Milly fixed reproachful eyes upon her excellent relation. "How far this would have gone toward your dead-lustre!" she said. "And how much have prices fallen since the day before yesterday?"

"Oh, nonsense about that dress!" said Aunt Sarah, with vehement independence. "I've had my day, and now the young folks must have theirs. And it isn't the sort of thing I want at all. You must see yourself, Milly, that if I were going to get a new dress an alpaca would be a great deal more suitable."

"I don't see it; but since the money is spent, and there is no help for it, we must do the best we can. A nice alpaca," she went on, launching into her plans with renewed interest, "fine quality, good lustre, gored skirt, with fluted trimming around the bottom. Yes, with that and your new bonnet and mantle, and such little fixings as we shall get up, you'll look pretty nicely after all."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"And, Carrie," said her aunt, "I don't see what is to hinder your accepting Nelly White's invitation. You can go there for a fortnight just as well as not; we'll hurry and make up your silk, and you can get off before long. It will be an act of charity to Amelia to set her at work."

So Caroline bought her lining, and Miss Sykes fitted it, and the girls were very busy. Milly sewed with her usual whole-hearted energy, awakening some remorseful feelings in Aunt Sarah's breast. "The dear child!" she thought. "There isn't a particle of selfishness about her. Just as pleased as if the dress was her own. I must see to that. I wonder what she would like best."

Mrs. Morgan read aloud from "House and Home Papers" one afternoon while the girls were sewing. The description of "John's" parlors charmed Milly greatly.

"How I wish we had some of those chromo-lithographs!" she said. "I mean to buy one the very next money that I have."

"Oh you'll want it for finery of some sort," observed Aunt Sarah.

"Not now," said Milly, with perfect innocence. "I have things pretty good for this season already, and I like pictures so much—pictures and busts. How I should like to see a Clytie! Emily Northrop says it's lovely; they had one at her Uncle John's."

Aunt Sarah had her cue, and a clandestine epistle was again dispatched to Cousin Helen.

It was Monday morning, dark and dismal, the sky just ready to pour down rain, the air chill and raw. Milly was dusting the blinds in her room when a heavy sound broke on her ear. "Cannon!" she thought. She listened earnestly. "There it is again—and bells!" Down stairs she flew.

"Mother! Carrie! Aunt Sarah! Do you hear that? There must be news! Lee must have surrendered!"

Every one came. Mrs. Morgan from the kitchen, where she was "scalding over" sweetmeats, Carrie from her sewing, Aunt Sarah from sorting feathers in the garret. All stood in the door-yard, regardless of the chill and damp.

"Only hear!" cried Milly. "How fast they fire! Oftener than once a minute, I should think. Isn't it splendid? A great deal better than they did for Richmond. Oh, I wonder what the news is!"

"There's Mrs. Holman at her door," said Caroline. "Perhaps she knows." Milly instantly ran across, but returned unenlightened. Mrs. Holman had heard nothing.

"How I wish we knew!" said Caroline. "Just listen to those bells! And see the flags going up. I'm sure it must be Lee; they wouldn't make such a time for any thing else. "There come the Grangers down to their gate. Maybe they can tell us."

"Wait a minute," interposed Aunt Sarah. "There's a gentleman stopping to speak to them. I dare say he has got the news."

There was a most excited confabulation at the Grangers' gate; but the eager watchers across the way caught only now and then a word. Then Helena Granger ran down the walk.

"Lee has surrendered!" she cried. "With all his army!"

"Oh how good!" said Milly. "Thank God!" ejaculated her mother, fervently. While Aunt Sarah leaned her head against the gate-post and fairly cried for joy.

"We shall have peace soon, I hope," said Caroline. "And our boys will be coming home again," said Mrs. Morgan. "All that are left to come," added Aunt Sarah, with sorrowful recollection. "Oh, if Charley had but lived to see this day!" And all eyes filled at thought of the brave young cousin, far in his unknown grave, deaf to these rejoicings.

"But what news it is!" said Milly, as the sense of it struck her afresh.

"You may well say that," was her aunt's emphatic comment. "You never heard such news in all your life before, and never will again if you live to be a hundred."

"The flag!" said Milly, breathlessly; "what are we thinking of?" Away she scampered, and in five minutes more the dear old colors waved over the group.

"And now," she said, "I must go down and get the papers. We never can wait till father comes home."

The half-mile walk was a triumphal progress, vocal with the peal of bells and the thunder of cannon. Almost every house hung out the Stars and Stripes in honor of the glad occasion; every one she met saluted her with joyful smiles. One old Irishwoman, an utter stranger, called out "Good news, honey!" and Milly felt like falling on her neck and kissing her. In the town all was tumultuous delight. Never had our young friend known such an experience. The raw April morning breathed balm, the odor of gunpowder was pleasant and refreshing, she seemed to tread on air.

"Here are the papers!" she said, flying in upon her expectant family. "It's all true; you'll see the letters. That magnificent Sheridan!"

"There must have been dreadful fighting, though, to bring it to this," said Aunt Sarah. "Our soldiers will be needing every thing. I sent a little to the Commission last week, but I believe I must spare something more. Just write a line to the Treasurer, Carrie, while I get my porte-monnaie."

No one could settle steadily at work that day; the news must be talked over, and projects of peace and reconstruction dwelt upon. But after a night's rest things fell into their usual order again, Carrie's preparations went on with vigor, and were almost completed, when a second Express package arrived.

"For Milly this time," said her father, while

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Aunt Sarah prudently made her escape from the room. When strings and papers were removed a beautiful chromo-lithograph made its appearance. Milly went in search of her aunt, whom she loaded with thanks and reproaches, both of which were received with entire stoicism.

"After what you said the other day I thought you would prefer it to a new dress," was her only comment.

"Indeed I do! I had a great deal rather have it than any thing."

"Well, then, if you've finished scolding, we'll go in and take a look at it."

The picture was held against the wall and arranged in the best light.

"Pretty, isn't it?" said Aunt Sarah, complacently. "I left it to Helen; I thought she'd know what to get, she's around among such things so much. How rich that foliage looks!"

"Beautiful!" said Milly. It's almost as handsome as a painting. But," she added, sorrowfully, "this cost as much as your alpaca, I'm afraid. That will have to follow your silk. You will have nothing left but your bonnet and mantle."

"Who cares?" said Aunt Sarah, defiantly. "There's some comfort in spending one's money for a pretty thing like that. I never did fancy these stone-colored alpacas; dull, plain-looking things; no beauty about them any way."

Milly bestowed admiring attention on her landscape, but her aunt appeared uneasy. "There wasn't any thing else in the package, was there?" she asked.

"Why, what should there be?" said Milly, with open eyes.

Aunt Sarah gave no very definite answer, and the girl, in her interest about the framing and hanging of her treasure, forgot to press the matter. But with the evening mail there came a box; a box small but mysteriously heavy; and this also was directed to Milly. She opened it with fingers that trembled with excitement; it seemed to this country maiden as if Aladdin's Lamp were at work in her behalf.

Clytie! She knew it in a minute! How exquisite!

"Oh, this is too much!" she said.

"And why? I should like to know. Did you suppose I was going to give Caroline so much more than you? That's not my way of doing business; I don't believe in partiality."

Clytie was placed on a bracket in the parlor, and Aunt Sarah regarded her with immense satisfaction. "I did not think a low forehead could look so well," she said. "I call that the best investment I've made yet."

"But your new mantle!" exclaimed Caroline, half-laughing. "I am afraid it has gone to keep your silk and your alpaca company."

"Mantle, indeed!" said Aunt Sarah. "I never thought of having such a thing. My striped lady's-cloth is plenty good enough, and I knew it all the time. I let Milly talk on and amuse herself, but I had my own plans just the same."

"And nothing is left of that charming outfit but your bonnet," exclaimed Milly. "Well, I must devote my whole strength to that. I'll rip it up to-night, and take it to Miss Dawson in the morning."

"Now, Milly, I don't want to hear a word about that bonnet. Perfect extravagance! Just as good and fresh as ever it was!"

"All out of fashion," insisted her niece.

"Who expects me to dress in the fashion? Such vanity may do for girls like you and Caroline, but at my age I hope I have more sense."

A sudden suspicion flashed on Milly's mind. "Aunt Sarah," said she, "how much is left of that seventy-five dollars?"

"There's some of it."

"I believe it is almost gone; that is the reason you are so contemptuous of fashion. Come, own the truth; you haven't more than eight or ten dollars." Aunt Sarah saw that her time had come, and she might as well confess. She handed out her porte-monnaie. It held five cents in postal currency. "You see Carrie's silk came rather high," she replied, to the astonished looks of her nieces—"and your things. And I didn't tell you that Nora Flynn was here last week; her husband is sick again, and they are in want of every thing, so, of course, I had to help a little. And then our soldiers! I suppose you'd have had me let them suffer in order to buy myself those fripperies. Girls, I'm ashamed of you!"

"All your outfit gone," moaned Milly.

"You forget my new calico."

"Rich! And the expenses of your journey!"

"Journey!" said Aunt Sarah, indignantly. "No one ever heard me talk about a journey. That was your mother's notion. People may go journeying that can't find any thing to do at home. For my part I always have plenty."

And that was the end of Aunt Sarah's Outfit.

NEW YORK TO WASHINGTON.

THE journey from the "head centre" of commercial intelligence to the fountain-head of political inspiration is by no means uneventful. This journey may be said to commence in a mud-puddle "lying and situate" at the foot of Courtland Street, North River. In crossing this Slough of Despond the chances are one to ten that the traveler will not only cover his boots with slime—a pleasant compagnon du voyage—but that he will be knocked down in the helter-skelter rush of drays, hacks, and horse-cars. If he succeeds, however, in accomplishing the crossing the chances are then reversed, being ten to one that his pocket will be picked in the crowd of loafers, idlers, baggage-smashers, and professed thieves which throngs the vicinity of the ticket-office. The ticket-office itself is in keeping with the surroundings. It might make an indifferent wood-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

shed; it does make a villainous place for decent men to try their patience in.

Having, after a struggle for one's life in the brazen-faced crowd, obtained the pasteboard voucher for his eight dollars and forty cents, the already disgusted traveler sees his trunk duly smashed into the van, and then makes for the ferry-boat which is to transport him to the Jersey side. He first enters the "gentlemen's cabin," which he finds crowded with people unable to find a seat, it being near the hour of 7 P.M., when the Jerseyites are returning from their occupation in New York to their homes. The atmosphere of the cabin is fetid and sickening—and why should it be otherwise? It is never ventilated. Beating a retreat, he enters the cabin on the opposite side appropriated for "ladies," but there the crowding of women with market-baskets and bundles, the squalling of children, and the warm odor of orange-peel and animal exhalation, drive him back again. In the pursuit of fresh air under difficulties he then tries the middle of the boat, where, jammed in between horses and wagons, which occupy the space between the cabins, he receives the full benefit of a sharp, cutting wind, which draws through this aperture, and which threatens him with congested lungs and a stiff neck for weeks to come. At last the agony is over; the ferry-boat approaches the slip on the Jersey side, and the compact mass, each individual of which desires to be the first to land before the boat is at its moorings, carries him bodily ashore.

Once in the dépôt, he surveys the train of cars destined for Washington, with a view to securing some degree of comfort during the long night before him. He finds but one comfortably-furnished car in the whole train. That car is the one "reserved for ladies," as the vigilant subordinate standing by the door, and holding the keys thereof, duly informs him. If the traveler understands the modus operandi, he will secure a seat in that car whether he has ladies with him or not; but if he is not up to this little arrangement he must seek quarters elsewhere. The "sleeping car" suggests itself to his mind, but is instantly abandoned, as he remembers how many sick people and invalids have occupied those closely-curtained berths, and how many of that description may occupy them that very night. He thinks, too, of the blankets which, night after night, does the same service to—he don't know who; and although it may be some slight consolation to him to remember that "distinguished M. C.'s" occasionally breathe beneath these comforters, and thrust their stockings, if not their boots, between those sheets, still, on the whole, he believes that he will not try the "sleeping car"—and so enters the vehicle intended for ordinary mortals.

All the inside seats—those permitting a resting-place for the head against the hard window-panels—are very probably occupied by the sharp ones who go early and look out for themselves. Our traveler sees at last what appears to be a vacant seat. On approaching he finds that it is occupied by the legs and boots of the man on the seat opposite. The individual alluded to declines to give it up, as he is keeping it, he says, "for a lady." If the traveler does not wish to be outwitted he will nevertheless insist upon taking that seat, agreeing to give it up "when the lady comes." As the lady is sure not to come he will be no further disturbed, unless his companion makes himself disagreeable by crowding his legs, opening a draft upon him from the window, or expectorating more freely around his immediate vicinity than may be agreeable. In the event, however (which is more than likely), of not finding a seat in the first car which he enters he proceeds to the next. This he finds so intolerably hot from the overcharged stove and hermetically-sealed ventilators that he is glad to escape to the next car. In that he finds the fire entirely gone out, the stove cold, and the passengers peevish and complaining under the prospect of eleven hours' railroading without a decent comfort within their reach. At last, after long search, the particular man intrusted with the stove-department is found, and he proceeds to rekindle the fire, muttering, in reply to inquiring passengers, that "'Tain't my fault if the fire does go out. I made it up all right, and that's all I've got to do about it." Finally, the breath of the passengers, which finds no escape by ventilation, and the rekindled stove thaw the chilly atmosphere of the comfortless car, and our traveler, doubled up in the straight-backed seat with a snoring soldier on his left, and a woman and crying baby in his rear, attempts to settle himself to his straitened accommodations, and tries to fall asleep.

Vain hope! No sooner have his eyes closed than a mysterious individual enters the car with book and pencil and announces that he is prepared to effect immediate insurance upon the lives of any one present. "25 cents for $5000 in case of death, or $25 per week's illness in the event of accident." These are the "terms" loudly vociferated by the Accidental Agent. A thrilling piece of information, and calculated to excite visions of peculiar personal interest in the minds of timid old women and nervous young ones. Our traveler thrusts his fingers in his pocket for a 25-cent stamp. "What's a quarter," thinks he, "for the chance of $5000?" Yet hold! One does not get the $5000 unless he is killed, and this consideration induces him to leave his currency where it is, and to reflect upon the matter before further expenditures. Of what use, whispers his better judgment, is a life-insurance ticket to a dead man, whose head, perhaps, lies crushed between two cars, and whose body lies over an embankment? "But, my dear Sir," says Benevolence, in the garb of the Accidental Agent, "think of your family. It is for their benefit." Our traveler doesn't see it in that light. Who, pray, is to draw out of that dead body's pocket a blood-soaked and nameless ticket for the benefit of that headless individual's family? Ninety-nine

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

chances to one hundred the ticket is never recovered—as the Insurance Company well knows—and in the event of the one hundredth case occurring, it is not likely that the office will pay $5000 to an irresponsible pickpocket. With this little bit of philosophy (whether sound or not) to settle his mind our traveler once more doubles up his legs and adjusts his countenance to the semblance of beatific repose.

Perhaps ten minutes elapse after the train is in motion when the door at the end of the car opens and shuts with a slam and a bang, and the "gentlemanly conductor" enters, bellowing "Tickets!" The half-asleep passenger is most fully awakened by the blaze of the bull's-eye lantern presented to his face, and which he vainly attempts to outface during the process of hunting up his pasteboard. Each individual in the car having been subjected to this illuminating process, the "gentlemanly conductor" (the phrase is used in no invidious sense, for he is a gentlemanly conductor) departs at the other end of the car with another slam and a bang behind him.

"Now at last I shall have peace," says the traveler, and again the doubling-up process and the tranquil expression of repose repeat themselves. The train has not, however, accomplished—well, say five miles—when, slam-bang again, and enters small boy with a big voice and a basket. The former ejaculates "STU-arts gum drops!"—the emphasis and strength being applied to the first syllable of the name of the manufacturer, melting away in gummy softness as the specification of the compound transpires. The emphatic youth repeats his stentorian announcement some four or five times as he passes through the car, and sells a few packages to such individuals as prefer to diversify the monotony of their journey by swallowing the sugary compound and exciting their stomachs to nausea. He disappears at last with another slam-bang, and the car in front sends back the echoes as the vociferating youth continues to cry, till lost in distance, "STU-art's gum drops!" Another five miles or so and enters stentorian voice No. Two. This time it is "HAM-sandwiches and Pea-nuts:" nice combination! pleasing and mellifluous association of ideas! A slam-bang announces his departure, and sleep once more

"Knits up the ragged sleeve of care."

Soon enters stentorian voice No. Three, announcing "Apples and hard-boiled eggs." Then No. Four, with "ivory ornaments." Next "maple sugar" and "mince-pies," and toward daylight more "ham-sandwiches and hard-boiled eggs."

Ah, welcome daylight and the approach to the Capital! The fire in the stove has long since gone out, leaving a chilly atmosphere, which is by this time strongly impregnated with the breath of forty sleepers, whose guttural intonations have made the night hideous. The conductor has slammed and banged the doors, presented his glaring lantern in each man's face, shaken half the passengers into a condition of semi-somnolence, and bellowed "Tickets!" till his very face is odious to behold. The tough ham-sandwiches, varied with leathery mince-pies, have imparted nightmare horrors to the Irishwoman on the back seat, and kept the baby crying half the night. The floor between the hard-backed seats is slippery with the expectorations of tobacco juice, and the prevailing sentiment in the mind of every decent traveler is that he has got his money's worth of discomfort, and that any change must be for the better.

When at last the train comes to a stand-still in the gloomy, cheerless dépôt at Washington, with what relief does he stretch his cramped up limbs, emerge from that ark of confined animal life, and gasp for fresh air on the cold, damp sidewalk! There he commits himself to the tender mercies of one of the two dozen omnibus or hack men, who present their whips in his face, and is dragged through the muddy or the dusty avenue (as the case may be) to his hotel. The hotel, of course, is full, and the one solitary employé at the office can only promise "to try" to have him a room "after breakfast."

But breakfast will not be served for two hours, and what is he to do meanwhile? There is but one thing to do, and that is to fling his exhausted frame into one of the greasy arm-chairs in the smoking-room and woo the chary Morpheus. The smoking-room is at that hour in a state of collapse. A negro in shirt-sleeves is swabbing up the floor and emptying the gorged spittoons. The fire is in embryo, and the room is cold. Placing his carpet-bag firmly between his feet and his umbrella at his side, the traveler succeeds in achieving a sort of melancholy insensibility, but wakes at last to find his bag safe and his umbrella non est inventus. An unsuccessful search for the latter alone rewards his industry, and he seeks the "wash-room," dreaming of soap and towels. The former is perceptible only in minute and unattractive particles, and the latter has no single sign left of its original purity. That being the case, he scorns to improve his outward man, and, taking a favorable position for observation, watches for half an hour the impenetrably closed door of the dining-room.

At last eight o'clock arrives and it opens. He is not slow to enter, or to avail himself of the assiduous attention of the particular "cullud pusson" who, expectant of a pecuniary benefice, presents the bill of fare. While the beef-steak, etc., is in preparation the room gradually fills with other appetizing guests, the study of whose peculiarities affords something like an amusing study to our worn-out traveler. Perhaps an inquisitive individual takes the chair next him, and plies him with questions as to the political condition of the country, and particularly as to who he is, and what brings him to Washington. Foiled in this respect, the inquisitive gentleman effects a change of base, and begins to be communicative on his own account. A rustle

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of silks is heard (silks at breakfast), and a heavily flounced and tremendously bejeweled lady settles herself opposite to him at table. The inquisitive guest whispers that she is Mrs. Nugget, the millionaire. Mrs. N. has nine enormous rings on her oleaginous right hand, and six on her left. Her hair is radiant with rats, waterfalls, and a chignon, and she helps herself from the dish with her own fork. That is Nugget next to her: a squat, red-faced man with a bland and vulgar countenance. He eats with his knife, and inserts one red stumpy finger in his coffee-cup as if it were a leech invited to share with him the curious compound. Our traveler stands the fire until it comes to the employment by Mr. Nugget of his fork as a toothpick, and then beats a retreat to the "smoking-room" once more.

That apartment now swarms with the nobler animal. Smoke and small-talk are rampant; the spittoons are now at flood-tide, and a significant phase of politics in Washington opens before his admiring gaze. Suddenly he runs against the very man he most wants to see—the Honorable Samuel Junker—the man who is to "put through" the great "Rhinoville and Ramdoun Junction Railroad Bill," which he has come on to the Capitol to "lobby." The Honorable Samuel Junker suggests a cocktail as a preliminary to all conversation, and as our traveler wishes to keep on the right side of his political sheet-anchor, and dares not refuse his extended hospitality, he accompanies him to the bar-room and takes his first, and Mr. Junker his third, "smile" for the day.

The politician is hand-in-glove with the hotel attachés, great and small; so a bedroom for the weary guest is at last obtained in the eighth story. The ascent to this dormitory reminds the pilgrim of the ascent of the Great Pyramid, only in this case a grinning negro instead of the conventional dragoman assists in the achievement. Finally, it is accomplished, and the worn-out victim of railroad abuse is ushered into a dormitory ten feet by twelve, and having an uninterrupted view of a dirty blank wall within an arm's-reach of its small and only window. The room is yet warm with the influence of the last lodger, who has just vacated, and evidences of whose toilet are visible on the bureau in the shape of a rejected paper-collar, once white, and an exhausted tooth-brush. But weariness banishes from his mind all other considerations, and our friend falls limpidly upon the shallow sagging bed (which has sagged beneath the weight of 365 prostrate bodies for the twelve months previous), and, burying his face in the consumptive pillow, dreams that the Capitol is an enormous frosted wedding-cake—fair without, but empty within—and that the bronze figure of "America" on the apex is suddenly changed into the living form of Mrs. Nugget, who amuses herself with pelting the in-going and out-coming Representatives with packages of "Gum Drops," "Ham-Sandwiches," and "Accidental Life Insurance Policies."

TWO ROPES.

PREFACE.

VERY many readers will recollect the story of Rhampsinitus, given in Herodotus.* As the undoubted original of "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves," this episode of the pompous Egyptian king and his dwindling treasury is remarkable enough, even if we eliminate the latter incidents as forgeries of a subsequent age; and many, whose innocence of Greek and indifference to literal translations might argue them ignorant of it, must yet have met a metrical version, of notable accuracy, by John South Phillips, republished in Burton's "Cyclopedia of Wit and Humor."

Sundry German critics (whom—never having read—I quote at second-hand) indeed state that more than one Greek legend are mere dentotypes of this earlier Egyptian one; and other similar fables—parallel or derivative—probably exist in Eastern literature; but as an embodiment of modern fact, the following story is new. Not to prolong this perhaps unnecessary preface, it may be well to state that its incidents were related within a few months by a respectable merchant of Santa Cruz del Sur, Cuba, whose grandmother resided in Puerto Principe, and had frequently heard them from the lips of their heroine. They were notorious through all the eastern districts of the island, and some even among my own readers may have experienced the widening thrills of indignant horror which radiated from this one tragic centre during the summer of 178–.

ROPE NUMBER ONE.

Some six leagues to the northeast of the city of Puerto Principe the little river Maximo breaks in cascades of singular beauty through the northern sierra of the island. This range, appropriately enough, separated the two districts of Nuevitas and Puerto Principe, and possesses, among its high-lying terraces and sharply corrugated spurs, a loveliness of climate which contrasts agreeably with the miasma of the central lagoons.

Hence many of the well-to-do Camagüeyanos had erected cottages among these peaks, won by their entrancing scenery, the prodigal fertility of the soil, and the cool mountain air. Close on the brink of the loveliest of the cascades of the Maximo stood one of the little estancias, owned by a brother and sister named Cuevas. They had a cleared space of some fifteen acres, running into a triangular indentation of the great ravine, where they lived a life of most assiduous laziness during the summer months.

A mule-path led along the crooked torrent, separated only from the generous fields by a tangled hedge of dwarf-palm and the "Spanish bayonet," overrun by thorny vines, and white with the huge bells of the Cuban convolvulus. At the lower or easterly end of the clearing a ceiba, six feet in diameter, raised its giant shaft,

* Euterpe, 121.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

limbless and twigless, full ninety feet into the air, carrying its foliage only upon two great gnarled and twisted branches, which stretched out horizontally. The thorny hedge, however, terminated twenty yards from the ceiba; and a wet spot in the path was for this distance shaded impenetrably by overarching clumps of the feathery bamboo—the loveliest of West Indian growths—though usually sheltering the Majá, or Cuban boa, in its tangled brake of fern and weed and bamboo-débris. Now the Majá has a choice animosity against poultry; and but for the devotion of Fernando Cuevas to cock-fighting and monté, he would probably have had this feature in the landscape removed, as being "unprofitably gay."

By consequence of these sporting tastes every thing looked neglected about his place—neglected even for those dozing latitudes, where Pulci might have found supremest models of his "sweet do-nothingness." The house was built of wattles plastered with clay; and the slender bamboo rafters were thatched with palm-leaves. The doors were closed by heavy shutters of mahogany, innocent of all sculpture or decoration beyond what the untutored edge of a hewing-axe had supplied; each fastened by a sturdy bar of lance-wood which swung loosely into a fork, purposely left, of one of the main uprights of the cabin, and which had neither guard nor pin to hold it in its place. Anita had over and often urged her brother to have some more effectual protection arranged; but with a reminder that the negro-quarters were close by, or a "to-morrow" which never came, he passed the subject by.

Given such a mansion, one may faintly imagine what these quarters were. I do not describe them, for they might beguile me, usque ad nauseam, into some philosophical disquisition upon Cuban slavery, which would never do.

One Sunday morning Fernando went to examine the condition of his famous game-cock "Conquistador." Two mules stood saddled by the door, although it wanted nearly three hours of dawn; for to-day the gallant fowl was to cope with a sturdy adversary, and the battle-field was three leagues away in the sequestered hamlet of Cercado. He had been tethered overnight in a "lean-to" shed formed simply by the prolongation of the house-rafters to the ground, and covered by the usual thatching of palm-leaves.

The iron-wood pin was there, but the clumsy cord led away with curious and suggestive tenseness under the rubbish at the foot of the rafters, and Conquistador was not to be seen, although Fernando threw the smoky light of his candle-wood torch into every nook and cranny.

"Tomas!" he cried, angrily, to a negro, who stood by the mules, "come here and hunt up this devil's imp of a Conquistador."

And Tomas came. No sooner did he see the rope than he looked at his master with eyes full of mysterious sagacity and averred, "Massa, de ole he-Majá done gobbled Cornquister, I reckon. Let we see whar de tring go to;" so he pulled attentively at the cord, and added, "Got him, Massa!" as a general commotion under the rubbish proved that his snakeship was indeed there.

"Where's your corn-knife?" shouted Fernando, who for an instant had been too astounded to speak.

"Right by de door, Massa; hurry, Sar! Maybe my arms pull out—maybe Cornquister pull out if you no quick!"

With that out came the head and neck and half the great gray body of the Majá, visibly bulged to twice its usual diameter; with the stout rope standing tense as iron from between his fetid jaws, which snapped and snapped like the rascally click of a new sewing-machine. The burning candle-wood stood stuck in the ground, and its lurid light made the struggle worthy of Erebus; and, roused by the row, all manner of mules and pigs and chickens joined in the chorus, till Anita herself came scuttling out of the house to learn the why and wherefore of this surpassing tumult.

"Cornquister's leg done pull off!" said Tomas in melancholy tones, as he capsized backward; but Fernando had found the machete, and before the Majá could execute a second astonished wriggle, down came the keen blade once, twice, thrice, and his poultry-fancying majesty was severed into four writhing pieces.

"There! take that, you thrice-accursed devil!" and Fernando went on with a volley of exuberant expletives such as only Cuba can produce. "Come, Tomas, we must ride over to Cercado, notwithstanding this infernal mishap. Anita" (half-angrily to his sister), "go to bed, child; and don't say 'I told you so!' every time you look at that cast clump of bamboos. I will be at home by seven this evening."

So some speculations of Tomas's regarding the edibility of Conquistador were interrupted; and off they started down the little house-path and up the main road past the foamy brook, which gleamed like living silver in the full moon.

Fernando's loss was greater than our ideas of the "tame, villatic fowl" can well realize, and he rode on with clenched teeth, only opening his lips once to silence his squire's characteristic but saucy remark upon the comparative wisdom of the sexes—Tomas being fully aware that his young mistress had again and again asked for the uprooting of the tangle in which the snake had lurked.

As they turned from the main ravine southwardly, up a mountain cross-path, they were full in the shadow of the setting moon; and the sudden change of light brought a strange feeling of shuddering misgiving to Fernando as a little spur shut out the voice of the leaping Maximo. The dell was shut in by great hills, wooded to their tops with ceiba and lance-wood, tamarind, and palm; and the white palm-shafts gleamed like ghosts among the undergrowth of cactus and agave, while their

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

clustered spikes, "barren as lances," yet wove themselves into an unrivaled grace. The cocuyos flung their green trails of phosphorescent light across the gloomiest recesses; and in one spot a flower of the giant cactus opened its superb and starry beauty above a patch of the "plate-cleaner" weed, with its curious russet-pods.

They might have been a mile from the house when a shriek of deadly agony pierced the air above the far-off murmur of falling water, above the creaking saddles of the unshod mules, above the low whisper of the Cuban pines.

"My God!" said Fernando, "what was that?"

But the drowsy song of the distant stream, and the swaying music of the slender pines, were all that stirred the voluptuous night; and after a few moments of indecision Fernando resumed his way up the hill. Past huge blocks of limestone, spotted with lichen and gray with moss—past groves of caimito and orange, mango and mamey—under caoba and fustic trees hung with vines which writhed in the fading light, and among which startled lizards rustled invisibly—the two, master and man, worked upward until the summit was reached. And here the unobstructed glories of a tropical heaven burst upon them. In the west the setting moon lay couched between two peaks, whose rough outlines stood sharp and clear against the marvelous blue of the sky. And the superb sisterhood of Orion and the Pleiades shone from the zenith; and away to the south, above the billowy hills, the glories of the Southern Cross were as refulgent as when its revolving stars called forth Vespucci's celebrated boast.

But their progress was again arrested, and more imperatively than before.

ROPE NUMBER TWO.

Except Serafina, Tomas's wife, Anita was alone in the house. Her sleep would have been immediate and profound, but something of the same dim misgiving which had haunted Fernando in the shadowy dell swept away every feeling of repose, and she woke Serafina for a somewhat one-sided chat about the battle with the Majá.

It was a strange picture! She was a Spanish blonde—that loveliest of God's creatures!—and while the upper part of her face was broad-fronted, brown-haired, and gray-eyed, with the forehead, hair, and eyes of supreme intellect, her full, sweet lips and rounded chin glowed with dormant passion. Her loose dress was gathered at the waist by a cord of purple silk, whose tassels hung nearly to the floor as she sat in the inevitable rocking-chair; and at her feet, on the tiles, was Serafina, ugly and sleepy, with whose black of ancestral Congo mixed no solitary drop of Peninsular blue.

But the picture changed as the sound of horses' feet swept up the road, past the great ceiba, splashed through the bamboo-covered swale, and stopped at the rude gate which led to the house, and through which the men had passed not ten minutes since.

Reeved through a sheave from one of the cross-beams was a primitive sort of rope used for carrying a hammock; and as Anita placed her eye at a crevice in the door the two ends swung in her face. Little knew she that death and life were twisted in this lace-bark thong—death to another, black and vile and despicable—but salvation from worse than death to her own pure self.

For as she looked three men stepped upon the porch, the door was softly pushed as far as the bar would allow, and a low colloquy began between them. A villainous trio they were; with blackened faces, out of which their bad eyes shone from under broad palm-leaf hats; each with a machete and pistols in his belt, and wearing tall cavalry boots splashed to the knee with the mud of many a mile. And so on one side the door was an innocent girl, to whom twenty summers had each brought its perfumed grace; and on the other muttered those ruffianly freebooters, eager for Fernando's gold, and gloating over the richer spoil of womanly purity which their fancy made already a prey to their polluting touch. For in those days, and that land of assassins, visitors so announced needed not to proclaim their errand by any clarion of herald. The stark bodies of so many patrolmen rotted in the byways of Eastern Cuba, torn by the remorseless bullet or cleft by the surer steel, as to render disguise a proof, per se, of murderous intention. Anita knew what these men were, and what their purpose, from the first glance, and she sank on her knees, her eye glazed and her lips contorted in very idiocy of terror.

"Are you sure Fernando Cuevas is not at home?" asked the taller of the three.

"Yes, I am," he was answered. "He was to be in Cercado by daylight, and is far down the southern slope of the sierra before this."

"And the negroes?"

"Sent for a week to an infernal old estancia five leagues away; all, at any rate, except Tomas and his ugly wife; and he, I hope and believe, is playing Panza to Fernando's high and well-born mightiness."

"How are we to get in, Emilio?" asked the third.

A vague recognition had gradually crept over Anita as she listened, and now, at the name Emilio—the name of a dissolute cousin of her own—she shuddered, and a gasp escaped her lips, stifled, yet evidently loud enough to startle the robbers, for the conversation sank to a whisper of which she could distinguish no syllable. Two minutes, which carried in their lapse ages of thought and hells of agony, ran by; when suddenly a pellet of mud dropped from beside the door-jamb, the point of an oiled saw-blade was entered between two of the withes, and silently but certainly the work was begun.

A perpendicular cut was made of the length of perhaps four inches, and another begun at

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

four inches from, and parallel with, the first. Piece by piece the sections of wattling dropped to the floor; little by little the opening enlarged as the moonlight faded away. Faded, it may be, never more to shine on thee, thou daughter of the sun! Nor ever shall it shine unless the Holy Virgin, to whom thou prayest, come with fast and all-prevailing succor! For fiends more merciless than wolves are on thy track, and eternity is very near!

Through all Anita's terror her mind had been clear and active: cleansed, it may be, by the euphrasy of that very terror; and she now saw that the object of the robbers was to insert a hand, and lift the bar from its securing fork. The entrance was to be silent that the robbery might be accomplished, and herself gagged, before any outcry should awake Tomas, who, by possibility of theirs, was sleeping near.

And now a brawny hand and arm were stretched upward by the side of the forked upright. Knowing that it could not be far from day, and how important every fraction of every minute was to her fast-failing chances of escape, Anita placed her hand to her forehead as if to beat back the madness which was clutching her, and, God of mercy! it struck the rope. Another second, and a noose was over the wrist of the burglar, and the brave girl was swaying with all her weight upon the other end of that merciful cord.

The noisy efforts of the fellow to free himself from this unexpected trap roused Serafina, who mechanically obeyed her mistress's choking call, and threw two hundred pounds additional into the scale of safety. Pull, devil, as you will, the sisterhood of angels, black though be its better half, is straining your hellish biceps till it cracks again. Pull, oh women! for to be strong is chastity, and weakness is pollution.

And pull all parties did—Emilio cursing at one end, and the women praying at the other. But feminine muscles are less enduring than feminine pluck, and Fernando would have overcome the enormous disadvantage of his position, had not Anita remembered a projection and "belayed" thereon just as he was succeeding.

In a very pretty dilemma is that most precious youth, Emilio, just now—a dilemma recalling the tiger in Bayley's "New Tale of a Tub." But worse was in store for him, for the sound of a patrolman's well-known horn came pealing down the valley, and silenced the fluent oaths of himself and his companions. After a moment's pause the taller said, with murderous pleasantry:

"Emilio, you have got us into a very lovely scrape — scrape absurd, scrape discreditable, scrape not productive of dollars. But if you think we are to be garroted for your foolishness, you do perilously miss it. We could release you—ay, and secure the dollars, in ten minutes; but in five, this cursed patrol would have us all in limbo—patrol numbers six sturdy Basques; so fighting is folly. We must go, and, going, must leave you in no condition to expose us. Do you understand?" And he drew a long, narrow knife; and the two attacked Emilio with merciless fury.

Diplomatically considered—that is, morals and humanity out of the question—this threatened life was of propriety forfeit. History records more than one wholesale instance of similar sort, which puzzle the casuist, perhaps from the appalling shape which human—or supra-devilish—ferocity can assume under the spur of self-preservation; and these two were neither sublime blockheads from a logical angle of vision, nor very notable philanthropists; besides, they knew Emilio to be both cowardly and treacherous.

Anita was, after all, a woman, and so I violate no probability in stating the actual fact that she changed her mind. Anxious as she had been to have the robber noosed, she was now doubly so to release him; for, as she tugged at the most unprecedented of knots, her agony of womanly pity and pardon compressed the sensations of her fifteen earliest years into Hasheesh-like instantaneity, and she thought only of the steep street of St. Jago where she and Emilio had romped from babyhood to adolescence. His later offenses were obliterated by the rememberable beauty of his youth, nor ever had the sistership of their mothers been beautified by love more tender than yearned from her toward this cousin in his foul death-grapple.

But the love was unavailing, and her struggles for his safety could not save; for, as the last tight turn unknotted, the stiletto drove with fatal force through flesh, and cartilage, and heart. And with the blood which—whether the "ichor" of the gods, or the "red, strong Burgundy" of feudal baron, or mere plebeian "blood"—is no way pleasant to lose by such phlebotomy, the miserable Emelio sent forth a cry so quaverless and clear that it clove the soft moonlight, and fell with scarcely blunted edge upon Fernando in the Cercado Pass. To her dying day Anita had it with her, a memory of incarnate terror—what wonder if even into the starry radiance of her heaven that mortal memory does sometimes enter now?

Quick upon the stab followed two cranching blows whose hideous atrocity was, for a little, veiled from the shivering girl; and two galloped down the road up which three had lately ridden; and a dead thing lay in its warm blood upon the porch.

Before three minutes passed the patrol came thundering to the door. There lay a headless body, from whose dislocated wrist the twisted lace-bark led through the wattled wall; and beyond Serafina's mumbling of stupid prayers no sound came from the interior, for Anita had fainted. The door was driven in. The sergeant of the patrol shook the negress, and asked twice for Fernando before she could answer that he had left, a little before, with Tomas for Cercado; and a subordinate was at once sent in search of him.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

WINDING UP.

It was the pounding gallop of this patrolman behind him which stopped Fernando at the head of the pass; and a vague story of rope and knife soon sent the cock-fighter and the fighter of the Señor Majá headlong to the house. No cock-fighting to-day for Fernando —add, no inclination therefor — as you may well suppose. For a no-way-to-be-distinguished corpse, decently veiled by a heavy blanket, and a sister in so frantic case as the resuscitated Anita, did suffice to indispose for everyday disportings.

Anita mentions not—save by a palo-post-futurity of twenty years—that The Bisected is (or was) Emilio: so Family Honor is safe. The diplomatic butchers never discovered themselves, nor were discovered; and if a skull, months afterward, was found revolving in a lower eddy of the innocent Maximo, with a crawfish in place of each original, though scanty, brain, what of it? Contemporaries said naught. We, from stand-point of this story, say said skull was more profitably peopled than ever before.

IN A STREET CAR.

I.

JIM MALLORY came swinging on a half-run round the corner of State Street to catch an up-town car. "A red car," his friend Saxon had told him; and there it went full speed out of sight just as he came in view of it. An east wind was blowing, as it generally is blowing in Boston, and Jim Mallory shivered, and sneezed, and drew up his coat-collar, while he anathematized the Hub of the Universe and her east winds, as a Gothamite was bound to do. Presently, what with the dust in his eyes and the well-known delightful regularity of that city, Jim got "turned round," as the country folk say, and for a few minutes couldn't tell for the life of him which was up town or which was down town.

"Confound the place!" he began, when all at once it seemed as if all the cars in the city suddenly appeared. There they were, red cars and green cars and blue cars, bearing down upon him in swift confusion. He hailed the first, and shouted where he wanted to go. The driver shook his head, and pointed backward in the most indefinite manner; and there were six cars behind him.

He hailed the second, and went through with the same humiliating experience. He hailed the third, he hailed the fourth, and all at once came to his senses at the fifth, and discovered they were every one going the wrong way, and he himself all out of the way on the wrong street. He breathed an exclamation more emphatic than polite, and dashed through to Tremont Street just in time to catch the car he was after. Jim was a handsome fellow ordinarily, but you never would have suspected it now. To begin with, he had a cold in his head; and for

> "A cold in the head
> What can be said,
> Uglier, stupider, more ill-bred?"

Being a blond man, too, made it worse, as every blond, be they man or woman, can testify; for flushed and swollen eyelids and excoriated nostrils show off to most dismal disadvantage beside a blond's "hair of yellow or beard of gold." And then the thin tissues, the light skin, which evinces every disarrangement! Well, besides a cold in the head, Jim Mallory was covered with dust from his head to his feet. Then, because of the cold in his head, he had drawn his coat-collar up around his ears, and, because of a general uncomfortable condition, he had drawn his shoulders nearly up to his ears. And then something had happened to his hat. I don't know what it was. He didn't know what it was, or he never would have sat there right in the face of those five girls, looking like such a Guy, without trying to remedy it. It was something between a crush and a twist, which, taken together with his general muffy appearance, gave him the aspect of a forlorn and seedy old fellow at odds with himself and with the world. This was a climax for a young man who led off the German in Avenuedom, and who was spoken of usually by all feminine Avenuedom as "so distingué!" And there sat those five girls without a suspicion of these facts in his history. Five girls as pretty as girls need to be, laughing and chattering like—like—well, like five girls. I don't think there is any comparison that will serve as well as that after all. There they sat, laughing and chattering, perfectly heedless of the forlorn and seedy old fellow doubled up in the opposite corner. Such things as he found out! For there was nobody else in the car but another forlorn and seedy old fellow at the end of the seat. And what heed did these girls think would be given to their chatter by these forlorn old fellows?

"How do you get your hair into such a lovely fluff?" inquired a brunette of a blonde.

"Why, I roll it up into curls, and then just pass a coarse comb through it. But yours is lovely too, I'm sure. How do you do yours?"

"Roll it on a heated slate-pencil."

"Oh, but that hurts the hair so. I put mine into crimping-pins," said another.

And still another: "I braid mine and press it."

And still another: "Common hair-pins, I think, are the best of all. But then one looks so like a fury in any pins."

Then the brunette gave a little giggle.

"Oh, girls, I put my hair into pins once—those great crimping-pins Lou uses. It was one morning when it rained, and I thought I was safe from visitors. I was going to the opera in the evening with Will Hess, and I wanted to look very nice, you know. Well, there I sat in the parlor, practicing my last singing-lesson, and never heard the bell nor a footstep until some one crossed the threshold. Who

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

do you suppose it was?" And the little dark head buried itself in a little Persian muff to smother another giggle.

"We can't guess. Who was it?" burst out the other four voices in the greatest excitement.

Up came the head from its temporary hiding, the pretty face all a-blush, the dark eyes all a-dazzle with laughter, the frizzed hair a little the worse for the Persian muff.

"Oh, girls! it was Will Hess with Langford —Langford just home from Paris, you know!"

"What did you do?" from the chorus of four.

"Oh, I didn't die, and I couldn't run away; for there they were, right before me: so I made the best of it, and laughed, for it was funny, and then I snatched our George's Scotch cap from the table where he had flung it that morning, and covered up my steel horns and my ugliness in a twinkling."

"Plucky, I declare!" muttered Jim Mallory, inside of his coat-collar.

"Will said I deserved a *Cap*taincy for my coolness and strategy. Will is always making his bad puns, you know," concluded the fair speaker.

And then the others took up the tale, and not one but had some gleeful misadventure to relate. And in this relating, what mysteries of rats and mice and waterfalls, of knots and coils and curls and crimps, were not revealed to Jim Mallory as he sat there unsuspected in his corner! It was as good—no, it was a great deal better than a play to him. But presently the car filled, and the heedless voices hushed, and the play was over. And presently appeared the conductor, and Jim began rummaging his pockets for scrip.

"What! No money! Where in thunder is my pocket-book?" he almost said aloud.

His pocket-book was gone, probably picked when he was frantically hailing those six cars. Yes, his pocket-book was gone. But he must have some loose scrip about him, certainly! and with all the blood in his veins rushing up into his face, Jim Mallory continued his search—a fruitless search, for not a penny, even, could he find.

Here was a pretty fix for a man to be in. A stranger, too; and just then Jim caught a sight of himself in a little pocket-mirror he had turned out with other effects in his searching, and discovered what a forlorn-looking object he was, and, consequently, how much more difficult and disagreeable was his position!

What upon earth was he going to do? What upon earth was he going to say? He had a quick brain, usually fertile in expedients, but the ignominious facts of the present case were too much for him. He had heretofore declared, with rather a grand manner, that a man should rule circumstances; and here were the most contemptible circumstances ruling him with a rod of iron. "If it wasn't for those five girls, now!" he thought. But he might as well have said: "If it wasn't for that conductor!" and a great deal better, for there he was, slowly but steadily making his way toward the lower end of the car, with a wary eye for all whom he caught napping or negligent. And there were those five girls with their tickets fluttering in prompt readiness! All at once at this juncture he became conscious of a pair of the softest, tenderest eyes he had ever seen fixed upon him with a look of shy commiseration. It was one of those five girls. It was the brunette, who curled her hair over a slate-pencil, and dramatized her deshabillé. So, she had been watching him. She had seen his empty pockets, and was moved to pity thereby, spite of his forlorn and seedy appearance. He felt the blood go tingling up into his face again, but before he had time to know whether he was glad or sorry there was a pull at the bell, the car stopped, and two or three people were getting in. And in the crowd and the confusion up started the little brunette, and nodding over her shoulder at her companions, made a hurried rush for the door. Jim Mallory, sitting there, saw once more those pitying brown eyes, and then, as her garments brushed past him, he felt a little ungloved hand thrusting something into his hand. His fingers closed over this "something" mechanically. For a moment he could see nothing in the hurry and confusion, but there was a near, faint scent of early violets, which suddenly vanished with a soft rustle of silk. He looked up then, and she was gone. He looked down—and there in his palm was—"Why, bless my soul, a car-ticket!" as Jim himself exclaims whenever he tells the story. And to follow Jim's words at this point, which will tell the story better than any body else's words: "There had that little angel, under the disguise of crimped hair and a lot of other nonsense, taken note of my misfortunes, and made her little plan of relief, which she carried out, like the strategist she was, at the very climax of my desperation, and when the stir and confusion about us would cover every movement. Wasn't it splendid, though? How many girls do you suppose would have done that for such a muff as I looked to be that day? For I tell you, Tom"—this was to Tom Saxon—"that I did look something awful. What with those confounded cotton-samples from your office sticking to me, and the dust, and the cold in my head, and a smash in my hat, I was about as seedy a specimen as you ever saw." And Tom thought he might have been.

But out of one dilemma Jim Mallory had stepped fairly into another. As that "little angel in crimped hair and a lot of other nonsense" stepped out of the car, after the performance of her impulsive action—which was really a very pretty action—something entered Jim's heart which he had no will nor wish to banish; but, as I say, it was out of one dilemma into another—"out of the frying-pan into the fire." Tom Saxon would laugh, for all the clew he had was a name that hundreds of girls in Boston owned. And the way he got this

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was at the moment of her vanishing, when the astonished four cried out in chorus:

"What's Molly getting off here for?"

In vain Tom had brought him face to face with some half a dozen Mollys of his own acquaintance. From each Jim Mallory had turned with a sigh of disappointment. Not one of them belonged to his angel in crimped hair.

II.

It was curious how often after this Jim found it necessary to visit Boston. There was always some "business for the firm," which made it absolutely incumbent upon him to see Saxon and Co. And when he was there he fell into the habit of sauntering down Tremont Street about shopping hours. And from there to Washington Street, and into Williams and Everett's, or Childs and Jencks's. And not only there, but into trimming stores, into jewelers' shops, into fancy-goods stalls, into cars and omnibuses, and every where where he caught the glimpse of a little figure with dark, crimped hair tucked under a morsel of lace and ribbon which ladies call a bonnet. He passed the winter in this hunt. It was worse than the search for scrip that lucky and unlucky day when he first met her; or, as Tom Saxon jeeringly said, it was like that ancient search for a needle in a hay-mow. Such a reputation as he got, too, for the most impudent starer decorous Boston ever saw!

"I think that New York friend of yours is horrid, Tom," said not less than six girls that winter to Tom Saxon.

"Horrid! how?" asked Tom.

"Why he follows you about and stares so!"

Tom looked at them. Every one had dark hair, and every one had it crimped.

"He came into a car where I was one day," said one of these girls, "and just took an inventory of my features; and then, after fidgeting about two or three minutes, he dashed out."

Tom gave such a laugh at this that the fair speaker looked at him in wonderment, and privately told an intimate friend of hers afterward that she had reason to think that that Mr. Mallory was having a very bad influence upon Tom Saxon, for she had seen him "when—well—when he seemed very unlike himself, to say the least!"

If Tom could have heard this I think he would have laughed still more. As it was, his laugh was all at Jim Mallory; and Jim himself, though quite in earnest in his Quixotic search, saw the joke as readily as Tom, and, with ineffable bonhomie, enjoyed his own absurdity.

As I say, he passed the winter in this hunt, and by spring the excitement seemed to have subsided, or, at least, to be externally overlaid by other things. Tom Saxon thought it had died out entirely until one day, as he was strolling across the Common, listening to some business suggestions of Mallory, he saw Jim give a sudden start as a little dark lady passed, with her hair crêpé and a gay voice, chatting volubly to her companion.

"Jim, I thought you had dropped that string."

Jim laughed, and sung, in a low baritone,

"Her bright smile haunts me still."

And that was the last that Tom heard of the subject until—well, we will not anticipate.

Winter passed, and spring had come; and with the spring, as every body knows, premonitions of cholera. All the Mallory family, mother and sisters, were in a state of worry and fuss from the first about this expected scourge. They had twenty plans in twenty days as to where they would go, and what they would do. Cape May, and Long Branch, and Newport went by the board, because somebody had told Mrs. Mallory that the sea-coast would be unsafe. Then came all the mountain resorts. This was too far, that was too near, another too full, etc., etc., until a queer little place, perched up among the Catskill Mountains, was decided upon.

"And it will be so nice for you, James dear, for you can get your mails twice a day," said Mrs. Mallory.

But "James dear" made no reply to this. He had other plans.

"I'm not going to sacrifice city comfort another summer for one of those mosquito haunts," he said to his partner. "And as for cholera—bah!"

And so it came about that, for the first time in six summers, Jim took up his head-quarters in the deserted house at home, and found it, as he declared, the coolest and most comfortable summer resort he had known for a long time. I don't mean to say that he took no excursions away from the brick and mortar and marble. There was scarcely a week but found him for a day or so at one or another of the pleasant spots about New York, which were easily accessible to him by night trains or steamers. In the mean time his mother and three sisters wrote him frantic letters from the Kauterskill. They offered him every inducement they could think of—plenty of room, pure air, a nice table, and "such pleasant society."

"The Caledons—most delightful people—are here," wrote Kate Mallory; "two charming daughters and a son. They live on our street at home, too; isn't it funny we came way up here to find each other out?" And here followed an urgent entreaty to brother James to come up by Saturday night without fail and get acquainted with these delightful people. But brother James had made a partial engagement to go home with Mr. Wing, his partner, on Saturday night, and he didn't "see that he could get away from it," he wrote back to Kate.

Before Saturday night, however, Jim Mallory found it the easiest thing in the world to get away from his partial engagement with Mr. Wing. It was Tuesday when he wrote to Kate. On Wednesday morning, as he was walking down the street on the shady side, he suddenly heard a strange, shrill voice call out: "Molly!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Molly! Molly!" He laughed a little at the remembrance this called up, and turned to look in the direction of the voice. There wasn't a soul to be seen within speaking distance. But still that voice went on: "Molly! Molly! Molly!" ending with a curious chuckle of laughter. He turned more quickly this time, and there, just above his head, discovered a gray parrot swinging in its great gilded cage. He laughed again, and the parrot took it up with his mocking chuckle, and with, it seemed to Jim, actually a knowing wink at him, repeated once more: "Molly! Molly! Molly."

Jim Mallory shrugged his shoulders, then thought of the little dark-eyed angel of his search, and was half a mind to lift his hat to her name, even when thus shrilly cried, when all at once something appeared at that window by which the parrot swung, which rooted his feet to the pavement. This "something" was a little dark, dark head, crimped and curled, and decorated with brilliant little bows, that fluttered in the morning breeze like the pennons of his hope. He had spent a whole winter hunting for her. He had haunted Boston streets, and Boston cars, and Boston shops, day in and day out, without result; and here at last he found her—here in New York, in the very heat of midsummer!

And there she stood, talking and chattering to her bird, looking more like a little angel than ever; and there below, looking up at her, stood Jim Mallory in a dazed and hopeless condition. It wasn't possible for any young woman to remain long unconscious of such a gaze as this—some attraction, magnetism, or whatever it may be, makes them "aware" at length. And so presently the owner of the frizzed hair and the fluttering bows ceased talking to her bird, and, with a little start, became conscious of the observation of Jim Mallory. And once observed by those bright eyes, no young man could have had the hardihood to have remained at his post.

But I must say Jim Mallory left his position gallantly—some might have said audaciously—but there is no audacity but of impertinence, and of this there was not a particle in Jim. Instead only the most reverent chivalry; and chivalry makes itself felt under any cloak. So now when James Mallory met those bright eyes, and turned away with his hat lifted to them, I say he did gallantly; and the young lady who was the object of this gallantry was intuitive enough to think so too.

You may be sure that as he went he was not so dazed but that he sent a keen glance toward the door which shut in his little dark-eyed lady. But there was only the number 2767—no betraying door-plate gave him further clew. This was enough, however, for the present. More than enough you would have said if you had watched him that morning. Wing, who was the sedate father of a family, catching the look in his eyes, asked him, with grim humor, if he had lately come into the possession of his Spanish estates.

Mallory laughed his genial, jovial laugh, and confessed that he had had direct news of them.

Fate, which had been so elusive with him for the last six months, now seemed to smile invitingly, for that very night as he paced slowly up the street, humming to himself "Her bright smile haunts me still," there from the doorway beamed the very smile he was singing of—but—but—who the deuce was that—that black-bearded, Italian-faced individual who sat so composedly on the second step? What if Jim saw his Spanish estates disappearing in a blue mist at this if.

The next moment the mist cleared.

"Mr. Langford, when do you return?" the lady asked of the black-bearded.

Jim never heard the answer. What did he care when he returned? he was only "Mr. Langford" to her.

The next sentence brought the blue mist back a little.

"Will says he should like to spend every winter in Paris."

Will? who was this Will? what relation did he bear, confound him, to the dark-eyed little party? Then he recalled the Will Hess of her gay misadventure. So here he was again. Suppose now this Will Hess had long ago taken possession of his Spanish castle? Suppose—but hark, what name is that? Can he believe his ears when Langford says: "Miss Caledon?" Miss Caledon? Kate's Miss Caledon? Yes, clearly, Kate's Miss Caledon, for presently she remarks about the Kauterskill, and something else, which explains her presence in New York for that week. Kate's Miss Caledon! Was there ever any thing like it?

"What an idiot I've been!" he soliloquized. "Rushing all over Boston, when if I had had my eyes open I dare say I might have met her a dozen times on Broadway. Visiting at the Hub with those four girls, I suppose, when I saw her."

Which conclusion of Jim's was the most accurate one he had arrived at for some time, as he ascertained when he called upon Molly Caledon the next morning. Yes, he actually called upon her, upon the strength of Kate's last letter.

To Molly Caledon this call seemed by no means hasty or singular, for after the manner of young women, she and Kate Mallory had become bosom friends in these last six weeks, and what so natural as "dear Kate's" brother calling upon her when she was in town? I think Kate herself would have been no little astonished if she could have listened to Jim's free reference to her letter; and I think she might have been doubtful whether she had ever written that letter. Certain it is that Miss Caledon received the impression by this sketchy reference of Jim's, that it was at Kate's information of her presence, and at her suggestion that he ventured to call. And as I have said before, what could seem more natural than this call? And what more natural than Mr. Mallory's returning with her to the Mountains?

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

And what more natural than that on this journey these two should progress very rapidly in their acquaintance with such a mutual foundation of intimacy and interest as "dear Kate?" As for "dear Kate," she had the wit and tact to keep her astonishment within proper bounds, but whenever she found Jim alone didn't he have to take it?

"I can't imagine how you can be contented to stay here, Jim?" she would say; "and I can't imagine how Mr. Wing can do without you so long."

But Jim could imagine, and so I think after a time could little Molly Caledon. And so I think after a time could every member of the house; and it wasn't very difficult to prophecy the dénouement either, in the estimation of these on-lookers. But to Jim it seemed much more difficult, for Molly Caledon was far too bright to carry her heart on her sleeve, and a spice of feminine coquetry helped her to play a game of hide and seek.

But there came a day when she had to give it up, and acknowledge herself found, if not caught. It was the day Will Hess and Langford came. "Now or never!" thought Jim Mallory, as he watched her greeting with the aforesaid gentlemen. "Now or never!" I think Molly must have had a suspicion of his design, for with a queer, coquettish perversity she put him off, first with croquet, and then with a very animated discussion with Langford, and so on, through a list of employments and occupations that continually necessitated a third party. But Jim was too sharp for her at last. The mail had just come in, and as he read his letter from Wing with this item at the close: "One of us will probably have to go to Paris next year;" a bit of strategy suddenly proposed itself to him, which he forthwith acted upon. Walking straight by the group wherein Miss Caledon stood talking animatedly with Langford he glanced up from his letter with the most absorbed air and inquired of the landlord when the next train left.

"Oh, are you going to New York, Mr. Mallory?" asked Molly, with great sang-froid. "And if you are, will you undertake a commission for me?" and Molly came forward from the group at this.

Then she saw his serious preoccupied business face.

"No bad news, Mr. Mallory?"

"Oh no, not in the least; only my partner writes that one of us must go to Paris; and I suppose that one will be your humble servant. How many commissions shall I execute for you there, Miss Caledon?" looking straight into the pretty face before him. There was a quiver of the eyelids—a quiver of the lips, and a sudden forgetfulness of the hide and seek game altogether; and Jim knew that he had won.

"Come into the garden, Molly," he said, in a lower tone. "I've something else to tell you."

They went into the garden, and so absorbing was the story that he had to tell that he forgot all about the "next train" until Molly, as she heard the shrill whistle of the locomotive, looked up slyly into his face and said: "How about the cars, Mr. Mallory? I think you've lost them!"

Jim laughed. "But I've found something better than the cars, Molly." And then he laughed still more. And then he told her that other story of the cars when he had first met and fell in love with her.

"And you don't mean to say that you were that old codger in the corner?" asked Molly in amaze.

"I do, Miss Molly."

"My! but didn't we girls go on?"

"I should think you did. I found out all your hair-dressing secrets—all about the crimping and frizzing, you know—and say, Molly, do you 'do' your curls now over a slate-pencil? and do you ever get caught in your hair-pins by such young gentlemen as Hess and Langford now?"

"My goodness did I go on like that?"

"Just like that; and I thought the story in the end of the Scotch cap was rather a plucky climax. And when I listened to it, and saw what a gay little bird of Paradise you were, I had no idea that such a tender heart lurked beneath."

Molly laughed a little and blushed a little as she said: "Well, I don't know how any one could have seen another in such a horrid dilemma without doing something to help them out of it. I remember, though, how scared I felt as I jumped up; for, you know, I had to get off there to hide the action, for I knew I should feel silly enough, and I knew it would be terribly embarrassing all round.

"Yes, and in that way I learned your Christian name; for all those four girls wondered what Molly was getting off there for."

"And that was why you stopped under my window, Sir, was it, when my bird called Molly?"

"Oh, you saw me at once, did you, Miss Molly?"

"I saw you lift your hat to me, Sir," answered Miss Caledon, rather confusedly.

"And, Molly, my girl!" returned Jim Mallory, now dropping his gay tone, "I shall lift my hat always to the angel in your nature I discovered that day in the street car."

MY LOST ALICE.

I KNOW not why I should be so sad when I think of Alice Glendenning. It is truly no meet cause for sadness, when one has fought a battle and gained the victory—when one has earned rest—when one has entered into life. Dare I affirm that I believe in the infinite joy of Heaven, and yet sit stranded on the shore of time, and weep, with vain human longing, for one who walks in that eternal day? I say these things over to myself, and try for a moment to believe I am glad that Alice is gone

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google home. But my faith is not quite strong enough. I shut my eyes, and seem to see again a pale, fair face with delicate, straight features, eyes full of soft light, dark drooping hair—such a face as Luini painted, in a dead century, as his conception of the Virgin Mother, "blessed among women"—that was Alice.

She was my one friend, and I loved her as those love who have few objects in life. I had acquaintances enough—people whom I liked, and who liked me; but to none of them had I ever opened my heart until Alice came. My nature was shy and reticent, and my life and my spirit continually contradicted each other. My life was quiet in the extreme. I was surrounded by men and women who lived in their day's work or their day's pleasure, with little thought beyond. I used sometimes to wonder what they would do if suddenly translated into a purely spiritual existence—their occupation would be so utterly gone. Such people made me shrink more and more into myself. I could not speak to them of themes which they would have found as barren of interest and as incomprehensible as an unknown tongue. But when Alice came she understood all from the first.

We grew to be dear to each other, very dear. I had no stronger tie than the one which bound me to her. She had a lover, to whom she had been betrothed for years. He was a man of business, living in a distant city, and she did not see or hear from him often enough to interrupt our friendship. She wrote to him one week, and he answered her letter the next, and four times a year he came to Glenwood. For the rest I could have Alice to myself.

I saw this Marcus Glendenning on his first visit to Alice, after I knew her. He was her second cousin, but as unlike her, except in name, as possible. He must have taken his mental and physical traits from the other side of his ancestry. I did not like him, though I tried to for Alice's sake. There was something in his face which repelled me. I do not know whether it was the self-indulgent lips, or the inscrutable black eyes, or both together. His eyes were not brown or hazel, but simply and unmistakably jet black. Like all such eyes which I have ever met they revealed nothing. Whatever emotion stirred him they glittered unchangeably. I do not like such eyes. There is something in their mystery which warns me of unseen breakers. From the first I had no faith in Mr. Marcus Glendenning; but I did not say so to Alice. One day I asked her if she really loved him.

"Would I be engaged to him if I did not?" she answered, with an indignant blush, and a quiver of her sensitive lips, which made me think of a grieved child. "I love him better than any thing else in this world."

Then I held my peace. After all, she knew him better than I did, and very likely judged him more justly. At any rate she loved him, and that, with a girl like Alice, was a fact with which no pressure of outside influences could do away. If she were ever cured of it it must be by some wrong-doing on his part; and I knew her well enough to pray that for her such an evil day might be far off.

When I had known her a year I began to wonder that he never urged her to make any arrangements for their marriage, especially as she was an orphan, and might naturally be supposed to desire a home of her own as soon as possible. I spoke of this to her one day, and she said that they had been engaged almost ever since they were children; and it had been always understood that they were not to marry until he had met with a certain degree of success in his business. She was so trustful that I believe nothing of that kind could have disquieted her; but I, loving her so truly, was far from satisfied with the devotion of this man to whom she had consecrated her life.

The second autumn after she came to Glenwood she received an invitation from an old school friend to pass the winter with her. The friend resided in the same city with Mr. Glendenning, and that fact, I knew, influenced Alice in her delighted acceptance of the invitation.

"Only think," she said, "to be near him one whole winter! I shall see more of him than I ever have since I was a child."

With the same mail by which she answered her friend's letter went one to her lover, acquainting him with her plans. She waited anxiously for his reply, but when it came it was easy to see that she was not altogether satisfied with it.

"I don't think Marcus is half pleased," she said to me. "He writes that he is glad, but he adds that he had hoped I would come there first as his wife. Poor fellow! I think it troubles him that he is not ready to be married at once. But I shall cheer him up when I get there."

Would she? I wondered; or would she find herself no longer mistress of his moods? A presentiment settled on my mind that I should never see again my cheery, bonny Alice as she was when she went away.

The time of her absence seemed very long. Neither of us liked letter-writing, so we heard from each other but seldom. In these rare letters she made, from the first, little mention of Marcus Glendenning, and after a short time none at all. This omission troubled me, and I began to long feverishly for her return. She was to come early in May. I went out that day, I remember, under a bright sky full of flitting, changeful clouds, and gathered the first blooms of the trailing arbutus. I always felt a curious kinship with the shy flower. Its pink-and-white prettiness soothed me this day like the face of a long-absent friend. I carried home all I could find, and arranged them in Alice's room, for she was to come to our house. She had to board somewhere, and it seemed natural she should be with me. Taking boarders was contrary to all rule and precedent with

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

my mother, but I had persuaded her to make an exception in Alice's case.

When I had pleased myself in the arrangement of her room I went over to the station and waited for the cars to come in. The moment she stepped upon the platform I knew that my presentiment was verified; that the bonny, happy, care-free Alice who went away had not come back—never would come again. She looked ten years older than the day I parted with her. She had been pale always, but there had been a life and brightness in her face which was gone now. There were dark circles round her eyes which told of wakeful nights, and the thin hand she gave me was feverish. She kissed me, not impulsively, as she would have done once, but with a long, slow kiss, full of tenderness.

I took her home almost in silence. When we went into her room, and she saw the flowers with which I had adorned it, the ghost of a smile flitted across her face, and she said:

"I wonder if any thing could change your love, Margaret? I know by these flowers you have been thinking of me all day."

"Not to-day only, but all the days since you left me. Is it so strange that I should love you?"

"It seems, sometimes, as if there were no such thing as real love in the world; for the love I trusted in the most has failed me. Don't ask me any questions, dear. I could not bear to answer them. I am not engaged to Marcus any longer. He has been weighed in the balances and found wanting." She stopped a moment, and then she repeated the last words in a low tone, unutterably sad—"Found wanting!"

I dared not try to comfort her. I could only put my arms round her and hold her fast, while I kissed her through my tears. But her own eyes were dry.

For three months after that life went on with us in dreary fashion. The most pitiful of all was, to see how hard Alice tried to be like her old self—with what vain endeavor she strove to interest herself in all the old themes we used to talk about together. How I longed to let her know that I understood the gentle hypocrisy, and was ready to weep with her; but I fancied the very effort she made might be doing her good, and I knew she was grateful to me for keeping silence. When the days came round on which her lover's letters would have been due, had they been corresponding as of old, I always noticed in her an increase of restlessness. Often on those days she would take long, solitary walks, and come back utterly exhausted from the conflict, but mistress of herself. I longed to have her talk to me, but she never mentioned Marcus Glendenning's name after that first night.

So May went by, and June, and July. August came on with sultry heats. There had been little rain through July, and the August skies were like brass over our heads. People hoarded water like gold. They brought it from a river four miles away for the cattle to drink, and the poor, dumb creatures, pasturing in parched fields, under pitiless suns, rushed after it with an eagerness in their eyes which seemed human. There was a good deal of illness, but nothing that came very near us. Alice was not sick, but she drooped under the fervid heats perceptibly.

At last one day my father came in and handed her a letter. It bore the familiar post-mark which she had welcomed so many times; but it was in a strange handwriting. For the first time Alice gave way. She shivered like one in an ague, as she put it into my hand:

"Read it for me, Margaret. I have not courage to break the seal. I thought I was done with that place. What can any one there want of me?"

"It is signed 'Jane B. Reynolds,'" I said, glancing first at the last line.

"Yes; Marcus has boarded with her for years. She knows me. Read."

It was only a few lines, to tell her that Mr. Glendenning lay very ill of typhoid fever. The fever was prevalent in the neighborhood, and had assumed in many cases a malignant type. Mr. Glendenning was out of his head—had been ever since he was taken, so she could not ask him for any directions, but she felt that it was her duty to let Miss Alice know, as the physicians said the chances for his recovery were doubtful.

"She does not know that any thing is changed between us," Alice said quietly, as I finished reading.

"Thank God, at any rate, that it is not now your duty to go."

"I am going."

"You, Alice?"

"Yes. I told you once that I loved him better than any thing else in the world; and should I not be less than woman to let one I had loved so well and so long die without me? He need not know I am there. I can come away when he begins to get better; but oh! I must go, for no one else will tend him as I should. Don't blame me, Margaret."

Blame! I should have blamed an angel as soon. I began collecting the things she would need, and packing them. If sometimes my tears fell on them I could not help it. I wanted to go with her, but she would not let me. She knew she was going into danger, and she was determined to go alone. What days those were through which I waited! I had made her promise to send for me at once if she felt the slightest symptom of illness; so while I did not hear I knew that she, at least, was safe.

The second week in September rain fell for two days. The wind changed, or rather an east wind arose, for all through the drouth there had not been breeze enough to wave a feather. The parched earth began to revive. The beasts held up their heads. Men met each other in the streets, and said, reverently, "Thank God!"

Three days afterward Alice came home. I

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google sat quite alone when she came in, swiftly and silently, and clasped me in her arms.

"You have saved him, I know," I said, for I read it somehow in her face.

"He is saved! I do not know how much I helped. I think but for the rain he must have died. The fresh wind that came with it seemed to bring him healing upon its wings. The doctor says he will do well now; and I could not stay any longer, he had begun to know me."

"And you, Alice, are you safe?"

"Safe, dear, yes; but oh! so tired. I shall be rested in the morning."

But when the morning came we knew what I had guessed before. The fever which she had been breathing so long at Marcus Glendenning's bedside had stolen into her own veins, and come home with her. The doctor we sent for said that it had been coming on for some time, and excitement had kept her up. Now the strain on every faculty was over the disease began to show itself, and she was in far more danger from the fact that she had so long resisted the attack.

I knew when I heard those words that she would die, just as well as I knew it when the end came. But God knows how I tended her—as lovingly, I think, as any mother ever nursed her sick child—as faithfully as she had tended the man for whom she was going to die. From the incoherent mutterings of her fever I learned more than she would ever have told me of her wrongs and her suffering. I understood, during those long, slow nights through which I watched her, how the iron had entered into her soul.

After three weeks of such watching there came a sunset when I sat with her hand in mine, and tried in vain to see her wasted face through the tears which came between it and my eyes. I knew it was all over. Before the sun should set again she would be where "they have no need of the sun by day or the moon by night." These were the last moments I could snatch from eternity. And the words I longed to say, the words I should wish I had said in many an after hour, would not come to my lips. I could only cling to her desperately, and weep those useless tears.

"Do not be sorry for me," she said, at last. "It is not sad to go beyond the toiling and the weeping."

"Not for you!" I cried, bitterly, moved beyond my own self-control. "He made your life so bitter first that you were glad to throw it away, and then you threw it away on him. God will judge him. He has taken away from me the light of my life."

"I pray, Margaret, that God will judge him in mercy; and so must you. He will suffer for it all some day; and then, oh, Margaret, do not reproach him, but comfort him!"

"And I—who will comfort me for the only friend I ever had to be heart of my heart?"

"God will, dear;" and when she had said that she lay silently, seeming to watch the sunset clouds. Oh, if I had known how near the end was! "God will," she breathed again through the silence; and then, I know not how, the light faded out of her eyes. She had not kissed me or said good-by, but she was gone with the fading sunset. It was as if from those clouds had stooped the unseen messengers to carry her away.

Two days after she was buried Marcus Glendenning came to me, the wan ghost of his former self. He greeted me with scant ceremony.

"My cousin Alice saved my life, and then went away before I could thank her. I come to you as her friend. Will you tell me where she is?"

I rose and asked him to follow me. Swiftly I led him, waiting for no questions, across the fields until we stopped beside a new-made grave in the shadow of a great rock.

"There she lies," I said. "Speak, and see if she will answer you."

May God forgive me if I was cruel! but I thought his heart was stone, and nothing less than this could soften it. I was not prepared for the cry of mortal agony which smote upon my ears as he knelt down and pressed his ashen lips to that grave.

"Dead! dead! and I can never in all time hear her say that she forgives me! Oh, if she had only left me to die!"

He seemed to have utterly forgotten my presence. I stood there, witness of his remorse and despair until I, even I who had so loved Alice, began to pity him. I remembered her words:

"He will suffer for it all some day, and then, oh, Margaret, do not reproach him, but comfort him!"

"She did forgive you," I said. "She used almost her last breath in trying to make me forgive you also. If she could speak to you from this grave she would bid you go in peace."

"I am worse than Cain," he groaned. "I have killed the one creature in this world who loved me. What devil possessed me to throw away the truest heart that ever beat?"

Then he got up, as if with a sudden recollection of his old gallantry toward women, which sat strangely enough upon him here at this grave.

"Grant me your pardon," he said; "I am intruding my feelings upon you. It is still so light perhaps you will not mind walking back alone across the fields? You have been kind, and I thank you; but I would wish to be here a little while by myself."

I looked back when I reached the corner of the church-yard. He had knelt again by the grave with his head bowed over it. The dew was falling fast on him—the chill autumn night coming down. I was half tempted to return and try to persuade him to go home with me; but I shrank from intruding upon him again, so I went on through the nightfall and left him alone with the dead.

Digitized by Google · Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

His night vigil did not kill him, for, though I have never seen him since I left him kneeling by that grave, I have read his name in many a list of stock-owners and moneyed men. I hear that he has never married. I have never learned the secret Alice guarded—never understood by what wrong to her he broke the cords which bound them; but if ever I saw a man overtaken by an unutterable horror of remorse and woe I believe he was that man. Did she know it, I wonder, and pity his unquiet soul—she, looking back from the rest into which she had entered? God knows.

COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE.

AWAY with all sentimentalism! We'll none of it. But as it is to be presumed that the morale of Courtship and Marriage, even in theory, is not familiar to the uninitiated, whether young or old, this paper, like the sermon of a celebrated divine of the last century, in treating of this subject, will "go at it, through it, and round about it." By some persons the married state is supposed to be the summum bonum of human life, while by others it is assailed with ridicule, therefore the old scandal:

"Marriage, as old men note, hath likened been Unto a public feast, or common rout—
Where those who are without would fain get in,
And those that are within would fain get out."

Or, as Punch has said:

"Which is of greater value—pr'ythee say—
The bride or bridegroom? Must the truth be told?
Alas! it must;—the bride is given away,
The bridegroom often regularly sold."

None will deny that all this may be true with large numbers, who marry in haste and repent at leisure—hence the disgracefully large number of divorces granted by our courts of law, proving that some other than divine power had joined them together. From the many, however, who have lauded the praises of matrimony, we may infer, as the old divines have it, that it is "a goodly and blessed estate." An old writer has thus compactly and sweetly compared marriage with celibacy: "Marriage hath in it less of beauty, but more of safety than the single life; it hath not more ease, but less danger; it is more merry and more sad; it is fuller of sorrows and fuller of joys; it lies under more burdens, but is supported by all the strengths of love and charity, and those burdens are delightful. Marriage is the mother of the world, and preserves kingdoms, and fills cities and churches, and heaven itself. Celibacy, like the fly in the heart of an apple, dwells in perpetual sweetness, but sits alone, and is confined and dies in singularity; but marriage, like the useful bee, builds a house, and gathers sweetness from every flower, and labors and unites into societies and republics, and sends out colonies, and feeds the world with delicacies, and obeys their ruler, and keeps order, and exercises many virtues, and promotes the interest of mankind, and is that state of good to which God hath designed the present constitution of the world."

Marriage, properly defined, is the union for life of men and women in a state of undivided and affectionate fellowship. The Bible alone records the origin of this domestic institution, gives to it a high and noble basis, and defends it from those notions which sap its strength and mar its beauty. Where that book is disbelieved or unknown, error on this matter is deplorably prevalent. But in such cases humanity is degraded. Thus it is that opponents to the sacredness of the marriage tie, as well as those who violate the sacredness of the principle involved, are generally the very dregs of the most debased cup of society. "It is not good," says the Record, "that man should be alone. I will make an help meet for him." "Two are better than one." If, then, the garden needed the beauty and the fragrance of this flower, how much more the desert! if the paradise required this fruit, how much more the wilderness!

It would appear as if the aborigines of this country adopted a peculiar and apparently an all-sufficient preliminary to marriage, thereby avoiding all the sweets and sours of courtship. For instance, an aged Indian, who for many years had spent much time among the white people, both in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, one day, in the year 1770, observed that the Indians had not only a much easier way of getting a wife than the whites, but also a more certain way of getting a good one. "For," said he, in broken English, "white man court—court—maybe one whole year—maybe two years, before he marry! Well—maybe then he get very good wife, but maybe not—maybe very cross! Well, now, suppose cross! Scold so soon as get awake in the morning! Scold all day! Scold until sleep! All one—he must keep him! White people have law forbidding throw away wife, he be ever so cross—must keep him always. Well, how does Indian do? Indian, when he see industrious squaw, he go to him, place his two forefingers close aside each other, make two like one; then look squaw in the face—see him smile—this is all one he say yes! So he take him home—no danger he be cross! No, no—squaw know too well what Indian do if he be cross! throw him away and take another! Squaw love to eat meat—no husband, no meat. Squaw do every thing to please husband, he do every thing to please squaw—live happy." This anecdote is not presented to recommend imitation, but to show how easily in old times an Indian could choose and discard a wife, yet only a little more easily than "white man" in the present day, thus contravening the law of God, unless it be for adultery.

Many, indeed, are the false steps taken before matrimony, arising from ignorance not only of physiological laws, but also of what is due to each other in the marriage relation. There is a false step somewhere when May and Decem-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ber are united. It is a false step for a man to marry, not his grandmother, but one nearly as old. It is a false step when the two extremes of society are united in wedded union. It is a false step for young people to be married "at sight," or even at all, without thoughtfulness. It is a false step for any to marry merely "for money" or position. And it is most certainly a false step to enter upon that condition without adequate means of support and a fair prospect for the future.

As it may be interesting to the reader to learn at what age it is considered best to marry, we will quote from Dr. Johnson, who, in his work on the "Economy of Health," says that matrimony should not be contracted before the first year of the fourth septennial on the part of the lady, nor before the last year of the same on the part of the gentleman; in other words, the female should be at least twenty-one years of age, and the male twenty-eight years. The Doctor further maintains that there should be a difference of several years between the sexes, at whatever period of life the connection is formed. There is a difference of seven years, not in the actual duration of life, in the two sexes, but in the stamina of the constitution, the symmetry of the form, and lineaments of the face. In respect to early marriages, so far as concerns the softer sex, for every year at which marriage is entered upon before the age of twenty-one, there will be on an average three years of premature decay, more or less apparent, of the corporeal fabric.

While, however, hasty and premature marriages may be properly condemned, it is wise to be prepared for "the accepted time," as that passed, the goal is the more difficult to be reached. Especially should bachelors be on the alert, as, running a race with a widower of the same age, the chances of success are against them. A table inserted in a paper of the "Assurance Magazine," exhibits results of rather a startling character. In the first two quinquennial periods, 20–25 and 25–30, the probability of a widower marrying in a year is nearly three times as great as that of a bachelor. At 30 it is nearly four times as great; from 30 to 45 it is nearly five times as great; and it increases until, at 60, the chance of a widower marrying in a year is eleven times as great as that of a bachelor. It is curious to remark, from this table, how confirmed either class becomes in its condition of life, how little likely, after a few years, is a bachelor to break through his habits and solitary condition; and, on the other hand, how readily in proportion does a husband contract a second marriage who has been deprived prematurely of his first partner. After the age of 30 the probability of a bachelor marrying in a year diminishes in a most rapid ratio. The probability at 35 is not much more than half that at 30, and nearly the same proportion exists between each quinquennial period afterward.

It may rightfully be supposed, especially in these days of fashionable extravagance among the "female persuasion," that bachelors who have arrived at a thoughtful and calculating age will well weigh the whole matter, and count the cost ere they suffer themselves to be entangled in the meshes of matrimony. It is thus, probably, that they soliloquize, after the manner of Shakspeare's Hamlet:

"To wed, or not to wed, that is the question:
Whether 'tis better all alone to suffer
The jokes and laughter of mischievous maidens,
Or to take a wife, despite a thousand troubles,
And, by thus wedding, end them? To ask—to wed—
Doubt o'er; and, with a wife, to say we end
The heart-ache, and the greatest natural want
That man is heir to—'tis a consummation
Devoutly to be wished. To ask—to wed—
To wed! perchance a vixen; ay, there's the rub;
For in that state of joy, what storms may come
When we have shuffled off this mortal coil,
Must make us pause. That's a result
That makes calamity of married life;
For who would bear the scoffs and jeers of men,
The maiden's scorn, the widow's cruelty,
The pangs of despised love, the day's delay,
The insolence of rivals, and the slights
The doubtful lover of a fair one takes,
When he himself might his quietus make
With the first asking? Who such burdens bear,
And groan, and sigh, under a single life;
But that the fear that something after marriage—
The dread connubial state, from whose bourne
No bachelor returns—puzzles our wills;
And makes us rather bear the ills we have,
Than fly to others that we know not of."

The first advance, however, having been made, now begins the great struggle of life, or, rather, the serious drama of courtship, the gradual progress of which has been humorously hit off by Punch: "From Smiles to the Station at Kisses is 500 sighs, from Kisses to Pop-the-Question is 1500 sighs, and from thence to the terminus at Pa's-Consent, is 2500 sighs, making a grand total of 4500 sighs. To arrive at Pa's-Consent, however, the engine of Love has to ascend a steep incline, the gradients of which are enormous—2 in 3—causing a vast number of sighs to be heavily drawn in reaching it. Some sentimental surveyors have therefore proposed to facilitate the communication between Pop-the-Question and Pa's-Consent (which may easily be done if they can raise sufficient capital), or, failing that, to form a loop-line to Ma's. The estimated saving is not far short of a thousand sighs."

Judging from the practice of nowadays, there is evidently a difference of opinion as to courting or popping the question taking precedence, while asking the consent of the parents or guardian has so far fallen into disuse by the loose habits of the age, as to be frequently left until all else has been decided, and when, in view of solemn promises exchanged, it may be too late to interfere. Whether our ancestors acted more wisely, the reader may decide. There was an old law in Massachusetts to regulate courtship, which we may imagine would require a stronger force than that of the constabulary to enforce at the present time:

"Oct. 27, 1617.—The General Court enact that if any young man attempt to address a young woman without the consent of her parents or the County Court, he

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google shall be fined £5 for the first offense, £10 for the second, and imprisonment for the third."

And under date Sept. 11, 1649, we find the following record of punishments: Matthew Stanley was tried for drawing the affections of John Tarbox's daughter, without the consent of her parents, £5; fees 2*s.* 6*d.*, and 6*s.* for three days' attendance by her parents. In the same month three married women were fined 5*s.* each for scolding!

From Hill's History of Mason, New Hampshire, we learn that in the olden time, with rejecting the power of the English clergy, our ancestors went farther, and would not allow their own clergy to celebrate marriages. Only the Governor, Deputy-Governor, and assistants, had authority for many years to celebrate marriages. These magistrates having exclusive power in that direction, construed that power to extend to all cases, and even presumed to marry themselves, for which some of them were fined. Having regulated the celebration of marriages, the Court next undertook to regulate courtship by law. The act for this purpose was passed by the General Court of Massachusetts Nov. 11, 1647. The preamble is as follows:

"Whereas, God hath committed ye care and power unto ye hands of parents, for ye disposing of their children in marriage, so yt it is against the rule to seek to draw away ye affections of yong maydens, under pretence of purpose of marriage, before their parents have given way or allowance in yt respect, and, whereas it is a common practice, in divers places, for yong men irregularly and disorderly to watch all advantages, for their evil purposes, to insinuate into ye affections of yong maydes, by coming to them in places and seasons, unknown to their parents, for such ends, whereby much evil hath grown amongst us to ye dishonor of God and damage to ye parties, for ye prevention thereof in time to come, it is ordered," etc., and making it a penal offense "to endeavor directly or indirectly to draw ye affections of any mayden in this jurisdiction, under pretense of marriage," before liberty and allowance therefor by the parents, etc., or in the absence of such, by the Court.

This paper would be justly considered very incomplete did it not refer somewhat to the history of courtship. Therefore, for the benefit of the tens of thousands who will read it, some interesting facts are here cited, one or more of which will doubtless be found to afford some invaluable hints. Mr. Helps, in his Spanish Conquest of America, gives the following account of the way in which the Nicaraguan damsels were wooed and won in early times. We think that some Yankee girls would make no objection to lovers of the same kind:

"A young Nicaraguan beauty would have many favored lovers; but after a time, bethinking her that it would be well to marry and settle, she would ask her father to give her a portion of land near to where he lived. When he had appointed what land she should have, she would call her lovers together, and tell them that she wished to marry, and to take one of them for her husband; that she did not possess a house, but that she desired that they would build her one off the land which her father had given her. The prudent damsel did not hesitate to enter into details as to the kind of a house she wished to have built, and would add that, if they loved her well, the house would be built by such a day, giving them a month or six weeks to complete it in. To one she would give the charge of furnishing the wood-work; to another to find the canes which were to form the walls; to another to provide the cordage; to another to gather the straw for the roof; to another to get deer and pigs for her; to another to procure the dried fish to stock the house; to another to collect maize. This work was usually put in hand with the utmost promptitude, nor was the least thing dispensed with that she had asked for. On the contrary, anxious to show their zeal to the lady of their affections, they sometimes brought double of what had been demanded. Their friends and relations aided them, for it was always thought a great honor to be the successful competitor, and that it would reflect honor upon his kindred."

We may easily imagine what efforts were made by the contending parties to promote their several suits—how her relatives were honored and flattered, how her companions were waylaid, and what tales were conveyed to her ears of the dangers and labors that were undertaken for her sake. The pomp of courtship could never have been brought so distinctly before the eyes of the world as in the pleasant province of Nicaragua.

At last the house was ready. The provisions and furniture were put in it, and the hearts of the overworked competitors beat rapidly as the fortunate or the fatal moment approached.

A solemn feast was held in the new house. When supper was concluded the damsel rose and made a short but gracious speech. She first thanked them all heartily for the labor they had undergone on her behalf. She then said she wished it was in her power to make so many women that she could provide a wife for each of her suitors. In times past they have seen what a loving mistress she has been to each of them; but now she was going to be married, and to belong to one alone—"And this is the one," she said; whereupon she took the chosen suitor by the hand, and retired from the apartment.

As to the bride, she was henceforth utterly cold to all her former lovers, and showed herself to be a true wife. The disappointed suitors, for the most part, bore their disappointment meekly; but sometimes it happened that on the morning after the marriage one or two of them were found hanging from a tree, and there the bodies remained, a ghastly spectacle of horror, to show the world how the fair Nicaraguan had been loved and lost.

Some who may not have had time or opportunity to make their desires known elsewhere, have availed themselves of church privileges. For instance, a young gentleman happened to sit at church in a pew adjoining one in which sat a young lady for whom he conceived a sudden and violent passion, and was desirous of entering into a courtship on the spot; but the place not favoring a formal declaration, the exigency of the case suggested the following plan: he politely handed his fair neighbor a Bible opened, with a pin stuck in the following text:

"And now I beseech thee, lady, not as though I

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another."

She returned it, pointing to the verse in Ruth:

"Then she fell on her face, and bowed herself to the ground, and said unto him, Why have I found grace in thine eyes, seeing I am a stranger?"

He returned the book, pointing to the following:

"Having many things to write unto you, I would not with paper and ink: but I trust to come unto you, and speak face to face, that our joy may be full."

A marriage soon after resulted from this Biblical interview.

Several years ago the writer was cognizant of a singular case of courtship by proxy. A Presbyterian clergyman, residing in one of the British Provinces, had lived to the age of 48 without having even apparently "contemplated marriage," much to the disgust of various spinsters of his congregation. He was at length advised by some of his Sessions to enter into "the holy bonds." One and another of the female portion of his flock was mentioned as being eligible to become the wife of the dominie, until he declared that he had no choice, and was willing to submit the whole affair to his brethren, with power to make all necessary arrangements. They therefore waited upon a lady, "stated the case," received her consent, made the arrangements, and in the course of a few days "the twain were made one flesh." But, strange to say, from the time above-mentioned until the morning of the wedding the parties did not meet.

Courting by proxy, however, is not always so fortunate, for other men than the hard-headed Puritan, Miles Standish, have made the same blunder he perpetrated in sending John Alden to do his courtship with the pretty Priscilla.

As to different modes of popping the question there are many floating anecdotes, two or three of which, at least, are worth repeating, to "point a moral and adorn a tale." Of the eccentric class may be noted the case of a prominent merchant, who one day dining at a friend's house, sat next to a lady possessed of rare charms of conversation. The merchant did not possess this faculty in a very rare degree, but he could do that which is next best—he could appreciate—an appreciation which he endeavored to show by the following mode of action:

"Do you like toast, Miss B——?"

"Yes," replied the lady, slightly surprised at the question.

"Buttered toast?"

"Yes."

"That is strange; so do I. Let us get married."

There can not be much doubt that the lady was taken aback—a fact, however, that did not prevent the marriage from coming off in a month afterward.

The following is peculiar:

In the year 1855 the newspapers of New York gave an amusing account of courtship by telegraph. At the beginning of that year a young gentleman of Albany entered the Morse telegraph office, and requested to be instructed in such of the mysteries of telegraphing as the operators could or would inform him—such as would not interfere with the secrets of the office. The obliging operator proceeded to do so, and in the course of his instructions explained to the freshman the modus operandi of writing. It should be known that at one of the stations west of the city, in quite a small but enterprising village, a female—the schoolmistress of the village—was the operator at the telegraph station. While the operator in the city was going through his explanations the —— office called "Albany," and made a business inquiry, to which an answer was returned by the Albany operator, who, in a professional manner, asked the name of the anxious inquirer, and sent it, with the gentleman's compliments, to the —— office, which the female had charge of. Miss C——, the operator, replied. The gentleman was greatly delighted with the idea of interrogating a person one hundred and fifty miles distant, and, through the kindness of the operator, addressed several interrogatories to her, all of which were answered satisfactorily. The novice in telegraphing called again on the following day, and enjoyed a most delightful tête-à-tête with his charming inamorata, although so far removed. This continued for several days, the conversation progressing until at last the amateur operator inquired, "Will you marry me?" to which the lady graciously replied in the affirmative.

Another case was that of a gentleman who had retired from business at the age of forty, and built him a beautiful house, determined to enjoy life to the utmost. One day a friend was dining with him, and said, half jokingly:

"You have every thing here that the heart can desire but a wife."

"That's true. I must think of it," said he; and then relapsed into silence for a few minutes, at the end of which time he rose, begged to be excused for a short time, and left the room.

He seized his hat and went hastily to a neighbor's, and was shown into the parlor, with the information that neither the master nor the mistress was at home. He told the servant that he did not want either, and requested that the housekeeper be sent to him. She came, and the gentleman thus addressed her:

"Sarah, I have known you for many years, and have just been told that I want a wife. You are the only woman I know that I should be willing to intrust my happiness with, and, if you agree, we will be instantly married. What is your answer?"

Sarah knew the man that addressed her, and knew that his offer was serious, and as well weighed as though considered for a year, and she answered him in the same spirit:

"I agree."

"Will you be ready in an hour?"

"I will."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"I shall return for you at that time."

Which thing he did, the gentleman who had suggested the idea accompanying them to the clergyman's.

These eccentric courtships are not always successful, as witness the case of Amaziah Brown, a worthy Friend in New York. One afternoon it was impressed on his mind that Lydia Jones, a Philadelphia Friend, was to be his wife. Taking the evening train he reached the city of Brotherly Love at midnight. The fair Lydia had retired, but arose at the earnest request of Amaziah, and descending to the parlor was accosted with:

"Friend Lydia, the Lord hath revealed to me that thou art to be my wife."

"The Lord hath not said any thing to me about it," was the curt reply of the lady as she left the room.

Amaziah took the morning train for New York, and we believe that Lydia has not as yet received any spiritual communications corresponding to those vouchsafed to the party of the other part.

De Quincey, in his "Selections, Grave and Gay," caps the climax by referring to a misadventure to a German whose English education had been greatly neglected. Having obtained an interview with an English lady, who, having recently lost her husband, must (as he in his unwashed German condition took for granted) be open to new offers, he opened his business thus:

"High-born madam, since your husband have kicked de bucket—"

"Sir!" interrupted the lady, astonished and displeased.

"Oh, pardon—nine, ten tousand pardon! Now I make new beginning—quite oder beginning. Madam, since your husband has cut his stick—"

It may be supposed that this did not mend matters, and, reading so much in the lady's countenance, the German drew out an octavo dictionary, and said, perspiring with shame at having a second time missed fire:

"Madam, since your husband have gone to kingdom come—"

This he said beseechingly; but the lady was past propitiation by this time, and rapidly moved toward the door. Things had now reached a crisis, and if something were not done quickly the game was up. Now, therefore, taking a last hurried look at his dictionary, the German flew after the lady, crying out in a voice of despair:

"Madam, since your husband—your never-enoff-to-be-worshiped husband—have hopped de twig—"

This was his sheet-anchor; and, as this also came home, of course the poor man was totally wrecked. It turned out that the dictionary he had used—a work of one hundred and fifty years back, and, from mere German ignorance, giving slang translations from Tom Brown, L'Estrange, and other jocular writers—had put down the verb sterben ("to die") with the following worshipful series of equivalents:

"1. To kick the bucket; 2. To cut one's stick; 3. To go to kingdom come; 4. To hop the twig; 5. To drop off the perch into Davy's locker."

It will not be denied (certainly not by the fair reader) that the foregoing facts are both edifying and instructive. It will be seen that in neither case was much time lost. Each man came up to the mark in due time; and while there was little that was romantic, excepting in the telegraph offices, there was probably the more sincerity. Neither time nor place can be prescribed for performing the first act of the drama of "Matrimony." Nor can the precise mode in which to act be determined for any individual by a set rule. The man must carve his own fortune. The woman may read very learned works with such titles as "Matrimony made Easy," and "How to Catch and Cook a Husband," but will find after all that such treatises are almost worthless, and that she must be guided by circumstances. It may be considered as the raving of an "old fogy;" but still let it be said that, if months and even years are spent in an interchange of sober thought, that each party may thoroughly learn the character of the other, that the love and fidelity of each may be tested, and that they may become morally assimilated—a marriage contracted in such a case would be more happy than if they had wedded in the mist. Billing and cooing, conversing almost interminably about themselves, building castles in the air, or speculating only on love in a cottage, may satisfy unfledged bantlings not yet loosed from their mothers' apron-strings; but it is a sorry thing for the community when such become parents of the next generation. The sorriest sight in society is to see children "bringing up" children.

The pages of history unfold much that is deeply interesting regarding marriages by the Anglo-Saxons of the olden time. In Merryweather's "Lights and Shadows" may be found much that is really valuable. From him we gather a general view of the Anglo-Saxon laws on this subject. By them, it would appear, every woman was under the care of some man, who was termed her mundbora, or guardian; and no one could marry her without having paid a sum of money as a compensation to him. The father was the guardian of his unmarried daughters; the brother, if the father died; and the next to him the nearest male relative. If, however, the female was friendless and alone, she found in the king her legal guardian. The maid was estimated according to her rank in life. The first step in courtship, therefore, was to buy the consent of the mundbora; the lover was then admitted into the society of his mistress, and allowed to claim her in due course as his wife. If, however, her personal charms or her disposition proved, on better acquaintance, unsatisfactory to her suitor, and he failed to complete the bargain, he immediately became amenable to the law. If a man ventured

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

to marry without first having bought and paid for his wife, he was guilty of the crime of mund-breach; the consequences of which were both vexatious and disastrous. The husband in such a case possessed no legal authority over his wife; he was a husband, in fact, without a wife; he had no right to her property. By the same law a maiden and a widow were of separate value; the latter could be purchased for one half the sum which the guardian of a maid was entitled to demand; the man, therefore, who could not afford to purchase a maid might perhaps be able to purchase a widow.

Thrubb, in his "Anglo-Saxon House," gives a full account of a wedding in those days. Not till the ninth or tenth century did women obtain the privilege of choosing or refusing their husbands. Often they were betrothed when children, the bridegroom's pledge of marriage being accompanied by a security, or "wed," whence comes the word. Part of the wedding always consisted of a ring placed on the maiden's right hand, and there religiously kept until transferred to the other hand at the later nuptials. Then, also, were repeated the marriage vows and other ceremonies, out of which those now prevailing have grown. The bride was taken "for fairer or fouler, for better or worse, for richer or poorer," and promised to be "buxom and bonny" to her future husband. At the final ceremony the bridegroom put the ring on each of the bride's left hand fingers in turn, saying at the first, "in the name of the Father;" at the second, "in the name of the Son;" at the third, "in the name of the Holy Ghost;" and at the fourth, "Amen." Then also the father gave to his new son one of his daughter's shoes, in token of the transfer of authority which he effected, and the bride was at once made to feel the change by a tap or a blow on the head given with the shoe. The husband on his part took an oath to use his wife well. If he failed to do so, she might leave him, but by the law he was allowed considerable license. He was bound in honor "to bestow on his wife and apprentices moderate castigation." An old Welsh law decides that three blows with a broom-stick on "any part of the person except the head" is a fair allowance, and another provides that the stick be no longer than the husband's arm, nor thicker than his middle finger. Prior to the seventh century a wife might at any time be repudiated on proof of her being either barren, deformed, silly, passionate, luxurious, rude, habitually drunk, gluttonous, very garrulous, quarrelsome, or abusive.

At a later period, in the reign of Queen Mary of Scotland, the Parliament passed an act that any maiden lady, of high or low degree, should have the liberty to choose for a husband the man on whom she set her fancy. If a man refused to marry her, he was heavily fined, according to the value of his worldly possessions. The only ground of exemption was previous betrothal.

On the other hand, it is sometimes the case in these days, and especially in what is called "the religious world," that a third party interferes to prevent the would-be husband from making his own choice.

Without further referring to the mere fact of marriage it may be pleasing to refer to some facts of antiquity regarding the use of the wedding-ring. Great labor has been expended to ascertain on which finger the ring should be placed, although the question might appear to have been decided by the ancient Anglo-Saxon law, already quoted. The Jews have a tradition that Mary, when she espoused Joseph, received the ring on her middle finger—hence no Jewish woman wears her bridal ring there, but always on the forefinger. St. Ambrose, in one of his sermons, calls the third finger the finger for the ring. The ancient Greeks used this finger, also, because they believed a nerve to run directly from this finger to the heart—a notion which exists even in the present day. However all this may be, by many the use of the ring as a part of the marriage ceremony has been superstitiously regarded. And in default of the ring marriages in English churches have been actually solemnized with the church key and other substitutes; upon which thread hangs many an amusing story. Even leather has been used as a substitute, as we are reminded by the following anecdote:

There was a stolen match. The young lady's mother, a widow, had made objections to the party proposing, and, so far as possible, kept her daughter at home, to be under strict surveillance. One fine morning, however, it happened that she wanted to buy a pair of shoes; so, for greater security, she took her daughter out with her to the shoemaker's. Seizing the auspicious moment when mamma, seated in the shoemaker's back parlor, had "one shoe off and one shoe on," the younger lady slipped out of the shop and slipped into the church. There, by the oddest coincidence, she found her accepted, just as if he had been waiting for her; and, strange to say, he had got the license in his pocket! Nay, to crown all, the clergyman was there in full canonicals, and also the clerk! In short, all things seemed propitious for prompt solemnization. But alas! there was a hitch; the bridegroom had forgotten the ring! He, however, not choosing to be beat, and probably not initiated as to the availability of the church key, whipped off his glove, whipped out his pocket-knife, and with two cuts extemporized a ring of leather, with which the marriage was performed.

The ring, however, even in England, is no longer an essential part of the marriage ceremony, the act of Parliament, passed in 1837, having instituted marriage to be a civil contract; though it does not forbid the use of the ring, which holds its accustomed place to distinguish the maiden from the wife.

There are those who, it would appear, never tire of the good things of this life, but continue to use them to the very last, even in spite

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of decency. The following extract from the Public Advertiser of July 17, 1792, if true, records the case of a most determined pursuer of wedded bliss:

"On Thursday se'nnight (July 5) was married at Billingborough, after a courtship of one hour and fifteen minutes, Mr. Nicholas Wilson, Five-willow-walk, in the parish of Helkinson, to Mrs. Pepper, of the parish of Billingborough—this being his eighth wife and he her third husband. The number of relations that celebrated this wedding amounted to eighty-three, who, together with the bride and bridegroom, paraded the streets with colors flying."

Many similar instances might be quoted. But, of all we have read, that of John of Leyden is the most notable. He, it is said, married seventeen wives, and would, in all probability, have increased the number of his nuptial conquests, had not his matrimonial career been cut short by the summons which dissolves all human contracts. Disgraceful as is such a case, it is somewhat to be wished that he had left behind him his written experiences of married life.

We take but one step beyond marriage, and cite the following humorous but carefully prepared diagnosis of the brief era poetically styled "the honey-moon," scarcely daring to assert its probable accuracy:

"Second day. Speechless ecstasy—bliss impossible to be expressed.—Fifth day. Bliss in the ascendant—appetite begins to 'look up.'—Ninth day. Lady eats her dinner without being kissed between every mouthful.—Twelfth day. 'Oh, you naughty, naughty boy!' not said quite so frequently.—Fifteenth day. Gentleman fancies a walk solus—comes home and discovers his charmer in tears.—Sixteenth day. Gentleman and lady have returned to the world of sighs and gentle chidings, and promises 'never to go alone in future.' Are invisible all day.—Eighteenth day. Lady is presented with magnificent breast-pin; gentleman consults her about the details of their domestic arrangements.—Twenty-first day. Gentleman and lady fancy a 'little change,' and go to church.—Twenty-fifth day. Lady begins to 'pack up,' preparatory to returning from her wedding-tour; gentleman assists her, and only kisses her once during the operation.—Twenty-eighth day. On the journey; gentleman keeps his 'lady-bird' very snug.—Twenty-ninth day. Commit the dreadful faux-pas of falling asleep in each other's company.—Thirtieth day. Arrive at home; greeted by mother-in-law; hugs her 'dear son,' and vanishes aloft with her daughter; husband dancing attendance in sitting-room for two hours; already feels savage because dinner is getting cold, and spirit begins to rebel against ma for keeping Amelia. Amelia presently descends, looking very charming; husband brightens up, dinner put on the table; mother-in-law drinks wine, and is affected to tears. Amelia consoles her 'ma;' evening wears on; mother-in-law leaves; Augustus returns inward thanks and goes to bed, determined to be at the store very early in the morning and wake up the clerks."

Although most ladies are well aware of the great privilege which they may enjoy during bissextile, or leap-year, it is not to be presumed that they are all equally conversant with the fact that their pre-matrimonial right was originally secured to them by a statute law of England, enacted in 1606, which readeth thus:

"Albeit, it is now become a part of the common Laws, in regarde to the social relaytions of life, that so often as everie besextile year doeth returne, the ladyes have the sole privileges, during the time continueth, of making love unto the men, which they may doe, either by words or looks, as unto them seemeth proper, moreover, no man will be entitled to the benefit of clergy who dothe refuse to accept the offers of a ladye, or who dothe in any wise treat her proposals with slight and contumely."

A Scotch statute of 1228, however, preceded the above, and will appear to be even more stringent:

"It is statut and ordaint that during the year of her maist blissit Majestie, ilk fourth year known as leap-year, ilk maiden layd of both high and low estait, shall hae liberty to bespeak ye man she likes; albit, if he refuses to tak her to be his wif, he shall be mulcted in the sum of one poundis (£1) or less as his estait may be, except and awis if he can mak it appear that he is betrothed to ane woman, that he shall then be free."

As a counterpart to these laws, and worse for the bachelors, was the taxation of Englishmen who avoided marriage, either from choice or necessity. The idea of such taxation, for the sin of celibacy, is generally considered a good joke, and when proposed, it fails to attract any serious attention. But England, at the close of her revolution in 1689, resorted to this species of tax, and not without advantage to the revenue. In Sir John Sinclair's "History of the Public Revenue of the British Empire," we find that in the time of William III. taxes were imposed on marriages, burials, births, bachelors, and widowers. Tables of the rates imposed on different classes are given, showing that a duke, for the privilege of remaining unmarried was required to pay an annual tax of £12 11*s.*; a marquis paid £10 1*s.*; an earl, £7 11*s.*; a viscount, £6 6*s.*; a baron, £5 1*s.*; a baronet and knight of the Bath, £3 16*s.*; a knight bachelor, £2 11*s.*; the king's sergeant-at-law, £5 1*s.*; other sergeants-at-law, £3 16*s.*; esquires, £1 6*s.*; gentlemen, 6*s.*; doctors of divinity, law, and physic, £1 6*s.*; persons of £250 per annum, or £600 personal estate, 6*s.*; persons not otherwise charged, 2*s.* The aggregate revenue derived from this source was an average of £51,618 per annum, which was an important item at a time when the revenue of the kingdom was only about five and a half millions per annum.

As a conclusion to this article, it might be fitting to give a page of advice. But why give it merely to be disregarded? Men, and women too, will generally pursue their own course in this matter: they will seldom brook what appears to them an impertinent interference. Nevertheless, young and inexperienced lads and misses, who sometimes have recourse to newspaper editors for counsel, are hereby recommended to seek advice from their parents who have traveled a similar road, and who will prove themselves the safest advisers. To young men, however, are commended the wise words to his son of a Roman consul:

"If ever you marry, let it be to a woman who has judgment enough to superintend the getting of a meal of victuals, taste enough to dress herself, pride enough to wash before breakfast, and sense enough to hold her tongue when she has nothing to say."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Editor's Easy Chair.

IF any civic father of a city or of a village should graciously condescend to unbend his mind over our harmless pages, we wish to challenge him at this point with a question: How do you reconcile it to your conscience as a man, a citizen, and a responsible civil officer and guardian, to tolerate the public hall in your neighborhood? It makes no difference who you are or where you live, unless you are a public officer of the blessed city of Providence your hall is a trap and a snare, and, of course, a present disgrace and a possible future crime to your city or town.

There is the pleasant city of New Haven, for instance, where the traveler, arriving by railroad, is shot out into the dark bowels of the earth. When he emerges into the air and light of the world in which he lives he finds one of the most delightful cities in the country, graced with the tender and romantic traditions which always hang around a venerable college town. If he drives by the fine open green, shaded with noble trees, to the New Haven House, for instance, he will find a quiet, agreeable, family hotel. And he begins to forgive the dreadful pit which serves the city for a railroad station, and he begins to perceive that it is merely a piece of craft, a deep laid strategy to enhance by contrast the charm of the city. He feels a rapidly growing respect for the good sense of people who make their homes in so rural a city; and as good Yankees when they die are said to go to Paris, so while they live they go to lectures, and the traveler in a tranquil frame of mind betakes himself to the Music Hall, the chief hall of the city.

He is horribly undeceived. These gentle, gracious citizens are, then, barbarians after all! It is as if he had encountered symptoms of cannibalism in the soft and select circle of the hotel. For what does he find? He enters a double door of the usual width, he passes down to the other end of the building opposite the entrance, there he finds a staircase leading to the next story where the hall is situated, and continuing up to the deep gallery upon the next story, which quite encircles the hall. The hall is very gay and brilliant. It shows the audience perfectly, poor victims! It will hold probably two thousand innocents, and the sole means of escape that the two thousand have is the staircase at the end opposite the door, so that when the hall is peacefully emptying itself at the close of a lecture or concert there are about twenty minutes of close and continuous crowding along the narrow passage below before they are all fairly in the street. An alarm of fire, a panic of any kind, would inevitably produce results too direful to describe. It would repeat the horrible tragedy at the Chili cathedral.

New Haven has a grand jury, why does it permit so appalling and perpetual a risk? New Haven is full of the most intelligent and thoughtful people, why do they not procure a change? The chances of fire or of alarm are not great, they may say. But are they not obviously great enough to guard against, and are there not plenty of the sensible people of New Haven who feel precisely as we write? The city of Providence had a spacious and noble hall. It was two stories from the street, and the building below was full of the inflammable material of a furniture wareroom. The hall was often crowded, and one evening after the immense audience had dispersed the building took fire and burned like tinder. It was rebuilt, and burned again. Other halls were built, up stairs and with entirely insufficient means of escape. So some gentlemen leased a lot of land of the city, put up a plain brick hall upon the ground, perfectly accessible, sure to allow the escape of every one in a mere panic even, for there could hardly be any serious danger, and that is now the hall for lectures and concerts, and the only hall to which the Providence people go with a sense of security. In the early winter Ristori played in one of the other halls, and very many of those who would have enjoyed her acting most declined to sit in a trap to see it.

Most of the halls in the country are like that at New Haven. Small or large, it is much the same. Of course the risk varies. A huge building like the Music Hall in Boston or the City Hall in Springfield is less exposed than those in which there are stores and a single narrow throat of escape. How would it be in case of sudden alarm in Rand's Hall at Troy, in Corinthian Hall at Rochester, in the Arcade Hall at Lockport? Let us hope that in the great Western cities it is better, and that the good people are not compelled to hear a concert or a lecture at the risk of their lives.

And why should they be any where? Here is Mr. Recorder Hackett, who charges his jury that the new Academy of Music, or Opera House, in the City of New York, is to be supported by the old walls, and that it is a proper subject of inquiry. We are skimming along very thin ice in this matter. Buildings are constantly run up with the least amount of cohesiveness practicable. The fire at the Opera House revealed the fact that it was so flimsy that if it had been full of people when the fire began the loss of life would have been sickening. Is the new one to be any better? Are the theatres in the city traps, or are they not? Should we not all enjoy every thing a thousand-fold more if we could enjoy it in conscious security? Would we not all willingly pay more if we could buy that consciousness? The thing to be done in building a hall is so to build it as to avoid a panic; and this can be done by making the audience sure that they can escape. The moment a terrible accident occurs we shall all see how it might have been avoided. Is it not worth while to change the tense, and see that it is avoided?

THERE is often a feeling that mere monuments of personal or national commemoration are poor things, not only because they are generally poorly designed, but because of the vague impression that they might be made to combine use with beauty. The ointment might have been sold, and given to the poor. If a good man dies there are those who, with a not unnatural emotion, exclaim that no brass or marble should be reared, but that a hospital or a school would be his most fitting monument. But it is undeniable that the instinct of the heart asks a statue or a shaft. The emotion is simple. It does not reason. It is the remembrance of the man it seeks first of all, and the hospital and the school are an afterthought. The impression such buildings make is complex. A memorial chapel never seems exactly a monument of affectionate remembrance. It is like a course of lectures founded in honor of a famous philosopher. He is undoubtedly associated with them, but not as the heart prefers. When Mr. Lincoln was dead there were those who said, and sure-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ly with great reason, that a military hospital for Union soldiers would be his most fitting memorial. But on the morning when his death was announced an old colored woman, who had been a slave in Virginia, and was living pleasantly, although emancipated, with her master, a Union man, said that the great friend of her race was dead; that they ought to build him a monument; and gave five dollars of her first earnings as the beginning of the sum.

It was good seed. The freedmen far and near heard of it and obeyed the same feeling. Four thousand dollars came from Mississippi alone, and when the sum had increased to twenty-three thousand dollars, a Commission was appointed to take care of it, and to prepare for the erection of a monument. Then came the check in the feelings and prospects of the freedmen consequent upon the political aspect of the country a year ago, and the Commission have refrained from pushing the matter among them. Mr. Yeatman of St. Louis, the head of the Western Sanitary Commission, had received the first five dollars, and was deeply interested in the project. His friend, Mr. Crowe of St. Louis, traveling in Europe with Miss Hosmer, suggested to her to draw a design. Miss Hosmer instantly devoted herself to the work, and has sent out a model which has been adopted by the Commission.

We have seen a fine photograph of it, and the letter of Miss Hosmer has been generally reprinted and is doubtless familiar. Her intention is to build the monument of New England granite, the figures, ornaments, and bas-reliefs to be in bronze. The base of the whole will be sixty feet square, and the whole height sixty feet. The idea of the monument is, that Lincoln's fame rests upon emancipation and the preservation of the Union. The lower base of the monument is surrounded with four bas-reliefs, representing characteristic scenes in his life: his birth; his journey through the woods to his new home; his building log-cabins and splitting rails; his flat-boating and his farming. Then his public career as orator, member of the Legislature, his departure from Springfield, and inauguration. Then the bombardment of Sumter, the capture of Mobile and of Petersburg, and the surrender of Lee. Last, the assassination, funeral procession, and burial at Springfield. Upon this base Miss Hosmer proposes to place four statues of a negro—as a slave; as a plantation hand; as a guide of the Union troops, and as a freeman and soldier. Above these is an octagonal base with inscriptions, and upon this a circular base surrounded by a bas-relief of thirty-six figures hand in hand, symbolic of the States. This supports the four columns of a temple, upon the cornice of which are the concluding words of the Emancipation Proclamation—and within the temple a statue of the dead President lies on a marble sarcophagus—while around the base of the whole are four mourning Victories with trumpets reversed.

This is a very elaborate design, and in the description doubtless seems confused; but seen at once in the model or the photograph the details are easily comprehended. The cost of the work is estimated at a quarter of a million of dollars. It will be seen clearly that there are very fine points in the design; but we confess that we should be better satisfied if the freedmen's monument to Lincoln were indeed theirs; and a statue erected from the money they subscribed would perhaps be more satisfactory than the more elaborate structure, however noble and imposing. In Miss Hosmer's design the statues of the negroes are especially fine; and we trust, whatever the ultimate fate of the whole work, that she will not fail to make those. We do not know what form the various monumental projects in perpetuation of the President's memory have taken, but it would surely be a happy result if they could all be combined in one which should be generally satisfactory.

Sailors certainly seem more outcast than any class of persons who are so essential to society. In song and story they are always wild, half-mysterious figures. They are almost the sole class among us which has a special costume. They live in a certain quarter of all sea-ports. Their looks and speech have a strange, often racy and poetic character, and the imagination more easily plays with them than with those who pity or shun them. They have a fascinating lawlessness of manner, as if they were the chartered libertines of civilization; and the general feeling about them is, that they are a generous, careless, ignorant, sinful crew. But those who know them best love them most, and confide in them most fully. Especially a man who has been a sailor cherishes a tender freemasonry of sympathy for the craft, and resents any slur or sharp insinuation against them.

A sailor is a child in a certain kind of artlessness and simplicity; and, however reckless and roystering he may be, he seldom has that peculiar hard worldliness which is the worst misfortune that can befall a man. With this simplicity like a boy he has a curious feminine quality which appeals to courtesy if not sometimes to compassion, and often a natural dignity which is becoming to one who has seen so much of the globe upon which we live. But, like grown-up, neglected children, sailors are sadly bumped and buffeted about. They would be justified on misanthropy, but they somehow cherish a good-humored philosophy, expecting to rough it, and seldom deceived in their expectations. The toilers of the sea and of the land develop the most opposite qualities. The farmer is close, silent, sad, thrifty—the sailor frank, free-spoken, jolly, and lavish. The silent man is nurtured amidst the calm regularity of the seasons and the natural processes; the gay and rollicking sailor lives among storms and on the most treacherous and unstable element. Of course we land-lubbers invest Jack with a kind of romance which may be as suspicious as Cooper's romance of the Indians. But those who know the Indians well dislike and distrust them. Those who know the sailors feel more and more kindly toward them, and so justify the romantic interest.

Somebody wrote to the Herald recently a description of a visit to a sailor boarding-house in New York, with an account of the shocking way in which the poor fellows are fleeced. They are prey to the land-sharks which infest all the shores where sailors land, and all efforts to save them are futile. You come to the door of the house and look in. Everything is bare and dingy and dirty, and a foul smell exhales from the interior. The room at the side of the door is a bar-room, as desolate as the entry. It is low and dark and foul. There are a few tables, and seamen's chests are piled up at the end of the room. A few sailors are lying about the room on benches, or sit upon the tables dangling their feet. A kind of steep stairway or ladder leads to the story above, and climbing up you enter a bedroom. There are four beds covered with ragged, filthy clothes.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The floors are foul, and the walls covered with dirt stains and with obscene verses. Shrunken deal partitions separate the rooms, and the lodgers can talk and look through the apertures. In one corner of the room lies a drunken, half-naked woman.

This is the home to which the sailor comes. This is the bourne which is to cheer his imagination in the wild wintry night-watch upon the coast, and the landlord is often but a pirate. He knows that Jack has his wages in his pocket, and the landlord means to have them. Perhaps Jack has a hundred and fifty dollars. He strolls out of the house—for why should he stay in it?—and is brought home at night drunk. The next morning he goes out again, but as he is going the landlord advises him not to risk all his money by carrying it upon his person, but to leave it with him for safety. Guileless Jack assents, and gives up a large part of his money. Of course, as the host expects, he returns drunk at night. The landlord plies him with liquor, keeps him stupidly drunk through the next day, and on the day following carts him to a ship about to leave for a long voyage, and returns to enjoy the fruit of his pious endeavors.

Or Jack spends all his money and has no further resource. He comes to the landlord and says that he is willing to ship any where. The landlord opens an account for food and drink, and perhaps even money and clothes, and enters on it what he chooses. Knowing that not more than thirty dollars is likely to be advanced before sailing, the landlord hastens to put the sailor upon some ship ready to sail, draws the money, presents his account, which Jack does not very well comprehend, and pockets as much as he dares.

And what will you do about it? is the weary question. Good people, with chapels and tracts and missionaries, are trying to do something all the time. But they fail to interest Jack, although they may frighten him. Boarding-houses are licensed, but unlicensed boarding-houses still allure the easy son of the sea. If he could only learn to respect himself, and to feel that society does not really outlaw him! And another writer insists that he is beginning to discover this by discovering how important he is. A skilled sailor is like any other skilled worker, and he begins to demand wages in proportion; and there is an American Seaman's Protective Association which proposes to do for seamen what the guilds of other laborers do for them. It proposes to strike in case the members can not obtain the wages they ask for. Very well; only let it be fair. No association can rightfully supersede the liberty of the individual. Trades-unions have never yet learned that their tyranny is as bad, and often much worse, than that of capital. Let Jack beware of land-sharks in every form.

The prostration of our mercantile marine by the fortunes of the war should quicken our wits in regard to its resuscitation, and we may perhaps follow with advantage the British and French methods of obtaining competent ship-masters. British captains and mates "are required to have a strict examination in seamanship and navigation, and to have some knowledge of steam." They can inflict only certain punishments, and in a certain way. The officer is not allowed to abuse his power, but is secure in the due enforcement of discipline. But there is a Board to enforce the laws for the protection of the seaman, and a system of allotments by which he provides for his family when absent on a cruise. In the French service the requirements of the officers are severer. They must understand gunnery, and to that end must spend a year in the navy. Drunkenness or improper conduct is punished by the revocation of the certificate of command. They must not strike a sailor, and the sailor has the right to defend himself. Foreigners are not allowed to command in the French marine, and only one-fourth foreigners are allowed in the crew, and to every ten men there must be an apprentice. The Italians have adopted the French system.

In the city of New York there is an American Ship-masters' Association, established by act of the Legislature. But the marine of the country is national, and should be regulated by national laws. Experts deny the stringency or adequacy of the examinations which qualify American masters. Of course in all such assertions there is a certain amount of prejudice and personal feeling. But as we have now to reassert our rights upon the sea, let us command it by superior intelligence as well as by superior force.

While the winter nights sparkle with the snow, and ring with the merry music of the sleigh-bells, the solitary sitter in some country city, where he can hear the steady beat of the bells and mark their expression, will be reminded of the extraordinary lines of Poe, which seem to us by far the most unique and perfect adjustment of the words to the thing described to be found any where in literature. It is a wonder of verbal felicity:

"Hear the sledges with the bells—
Silver bells!
What a world of merriment their melody foretells!
How they tinkle, tinkle, tinkle,
In the icy air of night!
While the stars that oversprinkle
All the heavens, seem to twinkle
With a crystalline delight;
Keeping time, time, time,
In a sort of Runic rhyme,
To the tintinabulation that so musically wells
From the bells, bells, bells, bells,
Bells, bells, bells—
From the jingling and the tinkling of the bells."

The iteration of the word "bells" is daring, but it gives exactly the persistent monotony of the beating of the bells of a steady trotting horse. And it is doubtful if the bells are not the chief pleasure of sleighing. Silent slipping is as flat as food without flavor. In Lockport the Easy Chair saw a young lover driving his mistress over the snow in perfect stillness. They looked as if they were resolved to enjoy themselves, but were not succeeding. But the snow was smooth, the sleigh was light, the robes were ample, the horse was swift. But they were not happy. Their little trip wanted the music of the bells.

Mr. Bancroft's ninth volume of the History of the United States, which is the third of the Revolution, is published, and there is no reason to doubt that this great work will be finished before many years. The admirable perception of the historian is shown in a little remark he made more than ten years ago. A friend walking with him upon the cliffs at Newport, where he has a summer home, asked him to what period he should bring the history. "Down to the formation of the Constitution," replied the historian, "for all subsequent to that is experiment." So it has proved; but the experiment is successful.

It is curious to reflect how much of our literature

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

has arisen since the beginning of the publication of Bancroft's History. Its publication has extended over a generation. When the first volume was issued Emerson, Longfellow, Prescott, Hawthorne, Motley, Lowell, Holmes, were names unknown. Irving, Bryant, and Percival were the lords of the hour, and Willis was just beginning to be known. For the preface is dated June 16, 1834, and the author modestly says: "The work which I have undertaken will necessarily extend to several volumes. * * * * The work has already occasioned long preparation, and its completion will require further years of exertion." Those years have been steadily given. A generation has passed away. The historian has filled conspicuous positions in the service of the country, the opportunities of which, especially those of the embassy to England, he has turned to the advantage of his work, which has become the work of his life, and one of the most faithfully studied works in our literature.

Mr. Bancroft has many of the most valuable qualities of a historian. His temperament is intellectual. He is naturally a scholar, seeking knowledge with avidity in every direction and in many languages. For he is also an accomplished linguist, early and always accustomed to the Greek and Latin, to the French, German, and Italian. His memory is a marvelous magazine. The accumulations of a life of study exactly ordered, and ready for instant and adequate service. Widely versed in literature, he marks in it the tendency and spirit of historic movements before they appear in the grosser form of events; and this untiring zeal of study has kept even pace with the progress of the history to which he has devoted himself. The same resolute industry has secured the most ample manuscript material, so that his historic collections of that kind are of the highest value. To these advantages he adds the habits of the wise scholar. The earlier part of the day he gives to work, vigorously secluding himself from interruption. The afternoon he passes in active exercise in the air, usually in the saddle. The evening finds him in the midst of cheerful social recreation.

These are the fortunate endowments of the historian. As to the higher fitness for his task he has the faith that "through the ages one increasing purpose runs," and holds human progress to be measured by the development of liberty. He is, therefore, more than an annalist, for he sees all the facts he records in the light of spiritual law. Of course, therefore, his work is liable to the charge of being written upon a theory, and to be in a certain sense controversial. For it is hardly possible that the generalization is yet possible which will establish the law of historical development. We are still observing phenomena. On the other hand, it is equally impossible for any man born in sympathy with the great movement of his race and time, to record the history of his own country which plays so conspicuous a part in the great drama, or of any other country or time in which he discerns the impulse in which he delights and believes, without putting his heart into his work and cheering, as it were, the men and the deeds which vindicate his faith. All the chief historians of our tongue share this tendency with Mr. Bancroft, to read events by their convictions. Among the Englishmen Gibbon, who has the least sign of it, can not altogether conceal it; while Hume, Grote, and Macaulay conspicuously illustrate the truth. Besides, Bancroft, Hildreth, and Motley, among the Americans, can not but argue and applaud as they write. Prescott, who does it least, is rather an elegant and accomplished annalist than a historian of insight. Like Irving he tells fascinatingly a romantic tale.

It is urged that Bancroft deals too exclusively with the official aspects of his subject, and that we hear more of Parliaments and Congresses than of the people. But it is peculiarly true of American history that you can not faithfully describe their political movements without describing the people. Their character and condition are inseparable from their political history, and each constantly and in detail reflects the other. Certain details of manners, and curious statistics, such as Macaulay includes in one of his famous and interesting chapters, are not found in Bancroft grouped in one picture, but the details dropped throughout give a vivid impression of the actual daily life of the people, for which, indeed, in its particulars, we naturally look rather to memoirs than to history.

In Bancroft's History is recorded the progressive development of the experiment of popular government upon this continent by one who believes heartily in the principle, and who feels that there has been a steady justification of it in his country. The events of the last six years have but confirmed that faith, and in none of the volumes do the peculiar excellences of the author seem so striking as in this last issued, the ninth. It opens with the Declaration of Independence in July, 1776, and the action closes with the winter encampment at Valley Forge in 1777. It includes, therefore, the battle of Long Island and the retreat; the evacuation of New York and the retreat through New Jersey; the return by Trenton and Princeton to Morristown; the Northern campaign; the advance and defeat of Burgoyne; the contest for the Delaware River; Brandywine and Germantown and the British occupation of Philadelphia. These are the military movements; but the political history, both foreign and domestic, is not less interesting. The chapters upon the effect of the Declaration in Europe, the embarrassments of America; the course of opinion and legislation in England, and the aspect of Spain, are full of fresh material; while the chapters upon the United States and George III., and the United States and France, are truly admirable. The chapter upon the Constitutions of the various States of America is one of the most valuable contributions ever made to our political history.

The historical portraits are very vivid. Charles Fox, Dr. Franklin, Lafayette, Washington, with the passing touches of Lord North and a multitude more, show the skill of the long-practiced literary artist as well as the insight of the thoughtful student.

The friends of General Greene are troubled by some of Mr. Bancroft's statements and judgments of his conduct, and his grandson, Professor G. W. Greene, is said to be preparing a reply to the historian's view. We do not understand Mr. Bancroft, however, to be in the least hostile to General Greene, to deny his military talent and service, or to question the peculiar confidence which Washington reposed in him. He does say, indeed, that upon Long Island, at the opening of the war, and before Greene had had or could have had much military experience, his lines were too much extended for his force, and that at Germantown he was inexplicably slow in moving, and managed his troops badly. But the extension at Long Island was not surprising in a new commander, and the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 delay and mismanagement at Germantown are asserted upon the authority of contemporary letters which are mentioned. If there is a misapprehension of fact, General Greene's grandson will doubtless be able to make the truth clear. But as there is not the smallest ill-feeling toward Greene apparent upon the part of the historian, and as he is an exhaustive student of any especial point, the controversy can not fail to be very instructive. Between the two we are likely to know all the contemporary sources of information. The steady friendship and trust of Washington are Greene's sufficient credentials as a man and as a soldier. Yet there may have been occasions when he was at fault, and the fact would be no reason for denying or questioning the justice of the general impression.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Mr. Bancroft does, indeed, disturb the halo which surrounds some Revolutionary heads. Good old Israel Putnam, for instance, the hero of the boyish school-books and stories, is far from an Alexander or Marlborough upon these pages. Charles Lee and Horatio Gates had been previously exposed, but Mr. Bancroft fits them finally into their true historic niche. Joseph Reed, also, despite the pamphlet which has been published to shield him, will be always regarded either as weak or treacherous according to the humanity and generosity of the student. The sketches of Arnold, although the final scene of his career is not reached, are striking and vivid, and prepare the mind for the catastrophe. Indeed, if the historian with his firm handling has deranged some of the accepted traditions of the Revolution, he has done so in a spirit so reasonable and with a purpose so pure that nobody can question his sincerity however his conclusions may be denied. Wherever he departs from the popular view he seems to us generally justified. But if he has omitted any essential information or has unconsciously misused the knowledge he commands, his critics interested to correct him by pride of lineage and family fame will assuredly make it evident.

Meanwhile time has not touched the springs of enthusiasm in the mind of the historian. His style has not lost in warmth while it has gained in compactness. His narration is clear, swift, concise, and picturesque. It is sometimes too stately and hard, but the theme is so inspiring that the artist can hardly keep from his hand the swell of his soul in contemplating it. One volume more, the material of which is arranged, will finish the story of the Revolution, and we suppose one volume, or at the most two succeeding volumes, will bring the great task to an end.

Among the many charming books of the delightful season possibly the most charming—for who shall dare use unstinted superlatives—are Laboulaye's Fairy Book, published by the Harpers, and the illustrated Poems of Jean Ingelow, published by Roberts Brothers of Boston. Laboulaye's stories are exquisite, and it is not surprising that their sale has been rapid and extensive. They are admirably illustrated, and Miss Booth in translating has not lost the genial spirit and sparkle of the original. Quaint and fresh and truly fairy, we have seen no recent book which is so sure to go on making friends of all the friends of Cinderella and Puss in Boots and the Sleeping Beauty, and all the standards of fairy lore. The edition of Jean Ingelow, one of the most sumptuous books of any season, shows us that the Easy Chair's estimate of the essential popular charm of her poetry was not inexact; for there are few, if there be any, of the recent poets, who have sung their way so gratefully to the public heart. The illustrations are profuse and quaint, and the solid and splendid binding of the book makes its coming into any home a feast of beauty and melody.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 2d of January. Congress having assembled on the 3d of December, we devote the greater part of this Record to a narration of the condition of the country as presented in the official reports presented to the National Legislature, and to a chronicle of the proceedings of that body which appear likely to exert an important bearing upon the affairs of the country for the coming months.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The President's Message is mainly devoted to a recital and defense of his policy in regard to the lately seceding States. He declares that "Peace, order, tranquillity, and civil authority, have been formally declared to exist throughout the whole of the United States. In all the States civil authority has superseded the coercion of arms, and the people by their voluntary action are maintaining their governments in full activity and complete operation. The enforcement of the laws is no longer 'obstructed in any State by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings;' and the animosities engendered by the war are rapidly yielding to the beneficent influences of our free institutions, and to the kindly effects of unrestricted social and commercial intercourse."

After reciting the steps which had already been taken toward "the gradual restoration of the States in which the insurrection occurred to their relations with the Federal Government," the President goes on to state that the main thing which remained to be done was the "admission to Congress of loyal Senators and Representatives from the States whose people had rebelled against the lawful authority of the General Government." He regrets that Congress has failed, except in the case of the State of Tennessee, to admit such members, so that ten States remain unrepresented in Congress. He argues that the admission of the Representatives from these States would have been not only desirable as tending to restore good feeling, but right as carrying out the principles embodied in the Declaration of Independence, that there should be no taxation without representation, and the provisions of the Constitution securing to each State its representation in Congress. He argues at length against the proposition that "the existence of the States was terminated by the rebellious acts of their inhabitants, and that the insurrection having been sup-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

pressed, they were henceforth to be considered merely as conquered Territories," maintaining, on the contrary, that the entire course of the General Government during the war was based upon the assumption that the seceding States were still members of the Union, and that the declared object of the war was to restore, not to destroy, the States. He argues that the admission of members from these States would afford "no grounds of apprehension that persons who are disloyal would be clothed with powers of legislation," because each House, being judge of the qualifications of its members, would have full power to exclude any person ineligible to hold that position. If a person elected should "be refused admission as a member, for want of due allegiance to the Government and returned to his constituents, they are admonished that none but persons loyal to the United States will be allowed a voice in the Legislative Councils of the nation." If such admission was wise and expedient a year ago, the President argues that it is no less so now; and "if, in the exact position of these States at the present time, it is lawful to exclude them from representation, the question will not be changed by the efflux of time. Ten years hence, if these States remain as they are, the right of representation will be no stronger, the right of exclusion will be no weaker." The President therefore urges that the admission of the loyal Southern representatives in Congress is "imperatively demanded by every consideration of national interest, sound policy, and equal justice."

The most important suggestion made by the President in regard to domestic affairs is, that the District of Columbia should be allowed a delegate in Congress, with the same rights and powers as are accorded to the delegates from the Territories.

In regard to Foreign Affairs, our relations with France, growing out of the occupation of Mexico by French forces, are the most important. At the time when the Message was presented, the tidings had just come that the withdrawal of the French troops would not be commenced in November, as was agreed upon. The President hopes that the Emperor of France will reconsider his resolution, and adopt such measures as shall conform as nearly as possible with the engagements between France and the United States. Later intelligence than that embodied in the Message indicates that the Emperor proposes to withdraw his whole force at once in the ensuing spring, instead of, as originally proposed, in three divisions, the last leaving in November, 1867. This we may consider as a substantial conformity with the terms of the original stipulation; the withdrawal though begun later will be finished earlier than originally stipulated. In the mean while, Mr. Campbell had been appointed Minister to the only Government in Mexico recognized by the United States—that of Juarez—and "it was thought expedient that he should be attended in the vicinity of Mexico by Lieutenant-General Sherman, with the view of obtaining such information as might be important to determine the course to be pursued by the Government of the United States in re-establishing and maintaining necessary and proper intercourse with the Republic of Mexico." As yet, however, it does not appear that the Minister has been able to place himself in direct communication with the Government to which he was accredited.

As to our claims upon the Government of Great Britain, arising from the depredations upon our commerce during the civil war by British subjects, and notably those of the Anglo-Confederate cruiser Alabama, the President regrets that "no considerable advance had been made toward an adjustment." The President ascribes this delay in a great measure to the domestic situation in Great Britain, where an entire change of Ministry had occurred. The attention of the new Ministry had been called to the subject, and there was "some reason to expect that it will now be considered in a friendly spirit." Whatever might be the wishes of the two Governments, says the President, "it is manifest that goodwill and friendship between the two countries can not be established until a reciprocity in the practice of good-faith and neutrality shall be restored between the respective nations." Closely connected with this subject is the conduct of our Government in relation to the late Fenian attempt upon Canada. While considering this as essentially a political movement, and therefore recommending the exercise of clemency on the part of the British authorities toward those engaged in it, and having taken measures to secure a fair trial for citizens of the United States who have taken part in it, the President declares emphatically that "so long as the neutrality laws remain upon our Statute Books they should be faithfully executed;" and if they operate harshly or oppressively, Congress only can apply the remedy by their modification or repeal. Touching the prerogative still affirmed by some European Powers, and formally abandoned by none, though the exercise of it has been tacitly forborne by Great Britain and France, of the right to exact military service from such of their citizens as, having been naturalized in the United States, have returned on transient visits to their native countries, the President thinks this a favorable time for Congress to assert the principle that "naturalization by one state fully exempts the native-born subject of any other state from the performance of military service under any foreign Government, so long as he does not voluntarily renounce its rights and benefits."

The Message closes with the assertion that "our Government is now undergoing its most trying ordeal," and with the hope that "the peril may be successfully and finally passed without impairing its original strength and symmetry;" and the averment that "the interests of the nation are best to be promoted by the revival of fraternal relations, the complete obliteration of our past differences, and the reinauguration of all the pursuits of peace:" these ends to be attained by preserving "the harmony between the co-ordinate departments of the Government—each in its proper sphere cordially co-operating with the other in securing the maintenance of the Constitution, the preservation of the Union, and the perpetuity of our free institutions."

REPORTS FROM DEPARTMENTS.

The Report of the Secretary of the Treasury presents an elaborate resumé of the fiscal condition of the Government. The prominent features are, that the entire public debt, deducting the amount in the Treasury, was, on the 31st of October, 1866, $2,551,000,000, being a reduction since the 30th of June, 1865, of $130,000,000, of which $99,000,000 had been effected within the four months immediately preceding. Since October, 1865, when the debt was at its maximum, $2,741,000,000, the entire reduction has been $206,000,000. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, the receipts were $558,000,000, being $90,000,000 more than the esti-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google mates; and the expenditures $520,000,000, being $200,000,000 less than the estimates, nearly the whole of the diminution of expenditures being in the War Department. The receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, are estimated at $475,000,000, and the expenditures at $316,000,000, which would leave a balance in the Treasury of $159,000,000. The receipts and expenditures were mainly, in round numbers, as follows:

Receipts.
From Customs	$179,000,000
From Public Lands	660,000
From Direct Tax	2,000,000
From Internal Revenue	309,000,000
Miscellaneous Sources	67,000,000
Expenditures.
Civil List	$12,300,000
Foreign Intercourse	1,300,000
Miscellaneous	27,400,000
Interior Department	18,800,000
War Department	284,000,000
Navy Department	43,300,000
Interest on Debt	133,000,000

The Secretary disavows the idea that a public debt is for us a blessing, and although he judges that it may not be advisable to continue the reduction as rapidly as it has been made during the past year, but that it may be better to reduce the rate of taxation in various directions where it now presses most severely, he yet hopes that it may be regularly reduced at the rate of four or five millions of dollars a month, so that the whole may be paid by the generation which contracted it. He furnishes an elaborate exposé of the principles which have guided him in managing the fiscal affairs of the country, enlarges upon the evils of a redundant currency, urges its gradual but constant contraction, with a view to the resumption of specie payments, which, he thinks, with proper legislation, may be done in less than two years.——The principles which, in the opinion of the Secretary, should govern our revenue system are: (1.) That as few articles as possible should be subject to internal taxation. (2.) That duties upon imports should correspond with the taxes upon home commodities; they should not be so high as to be prohibitory, or to build up home monopolies, or to prevent the free exchange of commodities; nor so low as to seriously impair the revenues, or to subject home manufacturers to a competition, which they can not sustain, with cheaper labor and larger capital. (3.) That raw materials, whose value is largely enhanced by the labor to be expended upon them, should be free from taxation, or at all events very lightly taxed. (4.) That the burdens of taxation should fall chiefly upon those whose interests are protected by taxation, and upon those to whom the public debt is a source of wealth and profit, and as lightly as possible upon the laboring classes.——The present high prices, resulting mainly from a redundant currency and high taxes, are regarded by the Secretary as not only "oppressing the masses of the people," but as "seriously checking the development, growth, and prosperity of the country." They prevent the building of dwellings, manufactories, and ships; they affect injuriously the operations of agriculture, and of many other national interests. Assuming that no important interest can suffer without involving suffering in others, the Secretary proceeds to show, by a simple table, that while we have every facility for commercial enterprise, our foreign commerce has declined nearly fifty per cent. within the last six years, while the tonnage of foreign vessels in the American trade has increased in a ratio fully equal. The tonnage of American and foreign vessels engaged in our trade is thus given:

	1860.	1865.	1866.
Tonnage of American vessels engaged in the foreign carrying trade, which entered American ports	5,921,285	2,943,661	3,372,060
Tonnage of such vessels cleared from American ports	6,165,924	3,025,134	3,383,176
Tonnage of foreign vessels which entered our ports	2,353,911	3,216,967	4,410,424
Tonnage of foreign vessels cleared from our ports	2,624,005	3,595,123	4,438,384

While it is true that a large proportion of this diminution, from 1860 to 1865, was owing to the depredations of Confederate cruisers, still, after the war, there should have been a rapid increase in American vessels; and this must have been the case had not the high prices of material and labor with us transferred the business of ship-building to the British Provinces, where vessels can now be built more cheaply than in Maine. Indeed, "timber can be taken from Virginia to the Provinces, and from these Provinces to England, and there be made into ships which can be sold at a profit, while the same kind of vessels can only be built in New England at a loss." But, continues the Secretary, "the evil does not stop here. A nation which builds ships navigates them; and a nation which ceases to build ships ceases to be a commercial and maritime nation. Unless, therefore, the causes which prevent the building of ships in the United States shall cease, the foreign carrying trade, even of our own productions, must be yielded to other nations. To this humiliation and loss the people of the United States ought not to be subjected. The United States will not be a first-class Power among nations, nor will her other industrial interests continue long to prosper as they ought, if her commerce shall be permitted to languish."

Having passed in survey the entire financial condition of the country, resulting in the conviction that "we have been for some time and still are moving in the wrong direction, and that much of our prosperity is unreal and unreliable," the Secretary comes to the final conclusion, that "the ability of the country to right itself speedily is unshaken," we having as yet but "touched the surface of our resources, the great mines of our national wealth being yet to be developed." He is "of opinion that specie payments may be resumed as early as the 1st day of July, 1868;" and hopes that "such will be the character of our future legislation, and such the condition of our productive industry, that this most desirable result may be brought about at a still earlier day."

The financial policy recommended by the Secretary may be summed up under five general heads: (1.) The national bank-note currency should be redeemed at central points. (2.) The entire currency should be curtailed to the amount required by a legitimate and healthful trade. (3.) The tariff should be modified so as to relieve raw materials, as far as may be, from high duties. (4.) Five per cent. bonds, the interest payable in England and Germany, should be issued, sufficient to absorb the six per cent. bonds now there, and to meet any additional foreign demand for further investment. (6.) The Southern States should be rehabilitated, so that by

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the revival of their industry and productiveness they may be able to bear their share of the national burdens.

The Report of the Secretary of War is devoted mainly to the details of the measures attending the disbandment of the vast army of volunteers. The successive steps by which this has been accomplished are these: On the 1st of May, 1865, there were in the United States service 1,034,064 men; on the 15th of November of that year, 800,093 had been mustered out and paid; on the 20th of January, 1866, the number mustered out was 918,722; February 15, 952,452; June 30, 1,010,670; November 1, 1,023,021, leaving in the service only 11,043 volunteers, white and colored. The work of disbanding this army of more than a million of men might have been performed within three months, had it not been found necessary to retain a portion of the force for a considerable time after the conclusion of the war. "Past experience shows," says the Secretary, "that should any national emergency require a larger force than is provided by the peace establishment, an army could be swiftly organized to the full strength of a million of men." The materials of war have also been largely diminished by sale. Thus, up to August 2, there had been sold more than 200,000 horses and mules, nearly 4500 hospitals, barracks, and other buildings. Of the 590 ocean transports in service on the 1st of July, 1865, at a daily expense of $82,400, there were a year later only 53, at a daily cost of $3000, and most of these have since been discharged; and of the 262 vessels employed in inland transportation, not one remained in the service of the Government on the 30th of June, 1866. The military railroads, which during the war reached an aggregate length of 2630 miles, having 433 engines and 6600 cars, have been transferred to private boards and companies, upon condition of the adoption of loyal organizations of directors. The military telegraphs, 15,389 miles, have been discontinued. The total expense of operating these railroads and telegraphs during the war was nearly $50,000,000. After disposing of all perishable and unserviceable stores and supplies, there are still left on hand clothing, munitions, and arms sufficient for the immediate equipment of large armies; and as the disbanded troops stand ready to respond to the national call, our military strength remains really unimpaired, although the army has been reduced to a peace footing. The maximum strength of the regular army, as fixed by the Act of July 28, 1866, is 75,382 rank and file; its present strength is fixed at 54,302; and as soon as the ranks are well filled it is designed to raise the standard of qualifications required for enlistment.

The superiority of breech-loading small-arms having become apparent, measures have been taken for their speedy production. The ordinary Springfield muskets will be converted into breech-loaders at a small expense: these will form a gun better in all respects than the Prussian needle gun.

The army is now organized into thirteen Departments, as follows: (1.) The East; General Meade, head-quarters at Philadelphia. (2.) The Lakes; General Hooker, head-quarters at Detroit. (3.) Washington; General Canby, head-quarters at Washington. (4.) The Potomac; General Schofield, head-quarters at Richmond. (5.) The South; General Sickles, head-quarters at Charleston. (6.) The Tennessee; General Thomas, head-quarters at Louisville. (7.) The Gulf; General Sheridan, head-quarters at New Orleans. (8.) Arkansas; General Ord, head-quarters at Little Rock. (9.) The Missouri; General Hancock, head-quarters at Fort Leavenworth. (10.) The Platte; General Cooke, head-quarters at Omaha. (11.) Dakota; General Terry, head-quarters at Fort Snelling. (12.) California; General M'Dowell, head-quarters at San Francisco. (13.) The Columbia; General Steele, head-quarters at Portland, Oregon.

The Report of the Secretary of the Navy shows that the present number of vessels is 278, armed with 2351 guns. Of these 115 vessels, carrying 1029 guns are in active service. The entire number of seamen is about 13,000. Of the vessels in active service 69, with 694 guns, are on squadron duty. The European Squadron, Admiral Goldsborough, has 10 vessels, with 113 guns; the Asiatic squadron, Admiral Bell, 8 vessels, 78 guns; the North Atlantic squadron, Admiral Palmer, 15 vessels, 135 guns; the South Atlantic squadron, Admiral Gordon, 8 vessels, 75 guns; the North Pacific squadron, Admiral Thatcher, 10 vessels, 119 guns; the South Pacific squadron, Admiral Dahlgren, 7 vessels, 67 guns; the Gulf squadron, Commodore Winslow, 10 vessels, 71 guns.

The Report details at length the movements of all these squadrons during the year, dwelling in particular upon the ocean voyages of the Monitors Monadnock and Miantonomoh, which have dispelled the belief formerly entertained that our turreted iron-clads could not safely venture outside the harbors in which they were constructed. These vessels, however, were designed for coast operations and harbor defense, and, says the Secretary, "will furnish security to any port, and be able to disperse or destroy any blockading fleet which may appear in our waters. The peculiar formation of our coast is in itself a protection against the heavy and formidable iron-clads, of immense tonnage and deep draught, which European constructors have devised, because, except at a few points, it will be difficult for them to approach within cannon-shot of our shores, and there is but a single port which they can enter from the capes of the Chesapeake to the Rio Grande. But while in the estimation of our best naval officers our Monitor class of vessels are more than a match for the monstrous and expensive iron-clad structures of Europe, they are of such draught that they can enter all of our principal harbors, and are therefore peculiarly adapted to our coast defense."

The Report of General Grant embodies the subreports of the several officers commanding military departments. The most important of these is that of General Sheridan, who gives a very unfavorable account of the condition of affairs in Texas. He declares it to be his opinion that "the trial of a white man for the murder of a freedman in Texas would be a farce." General Wood reports more favorably of Mississippi, in which State he says that substantial justice is now administered by the local tribunals to all classes of persons irrespective of color or former political opinions, although there is much crime, and many outrages have passed unpunished. The crops in Mississippi are a total failure; the corn will not feed the people through the winter, and the cotton will not pay the cost of production.

CONGRESS.

Although few important measures have as yet been finally acted upon, the general line of policy to be pursued is clearly foreshadowed. The tone of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the leading members of the dominant party was indicated in a speech delivered by Mr. Colfax, upon occasion of a public reception given to the Republican members. He denounced the conduct of the President in unsparing terms; charged that in his "speech at St. Louis he palliated the guilt of the murderers" at New Orleans; that he had expelled from office thousands of men appointed by Mr. Lincoln, men to whom more than to any other equal number of persons the present Administration was indebted for the power it wielded, "their only crime being inflexible fidelity to the principles professed by the successful candidate for the Vice-Presidency in the canvass of 1864." The people had decided between the President and Congress, and Congress had reassembled to carry out this decision. Four things, he said, had been settled beyond controversy by the recent elections: (1.) "The work of reconstruction must be in the hands of those who have been the friends, not the enemies of the nation. Those who plunged the country into war shall not be clothed with the power to legislate for the widows and orphans, the kith and kin, of the men they have slain in the attempt to slay the nation." (2.) The promise of Abraham Lincoln in his emancipation proclamation "must be fulfilled both in letter and in spirit, and guaranteed beyond any power of abridgment in our supreme law, forbidding interference by any unfriendly State with the privileges and immunities of the liberty granted by the whole nation to all its people." (3.) "No persons shall be disfranchised in this Republic on account of their race, and yet have their numbers counted to confer increased political power on those disfranchising them." (4.) "The national debt shall be forever sacred, and all debts or claims growing out of the rebellion, or the breaking of fetters that ended it, shall be forever held illegal and void. And the people also decreed that Congress should enforce this decision of theirs by appropriate legislation."

On the first day of the session several important bills were introduced: In the Senate, by Mr. Sherman, a bill prohibiting the payment of any money to any person who having been nominated to an office, and rejected by the Senate, was subsequently appointed by the President; and making it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment, to make such appointment, to exercise office under it, or for any disbursing officer to pay any money by way of salary or fees to any person so appointed. —By Mr. Williams, That any person, except heads of Departments, appointed to office by the consent of the Senate, shall hold such office until his successor shall be duly appointed in like manner; but if any officer becomes unable to perform the duties of his office during the recess of the Senate, then the President may commission a person to fill the office, until the end of the next session of the Senate. A similar bill was introduced in the House by Mr. Stevens, containing a further provision that any person nominated by the President and rejected by the Senate, shall be incapable of holding any office under the United States for three years after such rejection, unless two-thirds of the Senate release him from the disability. The purport of these bills is to render the President incapable of making any removals from office without the concurrence of the Senate.—A bill providing that hereafter the times for the meeting of Congress shall be the 4th of March, the day on which the term begins for which the Congress was chosen, the first Monday of January next thereafter, and the second Monday of November next preceding the end of the term for which the Congress is elected. On this first day of the session a bill was passed in the House, by a vote of 111 to 29, repealing the 13th section of the Act of July 17, 1862, which authorizes the President to extend by proclamation pardon and amnesty to persons who may have participated in the rebellion.

On the day following the House, by a vote of 107 to 37, instructed the Committee on Territories "to inquire into the expediency of reporting a Bill providing Territorial Governments for the several districts of country within the jurisdiction of the United States formerly occupied by the once existing States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas, and giving to all adult male inhabitants born within the limits of the United States, or duly naturalized, and not participants in the late rebellion, full equal political rights in such Territorial governments."

On the 6th Mr. Sumner offered a series of six resolutions "declaring the true principles of reconstruction, the jurisdiction of Congress over the whole subject, the illegality of the existing governments in the rebel States, and the exclusion of such States with such illegal governments from representation in Congress and from voting on Constitutional Amendments." The following is the text of the most important of these resolutions:

3. That the work of reconstruction must be conducted by Congress and under its constant supervision; that under the Constitution Congress is solemnly bound to assume this responsibility, and that in the performance of this duty it must see that every where throughout the rebel communities loyalty is protected and advanced, while the new governments are fashioned according to the requirements of a Christian Commonwealth, so that order, tranquillity, education, and human rights shall prevail within their borders.

4. That in determining what is a Republican form of Government Congress must follow implicitly the definition supplied by the Declaration of Independence, and in the practical application of this definition it must, after excluding all disloyal persons, take care that new governments are founded on the two fundamental truths therein contained—first, that all men are equal in rights; and, second, that all just government stands only on the consent of the governed.

5. That all proceedings with a view to reconstruction originating in Executive power are in the nature of usurpation; that this usurpation becomes especially offensive when it sets aside the fundamental truths of our institutions; that it is shocking to common-sense when it undertakes to derive new governments from that hostile population which has just been engaged in armed rebellion; and that all governments having such origin are necessarily illegal and void.

6. That it is the duty of Congress to proceed with the work of reconstruction; and, to this end, it must assume jurisdiction of the States lately in rebellion, except so far as that jurisdiction has been already renounced; and that it must recognize only the loyal States, or those States having legal and valid Legislatures, as entitled to representation in Congress, or to a voice in the adoption of Constitutional Amendments.

Mr. Wade offered a resolution, which was referred, proposing to amend the Constitution so that the President shall be elected for four years, and shall not be re-eligible for election, and that in case of the death of the President the Vice-President shall become President, and he shall not be eligible for re-election after the close of the term. The general topics comprehended within the foregoing proposed Bills and resolutions have engrossed much of the debates in Congress.

On the 13th of December Mr. Stevens introduced into the House a bill providing for the civil government of North Carolina. It recites the facts of the insurrection in that State, by which the civil gov-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ernment of that State is alleged to have been overthrown, so that when the insurrection was quelled there was found "in the district formerly comprising the State of North Carolina no government organized or officers qualified according to the Constitution of the United States;" and military law was therein established; and it being the duty of Congress to cause to be organized in that State a republican government, therefore it is enacted that a Convention shall be assembled at the capital on the 20th of May, 1867, which shall be "invested with the sovereign power of the people of the district to frame a State Constitution, which shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for approval, modification, or rejection, preparatory to the re-establishment of the said State, and the re-investing of its loyal citizens with all the rights, privileges, and immunities appertaining to the citizens of other States of the Union." The qualification of voters for delegates are to be a male resident of the district, "of the age of twenty-one years, without distinction of race or color, who can read or write, or may own in fee real estate of the assessed value of $100 or more;" but no one who has before had the right of voting is to be disqualified from voting at this election. Every delegate to the Convention must take an oath that, on the 4th of March, 1864, he would "willingly have complied with the requirements of the proclamation of the President of the United States of December 8, 1863, had a safe opportunity of so doing been afforded;" that on the said 4th of March, 1864, and ever thereafter, he was opposed to the continuance of the rebellion, and voluntarily gave no aid or encouragement thereto, but desired the suppression of all armed resistance to the Government of the United States; and that henceforth he will support the Constitution of the United States. The proposed Act makes stringent provisions against the admission of any person as a delegate who can not take this oath; and should any one falsely take it he is to be indicted for perjury, and no person can act as a juror upon his trial until he shall himself have taken the same oath. The effect of this proposed Act is to place the State of North Carolina in the precise position of an unorganized Territory of the Union. The principle, if adopted in regard to this State, will be equally applicable to each of the other seceding States.

The most significant measure upon which final action has yet been taken is the passage of the bill respecting the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia. Its chief importance arises from the fact that it may be regarded as an indication of the general intent of Congress in respect to the entire question of negro suffrage. We give, with abridgments, the several sections of this Act:

§ 1. "Every male person, excepting paupers and persons under guardianship, of the age of twenty-one years and upward, who has not been convicted of any infamous crime or offense, and excepting persons who may have voluntarily given aid and comfort to the rebels in the late rebellion, and who shall have been born or naturalized in the United States, and who shall have resided in the district for the period of one year, and in the ward or district in which he shall offer to vote three months next preceding any election therein, shall be entitled to the elective franchise, and shall be deemed an elector and entitled to vote at any election in said District, without any distinction on account of color or race."

§ 2. Provides for the punishment, by fine or imprisonment, of any person whose duty it is to receive votes at any election who shall "willfully reject the vote of any person entitled to such right under this Act."

§ 3. Provides for the punishment, by fine or imprisonment, of any person who "shall willfully interrupt or disturb any such elector in the exercise of such franchise."

§ 4. Makes it the duty of the several courts in the District "to give this Act in special charge to the Grand Jury at the commencement of each term of the court next preceding an election in said District."

§§ 5, 6, 7. Direct the Mayors and Aldermen of the cities of Washington and Alexandria to prepare lists of the persons qualified to vote under this Act, and regulate the manner of conducting elections under it.

§§ 8 and 9 are designed to prevent and punish bribery at elections.

This Bill passed the Senate December 13, by a vote of 32 to 13; and on the following day passed the House by 18 to 46. The majority being more than two-thirds in each House, secures the adoption of the Bill even should the President veto it. The debates in the Senate upon this Bill were significant. Among the most notable speeches was one by Mr. Davis, of Kentucky, in opposition to it. He declared that "the great God who created all races never intended that the negro, the lowest, should ever have co-ordinate and equal power with the highest, the white race, in any government, national or domestic;" that "our Government is a white man's government, made for himself without the aid or any reference to the negro, or the Indian, or any other race of man;" and that while "our national family properly and wisely comprehends all of the nationalities of Europe who may come here, according to the terms of our naturalization laws, and their posterity, yet Indians, Mongolians, Chinese, and Tartars ought not and can not safely be admitted to the powers and privileges of citizenship." Mr. Davis affirmed that although "the people of the South made war in a wrong cause, turning their backs upon peace and prosperity and liberty, to fight for separate political power," he would "venture his life upon the proposition that in all the essential elements of loyalty, in devotion to the Constitution, to law and to order, in love for that system of government and liberty which our fathers founded and fashioned, the South is greatly more loyal than the radical States—the radical portion of the radical States."

Among the bills reported in the Senate are: From the Judiciary Committee to regulate the duty of the Clerk of the House in its organization. He is to place on the rolls the names of members from those States only that were represented in the preceding session. A violation of this provision is to be considered as felony. The Bill was passed.—From the same Committee a bill was reported providing that none of the States which participated in the late rebellion shall hereafter be permitted to take part in the election of President and Vice-President until, through the agency of the law-making power, they shall regain the civil governments of which they have been deprived by their revolutionary course.—And still another, repealing so much of the law of April, 1790, as prevents prosecutions for treason after the lapse of three years from the alleged commission of the offense.

Memorials have been presented in the Senate from the Union League at Norfolk, praying for the abrogation of the present State Government of Virginia, and the establishment in its place of a Territorial Government; and from the white loyalists of Louisiana, asking for the abrogation of the present State Government of that State, and the establishment in its place of a Provisional Government. The petitioners, among whom are Mr. Wells, the present Governor, Mr. Hyman, Chief Justice of the Su-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

preme Court, and Mr. Howell, Associate-Justice, say:

"A large majority of the voters of the State regret the failure of the late rebellion, and now openly approve and advocate the principles and feelings that produced it. The principles and persons of those who remained loyal are as odious to them now as during the war; and those who assisted the General Government in its victorious contest are now in the condition of a vanquished party. The murders and prosecutions of loyal men are increasing in frequency and turpitude; the lives, liberty, and property of the freedmen are mainly dependent upon the interests and caprices of the disloyal; and neither we nor they can obtain justice in the civil courts, or adequate military protection. We therefore petition your Honorable Bodies to take such action as will supersede the present political organizations in our State by such as will be loyal to the General Government, and secure to the loyal people of Louisiana protection in their lives, liberty, and property."

Mr. Trumbull, in presenting this petition, took occasion to lay down what may be considered an exposition of the views of the majority of the Republican party in Congress. He said that "Congress has complete jurisdiction over the whole subject; and the rebellious States, and the people of those States, are in the condition of any other people who have wickedly and causelessly undertaken to rebel against a good and just Government, and have failed." He continued, in substance: The people of these States undertook, not as individuals, but as States, and through their State organizations, to set up a Government hostile to that of the United States. They themselves overthrew the existing State organizations, which constituted the only link between them and the Federal Government; and thus breaking the link which bound them to the Union, were no longer States of the Union, with the appertaining rights and privileges. But "they were still communities within the jurisdiction of the Union, and the laws of the Union operated over the people just as completely during the rebellion as before or since." The armed force of the United States overthrew the rebellious State organizations; but the State Governments which had been superseded were not thereby revived. "There then existed no link by which these States, as States, were connected with the Federal Government; and in order to renew that connection it was necessary that State Governments should be set up; and the President of the United States undertook to organize such Governments, through Provisional Governors whom he appointed." While Mr. Trumbull considered that the President had no authority to do this, yet, he thought,

"Had the President's plan succeeded, had he organized State Governments that were loyal to the Union, that were under the control of loyal men, that protected loyal citizens and secured freedom to all the inhabitants in those States, Congress might, and doubtless would, have overlooked the manner of their organization, and recognized them as restored to their former relations; because Congress is as anxious, and the people of the country are as anxious, as the President himself ever was or can be for the complete restoration of the States of the Union to their former position upon fair and honorable terms. But the people of this country are not willing that the rebellious States shall continue to be ruled over by rebels, and Union men be persecuted for their loyalty."

The foregoing abstract indicates the tone and spirit of the proceedings of Congress in relation to the great national issues, and shows that the majority in that body do not propose to modify their policy to accord with that advocated by the President. Significant hints have been thrown out of a design to impeach the President; but these have, as yet, taken no definite form.——Resolutions for the admission of Nebraska and Colorado as States of the Union have been presented, and have elicited some debate, but no action has been taken upon them. ——On the 20th of December Congress adjourned for the holidays, to reassemble on the 3d of January.

The Legislatures of nearly all of the Southern States have now had before them the question of the adoption of the proposed Constitutional Amendment. Their action has, without exception, been adverse, and it may be fairly presumed that the Amendment will not be accepted by any one of these States. It may also be assumed that Maryland, Delaware, and Kentucky will not accede to the Amendment.

General Howard, Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, presents a statement of the condition of this class of people. He says:

"In Virginia the freedmen have decreased in number; estimated population at this date 500,000; North Carolina, estimated at about the census of 1860, 360,000; South Carolina decreased, present population estimated at 375,000; Georgia estimated at 400,000; the population of Florida has remained about the same as when the census of 1860 was taken, 62,677. In Mississippi a census has been taken since the close of the war, showing a slight decrease. 320,000 is the present colored population of the State. In Louisiana, no change reported. Colored population, 350,000. Texas —The Assistant Commissioner of this State reports an increase. Colored population estimated at 200,000. Missouri—It is probable that the freedmen have left this State in large numbers for Kansas, Iowa, etc. Estimated population, 100,000. In Arkansas the colored population has decreased to about 100,000. In Tennessee the Assistant Commissioner estimates an increase from 283,000 population in 1860 to 300,000.

"The Assistant Commissioner of the States of Louisiana, Florida, and Arkansas reports an increased disposition on the part of the freedmen to take advantage of the Homestead Act and the actual work accomplished up to October 1. In Louisiana sixty-nine entries have been made, and one hundred and eighty-three persons settled on the public lands, representing over six thousand dollars' worth of personal property; many more applications are made by persons who will move to these lands as soon as this year's work closes. In Arkansas many practical difficulties have prevented the Assistant Commissioner from obtaining correct information of the location of public lands. Thirty families, with one hundred and twenty-five persons, have entered lands and moved to them. In Florida more has been done than in either of the abovementioned States. It is probable that after their release from this year's contract many will enter lands, notwithstanding the fact that they will be compelled to compete with their more wealthy white neighbors.

"The reports contain evidence that the manner of executing the laws on the part of magistrates and jurors in some parts of the South does great injury to the freed people. The necessity for enforcing General Order No. 44 from head-quarters of the armies of the United States in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas by the Assistant Commissioners is fully established. The decisions of some of the district judges in the State of Mississippi that the Civil Rights bill was unconstitutional has no doubt robbed the colored people of privileges intended to be secured for them by that law. The machinery of the Civil Rights bill is not in full operation in some portions of the South, for many criminals that ought to be brought to trial under that bill are at large. The Assistant Commissioners generally favor the contract system. The freedmen are reported as having, in most cases, faithfully performed their obligations. Employers have, as a general thing, settled with the freedmen in accordance with the terms of their contracts; yet when any of them have failed to do so the State laws have not, in all cases, afforded the freedmen the proper remedies and protection. For this reason Assistant Commissioners report that they have relieved the evil as far as possible by assuming the guardianship of the freedmen as contemplated by the laws of Congress. I call special attention to the vagrant laws of Maryland, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas. The small time allowed after the expiration of one contract before a person must enter another to escape vagrancy will occasion practical slavery. The arrest of assembled

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

persons as vagrants upon information given by any party, his trial by a justice of the peace, and the sale of his services at public outcry for payment of the fine and costs, without limit as to time, whipping, and working in chain-gangs, present some of the obnoxious features of the irregular law."

The present condition of the leading Pacific railways is given at length in the Report of the Secretary of the Interior. The Union Pacific Railroad has been completed to a point 23 miles west of the 100° of longitude, and 270 miles from Omaha, where the dépôts are established. The Company is engaged in making surveys to ascertain the best route still further beyond. It has expended nearly $10,000,000, and has already established railroad and telegraphic communication for a distance of 418 miles west of St. Louis.—The Central Pacific Railroad has opened its line to a point 94 miles from Sacramento, and has a force of 10,000 men employed in grading the next two sections. It has also a large force engaged in constructing a tunnel 1600 feet long at the summit of the Sierra Nevada, and another of 900 feet seven miles eastward of that place. It is expected that during the present year the road will be completed to a point 195 miles east of Sacramento; and that Salt Lake City will be reached in 1870. The expenditures upon this road have been $12,000,000.

Three negroes, lately convicted of larceny at Annapolis, Maryland, and sentenced to be sold under the laws of the State, were sold at public auction on December 22. An agent of the Freedmen's Bureau on December 24 issued a warrant for the arrest of the Judge who condemned them, and the United States Court is to examine into the matter. Laws condemning freed negroes to slavery for larceny have existed for many years in most of the Southern States, and are now attempted to be enforced in the face of the Emancipation Proclamation and Civil Rights Bill. An attempt to enforce a not less unjust law was lately made in North Carolina, when the Sheriff of Raleigh attempted to inflict corporal punishment on a negro by whipping. Colonel Bomfort, commanding the United States forces in the military district, interfered, and in obedience to an old order of General Sickles, his superior, prohibiting corporal punishment for crime, prevented the whipping. An appeal was made to President Johnson, who decided in favor of the State authorities, and annulled the order of General Sickles. The negroes were whipped, and Colonel Bomfort is left to stand trial for offense against the State laws of North Carolina!

An ocean yacht race from New York to Cowes, in the Isle of Wight, took place during the month of December, 1866. The contestants were the yachts Henrietta, J. G. Bennett, Jun., commander; the Vesta, George Osgood, owner; and the Fleetwing, Pierre Lorillard, owner: and the wager thirty thousand dollars each. The vessels started on December 12, and the winning yacht, the Henrietta, reached Cowes on Christmas-day, making the run in thirteen days and twenty-two hours. The race created much excitement on both sides of the water. The city of Cowes tendered a banquet to the contestants. Queen Victoria reviewed the yachts, and granted an interview to the victor, while her son, Prince Alfred, Duke of Edinburgh, accepted the challenge which Mr. Bennett extended to all competitors, and is to race with him in August next.

Three officers and ninety men of the Second United States Cavalry and Eighteenth Infantry were surprised and massacred by Indians on December 22 near Fort Philip Kearney, Dakotah. Colonel H. B. Carrington, Eighteenth Infantry, commanding at the fort, was placed under arrest, charged with neglect of duty in suffering them to be slaughtered.

SOUTHERN AMERICA.

Maximilian returned from Orizaba to the City of Mexico December 12, and declared that he will remain in the country. Generals Marquez, Miramon, and Mejia have announced their intention to sustain him after the departure of the French, and claim to have an army of 30,000 men with which to do it. General Sherman and Minister Campbell, on arriving off Vera Cruz on the steamer Susquehanna, declined to land, and on December 3 sailed for Brownsville, Texas, and Matamoras, Mexico. After an interview with General Escobedo they left for New Orleans. Matamoras had been temporarily occupied shortly before by General Sedgwick, but evacuated by orders from Washington. On December 22 General Escobedo was captured by Canales and shot, the latter purporting to act in the name and by the authority of General Ortega, who claims to be the legal President of Mexico.

The war in Paraguay appears to have been virtually ended by the desperate battle before Fort Curupaity, on September 22. The allied army and fleet were badly repulsed and damaged. Subsequently General Flores, commanding the Uruguayan, and General Mitre, commanding the Argentine army, withdrew their forces and abandoned the war, to be prosecuted by the Brazilians alone. At our latest dates the latter remained in position before Curupaity, but all hope of further advance against the strongly-posted Paraguayans had been abandoned. General Flores, on returning to Uruguay, declared himself Dictator for another year.

EUROPE.

The threatened demonstrations of the Fenians in Ireland, as noticed in our last Record, have not taken place. The English Government had filled the island with troops, and succeeded in preventing an uprising.

The Reform Demonstrations in England continued with all the enthusiasm previously displayed. The London Trades Unions—organizations of great numerical strength—had placed their organizations and funds under the control of the Reform leaders.

Appalling explosions in the coal mines of Yorkshire, England, occurred at various times during December of 1866, by which several hundred lives were lost. The section of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, England, devoted to Eastern products, was destroyed by fire on December 30, 1866.

John H. Surratt, an accomplice of Booth in the assassination of President Lincoln, was arrested November 21 in Rome, while serving in the Papal Zouaves, but managed to escape. Subsequently, December 2, he was rearrested at Alexandria, Egypt, and secured on board the United States war steamer Swatara.

Rome was finally evacuated by the French troops on December 11, but up to our latest dates had not been occupied by the Italian forces. Victor Emanuel has made propositions to the Pope to the effect that Florence shall be made the capital of Italy, Rome be declared a free city under the control of the Pope, the Cardinals to be made Princes of the Kingdom, and the people of the Papal States allowed to vote on the question of union with Italy; the only concession of the Pope to be that he shall crown and acknowledge Victor Emanuel as King of Italy.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Editor's Drawer.

FROM Maine to Louisiana the Magazine is welcomed, and from almost every State and Territory come some contributions to the Drawer. All are given to the readers of the Drawer that have the essence of wit in them, and that can be printed without offense; and the variety is adapted to the various tastes of a multitude of readers. Perhaps a story seems dull to one that spreads a smile over the countenance or shakes the fat sides of another. So laugh away, friends, each when your turn comes.

TWELVE years ago, says a Louisianian, I was studying at an academy in W——, State of Maine. I roomed in a doctor's office on Main Street. Directly across the hall from our office was that of a lawyer. On one door was the sign "L. P. Babb, M. D.;" on the other, "J. Stackpole, Att'y at Law." Now in spite of these signs it frequently happened that people would come into our office and ask: "Is this Squire Stackpole's?" "Lawyer Stackpole at home?" etc. Such stupid blunders at last became annoying. My chum, who was a little profane, determined to cure the next case. So, as we sat one sultry day, cudgeling our brains over the Greek Reader, the door suddenly opened, and in bolted a greenhorn, when the following dialogue took place:

GREENHORN. "Is this Squire Stackpole's office?"

CHUM. "No, confound you! Can't you read?"

Amused at this laconic and decisive rejoinder, I determined to try my hand on the next customer. Soon after, as I lay on the lounge "ponying" Virgil, a gentle tap was given at the door. The usual "Come in!" brought in the stranger. Half-suspecting him to be a "subject," I saluted him civilly, whereupon he seated himself, and "thus began:"

QUESTION. "Do you stop here?"

ANS. "Yes."

QUESTION. "Can I get a little advice?"

ANS. "Yes."

Sure of my man, I threw down my "pony" and straightened up, looking wise as Coke or Blackstone. "State your case briefly," said I; which he did as follows:

"I am a carpenter; have been working in Windsor; locked my tools in my chest and went to Augusta. In my absence the chest was broken open and part of the tools were stolen. I carried the remainder away with me. The point of law is to know whether or not, after moving the tools, I can convict the thief on circumstantial evidence."

After mature deliberation I delivered the opinion of the Court as follows:

"If you can prove that you had such and such tools at such and such place on a given day, and that they were feloniously taken from you, and that such and such man has tools corresponding exactly to yours, and you can show incontestably that he could not have come into possession of them in any other way, then clearly he stole them from you. The case is a plain one."

I then resumed my "interlinear," as much as to say, "Now I am ready for the fees."

"Carpenter" looked about the room abstractedly for a few moments, glanced at some of the titles to the books in the library, stared curiously at my red-covered equulus, and finally said: "I haven't got no money to pay you for your advice. Wouldn't ye like to have yer fortin told?"

Inwardly bursting with laughter at this new turn in the case, I confessed that I did not believe in fortune-telling, and that he was welcome to the advice. He then slunk out of the room, and I into the back office, and exploded. After that I courteously directed every body to the "Squire's" office. Since that time I have often thought of studying law, but remembering the fees in my first case, have concluded other trades more profitable.

ANOTHER:

In the county town of Somerset County, same State, lived an old farmer named Tom S——, familiarly known as "Captain Tom." He was an incorrigible joker, and would not scruple to tell a "coarse-haired truth." Now it happened that he had a huge elm-tree directly in front of his house, to which he had hung an immense gate, opening into the orchard. Back in the country five miles lived Sam W——, not celebrated for brilliancy. One day Sam was riding by Captain Tom's when he met the proprietor in the yard. Stopping his horse, the following colloquy ensued:

TOM. "Good-morning, Sam!"

SAM. "Good-morning, Captain Tom! Fine gate-post you have there!" looking at the noble elm.

TOM. "Well, yes, pretty good; but the gate is 'most too much for it. It has pulled the tree over about two inches. Don't you see it leans a leetle toward Leighton's?"

SAM (holding up his arm as a sort of plumb). "Well, I declare I do see it."

ONE of the ablest of our Western lawyers sends the following:

Judge ——, who is now a very able Judge of the Supreme Court of one of the great States of this Union, when he first "came to the bar" was a very blundering speaker. On one occasion, when he was trying a case of replevin, involving the right of property to a lot of hogs, he addressed the jury as follows:

"Gentlemen of the jury, there was just twenty-four hogs in that drove—just twenty-four, gentlemen—exactly twice as many as there are in that jury-box!" The effect can be imagined.

AN Alabama correspondent depicts in a lively manner the state of society in his neighborhood:

There was a "big wedding" in town the other night; the chivalry gathered from far and near, and all the gentlemen, from the bishop down, became slightly intoxicated, which is a part of the ceremony in this region of country. Old Aunt Sylvia, our colored cook, hearing of the "big doings" over the way, expressed herself in this wise: "Lor'," says she, "what is de use of making such a fuss when a body gits married? It's all just foolish nonsense, so it is! Why, I hab had three husbands, and nebber was married yet!"

DOCTOR —— is President of a College in Western Pennsylvania, and is much given to form and ceremony. At the opening of the fall term of '65, boarding being scarce, the Doctor consented to receive a number of students into his family, among whom was one H——, more noted among his fellows for knowledge of the game of "seven up" and "euchre" than for his store of classical or biblical literature. Now it had been a custom,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google time out of mind, at the Doctor's table, for each member of his family to repeat a verse of Scripture before grace was said. At the first meeting of the Doctor with his boarders at the table each repeated his verse until it came H——'s turn, who, not having known of this custom of the Doctor, was of course unprepared, and politely told the Doctor, "I pass!" At another time, forgetting "his verse," he attempted part of the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, by repeating, "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall be mercied!" These comical and repeated blunders caused much merriment among his fellow-students, and sorely grieved the order-loving Doctor—so much so, that he was heard to exclaim, a short time afterward: "Scripture shall not be mutilated at my table!" and immediately discontinued the custom, and has never resumed it.

A Down-Easter tells a pretty good political yarn:

At the time of "Log-cabin and hard-cider" campaign, the eloquent and scholarly Dr. T——, then a young man, had just been placed in charge of his first church in a city way down in Maine. Party politics ran high, and were not entirely confined outside the walls of the "church"—at least so thought some good Democratic brethren, who consulted together in relation to what position the new minister would take, as he had come so recently among them that they had been unable to learn whether he was a Whig or a Democrat. At any rate, after consultation, our Democratic brethren concluded that, as it was hardly safe to rely upon him as with them, and fearing his influence in case he should go on the other side, decided that, as he had just come into the parish, 'twould perhaps be better, in order to keep in good fellowship all around, for him to stand aloof from any part in the approaching election. Consequently they appointed Brother R——, one of the oldest members, and considered as having the greatest influence with the minister, as a committee to call and talk with him, and advise him to keep out of politics. So one morning Brother R—— called in to see the young minister, who, as usual, was very happy to see him, and inquired anxiously in regard to the state of the church. This gave our worthy brother an opportunity to approach the subject in hand, and he commenced:

"Brother T——, you are aware that there is a great deal of political feeling through the country at the present time; party lines are pretty closely drawn; and, I am sorry to say, appearances indicate that it may not be kept entirely outside the church, but that brother will range himself against brother in this contest. We have, therefore, been consulting in regard to what is your duty in the matter, and I have been sent to give you the result of our deliberations. It is this: You have just come among us, a young man, and are loved and esteemed by the whole church; hardly a member, if even one, knows your political views. Should you take part with either side in the approaching contest, the other side will necessarily feel opposed to you, and a bitterness will spring up which, we fear, would end in sad disaster to our church. We have, therefore, felt it our duty to advise you to abstain from any part in the coming campaign, and hope that our views, if not in sympathy with your own, may be received in the same spirit of Christian love that prompted them."

Mr. T—— sat quietly and heard him through, as he had often before done upon subjects connected with the welfare of their church—as he was one whom, in particular, he felt glad to lean upon for support in his youth and inexperience. But, notwithstanding the apparent frankness and sincerity of the advice, he thought he could detect a little sign somewhere that it was *out*side of the church that was fearful of being offended, and being a man naturally full of fun—a very dry, quiet fun, by-the-way—and a good Harrison man withal, he thought he would let Brother R—— decide for him whether, after all, there would be any thing wrong in his exercising the right of franchise. So he replies:

"There is a good deal, I know, in what you have said; but, though I am a minister of the Gospel, still I am a man, and entitled to all a man's rights and privileges in the community, and if on the day of election I should quietly, and interfering with no man, go down to the polls and deposit my ballot for Martin Van Buren, and then quietly go home again, whose business is it?"

The bait took in a moment, and Brother R——, rising from his chair, came across the floor, and taking Mr. T—— by the hand, said, energetically:

"Brother T——, it's nobody's business, and I should do as I chose about it!"

Deacon C—— had an Irish girl who was decidedly verdant. The Deacon was building a wood-house on ground which inclosed a well. "And, shure," said the Milesian help, "are ye goin' to move the well?" Observing a smile on his face, she added: "Ah! what a big fool I be. Shure every drap of wather would run out movin' it!"

Dear Drawer,—Your horse-selling story, contained in the December Number, reminds me of a good one that happened not long ago in my country (Germany). A dealer in horse-flesh, of Jewish persuasion, sold to a gentleman of little experience in such matters a steed as perfectly "without faults." Next day the buyer came back in great fury, because his groom found out that the alleged "faultless" horse was blind in the right eye. "Why," replied the sly jobber, "this is not the horse's fault, it is only his misfortune!"

During the never-to-be-forgotten "Tippecanoe and Tyler too" campaign of 1840 the Whigs held a grand political Convention in the little village of Salem, in the western part of Jefferson County, Ohio. A large procession of "true blues" came from the town of Steubenville, who were very hungry and dry by the time they arrived at the place of meeting. Among the crowd was the late Judge Wilson, or "Old Jimmy," as he was generally called, then editor of the Steubenville Herald. Leading the crowd, he proceeded to the village tavern, kept by a "bully" Democrat by the name of Andrews.

"Here, Andrews," said Old Jimmy, "is a lot of the dryest Whigs you ever saw. I want hard cider for the crowd, with a gourd to drink it from!"

"Bless your soul, Judge!" responded Andrews, "I haven't a drop of hard cider in the house. Sorry I can't accommodate you."

"But," said the Judge, "you must get us some hard cider or the Convention can't go on."

"Well," said Andrews, "I'll do the best I can," and he accordingly retired to another room and set his "wits to work" to manufacture the much-desired beverage. Finding some venerable rain-water in a barrel in the back-yard he took a few gallons of it, and mixed therewith some vinegar and "forty-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

rod" whisky. In a short time he returned with a gourd full of this preparation, and handing it to the Judge, whose eyes sparkled with delight in anticipation of having a spirited meeting of the real log-cabin boys. So taking the gourd in hand, the Judge raised it in full view of the delighted crowd, and gave as a toast:

"Cold water may do for the Locos,
Or a little vinegar stew;
But give us hard cider and whisky,
And hurrah for Old Tippecanoe!"

Then, putting the gourd to his lips, he was about taking a good drink, when the smell was a little too strong for his stomach. He smelled and tasted, and tasted and smelled, and shook his head. Turning to Boniface, he said:

"Well, Andrews, this may be good hard cider, but it will take a more patriotic Whig than I am to drink it!"

CLERICAL experience is proverbially odd at times. A friend of mine, in orders, had an aged parishioner—the father of the town in years and honors—over whom, whenever he should depart, it would of course be necessary to pronounce some special discourse. So, not to be taken at unawares, as life is uncertain, especially to old people, my friend improved a leisure time to write a sermon on "The Respect due to the Aged," leaving obituary remarks to be afterward supplied. The manuscript being finished was duly "salted down," and the pastor felt relieved. But years passed, and the old gentleman was as hale as ever. By-and-by the annual Thanksgiving came around, and the parson, tired of waiting for his parishioner to exit, concluded to turn his sermon into a discourse for that festival, merely substituting for the intended obituary a peroration upon the pleasure of having these venerated old folks at home to trot the grandchildren on their knees at the family gatherings. The sermon, thus translated from a funereal to a festal use, was thought to be a decided hit, and the old gentleman himself enjoyed it most complacently, never mistrusting for what purpose it had been originated.

THE Drawer has received the following high testimony to its excellence as an anti-dyspeptic, who sends with his letter the subsequent contributions:

I belong to the "white cravat" profession, and yet believe in the "laugh and grow fat" principle of hygiene. Your Drawer of racy humor has afforded me many an allopathic dose of stimulant, aliment, and condiment, and I confess I have saved thereby from the doctors much more than the subscription price of the Magazine.

CHILDREN have great ideas of utility. Almost every object or action calls forth the questions, "What is it for?" "What will you do with it?" etc., etc. To illustrate: Mrs. A—— lived in the little town of Smithville, Chenango County, New York, and near her dwelling Doctor C—— had his office in former years. Mrs. A—— had about half a dozen frouzy-headed, roguish boys, from the age of twelve downward, among whom she was accustomed to practice rather more than Solomon's maxim, "Spare the rod," etc., in the way of sharp scolding and sharper cuffs. One lovely spring day, when "flowery May" had coaxed people to raise their windows, set their doors open, and enjoy themselves generally, Doctor C—— and his students were lounging in front of the office, in close vicinity to Mrs. A——'s door. Suddenly the usual uproar was heard within. A woman's voice and boys' voices on high key, contradictions, threats, hard names, and all the indescribable jargon of such scenes, evinced that a disciplinary operation was in progress, combined with certain arguments which might close up with blows and tingling ears. All at once quick steps were heard, and an eight-year-old urchin, with last year's dilapidated hat on his unkempt head, emerged from the open door like a flash, while just behind him came down on the resounding door-sill an enormous old-fashioned splint broom, wielded by his ultra-Solomonic mother, and a voice like a clarion poured through the soft air: "You little br-a-a-t! if I could ketch ye I'd skin ye alive!" At this the fugitive boy's utilitarian ideas immediately became uppermost, and, checking his wild flight through the front-yard, he whirled around, placed his arms a-kimbo, and exclaimed: "Mother, what would ye do with the skin?"

The curtain drops amidst the laughter of the Doctor and his jolly students, and, much to the detriment of Science, the scribe hereof is not able to give the woman's reply.

HERE is another from the same source:

Court was in session in C——, and a case in progress in which the community was deeply interested. Among other citizens, the Rev. Mr. H—— (Methodist), and the Rev. Mr. B—— (Presbyterian), went in to hear the "summing up." The two clergymen took seats either side of ex-Judge D——, a lawyer and Congressman of wit and eminence; and the Rev. Mr. H—— whispered in D——'s ear that the clergy had stepped in to secure justice and equity in the case pending, through the sanctity of their presence, and indicated that their position either side of D—— was on account of his especial need of such influence. D—— drew on a meek and injured expression, and, in a plaintive undertone, replied, "Do you remember between whom the Saviour was crucified?" It is needless to add that the dominies "remembered."

NELLIE N—— was standing one day by a hot stove, when her Thibet dress became badly scorched. Seeing there was something wrong about her she screamed to her mother, sitting in the next room: "Oh, mamma, what is the matter with me? I'm all puckered up, and smell bad!"

THE three following are Californian, and authentic:

Several years ago a traveling exhibition was announced in N—— City. The blank walls were placarded with bills original in their design, commencing: "The greatest wonder of the world! Come 1, come all!" the last word in each line being symbolically represented respectively by the world and a shoemaker's awl. Mat D——, one of the Teutonic persuasion, was a shrewd, wide-awake saloon-keeper, who had gathered together considerable of this world's goods, and thought well of himself in consequence. Yet he could neither read in English nor German; and this defect in his early education he was very sensible of, and tried to conceal under the plea that he could not pronounce English words. Having observed that much curiosity was attracted to these show-bills, he soon penetrated the mystery, and the conceit of the pictured words pleased him, inasmuch as he could

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

read them. Drawing up a friend to witness his newly-acquired orthographic talents, he burst forth: "Hans, did you read this? See what it says:" and commencing with finger pointing to each word as he vocalized it, "Ze greatest wonder of the world! Come one! come gimlet!" Mat had mistaken the picture, and was bored by his friends unmercifully for months afterward.

ONE time a friend had been sampling some of Mat's native wines, and objected to the fruitage of a bottle. "Oh, I knows dat is good," cried he, indignantly, "for Dr. Stone civilized it, and said it was ze pure grape juice!"

SAUNDERS, mine host of the Tremont, is a rare joke-loving hombre, and can tell a story in an inimitable manner, and appreciate a joke even when the point tells against himself. Several years ago a tall, loose-limbered, foolish-appearing loon came in to the supper-table in a slow and measured manner, and attracted attention by the voracity with which he made away with the eatables. Having devoured the portion of several men he called at Saunders's desk, and paying his "four bits," drawled out the question in a stuttering way, "I say, Cap, hev you got more beds than you want? for I thought ef you had I'd take one, and ef you didn't have more'n you wanted I'd go somewhar else and take one." Mine host wondered at the queerness of his style of language, but answered that if he wanted lodgings he could be accommodated—that he still had some spare beds. The stranger came out with his dust and was shown to a double-bedded room, occupied by a little Irishman. Before daybreak Saunders was awakened by hearing stealthy footsteps in the dining-hall, and hastily throwing on some garments he proceeded to investigate, pistol in hand. Just as he reached the hall-door he heard a voice in a smothered tone crying, "Saunders! Saunders! who did you put in my room, sure? for the murthering thafe has stole my boots!" It was the little Irishman prowling around in his stockings; and the two hastily proceeded to the room of the late guest, found it sans him, Mike's boots, and the bed, blankets, sheets, and pillow gone. The suggestion about the stranger's "taking a bed" had been acted upon, and it was so rich a sell no attempt was made to apprehend the thief, although heard of at every mining camp along the river for miles, and supposed by all to be a "Jew Peddler with his pack on his back."

A GOOD story is told of a fellow at a cattle-show, who was making himself ridiculously conspicuous by an evident intention of finding fault with every thing. (A disagreeable habit, by-the-way, with some people.) At last he burst forth with, "Call these 'ere prize cattle? Why, they ain't nothing to what our folks raised. My father raised the biggest calf of any man round our parts!" "I don't doubt it," was the timely remark of a bystander; "and the noisiest." The forward youth, as well may be imagined, incontinently subsided.

ONE day Nais-ed-din, a Turkish priest, having ascended the pulpit of the Mosque, thus addressed the congregation: "Oh, true believers, do you know what I am going to say to you?" "No," responded the congregation. "Well, then, there is no use in my speaking to you," and he came down from the pulpit. A second time he went to preach, and repeated his question, "Oh, true believers, do you know what I am going to say to you?" "We know," replied the true believers. "Ah," said he, descending from the pulpit, "as ye know, why should I take the trouble of telling ye?" When next he came to preach the congregation had resolved to test his powers; so, on his asking the usual question, they replied, "Some of us know, and some of us do not know." "Very well," said he, quitting the rostrum for the third (and last) time, "let those who know tell those who do not know."

A LADY in Tennessee vouches for the authenticity of the three following:

I was once attending the Methodist church in our village when the minister for that year was to preach his last sermon before leaving.

We all kneeled at prayer, when he began to beseech the Lord to send a minister to that people who should be the instrument of doing more good than he had ever been able to do. The congregation responded, most vociferously, "Amen!"

I HAD a little cousin whose name was B—— visiting us. My husband, as usual, was about to engage in family worship one morning, and when he uttered the words "Let us pray," before any of us could assume the devotional attitude the little fellow was down, and turning his eyes up he said, "Cousin F——, please be as short as possible." I need not say that the solemnity of the occasion for some of us was at an end.

I MUST relate a cat story before winding up. One of my neighbors, Mrs. M——, had an extraordinary number of cats, and desiring to get rid of some of them, thought she would put them in a bag and turn them loose after reaching our county seat, about ten miles distant. On arriving at C—— she emancipated them, bidding them, as she fondly hoped, an eternal adieu. She spent the day with a friend, and late in the afternoon reached home. How great was her astonishment, when entering her yard, to find them all seated in a row upon the piazza, evidently delighted at her return!

E—— W——, of Minneapolis, is one of the most promising young lawyers in Minnesota, and a very great wag withal. Last term of court he was employed by an ex-provost marshal, who was the defendant, in an action for damages. J—— S——, of St. Paul, was for the plaintiff. During the trial W—— ventured the assertion that "the provost marshal's department during the war was a bureau." S—— denied this, and arguments pro and con were offered by each in turn, until finally S—— became excited, and turning to W——, exclaimed:

"What! does the gentleman mean to say that the provost marshals scattered all over the North during the late war were a bureau?"

"Oh no," coolly replied W——, "they were the drawers!"

In view of the remarkable regularity that characterized those gentlemen in drawing their salary the answer was considered a good one.

A GOOD story is told about a couple of church-members—one of them a deacon by the name of Bennet, and the other a Brother Griffin. Brother Griffin was addicted a little to the use of intoxicating drinks, and was the cause of some trouble to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the church. On one occasion Deacon Bennet was sent by the church to talk with Brother Griffin in regard to the error of his ways, and, if possible, persuade him to reform. In going from his house to that of Brother Griffin's he was compelled to cross a stream of water, over which there was a row-boat ferry. In crossing the Deacon told the ferryman where he was going, and his business. When he arrived at Brother G.'s he found him in the hay-field at work with his men. He was very cordially received by Brother G., who suspected his errand and invited him to a seat in the shade of a large tree.

"It is a very warm day, Deacon, very warm; won't you take a little something?" said G.

"Well, I don't care if I do take just a swallow," said the Deacon.

To make the story as brief as possible, the bottle was brought into requisition pretty often, the Deacon forgot his errand, and started for home toward the close of the afternoon, considerably "over the bay." When he arrived at the bank of the river, which was very steep, he had to call the ferryman, who was upon the opposite side, and wait for him to come over. By waiting the liquor had a pretty good chance to work, and when he finally started for the boat, instead of going toward it, he rushed down the bank into the river. The ferryman plunged in and brought him out, and after the Deacon was on dry land the ferryman said:

"Why, Deacon, what is the matter?"

"Oh," whimpered the Deacon, "I feel so for Brother Griffin I can't stand!"

After this if any one in that neighborhood got too much liquor it was said: "Oh, he feels for Brother Griffin!"

A NEW YORKER says:

Our porter, Robert T——, is a stanch Scotch Protestant, and, to help out his living, rents a small place in B——, where he keeps a few cows. He considers himself unfortunate in being surrounded by a number of squatters, who are opposed to him both in religion and habit. Still he manages to keep on fair terms with them. A little while since he bought a cow which proved vicious, kicking whenever milked. One evening she acted so outrageously he had to hopple her. While trying to milk her in this condition his neighbor Jimmie dropped in to have a word in passing. After witnessing the struggle for a few minutes he exclaimed: "An' Robert, that's one of yee's Protestant cows." Robert inquired what he meant. "An' shure, isn't she protesting all the time?" Robert acknowledged the joke.

THERE once lived in Georgetown, District of Columbia, a tanner named Anthony Hyde. His sign was as follows:

A. HYDE.

Hyde's my name,
And hides I buy;
Four cents for green,
Eight cents for dry.

A LEARNED judge of St. Paul (not the apostle) writes to the Drawer:

There lived in one of our saintly cities, before we were out of our swaddling-clothes, Squire ——, known hereabouts as the "Author of the Black Hawk War." He was a good-natured old man, and perhaps a good judge. Holding court one day, an attorney before him was confidently citing Wendell, Cowen, and other Reports with which he had "crammed" himself for the occasion. The old Squire, as he finished, peered over his spectacles, and astonished the young practitioner with the following settler:

"Dang the law, Mr. Attorney! Look at the ekity of the thing. I don't find that you are sustained by Lord Co-kee at all, and this Court follows the learned Co-kee always."

NOT many years ago, in answer to the call of a country parish in Virginia, there appeared a young clergyman whose sole earthly possessions consisted of two black trunks and a horse, whose ill-kept condition gained for him the sobriquet of Buzzard. The parson, however, being a man of fine address and brilliant parts, soon made for himself friends, and, it may be, excited the envy of some, by securing the affections of a lovely young widow, whose great wealth was more than an offset for his poverty. The time for the wedding came. The ceremony had proceeded to that point where the groom, in presence of the company, most solemnly declares to the bride, "With all my worldly goods I thee endow," when his gravity, and that of the guests, was completely upset by a wag just behind him exclaiming, "There goes Buzzard and the two black trunks!"

ON the afternoon before the night of the 13th of November, when the great meteoric shower was expected to occur, little Annie S——, of this city, came to her mother and begged very earnestly to be allowed to stay at home from school the next day, "because," said she, "I want to pick up stars all day to-morrow; they are going to fall to-night."

THE following is about as mean a character as the Drawer ever showed up:

An old woman and her husband lived in Vermont. The old man one day, riding home from town, was thrown from his horse against a stone and instantly killed. His wife, on hearing of it, hurried to the spot. Taking up one hand and letting it fall again she exclaimed, in a loud voice, "Ye're dead, Isaac—dead as a nit." Taking the other hand: "Yes, ye're dead as a door-nail. Well, I know what I shall do with that new cloth I bought for your shirts. I shall make it right into sheets." The day of the funeral came, and she wore an old black bonnet of her grandmother's time. It was a cloudy day, and as she started she held out her hand, raised first one eye, then the other, toward the clouds, then, in her usual loud tone, said: "I declare, it sprinkles! It 'll spile my bunnit! Guess I won't go; ye won't need me." Being persuaded by her friends she consented to go, but first tied a large red silk handkerchief over her "bunnit."

A CORRESPONDENT in New Mexico sends the following:

George Koalhous, who lives just below us, in San Elizario, Texas, and known on the Rio Grande as a hospitable, jolly, good fellow, is constantly getting off the richest of bulls. Among the many I will instance one. When Judge B—— was holding his first session of court at San Elizario the Teutonic George was acting in the capacity of deputy sheriff. One fine morning in September last the Judge said: "Mr. Sheriff, open the court." George (or "Don

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Nicholas," as the natives dub him) very promptly and pompously went and opened all the doors and windows, after which, with much conscious dignity, gave his Honor a military salute, and ejaculated, "Sir, the court is open."

A CLERK in Iowa City says: A very pretty and nobby young lady called in the store the other day and requested to see our lavender kid gloves, whereupon she was shown several different shades of that color. Being a little overcome with so great a variety, she asked, "Which of those pairs are the lavenderest?"

THE night after the sanguinary battle of Peach-Tree Creek, fought July 20, 1864, in which the rebel General Hood was taught a most salutary lesson in his efforts to drive "the invader" from the soil of Georgia, a party of half a dozen soldiers were discussing the events of the day, and mentioning the names of their comrades who had been killed or wounded, among the list of which most of them had some particular friend to mourn. At last Daniel Probert, an Englishman, but as good a soldier as ever wore the blue, remarked that his friend Bill, during the last charge, was "'it in the harm, but hit was an 'armless wound!"

DEAR DRAWER,—When Foote was canvassing the State of Mississippi, previous to the Congressional election, for which he was a candidate, he arrived one day at the town of L——, where he was engaged to make a speech. While waiting for dinner he chanced to pick up a late number of the Banner—a little one-horse paper published in that place—and found contained therein a very severe article against himself. He clipped the article from the paper, and after eating his dinner proceeded to the court-house, where a very respectable crowd had already assembled; among others, in company of his sweet-heart, Billy Cox, the editor of the aforementioned paper. Foote, in the course of his speech, took occasion to speak of the many severe and unjust things which were said of him by the newspapers. "And foremost in bitterness, but last in importance," he said, "I may mention a scurrilous little sheet published in this town, the editor of which, judging by the reading contained therein, has but a thimbleful of brains to balance a worldful of spite!" This was too much for Billy to stand; he sprang up and commenced a vindication of himself.

"Sit down!" commanded the orator; "the people came here to hear me speak, not you."

"Well, you needn't get your choler up about it," replied Billy.

"But I have my 'collar' up, and I always keep my collar up," answered Foote, at the same time giving a pull to that much-needed article of dress, which already reached the neighborhood of his ears; "and I would advise the gentleman to keep the other end of the same garment down!"

A KANSAS man sends the three following:

"If any body can beat that at meanness, let's hear of it," says your November Drawer, after the manner of beet and squash and "some pumpkins" braggings. The school janitor in Connecticut, who altered his account of $20 to $19 99, thus gaining one cent by dispensing with a two-cent stamp, was excelled by a Massachusetts farmer. It was in the days of Spanish coin—12½, 6¼, and 16⅔ cent pieces. Uncle Edward R—— had some work done at a blacksmith's shop in an adjoining town. After settling, and starting a rod or two on his return home, it flashed on his mind that he had over-paid the bill. "By my reckoning," said he to the smith, "I have given you half a cent too much." "You sha'n't have it to say," said the indignant son of Vulcan, in reply, "that I've cheated you out of a half-cent." And laying the old-fashioned United States copper cent on his anvil he cut it in two with his chisel, and gave one of the halves to his close-fisted customer, who ever after went by the name of "Half-cent Ned."

"GOOD Deacon Tupper," who feasted with such relish on the puddings at the Association Meeting in Maine, was rivaled by a clerical brother of a Ministerial Association of which I was once a member. It is sometimes said that ministers away from home have excellent appetites, and some have supposed them to be sharpened by involuntary fasts at home, like unto those voluntary ones wherewith "Uncle Sid," celebrated in your June Number, prepared for a convivial feast. Our gathering, on the occasion to which I refer, was at the residence of Brother B——, in L——. The fare was sumptuous; "from egg to apple" (as the old Romans expressed it), both in quantity and quality, it was all that it should have been. Brother T——, of one of the neighboring towns, did ample justice, with the rest of us, to the tempting variety, and having duly dispatched the large and rich pieces of pie (one mince, one squash), passed his plate to our host with a tacit "Oliver's asking." Our generous entertainer was surely not to blame for presuming that Brother T—— could take care of but one piece more, and therefore asked, "Which?" Brother T——, affecting to misunderstand, answered, "Yes." Our baffled host, manœuvring a moment, again asked, "Which did you say?" "Both!" replied the intrepid T——, and the phrase is a by-word to this day.

AT the rural academy where in my youth I was a pupil was a very worthy young man of twenty, a good scholar, but of very little general information, having read scarcely any thing of history or literature. At our boarding-house one day some of us were conversing about Oliver Cromwell—his character, career, death, etc. It so happened that in an adjoining town one Oliver Crummett, universally called Oliver Crummell, had been committed to the State Prison for sheep-stealing. Our fellow-student, who had never heard of the great Oliver, catching the name, "Oliver Cromwell," and the reference to his last sickness and death, electrified us with a "Sho! is that kritter dead?" and the phrase was the convulsing catch-word of the academy for weeks afterward.

AMONG the "characters" in Western Maryland is a jolly and clever Irishman, whose success in life is but the natural result of his patient industry. Living, as he does, on a canal, he occasionally has a few mules in his possession. Not long since, among others, was a neat little one, which, as Cuffee swore, would kick at every opportunity, and of which Cuff undertook to cure him by a generous cudgeling, every time he ventured to lift his heels in the presence of the dusky lord of the stable. Such treatment was wholly in conflict with the Irish good-humor of friend Murphy; and being so,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

he often remonstrated with Cuffee, and finally threatened to thrash him if he ever found him "bating a dacent mule like that again." True to his instincts, not an entire day after the threat had passed by before Murphy heard the darkey's verberations in the stable. Almost breathless, he bursts into the stable, crying, "Ah, ye darty black divel! and I've found ye bating the mule again, have I? and it as dacent a mule as iver was seen! I'll larn ye to bate an innocent crather like this!" laying his hand on the mule, who immediately let fly, catching Murphy on the shin, and sending him limping against the wall. "Oooh!" says Murphy, "he's cracked me on the shin! and it's yez, ye darty black divel—it's yez that has larnt him the thrick!" Cuff's sudden collapse in one corner saved his pate from the terrible blow Murphy aimed at him.

H—— was Sheriff of the County, and C—— a Roman Catholic ecclesiastic—both of them hearty, whole-souled men, and each the owner of a fast horse. Driving through one of the main streets of the city at a 2.40 gait brought them within the reach of the law, and both accordingly found their way to the Recorder's office, and due cause required why fines should not be imposed.

"Why," said the Sheriff (who, it seems, was left behind in the race), "I was only following the Church."

"And I," quoth the priest, "was running away from the Sheriff!"

The Recorder "didn't see it" in that light, however, and collected the fine.

Dear Drawer,—Like most city mortals weary of the dust and turmoil of town, I took a trip this summer into the country, and spent two weeks very pleasantly in the bustling town of B——, Vermont, situated upon the bank of the beautiful Connecticut River. I heard while in B—— a good story, in which a self-conceited, inquisitive, but good-natured Yankee, who literally hears and understands with his elbows, figured as a hero. Friend A—— is eternally prying into other people's affairs, and nothing delights him more than to be the first to report a scrap of news or scandal; this propensity of hearing with his elbows always makes him the laughing-stock of his audience. A short time ago a whole family in B—— were poisoned by taking Prussic acid. A——, upon hearing of the catastrophe, dropped his tools, made a circuit of the town, reporting at every house the wonderful intelligence that Squire C—— and family had all been poisoned with "putrid sausage!"

Judge D—— and Mr. P—— were always squabbling over some legality or other. On one occasion the Judge announced his intention of holding court on Good Friday. P—— at once rose: "May it please your Honor, such a proceeding is wholly without a precedent since the days of Pontius Pilate!" The court was not held till Saturday, as a natural consequence.

An ancient burgh, within cannon-shot of Gotham, having recently become infested with burglars, to the great alarm of its drowsy inhabitants, the City Council resolved to create a police force—the Mayor having the appointment of the men for that responsible situation. One of the Councilmen, in urging the claims and qualifications of his constituent for the position, asserted that his man had been engaged in the service of his country, and was one of the soldiers who spotted Wilkes Booth—in evidence of which he held the certificate of Abraham Lincoln! The Mayor replied that if he could produce that certificate he would certainly appoint his man.

Dear Drawer,—Here is one that is, I think, equally as good, and of the same sort, as the one in the November Number about the little boy in Oregon who thought his grandpa read the blessing off the table-cloth. Little Tommy K—— could not often find a seat at the first table, there being quite a large family of grown persons. One day, some member being absent, Tommy was allowed to take his place. The plates were of white stone china, and, as was customary, were turned upside down, thus showing the trade-mark and maker's name on the bottom.

"Well," said Tommy, "I'm glad I've got the blessin'-plate for once."

"Why, Tommy, what makes you think you have the blessing-plate?" asked his mother.

"Why, don't grandpa read the blessin' off the bottom of the plates?" said Tommy.

The late Judge W——, formerly Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, was a man of deep thought, and often so engrossed in his "cases" as to be wholly unconscious of conversation in his presence. Colonel S—— is one of your courteous Virginia gentlemen, quick, sensitive, and a good talker withal. The Colonel has a farm near Madison, on which he had just discovered a valuable peat-bed; and being much elated by the prospect of "sudden fortune," was apt to talk about it. Meeting the Judge in company with several gentlemen of the bar and legislators, then convened at the capitol, the favorite subject of the Colonel's opened. He, anxious to enlighten the Judge, directed his conversation particularly to that individual, who was sitting, head in hands, thinking-cap on, apparently an attentive listener, while the merits of economy, inexhaustible supply, great manufacturing advantages, etc., etc., were expatiated upon in all the earnestness for which the Colonel is remarkable. After concluding his statements with statistical and divers explanations, he asked the Judge what he thought of it.

"Of what?" says the Judge, looking up.

"Of peat," replied S——.

"What Pete?" again asked the Judge.

"Why, Irish peat," says S——, somewhat perplexed at the apparent stupidity.

"I don't know him, Sir," replied the Judge, not having heard a word of the subject.

Dear Drawer,—As I draw lots of fun out of your Drawer every month I thought I would send you this little scissoring, which I found in an old paper of 1849:

At an infant Sabbath-school, to the care of which I was "promoted" a few years since, I gave a "Bible story," the "Prodigal Son." When I came to the place where the poor ragged son reached his former home, and his father saw him "a great way off," I inquired what his father probably did. One of the smallest boys, with his little fist clenched, said, "I donno, but I des he set de dog on him."

Judge M'Farland tells a good story of his Texas practice. He now lives at Austin, but formerly

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google practiced at La Grange, in Fayette County. He had a client named H——, who was at dagger's point with his father about some property inherited from young H——'s mother. The client came to the Judge one day with a story that his father had tried to poison him.

"What evidence have you of that?" inquired the Judge.

"Oh! my boy, old Sam, told me so."

"Was his story a voluntary one?" queried the Judge.

"Oh yes, entirely so. I took Sam out and hit him three hundred, and he voluntarily belched it out."

The Judge declined to prosecute on that evidence.

The First Texas cavalry, under Colonel Davis, were quartered for a while at the barracks just below New Orleans. One day several of the young officers got leave of absence to go up to the city, but overstaid their leave, and got to the barracks after dusk, to find a sentry at the entrance. Fortunately one of them had a bottle in his pocket. The sentry was a Texas refugee, who had fled with them from this State. He, however, knew his duty, and hailed:

"Who comes there?"

"Friends!" (sotto voce) "with a bottle."

"Advance, friends, and present the countersign."

The countersign proved good. They were new to the service then, but that countersign (on a gentle hint from the Colonel) was not again used.

In the old times of the Texas Republic General Houston was sorely troubled with a lot of visionary madcaps who were constantly urging on a war of extermination against the Mexicans, numbering some seven millions of people, and the Indians, who at least equaled the few thousands of whites then in Texas. On one occasion a committee of these young war-horses waited on the General, their chairman and spokesman being Hugh M——, a young lawyer recently arrived from Georgia. A large crowd was present, and M——, who was a handsome young fellow and a very elegant speaker, improved the occasion to recite the wrongs of the people, to enlarge on the barbarity of the foe, and to explain to the President his duty, of which he demanded an immediate performance. Old Sam rose to the full majesty of his great form, and raising his face and hands solemnly upward, said: "Heavenly Father, I beseech Thee to save my poor, devoted country!" (lowering his head and hands and hissing out the remainder of the sentence)—"save it from these smart young men!" The committee retired amidst a roar of laughter; and M——, who told the story, said that he had never after attempted that sort of tactics on old Sam.

This comes from the Granite State, and is as fair a specimen of a scared Yankee as is often seen:

For twenty-three years old Jake Willard has cultivated the soil of Baldwin County, and drawn therefrom support for himself and wife. He is childless. Not long since Jake went in search of a cow. His course was through an old worn-out patch of clay land, of about six acres in extent, in the centre of which was a well twenty-five or thirty feet deep, that at some time, probably, had served the inmates of a dilapidated house near by with water. In passing by this spot an ill wind drifted Jake's tile from his head, and maliciously wafted it to the edge of the well, and in it tumbled.

Now the old gentleman had always practiced the virtue of economy, and he immediately set about recovering the lost hat. He ran to the well, and finding it was dry at the bottom, he uncoiled the rope which he had brought for capturing the truant cow, and after several attempts to catch the hat with a noose he concluded to save time by getting down into the well himself. To accomplish this he made fast one end of the rope to a stump hard by, and was soon on his way down the well. It was a fact, of which Jake was no less oblivious than the reader hereof, that Ned Willis was in the dilapidated old building aforesaid, and that an old blind horse, with a bell on his neck, who had been turned out to die, was lazily grazing within a short distance of the well. The devil himself, or some other wicked spirit, put it into Ned's cranium to have a little fun; so he quietly slipped up to the old horse, and unbuckling the strap, approached with a slow and steady "ting-a-ling" to the edge of the well.

"Dang the old blind horse!" said the man at the bottom of the well. "He's coming this way sure, and ain't got any more sense than to fall in here. Whoa, Bill!"

But the continued approach of a "ting-a-ling" said just as plainly as words that Bill wouldn't whoa. Besides, Jake was at the bottom, resting before trying to shin it up the rope.

"Great Jerusalem!" said he; "the old cuss will be a-top of me before I can say Jack Robinson. Whoa! dang it! Whoa!"

Just then Ned drew up to the edge of the well, and with his foot kicked a little dirt into it.

"O Lord!" exclaimed Jake, falling on his knees at the bottom. "I'm gone now—whoa! Now I lay me down to sleep—w-h-o-a!—I pray the Lord my soul to—whoa, now! O Lord have mercy upon me!"

Ned could hold in no longer, and fearing Jake might suffer from his fright he revealed himself. Probably Ned didn't make tracks from that well.

A Texan sends the following:

The First Texas cavalry formed a part of the force under General Davidson in his raid to Pascagoula from Baton Rouge. Severe orders had been issued against straggling and foraging. One night, after a hard day's march, Colonel Haynes and Major Holt, of the First Texas, had just got comfortably to bed when a big hog set up a most unearthly squeal in the neighborhood of the camp. The Colonel immediately began to rouse an orderly to send for the officer of the day, when the Major, opening his eyes, yawned out:

"Lie down, Colonel, that is none of our men."

"How do you know it is none of our men?"

"Well, Colonel, I have campaigned a heap more with this regiment than you, and I have found out that when the First Texas strikes a hog it never squeals but once."

That was entirely satisfactory, and the Colonel slept calmly.

On some railroads it is customary to have a lock on the stove to prevent passengers from meddling with the fire. A wag being asked why they locked the stove, coolly replied that "it was to prevent the fire from going out!"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

No. CCII.—MARCH, 1867.—Vol. XXXIV.

THE DODGE CLUB; OR, ITALY IN MDCCCLIX.

DICK!

I.

PARIS.—THE DODGE CLUB.—HOW TO SPEAK FRENCH.—HOW TO RAISE A CROWD.

IT is a glorious day in Paris. The whole city is out in the public places, watching the departure of the army of Italy. Every imaginable uniform, on foot and on horseback, enlivens the scene. Zouaves are every where. Cent Gardes hurry to and fro, looking ferocious. Imperial Gardes look magnificent. Innumerable little red-legged soldiers of the line dance about, gesticulating vehemently. Grisettes hang about the necks of departing braves. A great many tears are shed, and a great deal of bombast uttered. For the invincible soldiers of France are off to fight for an idea; and doesn't every one of them carry a marshal's baton in his knapsack?

A troop of Cent Gardes comes thundering down in a cloud of dust, dashing the people right and left. Loud cheers arise: "Vive l'Empereur!" The hoarse voices of myriads prolong the yell. It is Louis Napoleon. He touches his hat gracefully to the crowd.

A chasseur leaps into a cab.

"Where shall I take you?"

"To Glory!" shouts the soldier.

The crowd applaud. The cabman drives off and don't want any further direction.

Here a big-bearded Zouave kisses his big-bearded brother in a blouse.

"Adieu, mon frère; write me."

"Where shall I write?"

"Direct to Vienna—poste restante."

Every body laughs at every thing, and the crowd are quite wild at this.

A young man is perched upon a pillar near the garden wall of the Tuileries. He enjoys the scene immensely. After a while he takes a clay pipe from his pocket and slowly fills it. Having completed this business he draws a match along the stone and is just about lighting his pipe.

"Halloo!"

Down drops the lighted match on the neck of an ouvrier. It burns. The man scowls up; but seeing the cause, smiles and waves his hand forgivingly.

"Dick!"

At this a young man in the midst of the crowd stops and looks around. He is a short young man, in whose face there is a strange

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by Harper and Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google mixture of innocence and shrewdness. He is pulling a baby-carriage, containing a small specimen of French nationality, and behind him walks a majestic female.

The young man Dick takes a quick survey and recognizes the person who has called him. Down drops the pole of the carriage, and, to the horror of the majestic female, he darts off, and, springing up the pillar, grasps first the foot and then the hand of his friend.

"Buttons!" he cried; "what, you! you here in Paris!"

"I believe I am."

"Why, when did you come?"

"About a month ago."

"I had no idea of it. I didn't know you were here."

"And I didn't know that you were. I thought by this time that you were in Italy. What has kept you here so long?"

Dick looked confused.

"Why the fact is, I am studying German."

"German! in Paris! French, you mean."

"No, German."

"You're crazy; who with?"

Dick nodded his head toward his late companion.

"What, that woman? How she is scowling at us!"

"Is she?" said Dick, with some trepidation.

"Yes. But don't look. Have you been with her all the time?"

"Yes, seven months."

"Studying German!" cried Buttons, with a laugh. "Who is she?"

"Madame Bang."

"Bang? Well, Madame Bang must look out for another lodger. You must come with me, young man. You need a guardian. It's well that I came in time to rescue you. Let's be off!"

And the two youths descended and were soon lost in the crowd.

"Three flights of steps are bad enough; but great Heavens! what do you mean by taking a fellow up to the eighth story?"

Such was the exclamation of Dick as he fell exhausted into a seat in a little room at the top of one of the tallest houses in Paris.

"Economy, my dear boy."

"Ehem!"

"Paris is overflowing, and I could get no other place without paying an enormous price. Now I am trying to husband my means."

"I should think so."

"I sleep here—"

"And have plenty of bed-fellows."

"I eat here—"

"The powers of the human stomach are astounding."

"And here I invite my friends."

"Friends only, I should think. Nothing but the truest friendship could make a man hold out in such an ascent."

"But come. What are your plans?"

"I have none."

"Then you must league yourself with me."

"I shall be delighted."

"And I'm going to Italy."

HERE I INVITE MY FRIENDS.

"Then I'm afraid our league is already at an end."

"Why?"

"I haven't money enough."

"How much have you?"

"Only five hundred dollars; I've spent all the rest of my allowance."

"Five hundred? Why, man, I have only four hundred."

"What! and you're going to Italy?"

"Certainly."

"Then I'll go too and run the risk. But is this the style?" and Dick looked dolefully around.

"By no means—not always. But you must practice economy."

"Have you any acquaintances?"

"Yes, two. We three have formed ourselves into a society for the purpose of going to Italy. We call ourselves the Dodge Club."

"The Dodge Club?"

"Yes. Because our principle is to dodge all humbugs and swindles, which make traveling so expensive generally. We have gained much experience already, and hope to gain more. One of my friends is a doctor from Philadelphia. Doctor Snakeroot, and the other is Senator Jones from Massachusetts. Neither the Doctor nor the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Senator understand a word of any language but the American. That is the reason why I became acquainted with them.

"First as to the Doctor, I picked him up at Dunkirk. It was in a café. I was getting my modest breakfast when I saw him come in. He sat down and boldly asked for coffee. After the usual delay the garçon brought him a small cup filled with what looked like ink. On the waiter was a cup of eau de vie, and a little plate containing several enormous lumps of loaf-sugar. Never shall I forget the Doctor's face of amazement. He looked at each article in succession. What was the ink for? what the brandy? what the sugar? He did not know that the two first when mixed makes the best drink in the world, and that the last is intended for the pocket of the guest by force of a custom dear to every Frenchman. To make a long story short, I explained to him the mysteries of French coffee, and we became sworn friends.

"My meeting with the Senator was under slightly different circumstances. It was early in the morning. It was chilly. I was walking briskly out of town. Suddenly I turned a corner and came upon a crowd. They surrounded a tall man. He was an American, and appeared to be insane. First he made gestures like a man hewing or chopping. Then he drew his hand across his throat. Then he staggered forward and pretended to fall. Then he groaned heavily. After which he raised himself up and looked at the crowd with an air of mild inquiry. They did not laugh. They did not even smile. They listened respectfully, for they knew that the strange gentleman wished to express something. On the whole, I think if I hadn't come up that the Senator would have been arrested by a stiff gendarme who was just then coming along the street. As it was, I arrived just in time to learn that he was anxious to see the French mode of killing cattle, and was trying to find his way to the abattoirs. The Senator is a fine man, but eminently practical. He used to think the French language an accomplishment only. He has changed his mind since his arrival here. He has one little peculiarity, and that is, to bawl broken English at the top of his voice when he wants to communicate with foreigners."

Not long afterward the Dodge Club received a new member in the person of Mr. Dick Whiffletree. The introduction took place in a modest café, where a dinner of six courses was supplied for the ridiculous sum of one franc—soup, a roast, a fry, a bake, a fish, a pie, bread at discretion, and a glass of vinegar generously thrown in.

At one end of the table sat the Senator, a very large and muscular man, with iron-gray hair, and features that were very strongly marked and very strongly American. He appeared to be about fifty years of age. At the other sat the Doctor, a slender young man in black. On one side sat Buttons, and opposite to him was Dick.

"Buttons," said the Senator, "were you out yesterday?"

"I was."

"It was a powerful crowd."

"Rather large."

"It was im-mense. I never before had any idea of the population of Paris. New York isn't to be compared to it."

"As to crowds, that is nothing uncommon in Paris. Set a rat loose in the Champs Elysées, and I bet ten thousand people will be after it in five minutes."

"Sho!"

"Any thing will raise a crowd in Paris."

"It will be a small one, then."

"My dear Senator, in an hour from this I'll engage myself to raise as large a crowd as the one you saw yesterday."

"My dear Buttons, you look like it."

"Will you bet?"

"Bet? Are you in earnest?"

"Never more so."

"But there is an immense crowd outside already."

"Then let the scene of my trial be in a less crowded place—the Place Vendôme, for instance."

"Name the conditions."

THE CLUB.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"In an hour from this I engage to fill the Place Vendôme with people. Whoever fails forfeits a dinner to the Club."

The eyes of Dick and the Doctor sparkled.

"Done!" said the Senator.

"All that you have to do," said Buttons, "is to go to the top of the Colonne Vendôme and wave your hat three times when you want me to begin."

"I'll do that. But it's wrong," said the Senator. "It's taking money from you. You must lose."

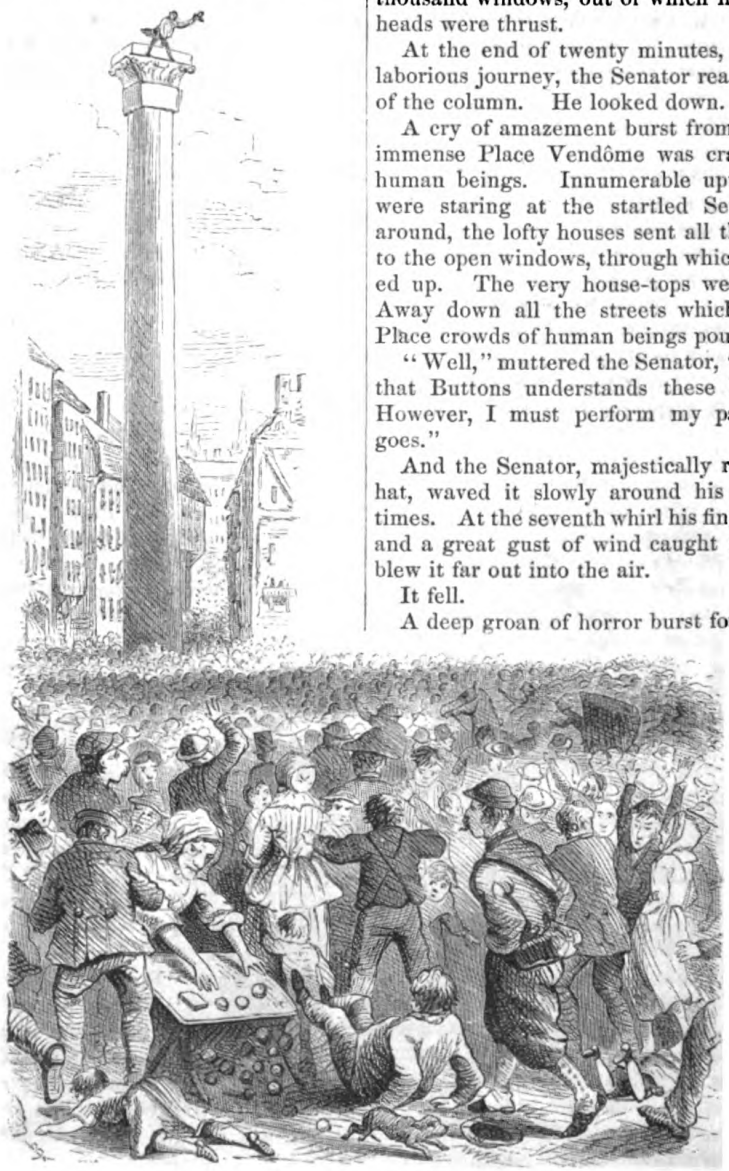
"Oh, don't be alarmed," said Buttons, cheerfully.

The Dodge Club left for the Place Vendôme, and the Senator, separating himself from his companions, began the ascent. Buttons left his friends at a corner to see the result, and walked quickly down a neighboring street.

Dick noticed that every one whom he met stopped, stared, and then walked quickly forward, looking up at the column. These people accosted others, who did the same. In a few minutes many hundreds of people were looking up and exchanging glances with one another.

In a short time Buttons had completed the circuit of the block, and re-entered the Place by another street. He was running at a quick pace, and, at a moderate calculation, about two thousand gamins de Paris ran before, beside, and behind him. Gens d'armes caught the excitement, and rushed frantically about. Soldiers called to one another, and tore across the square gesticulating and shouting. Carriages stopped; the occupants stared up at the column; horsemen drew up their rearing horses; dogs barked; children screamed; up flew a thousand windows, out of which five thousand heads were thrust.

At the end of twenty minutes, after a very laborious journey, the Senator reached the top of the column. He looked down.



A cry of amazement burst from him. The immense Place Vendôme was crammed with human beings. Innumerable upturned faces were staring at the startled Senator. All around, the lofty houses sent all their inmates to the open windows, through which they looked up. The very house-tops were crowded. Away down all the streets which led to the Place crowds of human beings poured along.

"Well," muttered the Senator, "it's evident that Buttons understands these Frenchmen. However, I must perform my part, so here goes."

And the Senator, majestically removing his hat, waved it slowly around his head seven times. At the seventh whirl his fingers slipped, and a great gust of wind caught the hat and blew it far out into the air.

It fell.

A deep groan of horror burst forth from the

THE PLACE VENDOME.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google multitude, so deep, so long, so terrible that the Senator turned pale.

A hundred thousand heads upturned; two hundred thousand arms waved furiously in the air. The tide of new-comers flowing up the other streets filled the place to overflowing; and the vast host of people swayed to and fro, agitated by a thousand passions. All this was the work of but a short time.

"Come," said the Senator, "this is getting beyond a joke."

There was a sudden movement among the people at the foot of the column. The Senator leaned over to see what it was.

At once a great cry came up, like the thunder of a cataract, warningly, imperiously, terribly. The Senator drew back confounded.

Suddenly he advanced again. He shook his head deprecatingly, and waved his arms as if to disclaim any evil motives which they might impute to him. But they did not comprehend him. Scores of stiff gens d'armes, hundreds of little soldiers, stopped in their rush to the foot of the column to shake their fists and scream at him.

"Now if I only understood their doosid lingo," thought the Senator. "But"—after a pause—"it wouldn't be of no account up here. And what an awkward fix," he added, "for the father of a family to stand hatless on the top of a pillory like this! Sho!"

There came a deep rumble from the hollow stairway beneath him, which grew nearer and louder every moment.

"Somebody's coming," said the Senator. "Wa'al, I'm glad. Misery loves company. Perhaps I can purchase a hat."

In five minutes more the heads of twenty gens d'armes shot up through the opening in the top of the pillar, one after another, and reminded the Senator of the "Jump-up-Johnnies" in children's toys. Six of them seized him and made him prisoner.

The indignant Senator remonstrated, and informed them that he was an American citizen.

His remark made no impression. They did not understand English.

The Senator's wrath made his hair fairly bristle. He contented himself, however, with drawing up the programme of an immediate war between France and the Great Republic.

It took an hour for the column to get emptied. It was choked with people rushing up. Seven gentlemen fainted, and three escaped with badly sprained limbs. During this time the Senator remained in the custody of his captors.

At last the column was cleared.

The prisoner was taken down and placed in a cab. He saw the dense crowd and heard the mighty murmurs of the people.

He was driven away for an immense distance. It seemed miles.

At last the black walls of a huge edifice rose before him. The cab drove under a dark archway. The Senator thought of the dungeons of the Inquisition, and other Old World horrors of which he had heard in his boyhood.

So the Senator had to give the dinner. The Club enjoyed it amazingly.

Almost at the moment of his entrance Buttons had arrived, arm in arm with the American minister, whose representations and explanations procured the Senator's release.

"I wouldn't have minded it so much," said the Senator, from whose manly bosom the last trace of vexation had fled, "if it hadn't been for that darned policeman that collared me first. What a Providence it was that I didn't knock him down! Who do you think he was?"

"Who?"

"The very man that was going to arrest me the other day when I was trying to find my way to the slaughter-house. That man is my evil genius. I will leave Paris before another day."

"The loss of your hat completed my plans," said Buttons. "Was that done on purpose? Did you throw it down for the sake of saying, 'Take my hat?'"

"No. It was the wind," said the Senator, innocently. "But how did you manage to raise the crowd? You haven't told us that yet."

"How? In the simplest way possible. I told every soul I met that a crazy man was going up the Colonne Vendôme to throw himself down."

A light burst in upon the Senator's soul. He raised his new hat from a chair, and placing it before Buttons, said fervently and with unction:

"Keep it, Buttons!"

KEEP IT, BUTTONS!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THAT'S A HOTEL BILL.

II.

ORLEANS.—HOW TO QUELL A LANDLORD.—HOW TO FIGHT OFF HUMBUGS; AND HOW TO TRAVEL WITHOUT BAGGAGE.

A TREMENDOUS uproar in the hall of a hotel at Orleans awaked every member of the Dodge Club from the sound and refreshing slumber into which they had fallen after a fatiguing journey from Paris.

Filing out into the hall one after another they beheld a singular spectacle.

It was a fat man, bald-headed, middle-aged, with a well-to-do look, that burst upon their sight.

He was standing in the hall with flushed face and stocking feet, swearing most frightfully. A crowd of waiters stood around shrugging their shoulders, and trying to soothe him. As the fat man spoke English, and the waiters French, there was a little misapprehension.

"There, gentlemen," cried the fat man, as he caught sight of our four friends, "look at that! What do you call that?"

"That?" said Buttons, taking a paper which the fat man thrust in his face, "why, that's a hotel bill."

"A hotel bill? Why it's an imposition!" cried the other, excitedly.

"Perhaps it is," said Buttons, coolly.

"Of course it is! Read it out loud, and let these gentlemen see what they think of it."

"I'll read it in English," said Buttons, "for the benefit of the Club:"

Mister Blank,

To the Hotel du Roi:

One dinner.....	3 francs.	One bed.....	5 francs.
Six porters.....	6 "	One boots.....	1 "
One cab.....	2 "	One candle.....	1 "
One do.	2 "	One candle.....	1 "
One information	5 "	One candle.....	1 "
Wine.....	5 "	One candle.....	1 "
Tobacco.....	2 "
			35 francs.

"By Jove! Thirty-five francs! My dear Sir, I quite agree with you. It's an imposition."

A deep sigh expressed the relief of the fat man at this mark of sympathy.

"There's no redress," said Buttons. "You'll have to grin and bear it. For you must know that in these inland towns hotel-keepers are in league, offensive and defensive, with all the cab-drivers, omnibus-drivers, postillions, truckmen, hostlers, porters, errand-boys, café-keepers, cicerones, tradesmen, lawyers, chambermaids, doctors, priests, soldiers, gens d'armes, magistrates, etc., etc., etc. In short, the whole community is a joint-stock company organized to plunder the unsuspecting traveler."

"And must I stand here and be swindled without a word?" cried the other.

"By no means. Row like fury. Call up the whole household one by one, and swear at them in broad Saxon. That's the way to strike terror into the soul of a Frenchman."

The fat man stared for a moment at Buttons, and then plunging his hands deep into his trowsers pockets he walked up and down the hall.

At last he turned to the others:

"Gentlemen, is this endurable?"

"Horrible!" cried Dick.

"Abominable!" the Doctor.

"Infamous!" the Senator.

"By jingo! I've a great mind to go home. If I've got to be plundered, I'd a durned sight rather have my money go to support our own great and glorious institutions."

There is no doubt that the unfortunate man would have had to pay up if it had not been for the energetic action of Buttons.

He summoned the hotel-keeper before him, and, closing the door, asked his friends to sit down.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Then Buttons, standing up, began to repeat to the hotel keeper, smilingly, but with extraordinary volubility, Daniel Webster's oration against Hayne. The polite Frenchman would not interrupt him, but listened with a bland though somewhat dubious smile.

The Dodge Club did infinite credit to themselves by listening without a smile to the words of their leader.

Buttons then went through the proposition about the hypothenuse of a right-angled triangle, and appended the words of a few negro songs.

Here the worthy landlord interrupted him, begging his pardon, and telling him that he did not understand English very well, and could his Excellency speak French?

His Excellency, with equal politeness, regretted his want of complete familiarity with French. He was forced when he felt deeply on any subject to express himself in English.

Then followed Cicero's oration against Verres, and he was just beginning a speech of Chatham's, when the landlord surrendered at discretion.

When, after the lapse of three hours and twenty-five minutes, the fat man held his bill toward him, and Buttons offered five francs, he did not even remonstrate, but took the money, and hastily receipting the bill with his pencil, darted from the room.

"Well," exclaimed the Senator, when he had recovered from the effects of the scene—"I never before realized the truth of a story I once heard."

"What was the story?"

"Oh, it was about a bet between a Yankee and a Frenchman, who could talk the longest. The two were shut up in a room. They remained there three days. At the end of that time their friends broke open the door and entered, and what do you think they found there?"

"Nobody?" suggested the fat man.

"No," said the Senator, with a glow of patriotic pride on his fine face. "But they found the Frenchman lying dead upon the floor, and the Yankee whispering in his ear the beginning of the second part of the Higgins story."

"And what is the Higgins story?"

"For Heaven's sake," gasped the Doctor, starting up, "don't ask him now—wait till next week!"

As they passed over the mountains of Auvergne a new member was added to the Dodge Club.

It was the fat man.

He was President of a Western bank.

His name was Figgs.

It was a damp, dull, dreary, drenching night, when the lumbering diligence bore the Dodge Club through the streets of Lyons and up to the door of their hotel. Seventeen men and five small boys stood bowing ready to receive them.

The Senator, Buttons, and Dick took the small valises which contained their traveling apparel, and dashed through the line of servitors into the house. The Doctor walked after, serenely and majestically. He had no baggage. Mr. Figgs descended from the roof with considerable difficulty. Slipping from the wheel, he fell into the outstretched arms of three waiters. They put him on his feet.

His luggage was soon ready.

Mr. Figgs had two trunks and various other articles. Of these trunks seven waiters took one, and four the other. Then

Waiter	No.	12	took	hat-box;
"	"	13	"	traveling desk;
"	"	14	"	Scotch plaid;
"	"	15	"	over-coat;
"	"	16	"	umbrella;
"	"	17	"	rubber coat;
Boy	"	1	"	cane;
"	"	2	"	muffler;
"	"	3	"	one of his mittens;
"	"	4	"	the other;
"	"	5	"	cigar-case.

After a long and laborious dinner they rose and smoked.

CICERO AGAINST VERRES.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SAC-R-R-R-RE!

The head waiter informed Mr. Figgs that with his permission a deputation would wait on him. Mr. Figgs was surprised, but graciously invited the deputation to walk in. They accordingly walked in. Seventeen men and five boys.

"What did they want?"

"Oh, only a pourboire with which to drink his Excellency's noble health."

"Really they did his Excellency too much honor. Were they not mistaken in their man?"

"Oh no. They had carried his luggage into the hotel."

Upon this Mr. Figgs gave strong proof of poor moral training, by breaking out into a volley of Western oaths, which shocked one half of the deputation, and made the other half grin.

Still they continued respectful but firm, and reiterated their demand.

Mr. Figgs called for the landlord. That gentleman was in bed. For his wife. She did not attend to the business. For the head waiter. The spokesman of the deputation, with a polite bow, informed him that the head waiter stood before him and was quite at his service.

The scene was ended by the sudden entrance of Buttons, who, motioning to Mr. Figgs, proceeded to give each waiter a douceur. One after another took the proffered coin, and without looking at it, thanked the generous donor with a profusion of bows.

Five minutes after the retreating form of Buttons had vanished through the door, twenty-one persons, consisting of men and boys, stood staring at one another in blank amazement.

Anger followed; then

"Sac-r-r-r-r-r-r-R-R-R-R-R-R-R-Ré!"

He had given each one a centime.

But the customs of the hotel were not to be changed by the shabby conduct of one mean-minded person. When the Club prepared to retire for the night they were taken to some rooms opening into each other. Five waiters led the way; one waiter to each man, and each carried a pair of tall wax-candles. Mr. Figgs's waiter took him to his room, laid down the lights, and departed.

The doors which connected the rooms were all opened, and Mr. Figgs walked through to see about something. He saw the Doctor, the Senator, Buttons, and Dick, each draw the short, well-used stump of a wax-candle from his coat pocket and gravely light it. Then letting the melted wax fall on the mantle-pieces they stuck their candles there, and in a short time the rooms were brilliantly illuminated.

The waiters were thunderstruck. Such a procedure had never come within the compass of their experience of the ways of travelers.

"Bonsoir," said Buttons. "Don't let us detain you."

They went out stupefied.

"What's the idea now?" inquired Mr. Figgs.

"Oh, they charge a franc apiece for each candle, and that is a swindle which we will not submit to."

"And will I have to be humbugged again?"

"Certainly."

"Botheration."

"My dear Sir, the swindle of bougies is the curse of the Continental traveler. None of us are particularly prudent, but we are all on the watch against small swindles, and of them all this is the most frequent and most insidious, the most constantly and ever recurrent. Beware, my dear President, of bougies—that's what we call candles."

Mr. Figgs said nothing, but leaned against the wall for a moment in a meditative mood, as if debating what he should do next.

He happened to be in the Doctor's room. He had already noticed that this gentleman had no perceptible baggage, and didn't understand it. But now he saw it all.

The Doctor began gravely to make preparations for the night.

Before taking off his over-coat he drew various articles from the pockets, among which were:

A hair-brush,
A tooth-brush,
A shoe-brush,
A pot of blacking,
A night-shirt,
A clothes-brush,
A pipe,
A pouch of tobacco,
A razor,
A shaving-brush,
A piece of soap,
A night-cap,
A bottle of hair-oil,
A pistol,
A guide-book,
A cigar-case,
A bowie-knife,
A piece of cord,
A handkerchief,
A case of surgical instruments,
Some bits of candles.

Mr. Figgs rushed from the room.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NUMBER 729.

Arles was much more satisfactory. There are more pretty women in Arles than in any other town of the same size on the Continent. The Club created an unusual excitement in this peaceful town by walking slowly through it in Indian file, narrowly scrutinizing every thing. They wondered much at the numbers of people that filled the cathedral all gayly dressed. It was not until after a long calculation that they found out that it was Sunday. Buttons kept his memorandum-book in his hand all day, and took account of all the pretty women whom he saw. The number rose as high as 729. He would have raised it higher, but unfortunately an indignant citizen put a stop to it by charging him with impertinence to his wife.

On the railroad to Marseilles is a famous tunnel. At the last station before entering the tunnel a gentleman got in. As they passed through the long and gloomy place there suddenly arose a most outrageous noise in the car.

It was the new passenger.

Occasionally the light shining in would disclose him, dancing, stamping, tearing his hair, rolling his eyes, gnashing his teeth, and cursing.

"Is he crazy?" said Dick.

"Or drunk?" said Buttons.

Lo and behold! just as the train emerged from the tunnel the passenger made a frantic dash at the window, flung it open, and before any body could speak or move he was half out.

To spring over half a dozen seats, to land behind him, to seize his outstretched leg to jerk him in again, was but the work of a moment. It was Buttons who did this, and who banged down the window again.

"Sac r-r-R-R-Ré!" cried the Frenchman.

"Is it that you are mad?" said Buttons.

"Sacré Bleu!" cried the other. "Who are you that lays hands on me?"

"I saved you from destruction."

"Then, Sir, you have no thanks. Behold me, I'm a desperate man!"

In truth he looked like one. His clothes were all disordered. His lips were bleeding, and most of his hair was torn out. By this time the guard had come to the spot. All those in the car had gathered round. It was a long car, second-class, like the American.

"M'sieu, how is this? What is it that I see? You endeavor to kill yourself?"

"Leave me. I am desperate."

III.

THE RHONE IN A RAIN.—THE MAD FRENCHMAN.—SUICIDE A CAPITAL CRIME IN FRANCE.

THE steamboats that run on the Rhone are very remarkable contrivances. Their builders have only aimed at combining a maximum of length with a minimum of other qualities, so that each boat displays an incredible extent of deck with no particular breadth at all. Five gentlemen took refuge in the cabin of the Etoile, from the drenching rain which fell during half of their voyage. This was an absurd vessel, that made trips between Lyons and Avignon. Her accommodations resembled those of a canal boat, and she was propelled by a couple of paddle-wheels driven by a Lilliputian engine. It was easy enough for her to go down the river, as the current took the responsibility of moving her along: but how she could ever get back it was difficult to tell.

They were borne onward through some of the fairest scenes on earth. Ruined towers, ivy-covered castles, thunder-blasted heights, fertile valleys, luxuriant orchards, terraced slopes, trellised vineyards, broad plains, bounded by distant mountains, whose summits were lost in the clouds; such were the successive charms of the region through which they were passing. Yet though they were most eloquently described in the letters which Buttons wrote home to his friends, it must be confessed that they made but little impression at the time, and indeed were scarcely seen at all through the vapor-covered cabin windows.

Avignon did not excite their enthusiasm. In vain the guide-book told them about Petrarch and Laura. The usual raptures were not forthcoming. In vain the cicerone led them through the old papal palace. Its sombre walls awakened no emotion. The only effect produced was on the Senator, who whiled away the hours of early bedtime by pointing out the superiority of American institutions to those which reared the prisons which they had visited.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"But no. M'sieu, what is it?"

"Listen. I enter the train thinking to go to Avignon. I have important business there, most important. Suddenly I am struck by a thought. I find I have mistaken. I am carried to Marseilles. It is the express train, and I must go all the way. Horror! Despair! Life is of no use! It is time to resign it! I die! Accordingly I attempt to leap from the window, when this gentleman seizes me by the leg and pulls me in. Behold all!"

"M'sieu," said the guard, slowly, and with emphasis, "you have committed a grave offense. Suicide is a capital crime."

"A capital crime!" exclaimed the Frenchman, turning pale. "Great Heaven!"

"Yes, Sir. If you leap from the car I shall put you in irons, and hand you over to the police when we stop."

The Frenchman's pale face grew paler. He became humble. He entreated the guard's compassion. He begged Buttons to intercede. He had a family. Moreover he had fought in the wars of his country. He had warred in Africa. He appealed to the Senator, the Doctor, to Figgs, to Dick. Finally he became calm, and the train shortly after arrived at Marseilles.

The last that was seen of him he was rushing frantically about looking for the return train.

HORROR! DESPAIR!

IV.

MARSEILLES.

OLD Massilia wears her years well. To look at her now as she appears, full of life and joy and gayety, no one would imagine that thirty centuries or more had passed over her head.

Here is the first glimpse of the glorious South, with all its sunshine and luxury and voluptuous beauty. Here the Mediterranean rolls its waters of deepest blue, through the clear air the landscape appears with astonishing distinctness, and the sharply-defined lines of distant objects surprise the Northern eye. Marseilles is always a picturesque city. No commercial town in the world can compare with it in this respect. On the water float the Mediterranean craft, rakish boats, with enormous latteen sails; long, low, sharp, black vessels, with a suspicious air redolent of smuggling and piracy. No tides rise and fall—advance and retreat. The waters are always the same.

All the Mediterranean nations are represented in Marseilles. Three-quarters of the world send their people here. Europe, Asia, Africa. In the streets the Syrian jostles the Spaniard; the Italian the Arab; the Moor jokes with the Jew; the Greek chaffers with the Algerine; the Turk scowls at the Corsican; the Russian from Odessa pokes the Maltese in the ribs. There is no want of variety here. Human nature is seen under a thousand aspects. Marseilles is the most cosmopolitan of cities, and represents not only many races but many ages.

Moreover it is a fast city. New York is not more ambitious; Chicago not more aspiring; San Francisco not more confident in its future. Amazing sight! Here is a city which, at the end of three thousand years, looks forward to a longer and grander life in the future.

And why?

Why, because she expects yet to be the arbiter of Eastern commerce. Through her the gold, the spices, and the gems of India will yet be conveyed over the European world. For the Suez Canal, which will once more turn the tide of this mighty traffic through its ancient Mediterranean channel, will raise Marseilles to the foremost rank among cities.

So, at least, the Marseillaise believe.

When our travelers arrived there the city was crammed with soldiers. The harbor was packed with steamships. Guns were thundering, bands playing, fifes screaming, muskets rattling, regiments tramping, cavalry galloping. Confusion reigned supreme. Every thing was out of order. No one spoke or thought of any thing but the coming war in Lombardy.

Excitable little red-legged French soldiers danced about every where. Every one was beside himself. None could use the plain language of everyday life. All were intoxicated with hope and enthusiasm.

The travelers admired immensely the exciting scene, but their admiration was changed to disgust when they found that on account of the rush of soldiers to Italy their own prospects of getting there were extremely slight.

At length they found that a steamer was going. It was a propeller. Its name was the Prince. The enterprising company that owned her had patriotically chartered every boat on their line to the Government at an enormous profit, and had placed the Prince on the line for the use of travelers.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THOSE ITALIANS.

V.

THE RETIRED ORGAN-GRINDER.—THE SENATOR PHILOSOPHIZES.—EVILS OF NOT HAVING A PASSPORT.

THE Mediterranean is the most glorious of seas. The dark-blue waves; the skies of darker blue; the distant hills of purple, with their crowns of everlasting snow; and the beetling precipice, where the vexed waters forever throw up their foaming spray; the frequent hamlets that nestle among them; the castles and towers that crown the lofty heights; and the road that winds tortuously along the shore —all these form a scene in which beauty more romantic than that of the Rhine is contrasted with all the grandeur of the ocean.

Buttons, with his usual flexible and easy disposition, made the acquaintance of a couple of Italians who had been away from Italy and were now returning. They were traveling second-class.

Buttons supposed they were glad to get back.

"Glad? Did he doubt it? Why, they were Italians."

"Are Italians fonder of their country than others?"

"Without doubt. Had they not the best reason to be?"

"Why?"

"They had the garden and pride of the world for their country. Mention any other in the same breath with Italy."

"If they love it so much why can they not keep it for themselves?"

"How can you ask that? If you know the history of the country you will see that it has been impossible. No other was ever so beset. It is split up into different States. It is surrounded by powerful enemies who take advantage of this. It would not be so bad if there were only one foreign foe; but there are many, and if one were driven out another would step in."

"There will be a chance for them now to show what they can do."

"True; and you will see what they will do. They only want the French to open the way. We Italians can do the rest ourselves. It is a good time to go to Italy. You will see devotion and patriotism such as you never saw before. There is no country so beloved as Italy."

"I think other nations are as patriotic."

"Other nations! What nations? Do you know that the Italians can not leave Italy? It is this love that keeps them home. French, Germans, Spaniards, Portuguese, English—all others leave their homes, and go all over the world to live. Italians can not, and do not."

"I have seen Italians in America."

"You have seen Italian exiles, not emigrants. Or you have seen them staying there for a few years so as to earn a little money to go back with. They are only travelers on business. They are always unhappy, and are always cheered by the prospect of getting home at last."

These Italians were brothers, and from experience in the world had grown very intelligent. One had been in the hand-organ business, the other in the image-making line. Ital-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ians can do nothing else in the bustling communities of foreign nations. Buttons looked with respect upon those men who thus had carried their love for their dear Art for years through strange lands and uncongenial climes.

"If I were an Italian I too would be an organ-grinder!" he at length exclaimed.

The Italians did not reply, but evidently thought that Buttons could not be in a better business.

"These *I*talians," said the Senator, to whom Buttons had told the conversation—"these *I*talians," said he, after they had gone, "air a singular people. They're deficient. They're wanting in the leading element of the age. They haven't got any idee of the principle of pro-gress. They don't understand trade. There's where they miss it. What's the use of hand-organs? What's the use of dancers? What's the use of statoos, whether plaster images or marble sculptoor? Can they clear forests or build up States? No, Sir; and therefore I say that this *I*talian nation will never be wuth a cuss until they are inoculated with the spirit of Seventy-six, the principles of the Pilgrim Fathers, and the doctrines of the Revolution. Boney knows it"—he added, sententiously—"bless you, Boney knows it."

After a sound sleep, which lasted until late in the following day, they went out on deck.

There lay Genoa.

Glorious sight! As they stood looking at the superb city the sun poured down upon the scene his brightest rays. The city rose in successive terraces on the side of a semicircular slope crowned with massive edifices; moles projected into the harbor terminated by lofty towers; the inner basin was crowded with shipping, prominent among which were countless French ships of war and transports. The yells of fifes, the throbbing of drums, the bang of muskets, the thunder of cannon, and the strains of martial music filled the air. Boats crowded with soldiers constantly passed from the ships to the stone quays, where thousands more waited to receive them—soldiers being mixed up with guns, cannons, wheels, muskets, drums, baggage, sails, beams, timbers, camps, mattresses, casks, boxes, irons, in infinite confusion.

"We must go ashore here," said Buttons. "Does any body know how long the steamer will remain here?"

"A day."

"A day! That will be magnificent! We will be able to see the whole city in that time. Let's go and order a boat off."

The Captain received them politely.

"What did Messieurs want? To go ashore? With the utmost pleasure. Had they their passports? Of course they had them viséd in Marseilles for Genoa."

Buttons looked blank, and feebly inquired:

"Why?"

"It's the law, Monsieur. We are prohibited from permitting passengers to go ashore unless their passports are all right. It's a mere form."

"A mere form!" cried Buttons. "Why, ours are viséd for Naples."

"Naples!" cried the Captain, with a shrug; "you are unfortunate, Messieurs. That will not pass you to Genoa."

"My dear Sir, you don't mean to tell me that, on account of this little informality, you will keep us prisoners on board of this vessel? Consider—"

"Monsieur," said the Captain, courteously, "I did not make these laws. It is the law; I can not change it. I should be most happy to oblige you, but I ask you, how is it possible?"

The Captain was right. He could do nothing. The travelers would have to swallow their rage.

Imagine them looking all day at the loveliest of Italian scenes—the glorious city of Genoa, with all its historic associations!—the city of the Dorias, the home of Columbus, even now

GENOA, THE SUPERB.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the scene of events upon which the eyes of all the world were fastened!

Imagine them looking upon all this, and only looking, unable to go near; seeing all the preparations for war, but unable to mingle with the warriors. To pace up and down all day; to shake their fists at the scene; to fret, and fume, and chafe with irrepressible impatience; to scold, to rave, to swear—this was the lot of the unhappy tourists.

High in the startled heavens rose the thunder of preparations for the war in Lombardy. They heard the sounds, but could not watch the scene near at hand.

The day was as long as an ordinary week, but at length it came to an end. On the following morning steam was got up, and they went to Leghorn.

"I suppose they will play the same game on us at Leghorn," said Dick, mournfully.

"Without doubt," said Buttons. "But I don't mind; the bitterness of death is past. I can stand any thing now."

Again the same tantalizing view of a great city from afar. Leghorn lay inviting them, but the unlucky passport kept them on board of the vessel. The Senator grew impatient, Mr. Figgs and the Doctor were testy; Dick and Buttons alone were calm. It was the calmness of despair.

After watching Leghorn for hours they were taken to Civita Vecchia. Here they rushed down below, and during the short period of their stay remained invisible.

At last their voyage ended, and they entered the harbor of Naples. Glorious Naples! Naples the captivating!

"Vede Napoli, e poi mori!"

There was the Bay of Naples—the matchless, the peerless, the indescribable! There the rock of Ischia, the Isle of Capri, there the slopes of Sorrento, where never-ending spring abides; there the long sweep of Naples and her sister cities; there Vesuvius, with its thin volume of smoke floating like a pennon in the air!

THEIR NOBLE EXCELLENCIES.

VI.

LAZARONI AND MACARONI.

ABOUT forty or fifty lazaroni surrounded the Dodge Club when they landed, but to their intense disgust the latter ignored them altogether, and carried their own umbrellas and carpet-bags. But the lazaroni revenged themselves. As the Doctor stooped to pick up his cane, which had fallen, a number of articles dropped from his breast-pocket, and among them was a revolver, a thing which was tabooed in Naples. A ragged rascal eagerly snatched it and handed it to a gendarme, and it was only after paying a piastre that the Doctor was permitted to retain it.

Even after the travelers had started off on foot in search of lodgings the lazaroni did not desert them. Ten of them followed every where. At intervals they respectfully offered to carry their baggage, or show them to a hotel, whichever was most agreeable to their Noble Excellencies.

Their Noble Excellencies were in despair. At length, stumbling upon the Café dell' Europa, they rushed in and passed three hours

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google over their breakfast. This done, they congratulated themselves on having got rid of their followers.

In vain!

Scarcely had they emerged from the café than Dick uttered a cry of horror. From behind a corner advanced their ten friends, with the same calm demeanor, the same unruffled and even cheerful patience, and the same respectful offer of their humble services.

In despair they separated. Buttons and Dick obtained lodgings in the Strada di San Bartollomeo. The Senator and the other two engaged pleasant rooms on the Strada Nuova, which overlooked the Bay.

Certainly Naples is a very curious place. There are magnificent edifices—palaces, monuments, castles, fortresses, churches, and cathedrals. There are majestic rows of buildings; gay shops, splendidly decorated; stately colonnades, and gardens like Paradise. There are streets unrivaled for gayety, forever filled to overflowing with the busy, the laughing, the jolly; dashing officers, noisy soldiers, ragged lazaroni, proud nobles, sickly beggars, lovely ladies; troops of cavalry galloping up and down; ten thousand caleches dashing to and fro. There is variety enough every where.

All the trades are divided, and arranged in different parts of the city. Here are the locksmiths, there the cabinet-makers; here the builders, there the armorers; in this place the basket-weavers, in that the cork-makers.

And most amusing of all is the street most favored of the lazaroni. Here they live, and move, and have their being; here they are born, they grow, they wed, they rear families, they eat, and drink, and die. A long array of furnaces extends up the street; over each is a stew-pan, and behind each a cook armed with an enormous ladle. At all hours of the day the cook serves up macaroni to customers. This is the diet of the people.

In the cellars behind those lines of stew-pans are the eating-houses of the vulgar—low, grimy places, floors incrusted with mud, tables of thick deal worn by a thousand horny hands, slippery with ten thousand upset dishes of macaroni. Here the pewter plates, and the iron knives, forks, and spoons are chained to the massive tables. How utter must the destitution be when it is thought necessary to chain up such worthless trash!

Into one of these places went Buttons and Dick in their study of human nature. They sat at the table. A huge dish of macaroni was served up. Fifty guests stopped to look at the new-comers. The waiters winked at the customers of the house, and thrust their tongues in their cheeks.

Dick could not eat, but the more philosophical Buttons made an extremely hearty meal, and pronounced the macaroni delicious.

On landing in a city which swarmed with beggars the first thought of our tourists was, How the mischief do they all live? There are sixty thousand lazaroni in this gay city. The average amount of clothing to each man is about one-third of a pair of trowsers and a woolen cap. But after spending a day or two the question changed its form, and became, How the mischief can they all help living? Food may be picked up in the streets. Handfuls of oranges and other fruits sell for next to nothing; strings of figs cost about a cent.

The consequence is that these sixty thousand people, fellow-creatures of ours, who are known as the lazaroni of Naples, whom we half pity and altogether despise, and look upon as the lowest members of the Caucasian race, are not altogether very miserable. On the contrary, taken as a whole, they form the raggedest, oiliest, fattest, drollest, noisiest, sleekest, dirtiest, ignorantest, prejudicedest, narrow-mindedest, shirtlessest, clotheslessest, idlest, carelessest, jolliest, absurdest, rascaliest—but still, for all that, perhaps—taken all in all—the happiest community on the face of the earth.

LAZARONI AND MACARONI.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AN INTERIOR.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR.

BY A VIRGINIAN.

[Sixth Paper.]

THE VALLEY OF THE SHENANDOAH.—BANKS'S RETREAT.

March 26. — Pleasant. Well, instead of Fredericksburg here we are again at Strasburg, as stupid and dirty a village as may be found in this beautiful Valley. My appreciation of the locality has perhaps been exaggerated by a cup of rye coffee I got at the tavern this morning, which, to borrow the wit of a comrade, has set my temper awry—yet if I looked through the glowing medium of pure Mocha I can not imagine I could see any thing favorable in Strasburg. In this state of mind I met Colonel Brodhead, our Chief of Cavalry, and accepted a polite invitation to share his lodgings and mess, with the assurance of pure Government Java ad libitum. Brodhead is a handsome little fellow, amiable, sociable, and conversable. He is from Detroit, has seen some service in the Mexican war, and has latterly been in Congress from Michigan. His views of the war are entirely national, and we can discuss it freely and fully without misunderstanding.

March 27.—Bright and temperate. I received orders this morning to reconnoitre the road to Front Royal; but while I waited for my cavalry escort news came from the front that the enemy were advancing in force from the direction of Woodstock, and that an attack was expected momentarily. Colonel Gordon's Brigade moved out to support Sullivan, who commanded the advanced posts. I applied for permission to go out with the troops, but the reconnoissance to Front Royal was considered important, and the alarm at the front had subsided. After mid-day my escort reported an independent troop of cavalry about eighty men, commanded by a Captain M——. Lieutenant Daniels, of the Michigan Regiment, got leave to accompany me as a volunteer aid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Crossing the North fork of the Shenandoah, two miles from Strasburg, we took the road around the butts of the Fort Mountains, running parallel with and generally in sight of the Manassas Gap Railroad. As we approached a station-house, about four miles east of Strasburg, our advance reported that it was occupied by a picket-guard of the enemy. Captain M—— proposed that we should capture them. Although my orders were simply to reconnoitre the roads, I considered that I was acting in accordance with them by removing any impediment in the way of their fulfillment.

I therefore divided the troop into two companies, and ordered M—— to dash forward with one, while I followed slowly, holding the other in reserve, to support or extricate him in case of failure. He started with a "whoop-e! come on, boys!" followed at full speed by his company. At the same time my reserves broke ranks, and, putting spurs to their horses, scampered after their Captain, screeching like Comanches. Their yells drowned my commands, expostulations, and reproaches, and I was fain to spur up and follow the mob. The occupants of the station-house received the advance with two or three shots from their carbines, when a parley took place, and it was discovered they were our own men, belonging to the First Michigan Cavalry.

This dénouement was followed by a general gabbling and guffawing which continued for at least fifteen minutes. By dint of repeated orders I at length got my troop in motion again, fully satisfied that whatever praises might be bestowed on their valor no reliance could be placed on their discipline.

Passing Passage Creek, which flows from the Fortsmouth, we at length arrived at Richardsons, on the bluff, overlooking the South River or main stream of the Shenandoah. The bridges had been destroyed, and the stream reported impassable by fording. I found a negro man, however, who seemed to know more than he was willing to tell me in the presence of white people, and furnished him the apology for doing what he secretly desired, by threatening him with instant death if he did not show me the ford. Nothing loth he mounted a cavalry horse and led the way, M——, Daniels, and myself, with about a dozen of the command, following. The crossing was rough, tortuous, and deep, the water sweeping over the backs of the smaller horses, and bringing some to a swim. The majority of the company declined to follow us over, replying to their Captain's remonstrances, that they "didn't want to get water in their boots."

Pursuing the road, we presently reached the summit of a hill which commanded a view of the village of Front Royal, two miles distant, and also the Blue Ridge and Luray Valley for many miles around. Having only a dozen men with me I hesitated about going farther, when a countryman informed us that Front Royal was occupied by a company of rebel cavalry engaged in impressing recruits for Jackson's army. I was disgusted and angry at the conduct of my troopers, and in this state of mind determined to push on with the squad at command. Understanding my intentions Captain M—— sent back a messenger to the recreants who had tarried on the other side of the river. The courier rode back at speed, and delivered his message

THE FORTSMOUTH.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in this wise: "Hello, boys! Cap says come over; there's going to be some fun." At the prospect of "some fun" the vagabonds mounted and dashed in, boots and all. The squad under my command had reached the outskirts of the village when, looking back, I saw my heroes trooping over the hill behind. As there seemed to be a line of gray-coats forming across the further terminus of the street I waited until our column closed up, and then moved forward at a walk with carbines advanced. My Captain desired to order another flourishing charge, but I forbade it peremptorily, explaining to him that my theory in regard to cavalry (volunteer cavalry especially) was, that it should be carefully trained to execute all its manœuvres at a walk, rarely using the trot, and never indulging in a gallop until the troop had earned the name of "Veterans" by using the sabre in half a dozen engagements, and capturing one or two batteries at a trot.

Arrived at the angle of the street we found our line of gray-coats to be nothing more than a crowd of unarmed citizens collected to witness our entrée. They answered all questions with civility, and asked us to dismount and drink. This courtesy I was obliged to decline as the day was far spent, and I felt indisposed to risk the discipline of my cavalry. Having obtained satisfactory information in regard to the various roads and bridges in the vicinity, I countermarched the column and started back to head-quarters. Meanwhile the petticoated inhabitants had recovered from the tremor incident to the first appearance of "Yanks" in their village, and, thronging the doors and windows, honored us with their curious regards. Indeed, several cambric handkerchiefs waved salutes, which were cheerily responded to by our men. Others answered our bows with a colder and more constrained civility. We left the village as quietly as we had entered, and I flattered myself that our visit had left an agreeable impression. Instead of the wild marauders they had been led to expect, uncouth and horrible, plundering, outraging, and murdering, regardless of age or sex, we had shown ourselves cool, considerate, and courteous; our fellows were well-dressed, well-armed, and by no means ill-looking. I complimented the men on their good conduct, and took the opportunity to impress them with the idea that, while hard looks, hard words, and hard knocks were for our armed enemies, we should invariably accord to our unarmed fellow-citizens kindness, forbearance, and protection; most especially should brave men be considerate of that charming sex, who, in spite of politics, we were all bound to love and honor—

First Trooper (interrupting). "A red-headed gal made a mouth at me, she did—"

"Silence!" shouted the Captain.

"Don't take that to heart, my friend; perhaps she had a lover in the rebel service:

"'"'Twas but the tender fierceness of the dove,
Pecking the hand that hovers o'er its mate.'"

Second Trooper. "The woman that screeched at me had a voice more like a hen-hawk—" (Laughter.)

Forward! march!*

Recrossing the South River at Weston's mill I stopped at Richardson's to see some ladies who were desirous of obtaining passes through our lines. One of them I was personally acquainted with, and knew she had two brothers in the Union service. I therefore gave her a recommendation to the nearest Provost Marshal or Post Commander, having no authority myself to grant passes.

It was growing late, and throwing forward an advanced-guard of half a dozen men I again got my troop in motion, recommending silence and precaution against surprise.

Our route lay through a wooded region, crossed and entered by numerous side-paths and roads leading from the secluded mountains lying immediately south of it, all in full possession of the enemy. We were liable to be surprised and cut off at every turn, and if overpowered, had no means of retreat except by tumbling over the bluffs and swimming the swollen river, which ran parallel with our road to the right. Had Ashby been as enterprising as he might have been this road would have been dangerous. My recommendation of silence and alertness were followed by a gabbling, rollicking march of a mile or so, accompanied by the occasional discharge of a carbine or pistol.

Pushing forward with the hope of reaching our pickets before dark, I presently found myself, with Lieutenant Daniels and a brace of or-

* I was enlightened on this subject some weeks after by reading a letter captured by one of our scouts. It was written by a young lady of Front Royal to her brother or lover in the Confederate service, and ran as follows:

"We have been awfully dull since you left us, and had no excitement until last Thursday, when it was reported that the Yankees were coming. You can of course imagine our distress and terror. We hid every thing we thought they might be tempted to steal, and got ready to leave in case they burned the town. Late in the afternoon about a hundred of their cavalry came sneaking into town, and, after stopping in the street a short time, sneaked out again as they came. They seemed to be scared half to death, and were all the while looking up at the windows as if they expected somebody was going to shoot at them. They did not steal any thing nor disturb any body while they were in town, because they were too cowardly, I reckon. They say they behaved dreadfully along the road, and shot Mr. Richardson's negro man because the faithful creature refused to show them the ford. I have not heard whether he is dead or not. They were going to burn Weston's mill, but when they found he was one of their kind they let him off. As I was accidentally passing by the window one of them had the impudence to bow to me, but I gave him a look that I reckon he will remember.

"Would you believe it that S—— and the ——'s waved their handkerchiefs to them. They now profess that they were badly frightened, and did it to save their houses from being burned. For my part I thought they were the meanest, cowardly, hang-dog-looking crowd I ever saw, and did not ride like our boys in gray. I hope this will be the last we will ever see of them."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

derlies, out of sight and hearing of the column. I send an orderly back to hasten their movements. He overtook me in the course of the next half hour with the report that the troop had halted outright, and said they were waiting for Cap, who had stopped for supper at some country-house. We pushed forward rapidly, and at length overtook the advance-guard, riding with them into Strasburg, where we arrived about nine o'clock at night. I called at headquarters, and reported the information acquired by the reconnoissance while taking a cup of tea with the General.

March 28.—I have been occupied this morning in writing out a report of yesterday's reconnoissance, with sketches of the roads and adjacent topography. Our present position is one which can be made untenable by a very inferior force of the enemy. Both our flanks and our communications are open to assault and vexation at any time, and almost without risk by an active partisan force. Ashby's cavalry, however, has neither dash nor discipline, and is inferior to ours, weak and unformed as that is. The General tells me he has telegraphed for a regiment of Vermont cavalry now lying at Poolsville, in Maryland. Brodhead reports our present effective force at seven hundred and thirty men only.

March 29.—Clouds and rain. There is a good deal of sickness developing among our troops, chargeable to the bad water of this locality. Shields's Division, while under Lander's command, was much abused, it is said, by exposure and fatigues from which they ought to have been protected. The consequence is, they have about a thousand bad cases in the hospitals. In carrying on war the art of preserving is more important even than that of destroying.

The General says the enemy is falling back along his whole line behind the Rappahannock and Rapidan. Jackson is reported to be lying behind Woodstock, and he thinks of attacking him. I approve most heartily of the suggestion, but doubt whether Jackson will await an attack. Why does not our force in Western Virginia close in upon Staunton at once? Our outposts report that they have heard cannon apparently in a southwesterly direction from Woodstock. If Rosecrans's command is at Moorfield this may be the sound of his advance. In the east we occupy Warrenton Junction. Why should we lie here?

We hear that Secretaries Seward and Stanton are in Winchester, on a visit to the field of the late battle.

March 30.—It is raining, and every thing covered with an icy coating of sleet. The General called with a map which he wished corrected and improved. He mentioned that Fremont was in Wheeling, having been assigned to command in Western Virginia. He will have a force of about thirty thousand men. I suggested that he should march via Lewisburg in Greenbrier, Lexington in Rockbridge, to Salem, on the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad, holding that road, threatening Lynchburg, and, indeed, all the interior railroad lines of the Confederacy. We should push on to Staunton, and be ready to co-operate with or join Fremont in case of necessity. Our position on the Virginia and Tennessee Road, menacing or occupying Lynchburg, turns the James River line completely, and necessitates the abandonment of Richmond.

The General has determined on a forward movement, but finds himself opposed by most of his officers. It is urged that with a lengthened line of communication the army can not be supplied. Our position becomes more exposed as we advance, and from the nature of the country more easily turned. Should we meet with disaster so far from our base it would be ruinous and irretrievable. It was argued, on the other hand, that by remaining at Strasburg we were wasting men and means to no purpose. With a superior force at our disposal, we were simply standing on the defensive on an indefensible line. For the rest we could live on the country, as we should have been doing all along, thereby lightening the expenses of our Government and using the resources of the enemy. I can not see the propriety of holding our forces scattered from Fredericksburg to the Kanawha. But our column, eighteen thousand strong, can take Staunton with its own weight. There is nothing that we know of to hinder us. The advance is ordered for to-morrow morning.

April 1.—Fair. The troops were in motion by early dawn this morning. The Staff did not get off until ten o'clock. As we approached Woodstock Ashby's guns opened from a hill south of the town. Lieutenant-Colonel Daum placed a section of Parrott guns in position to drive them off. Meanwhile Brodhead went charging up the turnpike at the head of the cavalry, and, as usual, got the benefit of Daum's shells. Fortunately nobody was hurt, but there were some narrow escapes, and the Colonel came back furious, declaring if it occurred again he would turn his column upon the guns. Woodstock has a pleasanter aspect than Strasburg, and as we swept through the streets appeared thronged with women and children who had come out to gaze.

At Narrow Passage Creek, two miles beyond Woodstock, our skirmishers drove off the enemy, who were trying to burn the turnpike bridge. There was some firing between the adverse batteries, but nothing of importance. The bridge was saved, and we pushed on. About two hundred yards beyond is the Narrow Passage—a natural causeway with precipitous sides, formed by the near approximation of the Shenandoah River and Passage Creek—a tributary. This causeway is about fifty yards in length, and just wide enough to admit of the passage of the Valley turnpike, which crosses it. The streams appear on either side as if endeavoring to meet, but hindered by a barrier of solid limestone rock sixty or eighty feet in height.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE NARROW PASSAGE.

From the summit of the next ridge overlooking the village of Edinburgh we saw two lofty pillars of smoke, indicating the destruction of other bridges in front. The view from this ridge is extensive and beautiful.

Our advanced skirmishers already occupied Edinburgh, and were exchanging shots with the enemy on the south side of Stony Creek. The batteries from the opposing hills were also roaring in a manner that sounded like work. Entering the village we passed the body of a soldier killed by a fragment of shell, which cracked his skull as if it had been a cocoa-nut, throwing out the brain in an unbroken mass, with its lobes and membranes perfect. This man belonged to the Twenty-ninth Pennsylvania Infantry, and was quietly taking his lunch, seated behind a high hill, and apparently covered from the fire. A shell thrown at the battery above burst in the air, and this was his unexpected death-warrant.

The turnpike bridge over Stony Creek had been effectually destroyed, and our lines were consequently established on the northern bank of the stream. After satisfying himself that the position was a suitable one the General returned to Woodstock.

April 2.—Clouds. The head-quarter offices are established in the court-house. The General examined the premises with much interest, commenting on its smoke-begrimed and weather-stained walls; its brick floors, steeped with tobacco; the uncouth, ill-wrought forms of its architecture; its lumbering, unpainted pine presses, containing papers and records; its totality of quaintness, inconvenience, and dirt, characteristic of Virginia court-houses. He at length observed that these old buildings had turned out many strong men in their day. I had been familiar with these old court-rooms and clerk-offices from childhood, and had long remained under the belief that dusty cobweb hangings and a carpeting of dirt and tobacco-spit were their normal furniture. A visit to Massachusetts taught me that it was possible to transact public business and administer justice without these accessories. Then the question arose whether the material surroundings could in any manner affect the administration; whether the advocate's reasoning was less clear or his oratory less impressive by reason of these dingy walls; whether the judicial ermine was more likely to be soiled by the surrounding dirt, or whether a handsome chair and prevailing neatness would insure its purity. We concluded that these things were merely matters of taste and habit, incidental differences between a lazy and thriftless people and one that is thriving and progressive; characteristic indications, but in no way influencing the intellectual or sentimental qualities.

While we discussed these questions two prisoners were brought in for examination. One was a Lieutenant Duff, of Ashby's cavalry, a Marylander, who had visited a farmer's house to get some apple-jack and see the ladies, and thus fell into the hands of our scouts. He told me that it was he who had captured my friend Luce. He was on picket-duty near Milnwood, when a resident of the locality informed him that a Federal engineer was surveying the Berryville road, and without an escort. He laid in wait for him with his squad, and presently Luce came riding along, absorbed as usual in his note-book and compass. The Lieutenant advanced and demanded his sword. Luce,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google whose official position was not clearly understood by our men, was often annoyed by sentinels and subalterns on outpost duty, and supposing the interruption to be of the usual character, replied to the demand by fiercely asking: "What regiment do you belong to, Sir?"

"To Ashby's Cavalry," replied the Lieutenant.

"The devil!" exclaimed Luce, clapping his hand to his pistol. The Lieutenant's pistol was already cocked and bearing on him, the squad showed itself, and my plucky friend was forced to surrender himself and command, which consisted of the topographical baggage-wagon and Henshaw the teamster. The prisoners were relieved of their equipments and all superfluous clothing, and then sent back to Harrisonburg; and, as I have since learned, they suffered a good deal from cold and short rations. An incident occurred here which resulted in some amelioration of Luce's condition. He was confined in the court-house, with a mob of other prisoners of all varieties of character and opinions. There were Yankee soldiers, Rebel guard-house birds, deserters, and Union men all jumbled together. Luce's generous sympathies had been excited by the condition of an aged prisoner, arrested on suspicion of Unionism, and forced to march with their gang until he was ready to faint from exhaustion. Their meals, scant and far between, were served by a stout negro-man, who distributed the chunks of corn-bread and bits of fried meat with a domineering arrogance which showed that the character of the African is as likely to be spoiled by official position as that of the white man. There had been nothing served that day, and as the burly steward entered the guard-room with a large dripping pan filled with fried meat there was a general murmur of gratification among the prisoners. The ordinarily meek and modest old Union man, half frantic with hunger, stepped forward and snatched a piece of meat as it passed. The insolent black rebuked him with a torrent of abuse, concluding by a cuff which sent the old man reeling against the wall. At the sight of this cruel indignity Luce boiled over, and rushing at the brutal official, gave him a blow and a kick which sent him tumbling down a flight of steps accompanied by his greasy viands and clattering pans. The guard-house roared with applause. The guard outside, alarmed at these unusual sights and sounds, rushed to arms, thinking there was a revolt among the prisoners. The drums beat the long roll, the officers ran to their posts; but seeing no attempt on the part of the prisoners to escape, at length concluded to enter the room to learn the cause of the confusion. Luce meanwhile had time to reflect on the rashness of his conduct, and, perceiving the hubbub it had raised, expected nothing less than instant death. He folded his arms and summoned up his spirit to meet it with becoming fortitude. The entrance of the guard quelled for a moment the merriment of the prisoners. The affair was explained to the officer, who took the generous view of it. Luce was applauded; the negro steward rebuked; and the merriment was renewed.

"The Yankee kicked the nigger—hurrah! that's a good joke. The Yankee kicked the nigger down stairs!"

The political solecism seemed to tickle every body's fancy. The guard laughed and hurrahed. "A Yankee kicked the nigger down stairs!" A capital joke. The Yank was voted a spirited and liberal-minded fellow, and the prisoners shouldn't lose their breakfast for his spunky act. A subscription was opened among the guard, and the pan, refilled with meat and corn-bread, was sent in to them. From this moment my friend found favor in the eyes of his captors. He was a clever artist. They furnished him with paper and pencils, and he sketched their portraits, for which they paid him as they could. He thereby found solace in his confinement, and raised money to refit his clothing and procure other little comforts grateful to a prisoner. He was shortly afterward sent to Richmond, and confined at Belle Isle, I think.

Before closing the subject I may be permitted to relate another anecdote illustrating one of the finest characters I have ever known. Some time after this I met Henshaw, the teamster, who had been exchanged. I questioned him in regard to their imprisonment at Richmond. Luce, who was not only an artist but an ingenious mechanic, passed a great part of his time planning an escape. Henshaw was his confidant, and was to be his companion. With that patient ingenuity which a prison-life frequently develops, he found the material and privacy to make himself a false face. His scheme was nearly complete. The prisoners were numerous, and guard-duty carelessly performed. In the universality of rags and dirt costume had lost all significance. By changing his face the prisoner might easily elude the guards and get into the country. Things began to tighten up, however, and it presently became manifest that their scheme required a forged pass. Mechanically nothing would have been easier to Luce, who was an accomplished penman; but a word that was coupled with dishonor shocked him in the utterance.

"I can not condescend to forge," said he, "even if it were to save my life."

"Why, Captain," quoth the literal teamster, "you have spent a great deal of time and pains trying to deceive your enemies by forging a face, and I don't see that you will add to the immorality by forging a pass, which you can do in a minute."

"Perhaps it is all dishonorable," replied my friend. "I think it will be better to wait quietly until we are exchanged."

The long-cherished object of their labor and their hopes was sadly consigned to the flames, and the plan of escape abandoned.

For the next two weeks we lay at Woodstock, doing nothing, with but few incidents to enliven the dullness. There was the usual

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google amount of reconnoitring, skirmishing along the front, and foraging. The country afforded ample supplies, which were obtained with comparative ease. Our cavalry had been strengthened by the arrival of the Vermont Regiment, under Colonel Holliday, an officer of the Regular Army. General Hatch had also arrived, and had been assigned to the command of the whole cavalry. The spirit and discipline of this new force gave us entire predominance over the enemy in our front. Ashby's vagabonds were beaten whenever encountered. A Lieutenant Greenfield, of the Michigan Regiment (I believe), one morning captured an entire company of them—sixty men with all their officers. Deserters and refugees were streaming in upon us, sometimes in gangs of a dozen or twenty together. These informed us that hundreds of their comrades would follow them if they could be assured of deliverance and good treatment. Citizen refugees represented that the rebellion was caving-in every where; that the people only wanted assurance of protection by the United States Government to induce them to repudiate the Confederacy openly, and turn their vengeance on the leaders who had deluded and betrayed them into their present unhappy position. Jackson's main force, it was said, lay between Rude's Hill and Harrisonburg, not more than six or seven thousand strong, demoralized, deserting, and drinking whisky furiously. The weight of their stores and their heavy guns had been sent back to Waynesborough, on the Virginia Central Railroad. They were evidently prepared for a retrograde as soon as we advanced.

In proof of the material character of this disaffection we had positive information that a body of Union men and refugees from conscription had fortified a position near Swift Run Gap, in the Blue Ridge, and were holding their own by force of arms, fighting and praying for the arrival of the National troops. This party, I understood, was headed by a Dr. Edward Gearing. They were armed with squirrel-rifles and ordinary shot-guns, and held within their lines a small grist-mill, which furnished them supplies. Jackson sent a regiment to dislodge them, which succeeded in getting temporary possession of the mill, but was finally driven off. He then sent a brigade with a section of artillery. The cannon frightened the mountaineers, and the force dispersed, a portion surrendering to the rebels and others escaping into the Union lines. We had at head-quarters a Dr. Gillespie, from Honeyville, in Page County, who had been arrested and imprisoned at Culpepper Court House, to be tried for loyalty to his country. He managed to escape, and arrived safely within our lines in front of Washington, from whence he was sent to the column of the Shenandoah, with the expectation that his knowledge of the country would be of service. Gillespie, who was a gentleman of intelligence and education, confirmed all that we had been told of the moral condition of this portion of the Confederacy. The majority of the people were only waiting to be assured of their safety to welcome us with open arms. Upon the first reverse the army, composed of unwilling conscripts or volunteers, wearied with hard work and short rations, would disintegrate or mutiny. In addition to all this the news from the West was glorious and decisive. Grant had fought a great battle at Pittsburg Landing. General Sidney Johnston was dead, and the rebel army of the West defeated with great slaughter. Island Number Ten, with stores, artillery, and prisoners, had also fallen into our hands. Yet in face of an enemy discouraged by defeat and disaster, demoralized by a consciousness of the material and moral weakness of its cause, what is it that has paralyzed so fatally the National power in Virginia?

We have news from McClellan at Yorktown. He says Joe Johnston confronts him with a large force, sustained by strong fortifications. His tone is not confident, but rather complaining that part of his command has been taken from him. He says, however, he will do the best he can. Perhaps this is only a modest manner of expressing himself, but a modest appreciation of his own powers is not a strong point in the character of a military commander. Confidence of success does much to insure success; a boast often engages a man to perform great deeds; at games of chance the millionaire generally wins, because he can afford to play boldly. The United States, with its vast resources, is playing this great game like a poor devil who is staking his last dime, and stands trembling lest he should lose his dinner. Why is M'Dowell, with forty thousand men, doing nothing on the Rappahannock? Why is Fremont, with thirty thousand, doing worse than nothing in Western Virginia? Why rest we here all the day idle?

Since we arrived at Woodstock I had continued to lodge and mess with Colonel Brodhead, in whom I found pleasant companionship. We discussed war, politics, and society with great unanimity of opinion, thereby lightening those hours of tiresome repose which hang most heavily on a soldier's hands. When not engaged in other duties we made frequent reconnoissances of the lines from Edinburgh to Columbia furnace. In these rides we found some material for the improvement of our maps, but met with no adventure worthy of record. On one occasion, while walking in the fields near Woodstock, I saw a column of flame and smoke suddenly leap up to a height of several hundred feet, its top spreading and rolling over in beautifully voluminous curls until it took the form of an immense white mushroom. This exhibition was followed by a deep-toned report which shook the earth, and then a series of minor explosions resembling the rattle of a bunch of Chinese crackers magnified. This pyrotechnical display was caused by a stray spark from a bivouac fire which exploded one of our caissons passing at the moment. The speed at which the horses went up the turnpike was

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AN EXPLOSION.

somewhat less, perhaps, than the initial velocity of a shell discharged from a ten-pounder, and when they stopped, as they did at a point about two miles from the scene of the explosion, they and every one else were amazed to find that neither the driver nor his animals had received any serious damage.

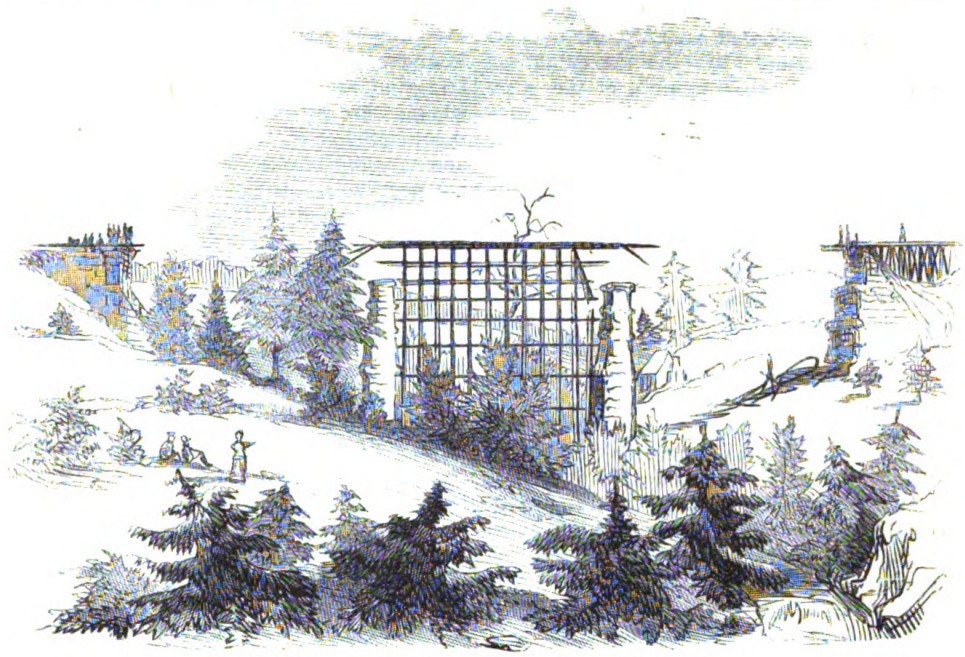
During our stay in Woodstock the Colonel presented me with a beautiful mare—a slender, light-footed chestnut sorrel, with thin mane and tail, and an eye like that of a gazelle, soft, lustrous, and loving. She was gentle as a pet lamb, and wild as a giraffe. Her little head was as full of foolish fancies, skittish perversities, and unaccountable obstinacies as that of a handsome woman. She was fleet of foot, leaped like a doe, and trotted so springily that a weary man might have slept in the saddle. Her silken coat, swelling veins, and punctilious nicety in regard to her drink, indicated her patrician descent. I soon became attached to this animal to a degree that none but a mounted campaigner can fully understand.

April 15.—The snows and rains succeed each other continuously, keeping up the streams and delaying our movements. I met General Rosecrans at head-quarters to-day. He politely mentioned that he had intended offering me a position in the army of Western Virginia, but understanding I was with General Banks he had forborne to do so.

In the midst of the restlessness and dissatisfaction engendered by inaction I received a letter from General Birney in regard to my joining him before Yorktown. Longing to participate in the more stirring service promised in that field, I again solicited and received permission to return to the Army of the Potomac. I have packed my duds, settled my affairs, and have arranged to take my mare with me. Brodhead left for Detroit this morning.

April 16, Wednesday.—Taking leave of my friends, I mounted for my journey to Harper's Ferry. On calling at head-quarters I received my written orders from Adjutant Copeland, and again mounted to depart. As I turned to take leave of an acquaintance an orderly handed me a note from Major Perkins. He was confined to his room by sickness, and desired to see me. He had sent for me to urge me not to leave the column, and presented reasons that were both friendly and flattering, and I agreed to delay my departure at least for some days. Thus, instead of riding northward, I turned my horse's head in the opposite direction; and, halting at the Narrow Passage, sought to calm my troubled mind by sketching the ruined railroad-bridge which spanned that romantic gorge.

How seldom do we find a man capable of rightly using or enjoying even that modicum of independence which circumstances, society, and government allows him! How seldom is it that those who, by the fatal favor of fortune, are freed from the ordinary necessities and responsibilities of life, are found in the ranks of usefulness or honor! How surely does that man become a drone and vexation in society, an intolerable burden to himself, and dies "as the fool dieth!" Happier he whose way of life is hedged in with thorny circumstance; who is early taught to feel the saddle of responsibility on his back, and the bit of necessity in his mouth. His strength is spent in earnest labor, and he will die in the midst of honorable achievement.



"Ducunt volentem fata, nolentem trahunt."

I remember in happier days, when friends and fortune were at my elbow—when peace, prosperity, and honor were the birth-right of my native land—I used to repeat that awful sentence with an involuntary shudder. But now, tossed on this fathomless ocean of events—groping amidst storms and darkness—the words have a comfortable significance, and there is a sense of friendliness in the grasp of the unseen hand—Lead on, dark Fate, you have a willing follower!

Returning to my quarters after dark I learned that General Banks and Staff had moved toward Edinburgh. I overtook and rode with them to General Shields's quarters in that village. There is to be a forward movement in the morning, and Shields's division is to lead the advance. I was introduced to a brace of young Irish officers, attached to Shields's Staff, and just returned from the Italian wars. They seemed to be well-educated, gallant youths, and I had some agreeable conversation with them. The arrangements for the march having been concluded we rode back to Woodstock.

April 17.—Bright and pleasant. Awaking this morning at the usual time, I found the General and Staff had been gone two hours. I got breakfast and rode forward at a trot. Beyond Edinburgh I overtook several brigades of infantry en route. The lofty columns of smoke which

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

BURNT RAILROAD BRIDGE, NARROW PASSAGE CREEK.

rose in front showed that the enemy was on the alert and at his usual work. Just before entering Mount Jackson I overtook Major Crane of the Third Minnesota and rode with him. There were several dead horses lying beside the highway, indicating that the cavalry had been engaged. At this village the finished part of the Manassas Gap railroad terminates. A number of cars and engines, a quantity of stores and material, with the dépôt buildings and offices, were all ablaze. Three buildings, recently built for military hospitals, were left unburned.

Pushing rapidly through the village I overtook the General and Staff on the bluffs overlooking the north fork of Shenandoah River, which here traverses the Valley from west to east. Opposite, about a mile distant, was Rude's Hill, its summit crowned by the enemy's guns. The bridge over this stream was saved by the activity of the Vermont cavalry. It had been prepared for destruction, which was thought so important that Ashby had remained to superintend it in person. At the approach of our vanguard the fagots were ignited. A squad of the First Vermont charged through flames and smoke, dispersing the enemy on the other side and capturing two men and a tall, robust officer with black whiskers, whom they took for Ashby. As the prisoners rode by, one of our officers exultingly pointed him out to me as the rebel Colonel. I was sorry to be forced to throw a damper over his exultation. Ashby is a small man, very dark, with rather hard features and a heavy beard. The prisoner was a very large, showy man, clear complexion, and rather handsome face, like an Irishman, which I believe he was. Ashby was actually present in the melée, and had his horse shot. The animal had strength enough to carry his rider out of danger, and then fell dead by the road-side. After this exploit the brave Vermonters turned upon the fire, which they extinguished by carrying water from the river in their horses' nose-bags. Thus the bridge was saved.

The aspect of this country justifies all my boastful praises. The broad meadows carpeted with velvet green and watered by crystal streams; the rock-crested mountains overhanging the river, and bordering the valley on either side in long perspective ranges, vanishing in the distance in a haze of delicate blue; all combine to form a picture of marvelous beauty. The General seems enraptured with the country, and continues to remark it even amidst the excitement of the pursuit. As they mount the ridge whole regiments will halt and burst spontaneously into shouts of admiration. There is a significance in all this which we will discuss when more at leisure.

Our marching column had closed up, and the troops lay reposing between Mount Jackson and the river, concealed from the enemy's view. We were trying another flank movement to catch Ashby, or whomsoever might choose to fall into our net. A column about six thousand strong had started from Woodstock by the back road running along the base of the North Mountain. A cross-road entered the Valley turnpike above the village of New Market, by which a force could be thrown upon the rear of an adversary occupying Rude's Hill, thus turning a position which would be unassailable in front. Jackson's main army was doubtless out of danger before this. The force visible was apparently nothing more than a mounted rear-guard under Ashby. He had been trying the range of his guns upon us as usual, and we placed several pieces in position to return his fire, hop-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ing to amuse him until our flanking column got in his rear. Our Chief of Artillery, Lieutenant-Colonel Daum, more intent on the exhibition of his special arm than mindful of the more comprehensive plan, took a battery around a bend of the river, and obtaining an advantageous cross-fire on Rude's Hill, he opened with such zeal and accuracy that the enemy limbered up in haste and retired.

Our force, about ten thousand men of all arms, then crossed the bridge, and, deploying on the level ground, marched in order of battle across the meadows and up Rude's Hill, halting on the summit. This was the most imposing military exhibition I had seen during the campaign. The Staff followed over, and from the hill enjoyed the view, looking back toward Mount Jackson, and embracing the magnificent estates of Charles Moore, Rude, Steambergen, and Meems. Riding among the enemy's recently deserted encampments, I was impressed with the wretchedness of their provision and equipment.

They seemed to have no tents, but found a very good substitute in their sheds of bark and branches, which, in a country plentifully wooded, can be constructed in nearly the same time that it requires to unload and pitch a canvas-tent. Among the débris of clothes, equipments, and cooking utensils I never saw an article that I supposed any human would take the trouble to gather up. The very hogs that visited these localities in hopes of spoils went away whining with disappointment. In one of the sheds I found a lump of bread—the only thing resembling commissary stores which had been abandoned. I tried to hack off a portable specimen with my sabre, but after some detriment to the steel I gave it up. It is possible this poor devil had been trying to invent a composition which might answer indifferently for commissary or ordnance purposes. Artillery would be terribly effective with such missiles at short range.

We reached New Market about sunset, and took quarters in the house of a Doctor Rice, at the northern extremity of the village. Here we learned that Jackson's main army had moved southward at double-quick, about ten o'clock in the forenoon. The main body of Ashby's force had followed at three in the afternoon, leaving about fifty men and three guns on the bluff to watch and retard our movement. This forlorn hope of a rear-guard had just passed through the village, exchanging pistol-shots with our advance. Our flanking movement was a failure. We heard nothing from it until ten o'clock at night, when a messenger arrived informing the General that the column had reached the river about a mile to the westward, but would not be able to cross until daylight. We are consoled by the assurance that it could have accomplished nothing more if it had come up to time. Our crafty opponent is not to be caught with such chaff.

The news from McClellan is not encouraging.

April 18.—Bright and balmy spring weather. Walked about the village with Colonel Clarke. Found a youth, of Pocahontas County, who brings information from Richmond and elsewhere. He says there is a strong Union feeling in Richmond, repressed only by military power, while in the rural districts the people are ready to revolt against the enforcement of the conscription. They would do all these things and more, I do not doubt, if they had leaders, but they have none.

Fort Pulaski, on the Savannah River, has fallen before the superior fire and weight of our artillery. This determines the fate of all similar strong-holds held by the rebellion.

On the street we saw a native eight-year-old boy in rebel gray uniform drilling a squad of our six-footers. The joke seemed to please the citizens vastly. I also overheard a shock-headed sergeant boasting that the rebel women freely acknowledged that our men were better-looking than the graybacks.

April 19.—Warm and raining. The General started to reconnoitre the turnpike road leading over the mountain toward Luray. At Smith's Creek we saw a regiment sheltered from the rain under gum blankets stretched over frames made of fence-rails. These cloths, enveloping the soldiers' baggage, supply the place of knapsacks. As a knapsack on the march and a shelter during repose they must be well adapted for light campaigning, and will doubtless be introduced. We crossed the range of the Peaked Mountains by an admirable stone road, and descending on the opposite side into the Luray Valley, crossed the main or South Branch of Shenandoah at the White House Bridge. There was a small settlement on the further bank, where we halted and requested some refreshment. We were directed to a comfortable country-house a short distance down the stream, where we were well received and promised a meal as soon as the women could prepare something. We waited an hour, and nothing appearing I went to the kitchen to see what was the cause of the delay. I found our pretty hostess up to her elbows in cooking: pans, ovens, skillets, and coffee-pots all fizzing, stewing, and baking to the extent of their capacity. The results of which, as they were consecutively turned out, being instantaneously swallowed by several dozen of our lantern-jawed, blue-bellied Yanks, who stood ravening about the kitchen and adjacencies.

I represented the enormity of this proceeding to the lady, and endeavored to impress upon her the vast difference between the appetite of a major-general and that of a knapsack-bearing private. As some of the boys were likely and plausible, and our hostess tender-hearted and little versed in the secrets of the military hierarchy, my remonstrances were useless; she couldn't bear to refuse any thing to a hungry man; so I was obliged to seize a couple of dishes at the sabre's point and carry them into the house myself.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Returning to New Market we left the main road for a short distance to look at the body of a man who had been killed by our skirmishers as we came over. Riding for several hundred yards through a tall dark forest, we came at length to a cleared space, in the midst of which stood a small cottage of logs and clap-boards. Stretched on the green-sward near the gate of this poor dwelling lay the dead man. The body was that of a beardless boy, whose clear white face and scrupulously-clean clothes showed that he had never seen camps nor campaigning. He had probably mounted this morning to seek his first military adventure; and those soft, evenly-knit yarn socks, the white shirt, and neatly-trimmed regimentals of gray jeans, looked as if they had just left the hands of a careful mother or loving sister. His career was short. He had ridden up to the house with a companion to make some inquiries about the Yankee forces. He had not spoken a dozen words when a Minié ball whizzed through his brain. His companion fled, and presently the Yankee soldiers came up, and taking his horse, arms, and boots, left him where he fell. The woodman had straightened the corpse, and was gone to get a neighbor to assist in burying it. This was told us by a shuddering girl about ten years old that our troopers had found in the cottage alone. She spoke to us in a whisper, with her face persistently turned away from the pale horror that lay at the gate, with white hands crossed on its breast and its crushed head glued to the grass by a mass of clotted blood. The General was visibly affected by the scene, and we all rode away in silence.

On arriving at head-quarters we found some prisoners, deserters, and refugees, sent by the Provost Marshal for examination. One of these was a personal acquaintance, and verified the statement made by one of our scouts some time ago. This scout, named Taggart, wishing to gain information of the enemy's force and movements, pretended to desert, and, escaping through our lines, delivered himself up to one of Ashby's picket-guard. He was taken to the chief, and by plausible representations induced him to believe there was serious disaffection among the National troops, especially the cavalry, and promised, furthermore, that, upon assurance of good treatment, he could bring over the whole company to which he belonged. Ashby took him to Jackson, whom he stuffed with the same stories, answering all questions in regard to the numbers and intentions of the opposing army with frankness of manner and with just sufficient regard to truth to avoid exciting suspicion of intentional deception in the minds of those whom he knew were generally quite well informed on these subjects. His stories and promises were too flattering to be rejected. His McClellan saddle and equipments were much admired and coveted. Officers of all grades had it buckled on their horses and rode around to try the seat. His boots were remarked, and measured over and over again. The hope of acquiring a whole company of such boots and saddles overcame all scruples and suspicions. He was allowed to return to the Federal camp, and nightly arrangements made for some time to receive the promised company of deserters. At length the pleasing illusion faded away, and it was acknowledged that he had Yankeed the whole of them, from the General down.

From other refugees and deserters we learn that Jackson has left the Valley turnpike at Harrisonburg, and is moving eastward on the road to Gordonsville by way of Swift Run Gap. This information is most important if true, and must be immediately looked into.

April 20.—Raining. Gangs of refugees and deserters bring positive confirmation of yesterday's report. Some from the Irish Battalion say that Jackson's destination is Gordonsville. It is also reported that the Federal troops occupy Staunton. This is doubtless premature, but Fremont's advance under Milroy should be near there at this time. This manœuvre of Jackson's toward Gordonsville develops painfully the unfortunate location of the National forces in Northern and Western Virginia. A fine army of seventy thousand men is distributed on a line of more than two hundred miles in extent, in detached bodies under different chiefs, separated by long distances, deep rivers, and chains of mountains, rendering mutual support or concert of action impossible. Most of these troops entirely out of the sphere of decisive action, held by a mere shadow of an enemy in front, are lying still, devouring the country around them, or groping their way forward without any definite aims or objects; generally on the defensive before an enemy contemptible in numbers when compared with the aggregate whole, yet who, with the advantage of interior lines, may concentrate a superior force upon either of the columns and overwhelm it. Banks's column, which has shown a disposition to be active, and has, at least, eagerly sought battle, is now clearly brought to a halt and is on the wrong line. Jackson, lying at Swift Run Gap, forbids our advance in this direction. Backed up by Gordonsville and Richmond, with free railroad transportation, he may overwhelm us at any time. His position is a continual menace to us even where we are. If we assail him we must first cross a deep and rapid river, doubtless to find him in a strong position and reinforced to an uncertain extent. Fremont informs us that the force lately in his front has fallen back. We hear the same from M'Dowell. This indicates a concentration of the enemy's whole power at Richmond, or it may more nearly concern us here. Why don't we concentrate? Why don't Fremont join us, and, crossing the Blue Ridge to M'Dowell, precipitate our combined power upon Gordonsville, and consecutively upon Richmond from the north? If there are reasons why this should not be done I have never heard them.

April 21.—Continuous rain. The water-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE PEAKED MOUNTAIN FROM NEW MARKET.

courses are all roaring, which precludes the idea of military operations for some days. I found entertainment in reading Olmstead's "Cotton Kingdom." Its pictures of life in the Cotton States are doubtless accurate as far as they go; but they, almost without exception, represent the evils and vices of the slavery system. A series of observations, made in a similar temper, of any country or state of society, may present a picture quite as shadowy.

"For who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,
The pangs of despised love, the law's delay,
The insolence of office, and the spurns
That patient merit of the unworthy takes,
When he himself might his quietus make"

by going to some blessed El Dorado where none of these evils are found?

Perhaps the greatest evils that afflict society are those produced by the attempts of well-intentioned but ignorant zealots to manage and mend that which they can not control and do not understand.

April 22.—Alternate clouds and sunshine. I was quite ill to-day, and called in Doctor King of the Staff, whose skill and kind attention have afforded me partial relief.

I had up to date managed to get along without a body servant, holding the place open for my man Adam, of topographical memory. As the advance of our army guaranteed the quiet of the border counties, Adam, doubtless satisfied with his military experiences, has found it more pleasant and profitable to remain with his family in Martinsburg. There are always idle negroes enough hanging around head-quarters, and I had but to express the wish to engage a servant when one presented himself. John had belonged to a man named Richardson, who kept the hotel at Strasburg. His elder brother had taken service with one of the officers, and John had followed in the train of the army hitherto without employment. He is, to use a current phrase in Virginia, "a likely boy," quiet and well-mannered, but too modest and slow, I fear, to hold his own among our head-quarters bummers. I will try him.

While on the subject of servants, I must notice the General's valet de chambre. Frank is a Saint Domingo Frenchman, black as the ace of spades. He speaks imperfect English, and in his service is quiet, attentive, and polite, and quite French and aristocratic in his deportment toward the other servants. The General tells a pleasant story on Frank, which contains a most pointed illustration of the diversity of character and ideas existing in the world. While the army lay at Frederick City last winter several balls were given to the officers. On one of these occasions Frank was in the cloak-room looking after the General's wrappings. Wine had been flowing freely, and the valet had the misfortune to get into a difficulty with some of the officers. He presently presented himself before his chief all trembling and ashen with rage. "General! General! I have received a blow; an officer has struck me; my God, Sir! what am I to do?" The General examined the contusion upon the negro's cheek, and kindly expressed his regret at the affair. "But what am I to do?" reiterated the excited valet. "I think," replied the General, in good faith, "you had better put some grease on it." "Grease!" shrieked the ebony Frenchman, "grease hell! It is satisfaction I want!"

April 24.—I am still ailing and unable to go out. The view from my window is rather peculiar this morning. Bright green fields, full blooming peach and plum trees all draped in snow. Our signal men on the Peaked Mountain report Jackson's force encamped on the slopes of the Blue Ridge across the road to Stannardsville. Our cavalry have scoured the country nine miles beyond Harrisonburg.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

April 26.—Damp and cloudy. Warm rains have melted the snow; all the streams are swollen, and we hear of the destruction of our bridges in every direction. Hatch, with his cavalry, is on his way to Staunton, expecting to join Milroy, of Fremont's command, who is coming through Buffalo Gap. There is a great panic at Staunton from all accounts.

April 27, Sunday.—Bright and pleasant. I was so much better to-day that I rode with the General to Harrisonburg, eighteen miles. Hatch, it seems, got no further than Mount Crawford, where he was arrested by the high-water.

April 28, Monday. — Pleasant. This place seems much improved since I last visited it. We have a brigade and some cavalry here. The cavalry has been skirmishing with the enemy near Conrad's Bridge, and took some prisoners. Of the aged Union citizens seized by Jackson, and inhumanly dragged from their homes, two died of fatigue and exposure, and are buried here. These graves are marked "Job Throckmorton and —— Martin, Union men."

We have news of the capture of New Orleans by our forces.

In the afternoon rode back to New Market. Instead of improving, as I hoped, I find the ride has exhausted me terribly.

April 30.—Clouds. I was ordered with Captain Scheffler to inspect our outposts in the Luray Valley. We crossed the mountain to the Columbian Bridge over the Shenandoah. Here we found Lieutenant-Colonel Foster with the Thirteenth Indiana Infantry, a section of artillery, and a squadron of cavalry. The enemy had made no demonstrations in his vicinity, and the position being naturally strong he felt confident that he could hold it in case of attack. The position at the White House Bridge, on the direct road to Luray, was equally satisfactory. Returning, we stopped at a house for dinner, and passed a merry hour with several young ladies of the neighborhood, stanch Unionists, whose father and brother were in the United States service. Descending the Mountain toward New Market we met the First Virginia Regiment of Infantry, formerly Colonel Kelley's regiment at Philippi, now commanded by Colonel Thoburn. It was on the march to reinforce the post at the Columbian Bridge, and was as effective a body of men in appearance as I ever saw. It commenced raining heavily as we descended, and I returned to quarters feeling sick and chilly. An hour after I went to bed quite ill.

May 1.—It rained all day, and I did not leave my bed. The General informs me that the desired movements, looking to a concentration on the enemy's flank at Yorktown and Richmond, are about being consummated.

General Abercombie, with his Brigade, who led the march of our Division across the Ridge previous to the battle of Kernstown, had never rejoined us. He was now in communication with M'Dowell. Fremont was closing in upon us from the West. There would presently be a concentration of forces, then decisive action. This is encouraging.

May 6.—Bright and cool. There is still no abatement in my illness, which is assuming a typhoid form.

Colonel Brodhead has arrived from the North, bringing papers with particulars of the evacuation of Yorktown. The enemy abandoned their works during the night, leaving over a hundred heavy guns, with ordnance stores and other material. This seems the beginning of the end. What next? Yet in the midst of our exultation we receive orders to fall back to Strasburg. Shields, it seems, has been commissioned a Major-General, and is to be withdrawn to hold Fredericksburg with his veteran Division, which contains three-fifths of the numerical strength of this column. Banks's Division, reduced by the absence of Abercrombie's command, by the usual wastage of sickness and furloughs, will show but little over seven thousand men. With this force he is to hold the Valley at Strasburg. While victory crowns our arms, east and west, we are doomed to a shameful retrograde—fleeing like the wicked when no man pursueth. Instead of concentration, dispersion seems to be the favorite strategic idea that governs our military councils at Washington. Milroy is operating against Staunton with a brigade or a weak division alone, the main force of that Department being still at Moorefield. Our signal men on the mountain inform us that Jackson's column seems to be moving toward Staunton. A large additional force is encamped on the Gordonsville Road, where it ascends the Ridge, said to be Ewell's Corps, fourteen thousand strong, brought up from Gordonsville. Refugees and deserters inform us that Edward Johnson, with four thousand men, is in Staunton. This is the force which for a time lay in front of Fremont.

May 10.—Bright and cool. General Hatch has reconnoitred the country three miles beyond Harrisonburg without discovering an enemy. He tells me that, several days ago, two companies of our cavalry, riding toward Harrisonburg, met a squadron of the enemy and charged them, sword in hand. Their onset was gallantly met by the rebels, who were quickly overthrown and routed, losing ten men killed outright, with an equal number of wounded and prisoners. Our loss was but two killed. This is the first instance, on this theatre, of a determined collision with the sabre between two bodies of cavalry, and the result proves, what I have always maintained, that the Southern horsemen can not stand before ours in a charge.

May 11.—Pleasant. There have been some ugly cases of bushwhacking recently. Day before yesterday several of our troopers went out to search for milk. Calling at a house occupied by several women they were directed to a neighboring house, the road to which passed near a barn. As they rode by they were fired on from the barn, losing two men killed. As this was scarcely a hundred paces from the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google house it is scarcely presumable that the women were not in complicity with the murderers. They were arrested, and orders given to burn their house and barn — which were countermanded. Colonel Gordon, of the Second Massachusetts, informs us that a messenger belonging to his regiment was shot near Mount Jackson by an assassin concealed in the woods. Such acts are truly deplorable, as they will tend to give the war a vindictive and ferocious character, which it has not exhibited heretofore.

I felt so much better that I ordered my horse and rode out to Colonel Brodhead's quarters, where I dined. After dinner we received information from head-quarters of the evacuation of Norfolk and Portsmouth by the enemy, and the accompanying suicide of the Merrimac. Wool marched into Norfolk with five thousand men. The cavalry band was ordered out, and played "Hail Columbia" and "The Dragon is Dead." We hear music and cheering from all quarters: the rejoicing is general.

May 12.—Bright and mild. Three young men—one a Frenchman, and two Italians—were sent in from our outpost at Columbian Bridge. They present themselves as deserters from Ewell's camp at Swift Run Gap, and confirm our previous information in regard to the forces there. These fellows volunteered in the service of the United States at the commencement of the war; but the organization in which they served being disbanded, and not being able to obtain such positions as they desired, they went South and offered themselves to the Confederacy. They were recommended to positions under Beauregard in the West, but preferred service in the Valley, and in consequence were sent up to Ewell. It is probable he gave them a cold reception, or they otherwise found the rebel service not particularly inviting. They deserted yesterday, and offer themselves again to our side. The moral sense of these adventurers is rather too loose even for mere soldiers of fortune. They obtain no credit at head-quarters, and the General sends them to Washington under guard.

Our retrograde movement commenced this morning. Shields has departed with his Division by way of the Luray Valley and Front Royal to join M'Dowell. The Staff took the road to Woodstock late in the forenoon, I taking a seat in the General's ambulance in the capacity of invalid.

En route we passed the marching column, horse, foot, artillery, and baggage, all encumbered with various spoils, dogs, cats, herds of cattle, sheep, niggers, and refugees in abundance. Arriving at Woodstock we reoccupied our quarters in the court-house. After dinner Captain Abert called to report, and I returned with him to the Topographical Encampment, pleasantly located in a grass-grown street of the village.

I remained to tea, and spent a pleasant hour, recalling past campaigns and former friends. The Captain had a somewhat original and very convenient adjunct to his mess chest. This was a large covered wicker basket, accommodating a game cock and half a dozen hens. On the march the basket was swung to the bows of his baggage wagon. In camp it was lowered and opened, allowing its inmates the freedom of the common, where the hens scratched and chanticleer exercised himself in chivalric combat with any neighboring rooster that showed his crest. His lusty challenge was also often useful in developing the localities of fowls hidden from our foragers. In the matter of fresh eggs the basket resembled the famous cruse of the widow of Zarephath.

May 13.—Bright and warm. I resumed my seat in the ambulance with the General, and we started for Strasburg. In passing the troops and baggage trains we suffered extremely from the suffocating clouds of dust and debilitating heat. We found head-quarters fixed at a brick house on the turnpike, about half a mile north of Strasburg. One of the most agreeable circumstances connected with the location is that the town is entirely out of view. We found Captain Collis here with his company of Zouaves, who resumed their rôle of body-guard.

During the following week I find nothing recorded worthy of note. I continued to suffer so much from physical exhaustion and consequent mental depression that I took very little interest in what was passing around me. The weather was hot, damp, and debilitating, while the sudden and unexpected change of our attitude from offensive to defensive seemed to have affected every body's spirits. There was a general collapse.

The General alone, with that calm and patient persistence which characterizes him, set about the task of distributing his weakened force along a line hopelessly indefensible. The Valley at this point is about eighteen miles in width. Between the North Mountain on the west, and the Blue Ridge, its eastern boundary, arises a double chain of lofty parallel ridges called the Fort Mountains. This sporadic upheaval commences on a line with Strasburg and continues for thirty miles to the southward, disappearing as abruptly as it rises at a point opposite Harrisonburg. The great Valley is thus divided into three parallel valleys, separated from each other by mountain barriers generally impassable, and only traversed at distant intervals by narrow and difficult roads. These divisions are again subdivided by the deep and usually unfordable streams of the North and South forks of the Shenandoah, and by Passage Creek and some minor ridges of the Fort Mountains. North of Strasburg runs Cedar Creek; rising behind the Little North Mountain, it flows eastward until it joins the North Fork of Shenandoah, and with that river forming a line to the base of the Blue Ridge, running square across and at right angles with the mountains, valleys, and streams before described. Behind and north of this line, in the direction of Winchester, the Valley shows an undulating plain of alternate field and forest,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

with a width of twenty-five miles unbroken by any important hills or water-courses. Southward of this river line, between it and the butts of the Fort Mountains, and at right angles with all this intricate topography, this natural system of covered approaches, lies the line of the Manassas Gap Railroad, which had been put in running order, and which we were ordered to protect.

The maintenance of this road was advantageous, insomuch as it gave us a shorter and more direct line of transportation for supplies. But as we were in the midst of a fertile and well-provided country, and our old line through Winchester had answered for an army nearly thrice as numerous as ours, this advantage seemed scarcely sufficient to justify the hazards of our present location. To give details. Our head-quarters and main force lay at Strasburg, covering the Valley turnpike and the railroad bridge over the North Fork, about one mile distant. We had an open line on our right of four or five miles in extent, traversed by two roads, convenient for turning our right flank, besides any number of secluded parallel passages beyond the Little North Mountain, adapted for the same manœuvre. We must have a strong detachment at Front Royal to watch the road and bridges at that point, separated from the main command by twelve miles' distance, and two rivers traversed by light trestle-work bridges liable to be swept away by every rise of the waters, which, as our experience had taught, might be expected at any time. Cut off by rivers and mountains from support or retreat, this force was open to attack in front or on either flank by way of the Luray Valley.

We must next keep a detachment to protect Passage Creek bridge at Buckton, nearly midway between Strasburg and Front Royal. This secluded position was hemmed in by rivers and hills, and open to attack by way of the Big Fort Valley road, the Little Fort Valley road, and liable to be cut off by way of Luray or the main Valley. This disposition was essential to the protection of the railroad, and thus posted our whole line was liable to be turned at any time, or each of the detachments might be isolated and destroyed, as best suited the enemy's designs and means of carrying them out. Our only hope of escape from destruction was based on the chance that the enemy might be so hard pressed in other directions that he could not spare the force to assail us.

General Banks well comprehended the insecurity of his position, and, as I understood, sent a staff-officer to Washington to make the proper representations on the subject.

Meanwhile we had been informed of the attack on Milroy at M'Dowell, and his subsequent retreat, relieving Staunton from present apprehension. We also hear of the failure of our gun-boats at Fort Darling, and altogether the hopes of a speedy triumph of our arms are not so flattering as they have been during the past fortnight. Our more thoughtful officers say the enemy is concentrating all his power on Richmond in the East and Corinth in the West, yielding minor advantages to insure success on decisive points.

May 19, Monday.—Bright and warm. I rode out this morning with the General and Staff to visit General Hatch's camp in the direction of Woodstock. This is the first time I have been on horseback for three weeks. My mare, wanting her usual exercise, had become so skittish and playful that I was unable to manage her, and I presently became so exhausted that I asked leave to return. After dinner I accompanied the General to Front Royal, traveling by rail. I found some acquaintances here among the citizens and got an invitation to tea, where, with the savory dishes and agreeable conversation, I passed a pleasant hour. We returned to Strasburg about sunset.

May 21, Wednesday.—Clouds. Brigadier-Generals Greene and Crawford have reported for duty. Colonel Tompkins takes the command of the Vermont cavalry regiment, vacated by the recent death of Colonel Holliday. This is the same officer who, at the head of a squadron of dragoons, made such a spirited dash through Fairfax Court House last summer.

A great deal of the General's time is occupied in giving audience to complainants from the surrounding country, who will be satisfied with nothing less than an interview with the Commander-in-Chief. The affair is too important to be communicated to the subordinates of the Staff, and most frequently runs in this wise:

Enter countryman, and is presented to the General, with whom he shakes hands. "General, I am a good Union man, and am come to tell you how your soldiers are a behaving."

GENERAL. "How am I to know you are a Union man? Every body who wants a horse returned, or claims damages of the United States Government for any loss whatever, is a good Union man, at least until his claim is secured. What have you done for your Government?"

COUNTRYMAN. "Why, General, you know Swartz: he can tell you I'm all right, and never voted for nothing—"

GENERAL. "How should I know Swartz? Tell me what is the matter."

COUNTRYMAN. "Why, General, you see my wife's been a plantin' of a garden, and the soldiers have burned the fence, every rail of it, and have took every thing that was in the garden, and I would like to have a guard—"

GENERAL. "The mischief is all done it seems, what good would a guard do if they have already destroyed every thing?"

COUNTRYMAN. "Why, you see most of the things ain't growed yet, and if you stay here long I won't raise a wegetable—"

GENERAL (to an aid-de-camp). "Please attend to this man's case."

The Yankees of this command seem disposed to poke fun at me in regard to these specimens of Anglo-Norman chivalry, both male and fe-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

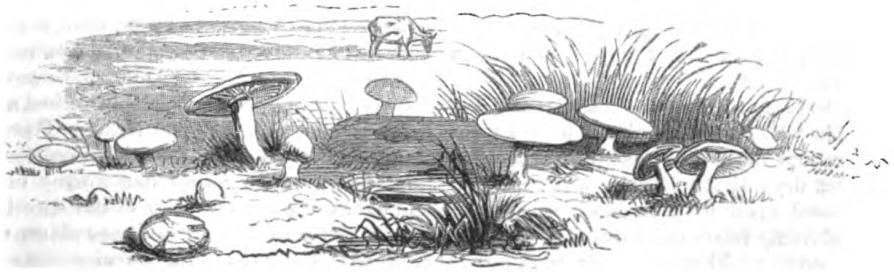
YOU KNOW SWARTZ.

male, that daily haunt our head-quarters, and thus arise frequent discussions and expressions of opinion in regard to Northern and Southern society. Colonel B——, like many others I have met, had always been a Northern Democrat. In view of the social and political evils patent in his section, he had been an ally of the Southern party at Washington and an acquiescent believer in Southern pretensions. Indignant and alarmed at the attack upon the nationality he had taken up arms in its defense, yet he had entered upon the campaign more in sorrow than in anger. When he crossed the Potomac at the head of his regiment he experienced sentiments like those attributed to the troops of Brennus on entering the Senate Chamber of the ancient Romans. As he heard the names and saw the localities belonging to history, he was filled with a species of awe as if in the actual presence of the venerable shades of those "simple great ones gone," the national Virginians of the past.

By this time he was cured of all that "omne ignotum pro magnifico est"—an interior view of the whited sepulchre had changed respect into contempt and disgust. He now saw through the petty demagogues and impostors who had been so long trading on the reputation of the men of Seventy-six. The South was a pretentious humbug socially, financially, and politically.

Major C——, who had been a political extremist on the Northern side of the question, had also modified his views on several points. He was not so fully assured of the infallibility of the negro as formerly. He was astonished as well as disgusted at the dirt and ignorance he saw around him. The prisoners he examined were objects of mingled contempt and commiseration. Then the seedy beggars that thronged head-quarters, the snuff-eating, slip-shod women, the rough heads of men all filled with aristocratic pretension. Could this be the people who had maintained such position in the country, and had for so many years predominated over the wealthy, educated, refined, and free people of the Northern States? He was both astonished and ashamed to believe it.

Captain B—— rather liked a little social pretension, it had always seemed a harmless vanity, calculated to make people liberal in their hospitality, and serving to soften the harshness of Democratic manners. For his part he always took off his hat to people's parlor idols, and even condescended to burn a little tobacco under the nose of any gentleman's pocket fetich when politely requested; but when these family weaknesses were elevated to the importance of matters of state—when a man's ridiculous presumption or his wife's silliness were continually thrown into one's face as an apology for treason—politeness ceased to be a virtue. When Gessler hangs his insolent cap in the market-place, he would side with Tell—when Nebuchadnezzar sets up his foolish image on the plain and demands obeisance, he would follow Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego if needs be, even into the bowels of the fiery furnace.



These are the opinions which I continually hear expressed by intelligent and liberal-minded men, and which present appearances would seem to justify. Yet those who were acquainted with and can recall Virginia society in happier days, can scarcely imagine how great the change which the war has made in the appearance and character of the people. Her leaders already perceive they have made a fatal mistake; her people now understand how miserably they have been duped; yet both feel themselves committed beyond the possibility of retrieval. Their pride of opinion prohibits the abandonment of a position in which their ruin is assured, whether the bad cause in which they are involved wins or loses. A people squirming under the consciousness of blunders and necessities so fatal, overtaxed and wasted in maintaining a struggle so gigantic and unequal, is not in a condition to be criticised socially, morally, or materially. There is no subject more generally incomprehensible to a superficial observer

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

or more vexatiously elusive of philosophical analysis, than the social distinctions which are found in all organized societies often in direct opposition to circumstances, logic, and positive legislation. So strong, indeed, is this vanity in the human heart that it bends both reason and religion to its sway; so deep that it undermines philosophy; so subtle that the finest woven net of law can not hold it; so protean in the shapes it assumes, that wit and satire find therein the theme of infinite jest; so tenacious of life, that ages of meanness and misery can not eradicate it; so exacting that fortune, friendship, and life itself are readily yielded to its demands; so despicable that honor, decency, and sacred love of country are lightly bartered for its empty pretensions. Scatter a handful of British dirt in any part of the earth, however remote from the parent isle, however unpropitious the climate or barren the soil, and a plenteous crop of volunteer aristocracy will presently sprout, sufficiently resembling the great original plant to excite a deal of envy and admiration in its locality, and even obtain a certain recognition from Old England herself, who pronounces it "quite astonishing for a new country." Thus, in spite of the equalizing poverty and misery of our early settlements—in spite of our boasted Democratic institutions and the hostile legislation of five generations—the patrician rudiment, hardy and irrepressible as wild garlic, still germinates and spreads its aroma throughout the United States. In the Northern States we have a social aristocracy far more elegant in its habits of life, more cultivated in its tastes and refined in manners, more elevated in its humanities, more jealous in its exclusiveness, than any class to be found at the South. But this patrician society at the North maintains its life within a limited and subordinate sphere. It is fashionable, luxurious, æsthetic, philosophic, scholastic, but not political. In the conduct of the Government and the great enterprises of the country it has neither control nor influence. It is completely overshadowed by the power, wealth, and ability of the great working-people of the country, the representatives of Republican Liberty and Equality, who control the Government of their own choosing, administer the laws of their own making, and tolerate every thing that is not strong enough to excite their jealousy. In the South the reverse is the case. Here the dominant class of slaveholding landed proprietors wields all the power of the State, political, social, financial, moral, and religious. Its interests frame the laws, its opinions govern society. There is no "people" in the South to thwart its policy or question its authority. The negro is its unreasoning chattel; the mean white man its dependent and retainer; the middling class of shop-keepers and merchants its subservient admirers and imitators; the expounders of the laws, human and divine, its partisans and participators. With the forms and phraseology of a Democracy this class has the tastes, habits, opinions, and authority of a feudal Aristocracy.

Those who expect to find among the Southern gentry that propriety of manner, that nicety of dress, that familiarity with polite observance, that acquaintance with the elegant arts and lighter social accomplishments, the Oriental luxury of equipage and living, the palatial residences that pertain to Northern society, will be greatly disappointed. Where these things are found at the South they are exotic and exceptional, not characteristic. The true Southerner is rural and squirely in his tastes and manners. He takes delight in horses, dogs, guns, and all exciting sports, including games of chance, narcotic stimulants, and politics. He scorns the arts of the petit-maître and the ostentation of the parvenu, and affects a republican simplicity in his style of living. He is social, hospitable, and brave; opinionated, overbearing, and easily provoked to violence. In his deportment he exhibits a certain dignified confidence, derived from the consciousness of power. Like the centurion of Capernaum, he has been accustomed to say to his servant, "Do this, and he doeth it;" and to his neighbor, "Think this, and he thinketh it," with a servility as ready and unquestioning.

While, on the one hand, the championship of free thought, free speech, and free government has been generally accorded to Massachusetts, public opinion, with singular unanimity, has allowed to Virginia the prestige once enjoyed by the aristocratic tribe of Koreishites in Arabia, which claimed the exclusive privilege of furnishing all the warriors, statesmen, gentlemen, and office-holders of that country. The eldest born among her sisters, and more intimate in her relations with the mother country, it may be presumed that, during the century and a half of her colonial tutelage, Virginia imbibed more

THE ARISTOCRACY.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of her parent's aristocratic milk than any other State. The memory of her early supremacy has never left her. The long catalogue of illustrious names which she has furnished to our national history has served to increase this local pride. As early as 1788 M. Brissot de Warville makes the following observation: "The towns in Virginia are but small. This may be said even of Richmond with its capitol. This capitol turns the heads of the Virginians; they imagine that from this, like the Romans of old, they shall one day give the law to the whole North." The continued predominance on the national arena of her trained and confidant politicians over the frequently unskillful and timid representatives of the Northern people has added confirmation to these flattering pretensions. In consequence, all the ambition and ability of the State has concentrated upon this one idea. Let Massachusetts potter with her button factories, her cod-fisheries, her weak literature, and ideologistic conceits. Political and social empire belongs to Virginia. The land, the gown, and the sword were alone considered worthy of her chosen sons. Manual labor, the mechanic arts, trade, and commerce were despised; the fine arts, literature, and science neglected. The real political code of the Virginian was not that of Jefferson, which was always on his lips, but that of the "Son of Sirach," which was engraven on his heart:

"The wisdom of the learned man cometh by opportunity of leisure, and he that hath little business shall become wise. How can he get wisdom that holdeth the plow, and that glorieth in the goad, that driveth oxen, and is occupied in their labors, and whose talk is of bullocks? So every carpenter and work-master that laboreth night and day: and they that cut and grave seals, and are diligent to make great variety, and give themselves to counterfeit imagery, and watch to finish a work. The smith also sitting by the anvil and considering the iron work; the noise of the hammer and anvil is ever in his ears, and his eyes still look upon the pattern of the thing that he maketh. So doth the potter, sitting at his work and turning the wheel about with his feet. All these trust to their hands, and every one is wise in his work; without these can not a city be inhabited, and they shall not dwell where they will, nor go up and down. They shall not be sought for in public council, nor sit high in the congregation; they shall not sit on the judge's seat, nor understand the sentence of judgment; they can not declare justice or judgment, and they shall not be found where parables are spoken."

And the Virginian adds: "Neither can they know how to interpret the Constitution of the United States nor to direct its policy."

Meanwhile, the world continued to move while Virginia continued to stand still; contented with her acknowledged supremacy, she desired nothing more than the quiet enjoyment of her honors.

There were not wanting those among her own people who perceived that where all are consumers and none producers the cask must in time run dry; that so stately and costly an edifice, based upon nothing more substantial than the slovenly labor and natural increase of barbarian serfs, could not be permanent; that a political and social system springing from this wretched muck must be unsound and corrupt. A state thus constituted must perish of encephalic hypertrophy, its body dwindling as its head swelled. But there was always a conclusive answer to these croakers; and it must be acknowledged that Virginia could boast of astonishing success in her specialties. Her soldiers and statesmen were always pre-eminent, her gentlemen admired, her placemen numerous and tenacious as barnacles; niggers were trumps, and she held a full hand.

To return to the social view of the question. The abolition of the law of entail, and the consequent division and subdivision of estates, was in time fatal to that most deeply-rooted and easily-pardoned of human vanities, the pride of ancestry. The results were here as elsewhere. As the wheel of fortune turned old families went down and new ones rose; estates changed hands. The hard-fisted overseer of one generation was the father of the following generation of patricians. The cobbler's son, educated to a liberal profession, might be the judge or statesman of his day. Yankee peddlers sneaked in, and purchased property and slaves. Strangers intermarried with the daughters of the land, and inherited estates. The patrician sentiment suffered in nowise from these changes. The new people were quickly imbued with the dominant opinion of the State—"Virginianized," as it was called—and novelty seemed even to impart fresh vigor to the stock; for just in proportion to the recency of their elevation and the humility of their origin do they boast of their aristocracy and their ancestry.

Another still more grievous cause of confusion in the social hierarchy arose from the eternal haranguing of the Virginia orators in praise of Democracy, and the improved facilities for communication with the outer world, which began to develop among the quondam lower classes some dim conceptions of popular rights. These did not manifest themselves, as elsewhere, in the base desire to pull down the gentleman to a lower level; their admiration for the class was greater than their envy. Consequently rag, tag, and bobtail began to assert the doctrine of equality, as they understood it, by proclaiming themselves gentlemen, swaggering broad, drinking vile whisky, and talking viler politics; seeking at village groceries and excited gatherings of all kinds that infallible wisdom which "cometh by opportunity of leisure," and putting on becoming airs in the presence of Yankees, North Carolinians, and others of the inferior tribes. Thus Virginia society, even before the war, had assumed the complexion of a muddled Aristo-Democracy, or a Dem-Aristocracy. As I never heard the Norman idea broached among her gentlemen of the Old School, I presume these later recruits of the patrician order, whose incongruities so bewilder our worthy officers, and excite the imaginations of our discriminating reporters, are the true descendants of the aforesaid Anglo-Norman chivalry. As ignorance, drunkenness, lewdness, brutality, and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

highway robbery were among the prominent characteristics of these famous barons, the claim to descent may be admitted as plausible.

May 22, Thursday.—Bright and warm. The newspapers bring intelligence which, if reliable, indicates that the Campaign of Richmond must soon reach a crisis. The impression here is that the city will be evacuated by the enemy. I have been so much enfeebled by sickness that for several weeks I seem to have lost all interest in the military situation, especially in this Valley, where I would naturally feel most concern. I am again mentally canvassing a transfer to the Grand Army, but my determination ebbs and flows with the changes of my physical condition. There seems indeed "no hope for gilded spurs" on this field—but how much less for me in the flaccid and enervating climate of the James River? Why, therefore, do I fret and strive against the irresistible decrees of Nature? To the iron sinews and bold, confident spirit of health belong the glories and rewards of war. Yet it irks me thus to rust away my life in a helplessness worse than captivity, while the loyal armies of my country are closing in to the death-struggle, and fair Virginia yet lies trampled under the foot of domineering treason.

Yesterday Hatch's cavalry had a skirmish, driving the rebel pickets out of Woodstock, killing several, and capturing half a dozen at the Narrow Passage bridge. He sent them in to head-quarters, and I was commissioned to examine them. They were all simple country youths, who had entered the rebel service through ignorance or coercion. One of them, a boy about eighteen years of age, badly bruised by the falling of his horse, commenced crying bitterly when I called him into a separate room for examination. He had been persuaded to believe that the Yankees would shoot him if they caught him, and, under this terror, he would not have been taken alive if his horse had not fallen in the chase and caught his leg under him. Another, with trembling earnestness, asked "if we were going to kill them?" I assured him of his life, and good treatment besides, at which he was overjoyed, and desired to take the oath of allegiance to the United States Government immediately. The intelligence obtained from these men was important. The whole power of the enemy had combined, and were at Harrisonburg, with their advance of cavalry and a battery at New Market. For the rest, there was a good deal of vagueness in the details they furnished, and they were not men of a class to know or surmise any comprehensive plans that might be afoot. They had told what they knew voluntarily and with evident truthfulness.

While at the Provost Marshal's office a meagre, sickly person was brought in. He had been sojourning with some relatives in Virginia, where he had been ill of typhoid fever, and was now seeking a pass to go to Philadelphia, where he belonged. Since our retreat from Woodstock, he says, the worthy citizens of that village spend their time about the taverns and street corners, boasting of their defiant demeanor and impertinent speeches to the National officers during their occupancy of the place. I am sure I never saw a more tame and cringing set of knaves than they were.

May 23, Friday.—Clear and warm. The village and the camps are teeming with camp-followers of all characters and vocations. The hucksters, clothiers, sutlers, peddlers, and fancy store-keepers, chiefly engaged in selling contraband stimulants. Strolling-players, lecturers, barbers, traders in horse-flesh, professional abductors [not of the cavalry] of that respectable animal, refugees, spies, and negroes of all ages, from the gray-haired sire and dame to the child that can barely run, homeless, wandering, and pitiable. The streets of the village remind one of Bunyan's description of Vanity Fair. While I was undergoing the manipulation of a smart colored barber from Pittsburg I saw one of these sad wanderers from his native corn-fields enter the shop. The poor creature looked so dazed that I began to question him as to his business and birth-place. He was from Rockingham County, had a good master, and would have been content to have lived in servitude for the rest of his life; but the disorganizing influences of the war had reached even his humble dwelling, and the dread of being impressed into the service at Richmond, or sold into the cotton States, had induced him to run away when our army fell back. He had nothing to do and no place to stay, and was hoping to get back to his family in Rockingham somehow. The smart barber told him he had better go home at once. There were more niggers now at the North than were pleasant or profitable. Seeing the stage-coach about starting for Winchester and Harper's Ferry, I gave the driver a note for my wife (to be left at Charlestown), requesting her to join me at Strasburg, and to bring some good wine, of which I was much in need.

I afterward met Colonel Brodhead, and stopped to tea with him. While at table his orderly told us that the rebels had taken Front Royal, burned the bridges, and destroyed the railroad. I hurried up to head-quarters, where I had from the clerks and orderlies confused reports of an attack both at Front Royal and Buckton. The General and aids had gone out. Colonel Clarke and Major Copeland, the Adjutant-General, were absent on leave at the North and Washington. After a while a negro came in, who stated that he had left the scene of action about five o'clock; that Kenley was falling back, fighting desperately, having himself destroyed the bridges. Presently General Banks returned, with General Crawford and others. A dispatch was handed to him, which he read, and then retired into a private room with Crawford to consult. When they reappeared it was to send orders to all the commanders and chiefs of departments to load up the trains and prepare for a move. This caused a general stir.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Half an hour after an orderly handed the General another dispatch, which, being obscurely written in pencil, he asked me to decipher. It read substantially as follows:

"SECOND BRIDGE EAST OF STRASBURG,
"May 23, 7 o'clock p.m.

"GENERAL BANKS,—I was attacked this afternoon about four o'clock by three or four hundred cavalry and some infantry, who dashed upon me and attempted to burn the bridge. I have defended it successfully, with a loss of several killed and quite a number wounded. The enemy are close by, and will probably renew the attack in the morning. I would like to be reinforced. HUBBARD,
"Captain Commanding Post.

"Can you send me a surgeon immediately?"

The General observed, "There is a sensible, manly report." Orders were given to send a surgeon to the post forthwith. He then showed me the first report received. It was by telegraph from Winchester, given on the authority of a captain of the First Maryland Cavalry, who had escaped from Front Royal. He says that the whole force at that post is destroyed or taken. Colonel Kenley is dead, and all his field and staff officers captured. Jackson, at the head of twenty thousand men, was marching on Winchester. He had seen as many as ten thousand already across the Shenandoah when he left the field. This was astounding. Hatch had reported every thing quiet in our immediate front as far as Woodstock. I did not think Jackson would move his whole force so far up as Winchester, with M'Dowell on one flank and Fremont on the other, in position to cut him off. I concluded, therefore, that the attack on Front Royal was only a raid to destroy the railroad and capture the garrison and stores at the post. The affair at Passage Creek was a co-operative attempt to isolate Front Royal from Strasburg, to prevent reinforcement, and render the prize more secure. This must be the whole design of the movement, and there it would end. Else why at this hour, half past ten at night, are our unguarded telegraph lines intact? Why have we not already heard of the enemy's cavalry in our rear? Why has no mounted messenger or fugitive officer from a field only twelve miles distant brought us clear and reliable tidings of the fight? Why do we get the first and only information from Winchester, twenty-two miles distant from Front Royal, and eighteen from Strasburg? I expressed the decided opinion that this statement was a monstrous exaggeration, made by some one who left the field prematurely, and who had told this story as an apology for his haste. The officer in command at Winchester was ordered by telegraph to examine the person who brought this report more carefully. He replied that the statement was persistently repeated and maintained. I still insisted that it could not be true. The General, on the contrary, accepted it fully, and sent orders hastening the preparations for a move.

I here proposed that a reconnoissance should be pushed across toward Front Royal by the roads on the northern bank of the river. Captain Collis, of the body-guard, volunteered to take half a dozen dragoons and make the desired reconnoissance. His offer was accepted, and he started immediately. I favored a reconnoissance in force, but on account of the intense darkness it was thought unadvisable to put a large body in motion. They could neither find their own way nor observe an enemy. Meanwhile another telegram arrived from Winchester, giving the statement of another refugee. A Major of the Fifth New York Volunteer Cavalry says that his command had been all killed, taken, or dispersed, while he had remained some time concealed near the scene of action. He had seen the rebel force which crossed the river, estimated at five or six thousand, again fall back on Front Royal. He had also overheard some mounted men saying they intended only to scour the country for a few miles around, and then fall back to the town. As this story accorded with my theory I preferred to believe it. The General then went to bed, leaving me in charge of the head-quarters' office, desiring me to communicate the news received to the War Department at Washington, and to awaken him in case any important tidings arrived.

May 24, Saturday.—Clouds and rain. Soon after daylight this morning Captain Collis returned, reporting that he had seen the enemy in large force, with his baggage trains, moving toward Winchester on the Front Royal Road. As the country was hilly and generally covered with wood I thought he might easily have been deceived, and probably mistook a forage train with its guard for a large force. An orderly also came in, who stated that he had lost his way during the night, and had ridden for some distance with a rebel Staff officer, who boasted to him that Jackson and Ewell would certainly catch Banks, and be in Winchester the next day. As I had made up my mind not to believe any thing I also laughed at this fellow's story.

As soon as daylight was established a brigade of infantry, with artillery and cavalry, was ordered to move from Middletown by way of Cedarville to the fords opposite Front Royal. This force, after advancing about two miles, reported a large force of the enemy in their front. By ten o'clock A.M. all our trains were moving toward Winchester, their lines lengthened and impeded by the wagons of the numerous traders and refugees who had accumulated around Strasburg. At the same time volumes of flames and black smoke arising from the village announced the destruction of our extra army stores.

About half past ten the General and Staff took the road. Near Cedar Creek Bridge we saw our company of strolling players packing their trumpery in great haste and trepidation. Just as we were crossing the bridge we met one of our teamsters riding at full speed, hair flying, and eyes staring with terror. The General halted him, and was told that the head of the train had been seized by the enemy, who

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

was formed in line of battle across our road about a mile ahead. At the same time several field-officers rode by, confirming the tidings. This was a shock, as I had to this moment been obstinately incredulous in regard to the enemy's being in force between us and Winchester. The present stampede seemed to establish the fact beyond a doubt. Indeed, I saw on the high ground near Middletown a body of men said to be the enemy's forces. The Staff had been scattered on various duties, and I rode forward with the General alone. We met sutlers' wagons, mounted teamsters, and bummers rushing frantically back toward Strasburg, while the regular army train stood still in the road, many of the teams deserted by their drivers. Rapidly summing up our position, I had manned myself for the crisis. I expected momentarily to hear the guns, and hoped that my fate would be what the French soldier calls "La belle morte," sudden and outright by ball or shell. There might be, perhaps, a chance of escape to the mountains westward. Surrender on any terms did not enter into my personal plans. Above all, I felt bitterly mortified at the total failure of my judgment, and filled with self-reproach at the thought that my obstinate and openly-expressed disbelief in the danger might have had some influence in delaying a movement upon which the safety of the army depended. The General's countenance I perceived was grave, but resolute. As I rode beside him he observed, "It seems we were mistaken in our calculations." Feeling this as a reproach for my persistent incredulity I only answered, "It seems so indeed." There was nothing more to be said, and we rode on toward Middletown in silence. The troops which appeared at that point were our own infantry, and there we found the wagon-master raging like a lion among his cowardly subordinates, driving them back to their wagons with his heavy whip and oaths of the first magnitude.

We learned here that the stampede had been caused by a dash made upon our ambulance train by about thirty rebel cavalry. In addition to our own sick we had in charge about a thousand invalids of Shields's Division, which stretched our train of ambulances to an inordinate length and scattered the guard in charge of it. This squad of cavalry had rushed in suddenly from a side road, killed one of the sick, and captured some others who were following afoot. They were easily driven off; and Colonel Knipe of the Forty-sixth Pennsylvania, with his regimental staff and orderlies, charged them, capturing one of their number.

An examination of this prisoner developed the fact that the cavalry on our flank belonged to Ewell's Division, although, as far as he knew, not more than three or four companies were hovering near our column, and the main body of the enemy still lay at Front Royal. Meanwhile our communications with Winchester remained uninterrupted, and every thing was reported quiet in the direction of Woodstock.

This was puzzling, and I began to recur to my former opinion. It seemed impossible that Jackson, with the force attributed to him, having opened the campaign with so vigorous and successful a blow, should permit our weak column, encumbered with so much coveted and needful spoil, to walk away intact and at its leisure. So we moved on, leaving Captain Abert, of the Topographical Engineers, and Captain Collis, with his Zouaves, to burn the Cedar Creek bridge after the rear-guard had passed.

At Newtown there was another demonstration made upon our line of march by a body of cavalry coming in from the right. We opened upon them with a section of artillery and easily drove them out of sight into the woods. At the same time there was a good deal of firing heard in the direction of Middletown. A short time after this had ceased information was received that our column had been attacked at Middletown by the enemy's cavalry with artillery, and that a portion of the baggage-train (about fifty wagons) and the rear-guard had been cut off.

Several mounted messengers had meanwhile been dispatched to Winchester with orders for the troops there to march out and support our advance. As none of these had returned it was surmised they might have been captured on the way by the enemy's scouting parties. Colonel Brodhead was therefore ordered to push forward with his regiment, to scour the road, and communicate with the town at all hazards. This was about four o'clock in the afternoon. The day, which opened cloudy, had become clear and pleasant. We were within eight miles of Winchester, and had thus far seen no enemy except a light force of cavalry, which only menaced but dared not attack. I was utterly spent with fatigue and lack of sleep, so I pushed forward to Winchester alone, and on arriving met Colonel Brodhead. The Tenth Maine Infantry and two or three companies of the Provost guard, the only troops in the town, were under arms and prepared to support us in case of need. The Colonel said the Winchester folks had been cooking dinners and baking cakes all day to feast Jackson and his army, whom they confidently expected. We laughed heartily at their fatuity. I did not think the main force of the enemy had advanced beyond Front Royal. Their cavalry was annoying our flank and rear, hoping to ease us of some of our superfluous baggage, and to clean out a few of our sutlers and perambulating whisky-merchants, which I thought would be advantageous to both parties. For the rest, I had been on duty all the previous night. I must have sleep and repose at all hazards. So I took a bed at the Taylor House, requesting the Colonel to send an orderly for me in case any thing should occur.

May 25, Sunday.—Bright and pleasant. I

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

awoke this morning with the consciousness of having enjoyed the most profound and refreshing sleep. As the house and streets seemed perfectly quiet I stretched and dozed again, and at length concluded to get up, take breakfast, and report at head-quarters to see whether the enemy still continued to annoy us. It was seven by the hotel clock when I went out; I had slept thirteen solid hours. I noticed some confusion about the house, and that there seemed to be no servants. I demanded breakfast of the landlord, who said, apologetically, that his negroes had all left, but they were trying to get something in the kitchen for us. I then inquired if there was any thing going on. He said there had been some cannonading on the hill toward Holliday's Mill, but that had ceased and he had heard of no particulars. Presently some breakfast was served, and I sat down with two or three of our surgeons, one or two quarter-master's assistants, and some non-commissioned army followers. None of these seemed to have the slightest idea that any thing important was going on, so that I took my rolls and coffee in that leisurely manner, and with that placidity of mind so especially recommended by writers on dietetics. As I was buttering my second roll a soldier entered and said to one of the officers, in a quiet, pleasant way, "Captain, they've driven our men off the hill." I finished my roll, paid my bill, and, taking my sabre from the office where I had deposited it, went out to the stable to order my mare, intending to ride out toward Kernstown to join the Staff, which I supposed would be in that direction.

I was surprised to find the stable deserted, tenantless, except by my mare, who whinnied as I entered. To my great disgust I found her all harnessed as I had left her the evening before, and from this concluded she had neither been fed nor rubbed. At this moment the hostler entered, and I commenced abusing him for neglecting my animal. He protested that he had fed her, and called my attention to her clean, sleek condition to prove she had not been otherwise neglected. Who, then, had saddled her and tied her to the stall ready for mounting?

"It was your servant, I think, Sir, a black boy named John."

"And where is John?"

"Don't know, Sir. Think he is run off with all the rest of the niggers—gone toward Martinsburg."

I was entirely bewildered, and led my steed to the stable-door preparatory to mounting. Across the way I saw a negro man with two or three women in the greatest trepidation, hustling some trunks and bundles into a light wagon. At this moment an officer, with whom I was acquainted, dashed by at speed, shouting, as he passed, "Mount, Captain, mount and ride for your life, you have not a moment to spare; they are in the town!" The rattle of musketry in close proximity clenched this recommendation. I mounted and trotted along the street behind the Taylor Hotel and down the cross street that leads to Main by the Farmer's Bank. A few infantry stragglers were hurrying along the sidewalks, at whom and myself a dozen or more shots were fired from windows and from behind fences.

On entering the main street I saw our troops moving at a quick step, and in some confusion, toward the Martinsburg road. The sidewalks were filled with stragglers, but the regiments kept their organization very fairly. Seeing Colonel Ruger's Third Minnesota Regiment coming up by Taylor's, I halted until it passed and then joined the Colonel. There was a sharp crackling of pistol-shots on every side from the houses and inclosures. Within six or eight paces of the Colonel and myself I observed a group of soldiers gathered to drink from the canteen of one who had just filled. As one of these men stooped to drink I heard a shot which appeared to come from the gate behind him, and only a few feet distant. The soldier clapped his hand to his side and fell into the gutter, where he lay struggling in the agonies of death. A short distance back I saw another man fall on the sidewalk, wounded, into the arms of a comrade—those around pointing up at the windows opposite, indicating that the shot had come from that quarter. An assistant surgeon showed me a bleeding wound in his horse's buttock from a pistol-shot fired from a house on one of the side streets. This murderous fusillade was evidently kept up by occupants of the town unconnected with the rebel army, the vanguard of which could be seen at the other end of the street, at least three-quarters of a mile distant. As we tarried to see the troops well up, I saw Colonel Gordon of the Second Massachusetts, and asked him why it was we were in retreat. He told me Jackson was on our heels, with between twenty and thirty thousand men—that our rear-guard at Middletown had been cut off, and was in all probability captured. He had been closely pressed from Newtown to Winchester, and on several occasions had been obliged to throw his brigade into squares to resist the persistent attacks of cavalry.

This morning about daylight our army, not over five thousand strong of all arms, had formed in order of battle, and with artillery and skirmishers held the enemy for about four hours. Jackson manœuvred and felt his way with great circumspection, remembering, no doubt, how severely he had burned his fingers in this neighborhood two months ago. One or two feeble attacks were easily repulsed, and with some loss to the enemy. At length, having apparently satisfied himself of our weakness, he displayed a line of battle, overlapping ours for half a mile on either flank and advanced slowly. Gordon says he counted twenty-seven battle-flags, representing as many regiments. At this exhibition of force several of our regiments faced about and left the field without orders. A general order to retreat speedily followed, and here we are.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

As we mounted the little ridge, the northern terminus of the main street, the scene was animated and exciting in the highest degree. For a mile ahead the open country toward Martinsburg was covered with our fugitive stragglers; horse and foot soldiers, refugees and camp followers, all "gitting" in the most approved style. Pouring out of every avenue from the town, marched our organized infantry in four short columns, with artillery in the intervals, and a column of cavalry covering either flank. Looking back upon the town, great clouds of flame and smoke were seen arising from the burning warehouses, which contained the military stores we could not move for want of transportation. Hurrying up the long street trooped a few of our stragglers and wounded, hoping to escape the advancing tide of the enemy's forces, which might be seen pouring in at the southern extremity of the town like a muddy torrent with the sunlight glittering on its turbid waves. As this panorama was essentially a moving one I did not dwell upon its grandeur, but, after one comprehensive glance, started down the Martinsburg road.

In an incredibly short time thereafter, as it appeared to me, I heard the crackle of musketry and the singing of bullets about my ears, and, looking back, saw the crest we had just left crowned by the enemy's infantry, who were hurrying up our rear-guard by a sharp fire. Presently a battery opened from the same point, and then for the first time I began to feel alarmed. At every shell that screamed and burst over their heads I could see our columns shake with a convulsive start, as of a single body. Their pace quickened, the number of stragglers increased, while knapsacks, overcoats, blankets, and even arms, were seen strown along the route. For several minutes it looked like the commencement of another Bull's Run panic. But the rising tremor was checked by a few sharp and animated words from the officers, and the troops again resumed their steady march. In the current of bummers that rushed by me at this time I remarked a fellow mounted on a horse hastily cut from some vehicle, with the harness still hanging upon him. A cannon-shot had plowed a furrow along the animal's rump so deep that a stout man might have covered his arm in the wound. He was making good speed notwithstanding; and, to my surprise, I saw the same horse in Martinsburg in the afternoon, doing as well as the rest, his wound nicely dressed with a coating of dust. Several miles out I overtook General Crawford, who, with drawn sword, was endeavoring to arrest the tide of stragglers. I joined him with a will, and a few moments after General Banks and Staff rode up. The General congratulated me on my safety, having given me up for lost. With the assistance of the Staff and escort he succeeded in rallying a troop of loose cavalry and several hundred infantry of various organizations, many of whom had thrown away their arms. A battery was also put in position, which fired a few shots, sensibly checking the enemy's pursuit. At the same time the sound of the guns came near putting our newly-rallied battalion to flight again.

In the vicinity of Stephenson's Dépôt we saw a body of cavalry approaching at full gallop from the direction of Charlestown. It was doubted for a moment lest the enemy was making an attempt upon our flank, but the loud cheers which hailed their arrival proved they were friends. Although these two companies made but a small addition to our numerical strength, their timely presence served to encourage the troops; and the long-continued and hearty cheering which followed their arrival had the effect, no doubt, of rendering the enemy's pursuit more cautious. Indeed, from this point all serious pursuit seemed to have ceased. Some cavalry, with a battery, hovered on our rear from Bunker's Hill to Martinsburg, firing a few shots occasionally at long taw, which served to drive up the stragglers, but scarcely hastened the march of the column. As we progressed this column was increased and encumbered by refugees from the surrounding country, who streamed in from every hamlet and cross-road, on foot, on horseback, and in every sort of vehicle known to the land. Among these were many respectable white citizens with their families, and such baggage as they could hastily collect. But the negroes were especially affluent. They had been told that, in revenge for their friendliness to the Yankee invaders, Jackson would kill them all when he came again. Whether they really believed this story in their cooler moments I doubt, but they had worked themselves into a general and irresistible panic. From the gray-haired sire to the apish pickaninny at the breast they thronged our line of March, blocking the road with their carts and loads of plunder. Whether on foot, on horseback, or on wheels, each negro had a "grab" of personal baggage, variously bestowed in a meal-bag, a pillow-case, or an old pair of breeches tied at the legs. Bundles they had from the capacity of a red cotton handkerchief to the voluminous circumference of a bed-cover. I remarked a girl carrying a fat baby in her arms, with another toddling after holding to her skirt, a plain sun-bonnet on her head, and a straw-hat ornate with flowers and ribbons firmly griped in her teeth. At every boom of the cannon this ebony column would leap as if struck by lightning. Down would go bundles, pillow-cases, bonnets, and babies, the proprietors starting at a full run, which continued until they were exhausted. Infants were not unfrequently abandoned by the way-side, where they lay squalling, until some soft-hearted soldier would gather up the little foundling and deposit it at the next house he passed. An uncommonly obese negress and a stout mulatto girl (her daughter, perhaps) were struggling and puffing along loaded with children in all the stages of infantile helplessness. There was some cannonading going on just as we passed

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'JORDAN IS A HARD ROAD TO TRAVEL."

them, and they seemed about to drop from exhaustion, and at the same time half frantic with terror; tears were rolling down their fat, dust-covered cheeks, leaving little channels of mud in their course. The whites of their eyes and their chattering teeth seemed actually to have grown whiter from fright.

"O Lord, masters, save us! Please don't leave us behind! They gwine to kill us—they gwine to kill us!" The very simplicity of the prayer was touching. The General ordered an artillery officer to give them seats on a caisson.

For the rest, while the troops regarded them with no especial favor, they gave them no wanton abuse that I observed. But the exigencies of a moving army are remorseless. At every rough point in the road we found the vehicles of these poor fugitives thrust aside, broken, and overturned, their goods scattered, and the family weeping in despair, or abandoning all and joining the trailing column of pedestrians. At Bunker's Hill I saw a cart laden with a negro family thrust off the causeway at the mill-dam to make way for a battery. They had got into water so deep that it ran into the body of the cart, and the man was wading up to his breast trying to lead his frightened horse to land. The dame sat upon the apex of their plunder, with an innumerable family of younglings hanging to her, reminding one of a female opossum with her litter hanging to her tail. I left without witnessing the dénouement of this scene, and must confess that among graver duties and anxieties I spent a thought or two as to the fate of the poor frightened creatures. That the humane reader may be relieved I will anticipate. As I was nearing Williamsport that night I passed a cart-load of negroes who were singing, merrily, "Jordan is a hard road to travel." Drawing near I recognized my quondam acquaintances of the mill-dam, and learned, to my satisfaction, that, "as near as they could count," none had been drowned or lost by the way.

At Martinsburg we found our baggage and supply train arrived and parked for rest and refreshment. Every thing else was in a hubbub;

"While thronged the citizens with terror dumb,
Or whispering with white lips, The foe! they come!
they come!"

There was a small Provost guard here, but neither soldiers nor citizens could give us any reliable information about any thing. The telegraph and railroad, as far as known, were both intact, but the operator had run off, carrying

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

his machinery, and all the rolling stock of the road had been withdrawn toward Harper's Ferry. It was but half past one in the afternoon when we arrived, and the General had expressed his intention of halting here until further developments. Captain Scheffler and myself were sent forward to select a position, and agreed upon the high ground to the north of the town.

Meanwhile the enemy's artillery was again heard in the opposite direction; but it created no uneasiness, as we had by this time ascertained we were followed only by a portion of his cavalry, which we did not consider dangerous. We were, however, mortified and alarmed at the non-appearance of a brigade of infantry commanded by Colonel Donnelly. This officer, it seems, without orders or the knowledge of the commander, had, at Bunker's Hill, left the turnpike upon which the army was moving, and led his brigade by a somewhat obscure parallel road, running several miles to the right.

As this route was but little, if any, longer than the main highway, Donnelly should have arrived in town as soon as we, whose march was impeded by carts and wagons of the flying population. We had been in town an hour, and still heard nothing from him. The Michigan Cavalry Regiment had been sent out on the back road to meet him, but after proceeding several miles met the enemy's cavalry advancing. The regiment returned about four o'clock, not having been able to obtain any information of the missing brigade.

Thus weakened, and without any reliable information in regard to the condition of things at Harper's Ferry, the General concluded to send his trains to Williamsport, and establish a position behind the Potomac, where he might the more securely rest, refit, and collect his stragglers. While our remaining infantry were pretty well knocked up and thinned out by the fatigue and straggling incident to a long retrograde march, we still had several regiments able to show a fighting front, our sixteen guns were all safe, and the cavalry full as strong and in as good condition as that of the enemy. All the men and material which might be classed among the impedimenta being now en route for Williamsport, we took position north of the town, determined to wait for Donnelly to the last moment. During our sojourn of five hours the loyal ladies of Martinsburg were incessant in their hospitable attentions, distributing coffee, tea, and more substantial refreshments to all who needed them. Of the male citizens a number had already taken service in our army, and many others joined our train of refugees.

Passing out toward the Williamsport road the General halted in front of a large stone warehouse used as a commissary dépôt and filled with valuable stores.

He was about to have the building and its contents destroyed, as usual, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. But it being represented to him that the house belonged to a loyal citizen he determined to spare it, and throwing open the doors, told the inhabitants to help themselves—an order which was obeyed without much hesitation or reluctance. As we moved slowly along the turnpike a messenger overtook us with the gratifying information that Colonel Donnelly, with his command intact, was at Opequan Bridge, two miles and a half to our right. He had lost his way, and wandered several miles out of the direct route.

I happened to be acquainted with a by-road which led to his position, and a squadron of cavalry was immediately dispatched to open communication and bring him back to the highway.

Leaving the General and Staff awaiting the arrival of the strayed brigade, I rode forward with orders to Colonel Gordon to halt and take position at Falling Waters until the other troops came up. I overtook him near Hainesville, the scene of Jackson's skirmish with Patterson's advance last summer. Gordon, who had been with Patterson in that campaign, recognized the ground, although now seen by starlight. He said any attempt to execute the order received would be futile. His brigade, which had kept its organization fairly during the day as long as there was any danger to be apprehended from an enemy, had, since it left Martinsburg, and with the approach of darkness, dissolved into a current of straggling individualities, moving in the same direction, and actuated by the common idea of reaching the terminus of their thirty-six miles' march.

I had begun to suffer seriously from exhaustion, when I proposed to Doctor King (the medical director), with whom I was riding, that we should halt at a way-side cottage and discuss the contents of my saddle-pockets, which had been filled by my kind friends in Martinsburg. A bottle of wine and some sandwiches were developed and disposed of, and we took the road again, refreshed and invigorated. Passing rapidly over the remaining distance we at length emerged from the wood overlooking the Potomac River at Williamsport. Here was a scene of animated and picturesque confusion. On the open slopes and along the margin of the river blazed a hundred camp-fires, illuminating a chaos of vehicles, animals, and human beings all jumbled in apparently inextricable entanglement. Here soldiers of all arms and organizations mixed with civilians, refugees, and negroes, of all ages and varieties. The ponderous army trains and batteries blocked up the highway in double and treble lines, while the lighter carts, wagons, buggies, and coaches were scattered far and wide where they could find a level or sheltered position.

Threading our way carefully through this multitude, at each moment I heard my name called with a cheery salute, for I was here among my own people—Virginians all—the loyal and the true; for, if the eastern and southern portions of the State had tamely submitted to being kicked into rebellion by the overbearing myr-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LOWERING THE FLAG.

midons of the cotton oligarchy, Berkeley, my native county, had never bowed the knee to Baal. The stubborn and defiant spirit of her people had never quailed before either the political or military executors of treason. These, enraged at the persistent defiance of their cause, revenged themselves by a sobriquet representing in their vocabulary the concentrated essence of all opprobrium. They called Martinsburg "Little Massachusetts." Instead of feeling insulted, the citizens had sense enough to accept this compliment to their spirit, their patriotism, and their civilization. Martinsburg was at this time represented in the United States Navy by Commodore Charles Boarman, Commander N. B. Harrison, Surgeon F. M'Sherry, and Midshipman Harry Pendleton, and had also furnished quite a number of officers and men to the army. Better than all, the élite of her society and lovely women wore the Union colors.

The closing scene of our occupation of Martinsburg to-day must not be forgotten. Late in the afternoon, when the last of our cavalry had left the town, it was perceived that the National flag which belonged to the citizens still floated from the tall flag-staff in the public square. The army was gone, and the men had followed the army, so the flag was left alone to hold the town against the enemy, who were waiting outside, and dared not enter until assured it was evacuated. Presently a mournful procession of women and children appeared moving toward the square, with bowed heads, wringing of hands, and tears.

Loosing the halyards they lowered the emblem of their hopes and pride, folding it with a solemn tenderness as though it were a shroud enwrapping the body of a dead friend. A boy on horseback receives the sacred charge from trembling hands, while eager voices bid him speed to save the flag from insult. Even at the moment, the rising dust-clouds give notice of the foe's advance. The bold urchin hugs the bunting with a nervous clasp, and digs his bare heels into his horse's ribs. They follow him with their hearts and eyes until he clears the limits of the town and disappears in the direction of Williamsport. The messenger reached the retreating army in safety.

On nearing the river bank I found our Chief Quarter-master, Captain Holabird, and his assistants, laboring with intelligent energy to effect the transportation of this motley mass of men and material to the Maryland shore. The river is here about four hundred yards wide, and fordable in ordinary stages of water. To-night its current was swollen and rapid, quite beyond the usual fording point, although some of our dragoons who rode tall and strong horses had crossed over safely. Mr. Thayer Abert, of the Topographical Engineers, had with great skill and energy succeeded in stretching a cable from shore to shore, and rigged a flying ferry, which was now in full success, crossing the sick and wounded.

It worked admirably, but its capacities were necessarily so limited, in view of the vast accumulation on the Virginia shore, that we turned away hopeless.

At the entrance of the fording there were several baggage wagons swamped, the water pouring over the tops of their wheels, while the teamsters and guards were cutting the harness and endeavoring to extricate the struggling and braying mules. This was not encouraging. Neither, as I circulated among the wagons and camp-fires on the bank, were any comfortable ideas suggested by the prospect of a damp and chilly bivouac. Here were thousands of men, women, and children, white and black, wandering like dreary souls on the shores of Styx, seeking a resting-place and finding none. Fortunately there was no panic among this crowd, and folks, seeing the impossibility of crossing, generally resigned themselves to necessity, providing such food and lodging for their families as could be had, or making up their minds to forego both until the dawning of a happier day. However, the situation was not accepted by all with equal patience and equanimity. There were growlings and complainings and cursings loud and deep, murmurings and bewailings in shriller tones, but always from grown people. Here, as elsewhere, it seemed that true wisdom had been revealed unto babes rather than the "wise and prudent." These little bald-headed

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

sages, with one consent, had gone to sleep sucking their thumbs.

The experience of a life that has known many vicissitudes can suggest nothing better under the circumstances, and I would fain follow their example. Yet, alas! where is the tender and faithful mother upon whose breast we of the bronzed cheeks and grizzled beards may lay our heads, even for a little while, to forget our weariness and responsibilities?

These enfeebling and unsoldierly reflections were suddenly rebuked by a voice that recalled the war in all its grimness. A tall, broad-chested, hirsute, leather-lunged fellow rode up to a party huddled round a neighboring fire, and, with a preface of roaring blasphemies, thus addressed them: "Git up here, I say, ye d—d ignominious lazy hounds! Them mew-ils be a drounding, and you a settin' here a-suckin' of yer thumbs!"

This discourse clearly indicated the wide difference between the duties of an old soldier and the proprieties of a juvenile civilian. So, shaking myself and stretching my stiffening limbs, I again approached the river bank. Seeing Colonel Gordon, with a group of officers around him, I proposed we should try the hazard of the river, and being well acquainted with the ford, offered to lead the way.

The proposal was favorably received; but I did not see fit, like Cassius, "to plunge in accoutred as I was." Distrusting the deep and powerful current, and the light weight of my mare, I prepared for all emergencies by unbuckling my sabre and revolver and hanging them to my saddle-bow. My heavy cavalry boots were also vacated and tied on behind. I was now light enough to try a buffet with the river on my own hook in case my monture was swept away. Calling on my friends to follow, I started down the bank, and was presently churning in an eddy among tangled wagons, harness, and dead mules. Rearing forward, my mare cleared these impediments by plunging into water which swept over her back and brought her to a swim for a short distance. At length she gained a footing, but so rocky and deep that at every step she wavered and stumbled, once going under until the water reached my arm-pits. Floundering along in this way I at length got to the middle of the river, when I perceived a dragoon, on a tall, strong horse, following me. I waited until he came abreast, and made the rest of the distance riding under the lee of his stout animal, which broke the force of the current. It was with feelings of great satisfaction that I heard the clatter of my mare's hoofs in the shallow water on the Maryland side. There was a large beacon fire burning here to direct those who crossed by the ford. Looking back I perceived my friends had not followed, so I rode directly to the hotel. The first man I met was Colonel Clarke, of the Staff, just from Washington. He told me that orders had been sent to M'Dowell and Fremont which would throw at once forty thousand men on Jackson's rear. That was a soporific, and now "blessed be the man that invented sleep."

IF I WERE RICH.

If I were rich, like some folks I know,
Who think themselves wondrously grand,
First of all I would purchase a costly ring
For my darling's snow-white hand;
A circle of gold for her fair young head,
With jewels to twine in her hair,
And a necklace of pearls for this queen of girls
Round her swan-like throat to wear.

I would build her a bower in some sunny nook,
Where no trace of gloom should come;
There the birds would warble their sweetest lays,
And the honey-bee would hum;
The nightingale's song would lull her to sleep
In the night which is sacred to love,
And at dawn of day her soul would awake
With the voice of the wooing dove.

All round and over the fragrant porch
Should the honey-suckle bloom,
And about the casement the clambering rose
Would scatter its sweet perfume;
There she should dwell, this queen of girls,
With a jewel in each little ear,
And if wealth could save her across her face
Never shadow of grief should appear.

If I were rich I would buy great ships,
And send them over the sea,
And close by the shore I would watch and wait
Till my ships came home to me:
Breadths of satin and shining silks,
With plumes from the ostrich's wing,
And cloth of India, woven fine,
My home-bound ships would bring.

If I were rich, then these attic walls
Would blossom with tapestry gay;
And the lingering hours, that so weary seem,
Would speed on swift wings away.
But alas for me, how often I fear,
In these cold methodic times,
That little of profit and little of praise
Will come from my idle rhymes!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND SPIDERS.

INTRODUCTION.

THERE has just left me a deputation of spiders from an island near Charleston, South Carolina, who announced themselves as the representatives of an indefinite number of their eight-legged kindred, and as empowered by them to present to me, first, an indignant remonstrance, and, second, an earnest request. The former on account of certain histories of another kind of spider from Long Island, wherein a single paragraph only was devoted to the remonstrants, while the appearance, habits, and uses of the other species were described with care and minuteness; which favoritism, they averred, was unjust, inasmuch as they could prove my opinion once was, that the James Island spider was very interesting and would be very useful; but that, after having paid them much attention and given them reason to anticipate high distinction, I had, all at once and for no reason whatever, discarded them entirely and occupied myself exclusively with the other species.

Of all this, by no means so mildly put in the original, I could make no denial; and simply offered them a bit of worldly wisdom, to the effect that it would have been more politic to have first made their "earnest request," after the granting of which (in case it was granted) their "indignant remonstrance" would have done them no harm, whereas now, a single stamp of my foot could easily demolish their entire embassy.

At this one of them laid his fore-foot aside of the place where his nose should have been (for spiders lack that organ of sense, though whether they smell or not is another and mooted question), snapped his ugly jaws, and said:

"Yes, we expected some such answer, and are prepared to say that if our request is denied, as will be inferred if we do not return within a certain time, then our whole nation will assemble, declare war against your precious silk spider, cross the creek on floating wood and fishermen's boats, and, with our overwhelming numbers, speedily destroy the entire population of Long Island."

To which threat I calmly replied that, if they did so, no great harm would follow; for, in the first place, the Nephila plumipes, so far from being confined to Long Island, as was at first supposed, is found upon other parts of the Southern coast; as, for instance, at New Orleans, in Louisiana, and on St. Simon's Island, Georgia; and, in the second place, as I already possessed a sufficient number for scientific purposes, the extinction of the whole race would injure, not me who had nothing to do with the silk beyond demonstrating the possibility of obtaining it, but rather the business men, with whom it rested to develop the matter in a practical point of view.

This put the subject in a new light before my excited friends, and, after some deliberation, they asked my pardon for their vehemence, begged to be at once sent back to their homes, and trusted to my generosity and sense of what was due to them, after the expectations raised by my first investigations upon them, for the performance of what they had been instructed to demand—namely, to write a little account of them, to let the biggest and handsomest one sit for her portrait, and to make pictures of their webs and cocoons, just as had been done for the silk spider. All which they seemed to think was a very easy matter—as easy, perhaps, as for them to spin a web. So I suggested that they must not adopt the recent teachings of philosophical anatomy so literally as to conclude, because the two ends of the body had been shown to be repetitions of each other in opposite directions, that there was no difference at all between them. The poet Southey knew better than that, when he said to a spider of his day: "You your bowels spin, I spin my brains;" by which he evidently intended should be conveyed the idea that spinning a web was one thing, and elaborating a discourse quite another. Besides, I added, even if I am willing to prepare such a history, it by no means follows that other people will care to read it; they may say that they have heard enough of spiders for the present. To which the spiders answered they were very sure that spiders were not all alike, that between them and the Long Island species were great and remarkable differences, and that there was plenty more to be said about even them.

All this I was forced to admit; for the result of all the attention I had bestowed upon the Nephila plumipes was, that, for one question to be settled when I began, twenty now suggested themselves for future inquiry.

So I yielded, and here is the promised history of the James Island Spiders. I must first,

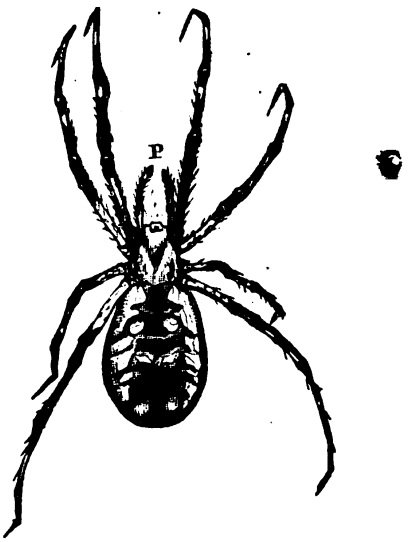

FIG. 1.—James Island Spider (Epeira riparia). Female.—P. Palpi, or Feelers.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

however, premise to the readers, what ought to have been urged to the subjects, of these memoirs, that they do not represent a finished investigation even to the small extent which could be claimed for the one they wished it to emulate; for, though at one time I was much interested in these spiders, yet the observations were made in the field, and at irregular intervals, and were twice totally interrupted—first, by the death of all the young; and afterward, by the discovery that the old ones were by no means well fitted for the project of obtaining silk. But, so far as they go, the observations are correct; the conclusions are, I trust, not far out of the way; and both may, perhaps, serve as hints to others in the further investigation of this and kindred branches of Natural History.

I.

To render what follows more intelligible to those who have not heard of the Nephila plumipes, I will briefly recapitulate the circumstances which led me to observe the spiders of James Island.

On the 19th of August, 1863, I found a female Nephila plumipes on Folly Island, South Carolina, and was led to draw silk from her body—to the extent of one hundred and fifty yards. During the following summer and autumn great numbers of the same spider were found on Long Island, and their silk obtained by various means and in various forms. Still there was no idea of the discovery ever proving of any practical value until February, 1865, when it was suggested to me to ascertain how much silk could be got from one spider, and to what extent it was possible to obtain and rear the insects themselves.

This I readily undertook, for the investigation not only opened a rich and hitherto unexplored field of scientific research, but, if successful, would supply work and means of subsistence to the freedmen, whose steadily-increasing number on the sea islands was already giving concern to the General Government.

During my absence from the regiment (the Fifty-fifth Massachusetts infantry) Charleston had been evacuated, and it naturally occurred to me that among other good results of this was that of removing obstructions in the way of further inquiries respecting spiders' silk; but so far from this, it soon appeared that Long Island, at least, was even more difficult of access from Charleston than from Folly Island, where we had passed so many months of careful watching against the attack of men who, knowing better than we the peculiar character of South Carolina mud, not only never undertook to cross it, but were on several occasions greatly astonished when the desperate Yankees, smeared to their knees with mud, suddenly appeared at the wrong side of their supposed impassable swamps.

But that our own opinion of their quality had some foundation will appear from the experiments make by General Gillmore to determine the practicability of placing a small work (afterward well known as the "Swamp Angel" Battery) upon the marsh between Morris and James islands, at a point which, prior to the capture of Fort Wagner, was the nearest within our lines to the city of Charleston. A trial platform four feet square, and made of three-inch plank, was evenly loaded with sand-bags; but when the weight of these amounted to nine hundred pounds upon a square foot it suddenly capsized, and many of the bags, weighing eighty-five pounds each, were buried out of sight in the mud, which here was only twelve feet in depth, but in most places ranged from eighteen to twenty-three feet. In addition to this information, which is contained in the official report of General Gillmore, there was, at the time the battery was made, a report current among those who were employed upon it, that the requisition for necessary materials sent in by the engineer officer detailed to superintend the work asked, among other things, for a certain number of men eighteen feet high.

But to return to my subject:—On the 14th of March, 1865, I found the regiment encamped at a place called Rickersville, on the Cooper River, just outside the city of Charleston. From the great numbers of spiders upon Long Island there was every reason to suppose they existed every where in the vicinity; but a search in the woods revealed no spiders—which perhaps was not strange at that season; and a strict inquiry among the residents elicited only the negative information that no such things had ever been seen by them. We were soon afterward removed to James Island, and located near Wappoo Creek; and here too was no trace of the spiders themselves, but on the 21st of the same month, while riding over the island toward Fort Pringle, I found in a bush by the road-side a little brown, pear-shaped bag, hung between the twigs by strong silken lines. (Fig. 2.) Without the least idea of what it was (for at that time I knew little of spiders), I opened it, and, to my astonishment, there tumbled out little spiders, not half the size of a pin's-head, with fat, round bodies and short legs, looking

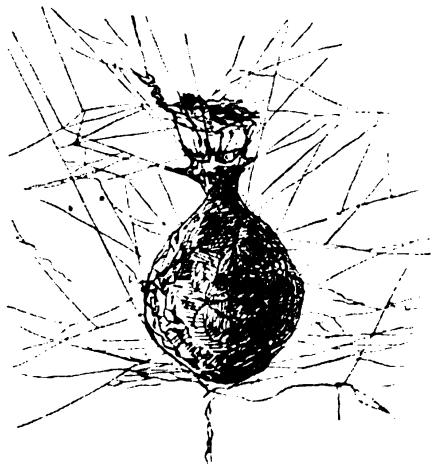

Fig. 2.—Cocoon of Epeira riparia.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

—as they swung down, each at the end of a silken rope (as in Fig. 12)—wonderfully like a lot of newly-hatched chickens hung by their tails. To count them was impossible; but there were evidently several hundreds in the cocoon, all huddled together in a living mass, but keeping pretty quiet unless their house was disturbed, when the outer ones would swing off—always, however, attaching a silken thread by which they could return to their companions. The cocoon itself was made of silk, very closely woven, and apparently varnished over with gum, so as to make a smooth and stiff outer layer, which could be separated from an inner layer of a more fibrous and open texture; but the most remarkable feature of this cocoon was its stem, or pedicel; this, like all the rest, was made of silk, but spun very closely in layers, or laminæ, narrow, and hollowed out at one end, to form the head and neck of the pedicel (Fig. 3, A), but much wider at the other, forming a broad base (Fig. 3, B), the whole looking very much like an inverted mushroom. In the entire cocoon only the head and neck of the pedicel are visible, the base being covered by the body of the cocoon, which fits closely around the neck of the pedicel like a bag (Fig. 3, F). It would appear, then, that the pedicel is spun first, and firmly suspended between twigs by strong silken lines, attached principally to its upper edge, which, as was said, is cup-shaped; the pedicel would now serve as a point of attachment for the rest of the structure, and it was easy to see that the body of the cocoon had been spun around its neck so as to be supported by it.

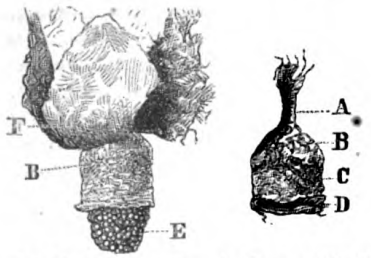

FIG. 3.—Interior of Cocoon.—A, Stem of Pedicel.—B, Base of Pedicel.—C, Hollow Curtain of Silk.—D, Upper Plate.—E, Eggs.—F, Walls of Cocoon turned back.

But the cocoon contained something more than the spiders. In the first place, there was a mass of reddish-brown silk, very loosely packed, in the meshes of which was ample space for the movements of the infant spiders; this loose silk filled the cocoon, and, on close examination, was seen to consist of two or more layers (often differing slightly in color), loosely attached above to the edge of the base of the pedicel, which projected a little way into the cocoon (Fig. 3, B); then there were two little flat plates, the upper one of which (Fig. 3, D) was inverted, and as wide as the base of the pedicel, to the edge of which it was suspended by a hollow cylinder, or curtain, of silk (Fig. 3, C), about one-third of an inch wide; the lower plate seemed to have no definite attachment—its concavity looked upward toward the first, while between and upon them were numerous little white scales, evidently the shells of the eggs of the newly-hatched spiders; to complete the table of contents, there were found scattered here and there, in the meshes of the silk, little filmy bits which, under the microscope, proved to be the empty skins, or exuviæ, of the spiders, who it seems wear closely-fitting garments, and, like caterpillars, can increase in size only by throwing off the outer skin, under which is a new and softer one, which expands for a time, and is then, in like manner, discarded for a third, and so on until the insect has completed its growth.

From what I saw in this first cocoon (and, never having succeeded in observing this spider deposit her eggs, I am none the wiser now), I inferred that, after the pedicel is made, the spider suspends from the edge of its base the upper plate, against the lower and concave side of which she deposits her eggs; for this purpose, judging from the habit of other geometrical spiders, she hangs by her legs, back downward, and presses the under side of her body up against the plate to which the eggs (Fig. 3. E), as they are excluded from the transverse fissure at the front part of the abdomen, adhere by means of a glutinous fluid with which they are covered; she then spins the second plate to fit as a cap over the lower side of the eggs, and then, over the whole, two or more layers of loose silk which she pulls out of her spinners with her hind-legs; this done, she spins a more compact layer, which is carried a little way over the edge of the pedicel, and, finally, envelops the whole in a firm tissue like thin brown paper, which is quite stiff and crackles when bent, and serves, in some degree at least, to keep out water; and then, having done her part toward the perpetuation of her race, I presume she goes about her ordinary business; for, although many spiders, especially those that live on the ground (Lycosa, Dolomedes, etc.), carry the cocoon in their jaws or attached to the spinners, and exhibit such solicitude for it and the young spiders (which have been known to be carried for weeks on their mother's back) as to almost atone for their usual ferocity, yet most of the garden spiders (Epeiridæ) seem to exercise no care over their offspring after the eggs are laid; and, indeed, with most species, the latter are not hatched till after the death of the parents.

This first cocoon was soon joined by others, and by the 25th of the month I had about fifty, containing at least twenty thousand young spiders—all alive and vigorous, but packed away in so small a compass that a good-sized carpet-bag would readily contain a million of them. By this time it was evident that no full-grown specimens of the Nephila plumipes were to be found on James Island; but in view of their abundance on Long Island the year before, it was very natural to conclude that these little

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ones, so plenty on an island separated from it only by a marsh—and at one point, by a creek but a few yards in width, were the young of the spider I sought.

At all events it could not be denied that the cocoons were the production of some large spider; and this was sufficient reason for giving them some attention. But before speaking further of them, and of certain other mysterious occupants of their silken domiciles, let us understand the use of the word cocoon in connection with spiders, and see if we can draw any absolute distinction between it and the cocoon of ordinary insects—I say ordinary insects, for the class Insecta is now considered by Agassiz and Dana to include not only the Hexapods or insects proper, having six legs, and generally, though not always, wings, but also the Arachnida or spiders, scorpions (Fig. 4), and mites with eight legs and no wings, and the Myriapoda or centipedes and many-legged worms; and, indeed, setting aside the absence of wings, which are also lacking in certain unquestionable insects (the flea tribe), and the presence of a fourth pair of legs, which distinction, however, would, if admitted, require us to make a separate order also for certain unquestionable spiders (Fig. 5) (the Mygalidae or trap-door species, whose palpi have the form of legs). There is no more reason for excluding spiders from the class of insects than Linnæus had for ranking the whale among the fishes before it was shown that the cetacea are warm-blooded, air-breathing animals, and bring forth living young, and are, therefore, entitled to a place in the same class with man himself.

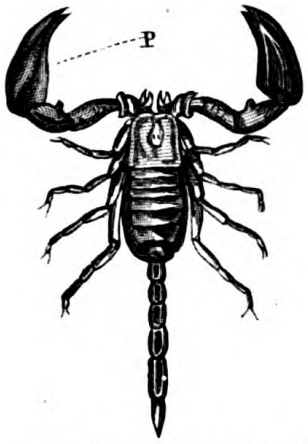

Fig. 4.—Scorpion.—P. Palpus (enlarged and modified so as to resemble a lobster's claw).

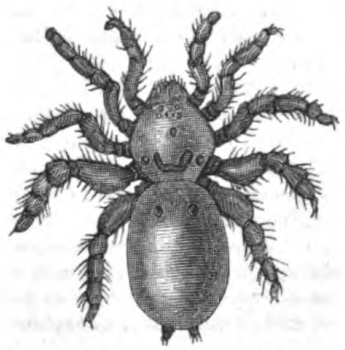

Fig. 5.—Mygale (a Spider which makes a hole in the earth, closed by a trap-door, which she holds down with her long palpi).

Fig. 6.—Very young Spider in the Egg (Pholcus opilionoides), showing three regions of the body.—A, Head; B, Thorax; C, Abdomen.

The great naturalist was, no doubt, confirmed in his error by the fish-like shape of the whale; it seemed to have no neck, and its limbs looked like fins; but dissection showed that its so-called fin was a five-fingered hand, and that, although there seemed to be no neck, yet the shoulder-blade was not attached to the back of the skull as in fishes, but to the side of the chest, leaving a distinct cervical region between the shoulder and the head. In like manner, great stress has always been laid upon the fact of spiders having no neck; and only two regions in the body instead of three, as with ordinary insects; but a glance at the embryo spider before it leaves the egg (Fig. 6) shows that at this early stage of development the head (A) and chest (B) are distinctly mapped out as separate regions, and that only at a later period are they soldered together by a horny covering or shield, somewhat as the carapace of the tortoise brings together as one region the chest, abdomen, and pelvis of that reptile.

Admitting, then, that our spiders are insects just as truly as the beetle or butterfly, only holding a lower rank than they, and standing intermediate between them and the Myriapoda, let us see whether the silken envelope of the spiders' eggs has an equal right to the title commonly applied to the larva case of a lepidopterous insect. This of itself would be very naturally taken as a sufficient reason for giving a different name, that the one is spun by the mother spider as a covering for her eggs, while the other is made by the caterpillar for a shelter during its season of helpless inactivity before its final appearance as the butterfly or moth. But it is a first principle in Natural History that the use and shape of an object have nothing what-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 ever to do with its scientific name. If it had, we should be obliged, from its shape, to call the elephant's tusk an eye-tooth, whereas its position in the jaw shows it to be only a front-tooth, modified in form for a special purpose; a better distinction would be, that the cocoon of the caterpillar is begun at the outside and finished within, while that of the spider is begun within, at the mass of eggs, and is completed by the outermost envelope: in brief, the one is made centripetally, the other centrifugally; but even this can not be laid down as an absolute rule, for the little hunting spiders (Saltici, etc.), when about to lay their eggs, first construct a silken tube which is made from without inward, and serves them as a retreat wherein they can stay, and, for a time at least, watch over their eggs, which are deposited in a separate cocoon inside of it; so that it might be imagined that some spider should spin from without inward a bag open at one part, through which she could enter and lay her eggs and afterward close up; and, indeed, it may be said that the Nephila plumipes combines the two methods, by first drawing out from her body with her hind legs a quantity of silk, matting it together in the form of a soft hemispherical cushion, which she attaches to the lower side of a leaf; against this she lays her eggs, she being then in the centre of an imaginary sphere, of which the cushion would form a part of the periphery, and this first step in the process is centripetal; but she completes her work centrifugally by spinning a second cushion upon the lower side of the mass of eggs, and finally covering the whole with silk.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

You say, then, it is granted that the cocoons of the spider and of the caterpillar are both made of silk, and that they may be constructed in the same manner; but is not the chemical nature of spider's silk different from that of caterpillar's silk; and even if this is not the case, is not one always evolved from the head, the other from the tail of the insect? This latter consideration seems, at first, an important one, and a sufficient ground of distinction; for what can be more unlike than the two ends of the body? In one sense they are, or may be, very unlike, as in common insects, and even in spiders; but, except that it would lead me too far, I could show that, however dissimilar they may be in appearance and in the functions which they perform, the two ends of the body, whether of insect, of quadruped, or of man himself, are essentially repetitions of each other in opposite directions, like the right and left sides, the two sides of a crystal, the north and south poles of a magnetic bar; and that the difference usually observed is always the result of a specialization of parts for particular functions, which does not exist in the lower forms, nor in the early stages of growth of the higher ones. Cut a centipede across the middle of its length, and not only will the two halves bear a wonderful resemblance to each other, but they will readily travel off in opposite directions; with this difference only, that, as the eyes are in the head, the front half will go around an obstacle, while the hinder part will run against it and stop. But that is nothing; for some worms have eyes near the tip of the tail: they are the ferry-boats, the "double-enders;" while the higher forms undergo a greater change at one end of the body, so as to move much more readily in one direction, like the better class of vessels. But even the higher insects must attain their perfection by slow degrees, while in this figure of an embryo spider (Fig. 7) few could decide which end is to become the head, and which the tail of the insect. The difference between the two ends of the body is, then, not sufficient to warrant our denying a common nature to the substances produced from them. And the distinction vanishes entirely when we learn that the larva of the ant-lion (Myrmeleon) spins silk from the hinder end of the body, and that the great water-beetle also envelops her eggs in a cocoon of silk from the same region.

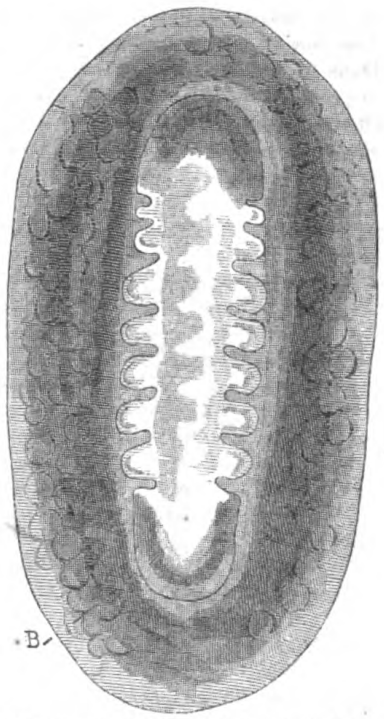

FIG. 7.—The same as in Fig. 6; but at an earlier period, and as if flattened out.—A, Head.—B, Tail.

The second question, which is really of more consequence, whether the two silken materials are identical in composition, may be, on good authority, answered in the affirmative. The only other consideration is, that ordinary silk is a single fibre, while the spider's thread is often made up of two or more strands, each of which is again composed of many filaments of exceeding fineness; but size and shape are of no importance, and so the unit of the spider's thread is a single fibre, as with that spun by the caterpillar.

It would seem then that, having yielded to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

spiders the inch of admission into the class of Insecta, they claim the ell of having the covering of their eggs called by the same name as that wonderful shroud of a caterpillar, from which is got the precious material, once worth its weight in gold, and still an appurtenance of wealth and luxury. And why not? It is reported by travelers that the inhabitants of the Bermudas, and the Indians in Paraguay, make thread of spiders' silk. More than a hundred and fifty years ago Le Bon, of France, experimented with the cocoons of certain spiders, which, having been carded, were woven into gloves and stockings, which were laid before the French Academy, and made the subject of an elaborate report by Réaumur.

This great entomologist seems to have been somewhat prejudiced against Le Bon's project, and not only stated the objections in the strongest possible manner, but committed serious errors in his estimates and calculations. Nevertheless, so potent was his authority that nothing more was heard of spiders' silk until, during the latter part of the eighteenth century, a Spaniard, named Raimondo Maria de Termeyer, made some investigations upon this matter, and in 1777 and 1778 published two memoirs in Italian periodicals of that time, and afterward, about 1810, at Milan, a little book in the Italian language, entitled "Ricerche e Sperimenti Sulla Seta dé Ragni," in which, after describing his own experiments, he points out the errors, and, to a great extent, refutes the arguments of Reaumur. How many copies of this book were printed I do not know; but Mr. Blackwall, of England, the highest English authority on spiders, has never seen one, nor does the work seem to have been known in this country until, at the sale of the library of the Baron de Walckenaer in 1853, a copy, bearing, as a great rarity, an autograph letter of presentation to the Baron, by Mons. de Béarne, was purchased in Europe by the Superintendent of the Astor Library in New York. Here it seems to have remained unnoticed up to the spring of 1866, when my attention was called to it. And then as soon as possible it was translated and published in the Proceedings of the Essex Institute, of Salem, Massachusetts, both as a most interesting and valuable contribution to the scanty literature of the subject, and as an example of the coincidences which from time to time occur between the experiments and conclusions of different investigators in distant parts of the world, and, as with the discovery by computation of the planet Leverrier, even at the same time. The present instance is the more remarkable from the almost entire oblivion, during more than half a century, of the name and fame of one who "had been occupied for more than forty years" with a matter which has always received especial attention in Italy and France.

Since then there has come to my notice a vague newspaper account of some similar experiments recently made at Vienna; and, perchance, we shall some day be informed that the idea of reeling silk from living spiders originated with, and was adopted by, some citizen of the Celestial Empire hundreds or thousands of years ago. But of this it is clear that neither Le Bon nor Termeyer had any knowledge. The former devoted himself to the cocoons of the spiders; but the Spaniard, in addition to this, after trying in vain to unwind the thread of a cocoon, as is done with the cocoon of the silk-worm, "made an observation which guided him to a more fortunate experiment." Let him relate it in his own words:

"But I made at that time another observation, which guided me to a more fortunate experiment. I saw that when the spider diadema took an insect it drew out from the spinner placed at the extremity of the abdomen some large threads, and enveloped it in a brilliant white web formed at the instant, and so strong that the insect, although sometimes it was a black beetle or a grasshopper, lost all motion. From this I argued that if I could have drawn similar threads I should have had a strong and beautiful silk. I succeeded, in fact, holding the spider by the corselet and touching the spinner, in drawing the silk; but I saw that by contracting the spinner, and, yet more, by grappling with the long legs behind, he soon cut the thread. I could hardly remedy the contraction of the spinner, but I found a remedy for the second inconvenience by placing the spider so that it could not touch the extremity of the abdomen (Fig. 8). This is the little contrivance which I devised: In a piece of cork (a) I made a small cavity, and a hollow place of nearly equal size in a sheet of tinned iron (b), about an inch wide, to which were soldered two iron pins or wires (c c), which were introduced into the cork. Upon this the spider was placed so that the sheet of iron, falling between the corselet and

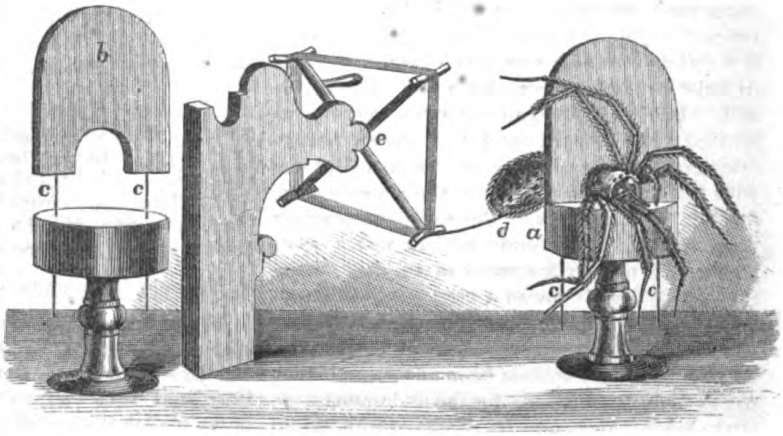

FIG. 8.—Termeyer's Reel.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the abdomen, held him secure in that place, so that he could not extend his legs behind, as is seen in the illustration.

"I have also found a method by which I can easily take the silk or allow it to be drawn from the spinner. I present a fly to him; he takes it quickly with the palpi, and turns it over as if he would envelop it. I raise the abdomen, and at the first touch he opens the spinner (d) and permits an abundance of silk to pass out. I then attach the end of silk to a little reel four and a half inches in diameter, with cylindrical arms of glass, which I slowly turn, and wind the silk of the spider like that of the cocoon. If, by the caprice of the spider, or for any other reason, the thread is broken, I again attach it as is done with the silk of the silk-worm drawn from the cocoon immersed in warm water. I have wound upon the same small reel a band of spider's silk, and a similar band of the silk of the silk-worm. The comparison shows evidently how much more brilliant and beautiful the first is than the second; so bright that it appears more like a polished metal or mirror than like silk."

Besides many more experiments and conclusions so wonderfully like those which, without the least knowledge of what had been done by either him or Le Bon, have been made by myself during the past three years, that, were not the past history of our science almost as important as its present or future, I should have been tempted to christen the translation after a story which appeared some years ago—"My Double, and how he Undid Me." But the naturalist who willfully conceals the labors of others lest they should appear to lessen the originality of his own investigations deserves not the title of student and interpreter of Nature.

It was now desirable to ascertain whether the spiders inhabited other islands in the neighborhood; so, on the 27th of March, I rode down James Island to that part known as "Grimbals," whence by bridges I reached Coles's Island, which lies between James Island and the lower or southern portion of Folly Island. Here there were woods, and, if I am not mistaken, plenty of bushes similar to those on which the cocoons had been already found; but not a single cocoon was seen either on Coles's Island or at "Grimbals." This seemed very strange; for though spiders might not readily pass over water from one island to another, yet one would suppose accidental transfers would occur even if a species were so narrowly circumscribed as to exist originally upon but a single small island. But this day another circumstance increased some misgivings I had already entertained as to the identity of the little spiders with the large ones of Long Island; namely, the finding, in a tree near the camp, of another cocoon, containing young spiders which were larger and more vigorous than the first, while the cocoon itself showed a very different structure, consisting of two cushions of loose yellow silk attached to the lower surface of a leaf. But neither did these spiders bear any resemblance to the Nephila plumipes; for the abdomen of the latter is very long, and its profile is trapezoidal (Fig. 9), while that of the little ones of both kinds was nearly round (Fig. 10); moreover, that of the silk-spider is yellow, or olive-brown, and variously ornamented with spots and stripes, while that of the little ones was pale-yellow, or nearly white, with some very faint markings on the back.—Perhaps the color was rather deeper in the newly-discovered variety. But if either should prove to be the young of the Nephila plumipes it was evident that, during growth, they must undergo changes in form and color much more extensive than are usually ascribed to spiders: and this, too, affecting not only the body, but also the legs, which, from a pale yellow color with a few scattered hairs, become dark, and, in places, nearly black, with peculiar anklets of black bristles. So that these spiders may be said to undergo a metamorphosis scarcely more incomplete than that of certain common insects—the bugs, grasshoppers, and others. With the spiders, too, there occurs a most decided change in disposition; for, after living quietly together, either, as with the garden spiders, in or near the cocoon, or, as with some field spiders, carried on the back of the mother, and if they do eat each other sometimes, doing it as if from necessity, gently and without "malice prepense," suddenly there seizes them a spirit of general distrust and longing for undisturbed seclusion; each seeks a corner in which to make her own web, and jealously guards it against all intruders, even though the visitor be a messenger of Cupid, or of such miserable particle of the god as feebly animates these creatures. But, in justice to the race, it should be said, a few species, as the Neriene errans, retain their infantile virtues through life; and Termeyer, although, after describing the impregnation of the eggs, says:

FIG. 9.—Body of Female Nephila plumipes, seen in profile and a little enlarged.—P, Palpus; A, Spinners.

FIGURE 10.—Body of young Nephila plumipes, magnified.

"But I saw also with surprise and indignation that, the work hardly finished, the male not being able to fly on account of the confinement, the female enveloped him in her threads, and, having thus deprived him of every means of defense, devoured him. Perhaps overpowering hunger compelled her to it, but the act was very ferocious."

He adds, in extenuation:

"But I ought to say that I have not found other spiders so ferocious. The Aranea cucurbitina remained with his companion in a little box the entire season, and if I gave them a fly, instead of quarreling over it, they ate it together peaceably."

It is worthy of note that the form of these young

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google resembles that of certain full-grown spiders of other kinds, as, for instance, the little round-bodied species that spins an irregular mesh of threads in the corners of rooms (Fig. 11). And this resemblance of the mature condition of one species to the earlier stages of others may some time serve as a guide to the determination of their relative rank, in the same manner as the butterfly is seen to be higher than the worm because the former begins in a shape like that in which the latter remains during life.

Fig. 11.—Body of small House Spider, Theridion.

On the 29th I filled both my coat-pockets with cocoons of the first kind gathered from bushes skirting the wet ditch in front of the first line of rebel earth-works, then in our possession, and on the 2d of April, by wading knee-deep in the water covering the field beyond, I took from the bushes cocoons enough to make the total number four hundred and six, containing, by a very moderate estimate, two hundred thousand spiders. The necessity of ascertaining whether they were the silk-spider was now greater than ever; so, on the following day, by taking a boat from Fort Pringle and rowing around the lower portion of James Island, then through the creeks separating it from Coles's Island, I at last reached Long Island: here, after a careful search, there were found only two specimens of the pear-shaped cocoon, while of the other and looser kind I gathered twelve, which number would doubtless have been larger but for their concealment under the leaves. It was noted at the time that all the cocoons I found of this kind were attached to the lower surface of the leaves of some evergreen vine, while the spiders themselves, as had been observed in the previous summer, always made their nets in trees whose leaves fell at the approach of winter; and I now remember that soon after the death of the only specimen of the Nephila plumipes that lived in Professor Gray's green-house, at Cambridge, Massachusetts, a cocoon, evidently made by her, was found attached to a leaf of an evergreen vine at a considerable distance from the web, to which, however, she had afterward returned. This instance, if such it shall prove to be, of the parent spider depositing her eggs where their safety will be more sure than in the place where she herself prefers to live, is most wonderful; yet no more so than that the cabbage-butterfly should attach her eggs to certain vegetables on which her young will feed, while all her own subsistence is derived from the honey of flowers. The dragon-fly too, and the mosquito, which live in the air, always drop their eggs into the water, where only the larvæ can exist.

These, and many other similar examples which might be given of the wonderful instinct manifested by insects in making provision for their offspring, would lead us to conclude that in all cases the little creatures do their best, and that any disaster is to be referred, not to a lack of foresight or accidental omission on their part, but rather to disturbing agencies over which they have no control—such as the wind, the rain, and cold, the depredations of birds and larger insects, and the less violent but no less deadly attacks of the insidious ichneumons. Nevertheless, in view of the great discrepancy between the small number of cocoons found and the hundreds of the spiders themselves, and also between the thousands of eggs contained in these cocoons and the far lesser number of the young spiders which live to form cocoons themselves, we can not deny, without more complete observation, that, as one means of keeping the increase of the species within due limits, it may be provided that, of all the cocoons made by the female spiders, only a few—namely, those attached to perennial leaves—shall be preserved during the winter, the rest being carried to the earth and destroyed by water and by other insects.

There could now be very little doubt that the open cocoons were those of the Nephila plumipes; but who would have thought that two islands but a few miles in extent, and in several places barely separated from each other by creeks, should each be almost exclusively the home of one large geometrical spider? And was it not the most natural thing in the world for me to infer that the young spiders found upon one island were the children of old ones such as were already known to inhabit the other? That this conclusion was not verified is a good example of a very safe rule in studying Natural History, that, though inferences may be useful in suggesting probabilities and lines of search, yet we must constantly bear in mind that Nature is not subject to mathematical rules, and that we know only what we have seen.

I was now more cautious, and confined my anticipations to two: 1. That these cocoons must have been the production of some large spider; 2. That, whatever it was, it would prove as docile and as amenable to the peculiar conditions imposed upon a silk-producer as had its neighbor of Long Island. That this latter hope was not realized will be seen further on; but whatever their disposition proved to be their number was prodigious. Two hundred thousand spiders all in one room! To my brother officers the statement seemed incredible; and occasionally my own misgivings as to the fact induced me to open a cocoon and see if there really were contained therein five hundred, more or less, creatures, which after a time would be large enough each to deposit another half thousand eggs, and cover them with a cocoon from half an inch to an inch and a half in diameter. Besides, each of these cocoons contained considerable silk, which could at least be carded. And from the spiders themselves who could say how many miles of beautiful thread could be drawn by the dusky hands of those to whom Sherman had allotted the isl-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ands where they were found. But great as was this number, it seems moderate compared with those on which Termeyer based his calculations. He says, in a note to the section treating of the "Facility of rearing spiders:"

"When I was in America, traveling over the great Ciaco, I collected thus 2484 very large spiders, which, being then placed upon a double row of pomegranate-trees, gave me 2013 great cocoons of the best yellow silk. I took out the eggs from the cocoons, which (calculating six cocoons for each spider, and between 600 and 1000 little spiders for each cocoon) exceeded 9,000,000 in number, and would have given me as many little spiders the next year. But an unexpected command and an irresistible power called me away from that country. What a pity, and what a loss!"

It seems that his spiders made five or six cocoons each year, but it will be noted that he "counted his chickens before they were hatched." Mine were already hatched, so far as leaving the egg was concerned. But something more was necessary before they could become useful members of society. In short, some of them had now been in my possession for nearly two weeks, and, by anticipating a little, I may add that some of them continued so until the middle of June, and yet, unless the cocoons were artificially opened, not a single young spider was seen to escape from them. It should have been said before that, of the 406 pear-shaped cocoons now in my possession, only 134, or about one-third of the whole number, were entire, while the remaining two-thirds presented certain openings which shall now be described.

Those which I first noticed were rents or tears of greater or less extent, sometimes laying open the side of the cocoon so that the contents had wholly or partly disappeared, sometimes consisting of one or two small holes, out of which the inner loose silk had apparently been violently pulled (Fig. 12); in fact, one could hardly resist the conclusion that these cocoons had been attacked by some bird; and one day it was my good fortune to actually see a little gray bird, the size of a sparrow, fly at a cocoon, make one or two quick pulls and retreat with, as we may imagine, a mouth full of dry silk, and a sensation akin to that of one of us after a good bite at a delicate first of April fritter, which some friend has slyly filled with cotton.

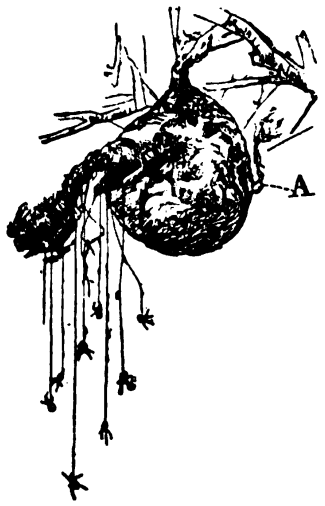

FIG. 12.—Cocoon torn by a bird, with the little Spiders hanging at the ends of their threads.—A, Smaller Hole, filled by the silk which was pulled through it.

As has been said, this sudden opening of the cocoon seems, in some cases, to at once destroy all the inhabitants; in others, it is probable that many die from premature exposure and the attacks of insects; but in a certain number the rent is more or less completely filled by the silk which is pulled through it. And so the little spiders are safe, and at the proper time find a ready avenue of escape into the air; so that these depredations of birds, which are made with the intention of destroying all, and generally do prove fatal to some, are apparently almost the only means of giving to any a chance to live. This curious provision recalls that in the case of certain flowers—the milk-weed and many orchids—fertilization of which seems absolutely to depend upon the insects who, in seeking their honey, cause the pollen to fall upon the stigma; indeed, the cases are strictly parallel, for if the birds came to murder, the insects came to steal; yet both these intended injuries are made the means of preserving, in the one case, the life of the individuals, in the other, that of the species.

Of the cocoons torn in the manner I have described there were sixty, most of which still contained some of the spiders; and it is to be observed that none of these showed any disposition to escape so long as they were kept quiet and not exposed to the sun; and even when so exposed they merely came out as if to enjoy it, sometimes swinging down in long festoons, and clinging to each other as bees when they swarm, but always retaining their connection with the cocoon, to which they returned when no longer warmed by the sun. The same was the case with the spiders in the entire cocoons which I cut open; but they never made their appearance through the walls of a cocoon, even though it was hung in the sun and sprinkled. So I concluded that it was not yet time for them to come out, and that when the proper time came some way would present itself for their escape from what now seemed altogether too secure a protection. The most careful examination of the entire cocoons showed no outlet whatever. All was smooth and firm, and even when the outer surface was not glazed, this was compensated for by an increased thickness of the walls, which would seem to defy the jaws of the little inhabitants. The loose and open extremity of the pedicel suggested that here might be an avenue of escape, but a section through it showed the base of the pedicel to be the thickest and most unyielding portion of the whole cocoon; and even if there had been such an opening it was strange for it to point always

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

upward; whereas the looser end of the caterpillar's cocoon, through which the moth is to force its way out, is always directed downward, so as to be shielded from the rain. So hopeless, indeed, seemed the prospect of the spiders escaping by their own unaided efforts that when, on the 4th of April, there came an order for us to prepare for moving, I selected two hundred of the cocoons, cut holes in each one, strung them upon loops of twine, twenty-five in a bunch, and next morning carried them in a bag across the whole length of James Island to Coles's Island, where I hung them in the trees to take their chance of life in their new country; where at least they would run less risk of destruction than in their former habitat, where a few fires or the cultivation of the field might kill them all.

From the 5th to the 14th we were on a raid into the State, during which, as may be supposed, rebels and their ambuscades received more attention than spiders and their fly-traps. Our returning march was attended by at least fifteen hundred freed people of all ages, taking with them as many as possible of their household goods, either upon their own backs or in very rickety vehicles, which, sometimes from their own weakness, sometimes from the giving out of the poorly-fed cattle, were occasionally disabled and left by the road-side, the owners being then obliged to select what portions of the load should be finally abandoned. I remember on one occasion catching up upon my horse a screaming, half-naked "pickaninny," the chaplain and the mounted orderly doing the same for two more, whose father, stupefied with terror of the rebel scouts who had just shot down some of his companions, seemed to lose all thought for his children, and frantically tried to save an enormous pile of bedding, which his wearied horse and broken cart could no longer carry.

This anxiety of the lower class of freed people for their property, more particularly the bedding, was sometimes noticed and indignantly commented upon by our own colored soldiers; most of whom, however, were free negroes from the North and West, and had outgrown the degrading consciousness which not even the hope of freedom could cancel in the minds of their less fortunate brethren, that clothing was their own because not worth taking from them, while their children were theirs only in name. And yet these same poor creatures—such was their dread of sickness, their faith in doctors, and, when permitted to think for themselves, their real affection for each other—would often walk ten, fifteen, and even twenty miles under a burning sun to get a little medicine for wife or child. The South would keep the negro as he has been; the North would have him what he may be. For one, as an officer in a regiment of colored men, I am glad to record my respect for them as men, and my confidence in them as soldiers, whether in camp, on the march, or in battle. Adding to this that they were never guilty of inhumanity toward captives even in the heat of action, our indignation was great when, on the 19th of March, in riding over the scene of the skirmish on James Island, July 2, 1864, we came upon the bones of our killed lying unburied just as they fell, the turf around them unbroken, and no traces of the skulls to be found. With no wish to add another doubtful case to the reports of such barbarism as the absence of the skulls would imply, we can not avoid comment upon the fact that the bodies of at least six colored soldiers were left unburied inside the rebel picket lines from July, 1864, to March of the following year. To those who then permitted this, and now regret it, there may be satisfaction in knowing that these dry bones were reverently gathered and buried with military honors in a fort upon the point of James Island nearest to Charleston.

To return to the spiders. My not finding any signs of them at Rickersville did not lead me to anticipate seeing many of the cocoons further from the coast, but as we moved quite slowly they could not have been very numerous without my observing them; nevertheless, I saw only eight cocoons on the way to and from Eutaw Springs, and all but one of these were within twenty miles of Charleston. But it by no means follows from this that in certain localities the spider may not be as abundant all over the State as it is on James Island, where also the cocoons had been found chiefly in a marshy field and by the side of a ditch, and also in dryer places along the roads between Wappoo Creek and Fort Pringle; while I never saw one in the woods about Fort Johnson or at St. Andrew's Parish, where we were stationed during the three weeks succeeding our expedition to Eutaw Springs.

Now, how was it that so few, comparatively, of these spiders were found when each of them, or at the most each pair of them, produced so many young at once? Five hundred is a very moderate estimate; for I have counted twenty-two hundred eggs in a single cocoon of this species: even taking five hundred as the limit, in two years our two hundred thousand spiders would give us the astonishing number of fifty thousand million. It is easy to see that the country would soon contain nothing but spiders. But then the same can be said of any animal which produces two or more young at once; "even slow-breeding man has doubled in twenty-five years; and at this rate, in a few thousand years, there would literally not be standing room for his progeny."

The result of this geometrical increase of animals and plants is ably set forth by Darwin in his chapter on the "Struggle for Existence;" and probably he is correct in assuming that out of the hundreds or thousands of young which are produced, the weaker "go to the wall" and the stronger individuals survive. But it is to be regretted that such profound learning as is manifested in this and other parts of the "Origin of Species," should have been employed in the ef-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

fort to confirm the unsupported assumption that these more vigorous individuals deviate from the common type rather than the weaker ones; which supposition lies at the bottom of his theory, and yet no single fact has ever been adduced to show that it is true among animals in a state of nature.

But I am treading upon dangerous ground, where taller men than I have, at least in the estimation of their opponents, got very deeply into trouble; so we will confine ourselves to the proposition that, except in cases where a marked increase in number has taken place, there comes to maturity, on the average, but a single individual for each preceding one, or two for every pair when the sexes are equally represented; and this, also, whether the offspring be originally single, as with some animals, and even a few flies (the Hippoboscidæ), or hundreds and thousands in number, as with most insects and fishes; the difference being, that, in the one case, more complete protection is afforded to the few young, while in the latter they are, at some period of their growth, so dependent upon chance, as it were, for the means of existence, or so subjected to destructive agencies as to prevent an increase which would otherwise, sooner or later, cause a plague of any creature producing more than one at a birth.

What then becomes of the rest? and how is this fortunate destruction accomplished? These questions apply with more or less force to the whole animal and vegetable creations, and present a most interesting line of observation and thought; but a general consideration of it would lead us too far, and we must limit our inquiry to the spiders already under our notice.

It is evidently the design of the mother spider to make some protection for her eggs. The Nephila plumipes constructs a cocoon of a loose and open texture, but attaches it to the lower surface of an evergreen leaf, by which it is sheltered from rain and excessive heat. The James Island spider also first makes a loose cocoon; but as it is to be suspended between two twigs she adds an outer covering, which is usually glazed so as to shed water. Now, to counteract the good effects of these measures, I have suggested that occasionally the former species makes a mistake, and attaches her cocoon to a leaf which falls in the winter, and thus involves the destruction of the eggs; and that with the latter species the outer envelope of the cocoon is always too tough for the little spiders, and must be torn by a bird before they can escape. But neither of these explanations is quite satisfactory: and although in support of the former it may be added that the Nephilas commonly occur in small colonies of five or six in the same or neighboring trees, as if all had come from one cocoon which was saved, and thus made up for the loss of five or six other cocoons; yet in regard to the latter I ought to say that, on the 12th of June, nearly three months after the spiders were probably hatched, I observed, for the first time, that two cocoons presented, just at the side of the pedicel, a hole with ragged edges (Fig. 13), as if something had gnawed its way in or out; but unfortunately my notes say nothing as to whether these cocoons still contained the spiders. During our stay at St. Andrew's parish I kept a few of both kinds of young in glass jars, and observed that occasionally they devoured each other, but not as yet to any marked degree, and generally preferred to keep in company, following each other by their silken trails as a flock of sheep follows its leader. In this respect the two kinds showed no especial difference, though the young from the loose cocoons were already larger and more vigorous and of a darker color. A string dipped in fresh blood was hung among them, and, though all seemed to like it, the larger kind ate the most: so with a small fly deprived of its wings, one of the larger ones caught it by the foot and held on in spite of its struggles, and presently others came and clustered about the fly, apparently sucking its juices; but the smaller kind were more timid, and manifested far less enterprise. One day I dropped a dozen or so of both kinds upon the branches supporting the web of a common garden spider about one-third of an inch long: some of them soon made their way along the guy-lines, and the spider, perceiving their presence by the vibration of the web, darted out, seized one of them, and quickly covered it with a mesh of silk. It then turned to pursue the others, but they, alarmed, had retreated—some as they came, others by swinging down upon their threads: again and again they ascended the lines leading to the web, and the owner as often attacked and drove them back, leaving as trophies in various parts of the web the bodies of the slain securely covered by silk. But at last some of them found their way to his back-door, and so outflanked him, while others advanced in front; and now the spider actually retreated, and left his net to the little assailants, twenty of which would hardly equal him in size.

FIG. 13.—Upper part of cocoon.—A, Hole near the Pedicel.

Of the other checks upon the increase of the spiders we may mention their disposition to devour each other, the depredations of other insects, and exposure to cold and wet after leaving the cocoon; but there is still another agent of destruction whose attacks, though less apparent, are none the less fatal in their effect. How this secret enemy gains access to its prey, when its operations commence, and even what is its precise nature, is still, in great measure, a matter of conjecture, as are also the details of its own ruin by still a third link in this wonderful "chain of destruction;" but whatever is known of these matters shall now be laid before you.

The facts are, in brief, as follow: One of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

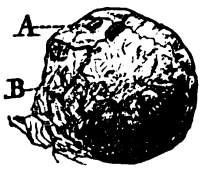

Fig. 14.—Bottom of cocoon pierced by Ichneumons and Chalcidians. —A, Holes made by Ichneumons.—B, Hole supposed to have been made by Chalcidians.

the cocoons first found on James Island in April exhibited several openings in its walls, the edges of which were not ragged as if torn but tolerably even, the holes themselves being rounded and about one-sixteenth of an inch in diameter (Fig. 14, A). On cutting into this cocoon a strange sight presented itself; the entire lower half of its cavity (Fig. 15) was occupied by a dozen or more little oblong cocoons of a white color, quite fine and closely woven, and firmly connected with each other apparently by some of the same silk as that of which they were composed; the original and lawful contents of the cocoon were crowded into half their former compass; but in the confused mass could be recognized the loose silk, the two little plates, and a number of blackened grains which were undoubtedly all that was left of the spiders' eggs; evidently mischief had been done, and by cutting open one of the small whitish cocoons we might gain some clew to the perpetrator; but in each of these were several little round holes like pin-pricks (Fig. 16, A), and within were, 1st, a hollow shriveled skin of a dark-brown color (Fig. 16, C), and, 2d, lying in and about this, fifteen or twenty little black bodies, some motionless and as if swathed up closely like mummies (Fig. 17, A); others crawling about and possessing four wings (Fig. 17, B). Here was a mystery indeed! and one which excited serious suspicions of terrible crimes—house-breaking and deliberate murder at the least. A second small cocoon was opened with the same result—it contained only one wrinkled skin and many little black flies; and this was the case with every one of the small cocoons in that large one; in another spider's cocoon, which had the round holes in its walls, there were found not merely the small cocoons, the loose silk, the two plates, and the blackened grains, but likewise a few egg-shells and a few little spiders. Here, then, were the evidences of three different insects in the house which properly belonged to but one; and, not having the means for a minute examination of them, or for ascertaining whether similar combinations had ever been described, I could only speculate to this extent: that a female spider had constructed a silken covering for her eggs; that some insect had contrived to deposit her eggs in such a position that the little larvæ hatched therefrom found their way to the spider's treasures, and, having wholly or in part devoured them, had themselves spun cocoons in which to undergo their metamorphosis; bnt this was not to be acccomplished, for death had been busy at their entrails in the shape of twenty little worms natched from eggs which had been in some way put into or upon them by little insects, the parents of those now filling their empty skins; these latter were evidently allied to the ichneumon flies—a family of insect busy-bodies, whose propensity for minding other folk's affairs is never satisfied with a simple visit, but impels them to leave a very palpable memento in the shape of an egg, from which proceeds a little worm destined to feed upon and finally destroy the caterpillar or other unfortunate recipient of their attentions.

Fig. 15.—Cocoon opened so as to show the small cocoons of the Ichneumons pierced by the Chalcidians.

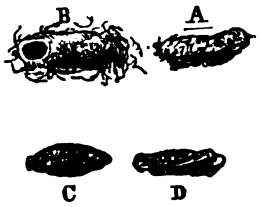

Fig. 16.—Cocoons, empty Larva Skin and Pupa of Ichneumons.—A, Cocoon pierced by the Chalcidians. —B, Cocoons pierced by the Ichneumon.—C, Empty Skin of Larva of Ichneumon.—D, Pupa or chrysalis of another Ichneumon (Pimpla instigator).

But what was the precise nature of this larva in the present case was not easily made out: did it belong to the Lepidoptera (butterflies and moths), which are so commonly attacked by parasites? No; for, in the first place, caterpillars have legs; and, in the second, no insect of that order was ever known to be parasitic upon others or upon their eggs. Was it, then, dipterous in its nature—the production of a two-winged fly? This seemed quite likely; for it is known that some flies (the Tachinidæ) are guilty of just such things—gluing their eggs upon the skin of a larva, so that the little worm may burrow in as soon as it is hatched: indeed such flies have been actually known to come from a mass of spider's eggs. In this case the parent fly, having neither jaws nor ovipositor, could not, of course, penetrate the cocoon after its completion, but she might have seized the opportunity, just as the spider's eggs had been laid, to deposit her own upon them before the outer walls were completed.

Fig. 17.—A Chalcidian (Eulophus nematí) magnified.—A, Pupa, or chrysalis.—B, Imago, or perfect insect.—The line between the two figures represents their real length.

Besides, there was a sort of poetical justice in this destruction, by a fly, of the eggs which would otherwise produce the sworn enemies of her race; and, as the larvæ of flies have no feet, I was much inclined to adopt this view of the nature of the shriveled brown skins in the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

small cocoons; but, after examining nearly all of the twenty-three spiders' cocoons, which had holes in them, and meeting with no new indications as to the nature of the larvæ which had made the small cocoons—all of them having been destroyed by the little flies—I came upon one in which some of the small cocoons bore no little holes, but a single larger opening near one extremity (Fig. 16, B): all such were empty; but three of them were whole, and contained neither the larva skin, nor the little black flies, but fragments of some larger insect, among which were two long and jointed antennæ or feelers, and some other parts which, after such combination as was possible, indicated that the larva had changed into a pupa or chrysalis, nearly resembling Fig. 16, D, and which represents the pupa of an ichneumon. I have since ascertained that the little black flies are not real ichneumons, but belong to the chalcididæ, a nearly allied family, whose members not only attack their more distant relations, but very often deposit their eggs in the bodies of their near cousins, the ichneumons, and are thus, in many cases, the parasites of parasites.

Those I have described are so minute that I shall not attempt to give an accurate picture of them, but merely a general representation of a chalcidian pupa (Fig. 17, A), and imago (B), the real length of our species being less than one-sixteenth of an inch, as indicated by the line between the two figures.

How the ichneumon and the chalcidian gain access to their respective destinations has not yet been observed; but as the larger holes in the spiders' cocoons are present in all that contained them, while not one of these ichneumons would have reached its final winged state so as to come out (though they do, in some cases, of course), we may reasonably infer that these larger holes were made by the parent ichneumon to effect an entrance, knowing, by a wonderful instinct, that the silken bag contained delicious food for her young. Through these holes the chalcidians could easily pass and deposit their own eggs under the skin of the ichneumon larvæ; they would soon hatch, and, probably knowing how to avoid at first the vital parts of the ichneumon, would slowly devour the fat, and afterward the other organs, until the latter, with just strength enough to spin a silken cocoon, finally died, leaving little but her skin and her minute destroyers. These in due time cast their own skins, became pupæ, and afterward, by a second moult, appeared as the winged chalcidians, who would easily eat their way through the skin and cocoon of the ichneumon larva, and then escape, either through the large holes (Fig. 14, A) already made in the spider's cocoon, or by gnawing for themselves a passage, as would appear from the occasional presence of such smaller perforations, as shown in Fig. 14, B.

Such would appear to be the methods of procedure, judging from the few facts known in this case and the analogy of other cases, where a parasitic insect is itself preyed upon by a parasite still more minute. But I can find no record of an instance exactly similar to this, and hope that what little information I have been able to impart will be of some use in an investigation of this interesting subject under more advantageous circumstances.

The remaining cocoons are mentioned in my notes as not quite entire, yet as not containing any ichneumons; quite often they presented minute holes, like those made by the chalcidians (Fig. 14, B), of which, however, they contained no trace; and a few had openings as large as those made by the ichneumons (Fig. 14, A); but the young spiders never came out of them, and as the large ones almost always showed a little silk pulled through them, as in Fig. 14, A, perhaps they were made by some small bird, who was not encouraged to persevere in his attacks; at any rate, the spiders in all of these behaved as though the cocoons were entire.

On the 7th of May we moved from the coast to Summerville, and soon afterward to Orangeburg, where we remained until late in August. At neither of these places did I see any signs of the James Island spider, nor indeed of large spiders of any kind. From time to time I opened an entire cocoon to make sure the inmates were still alive, and in every case found them both living and apparently contented with their close quarters, but increasing in size so slowly that toward the middle of June I could hardly conceive how, in the short time remaining to them, they could possibly get large enough to make for themselves such great cocoons: for some of these were fully an inch and a half in diameter, though among them was one so diminutive (Fig. 18) that, if such a thing had ever been reported, I should be strongly inclined to suspect some precocious little spider of trying her skill at making a nest long before she could expect to put any eggs therein; for this cocoon contained only loose silk, and as the pedicel was hollow, it may be questioned whether this cocoon was not the work of some smaller kind of spider.

Fig. 18.—Very small cocoon of some Spider, containing only silk.

I have said that most of the cocoons were as if glazed on the outer surface; and this, added to their pear-shaped form, would probably exclude the rain under ordinary circumstances; but after floating upon water for six hours the latter began to make its way through the walls, and steadily increased until, at the end of four days, the cocoon had sunk to the surface of the water, which was now found to have filled every part of it and caused the death of the spiders, who were, in every instance, gathered together in the (then) upper region of the cocoon. It was with but few, however, that the experiment was carried to such a fatal termination,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

though all were dropped into the water for some seconds, to see if they exhibited a peculiarity I had noted with the first; namely, that it floated upon one side, and would retain no other position, from whatever height it was dropped into the water. After a short time, too, a spot in the centre of the submerged portion changed its appearance; it grew darker, and almost transparent, and was to some extent soaked with the water. Out of ninety-nine entire cocoons so dropped into the water all floated upon the side, and never with the stem directed either upward or downward; of these, eighty-two invariably took a certain definite position, as if one side was heavier than the others; and upon this lower side there soon appeared the darker spot I have mentioned, differing in size in different cocoons, but never occupying more than two-thirds of the submerged surface; the remaining seventeen cocoons manifested no such peculiarity, but rested upon the water in nearly or quite the same position in which they were placed. It would be natural to account for this constant sinking of one side by assuming that the young spiders occupied that side; and that although no difference could be perceived in the texture of the walls at that place while the cocoon was dry, yet perhaps there was a difference with which the spiders were acquainted, and which would admit the slow passage of not only water but air. The fact of the spiders being found at the upper and opposite side of the cocoon after a longer exposure might be due to the presence of the water, which, by its weight, would keep the cocoon in the same position, even after they all had been driven into the upper part of its cavity. But all this is merely conjecture.

On the 10th of June I constructed a little house for the spiders taken from such cocoons as had been opened. It consisted of a cartridge-box set upon one narrow side, each wider side being covered with a pane of glass and a strip of gauze for ventilation. This house, for want of a better name, I called an "Arachnarium," and it enabled me to observe something more of the habits of the spiders. These now were all of the smaller variety, and had grown but little, though their skins were cast off as with the young of the Nephila plumipes. Like them, too, they preferred the light, and even that of a candle or lamp would attract them; so that, physically, at least, our spiders may be said to look always upon the brightest side of things.

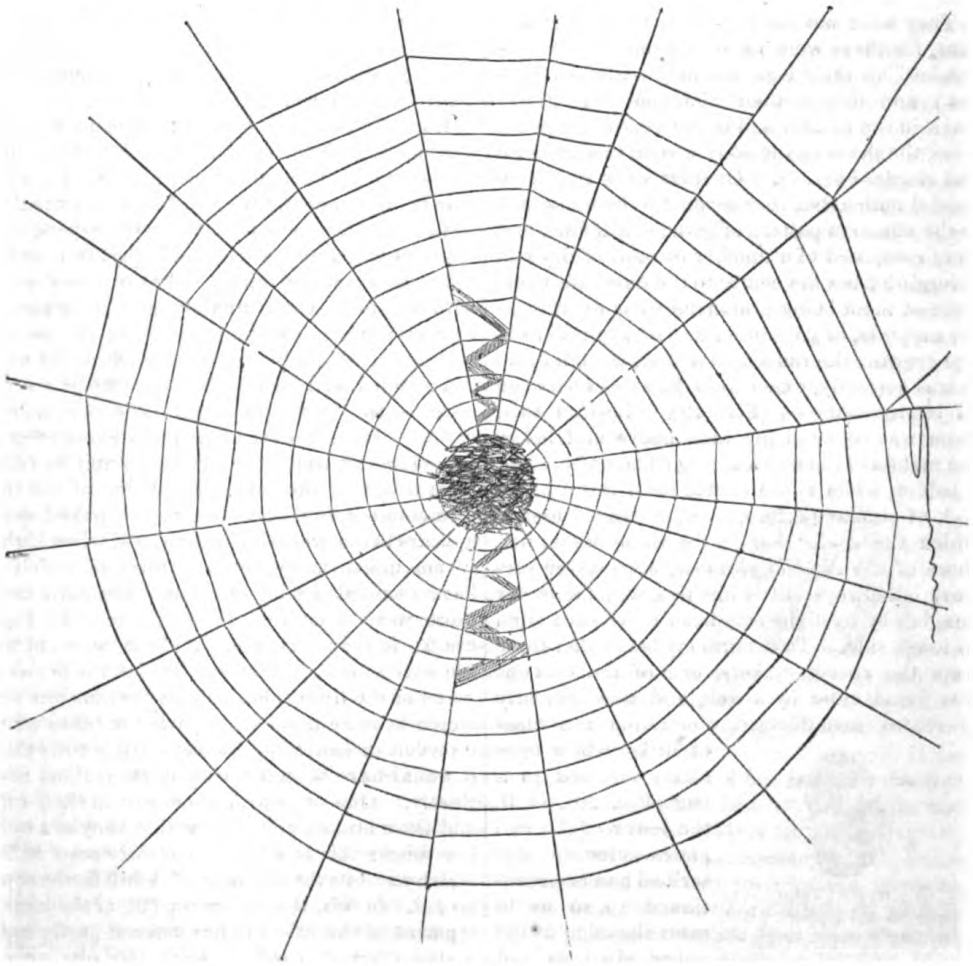

Fig. 19.—Web of Epeira riparia.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

These spiders also took a position with their heads downward, and, in fact, differed very little in their actions, from what I have since observed, with the young of the Nephila plumipes. But on the fifth day after the establishment of the arachnarium all the spiders in the remaining cocoons were cruelly sacrificed in one great holocaust by being left too long on a tray in the hot sun. This virtually put an end to my attempts to rear them; and though a bit of tender liver of chicken was offered to the survivors in the box, they would not eat, and as I have no further records of them, it is to be presumed they soon followed their companions.

II.

We have devoted so much of our time and space to the children that but little is left for the parents; and I must be very brief in my account of the full-grown James Island spiders. What these were like was still uncertain, though there was but slight prospect of their proving to be the Nephila plumipes. So, on my first visit to Charleston, I crossed the Ashley to our former camp on Wappoo Creek, and soon found plenty of large spiders in the field where the cocoons had been obtained, and especially along the borders of the wet ditch.

They were not the silk-spider; that was evident, for there were no such handsome "hair-brushes" on their legs, but only scattered bristles; and though their abdomen was glossy black in the middle and bright yellow along the sides, the shape of the body was far less graceful and elegant (Fig. 1). Of their webs I took no special notice, but they seemed to be made after the common pattern of geometrical nets, and were composed of a number of radii of dry silk diverging from the centre to the circumference, some of them being prolonged so as to serve as the supports, or guy-lines; and of a spiral viscid line crossing the radii, and nearly, though by no means perfectly, exact as to the spaces between its circumvolutions (Fig. 19). Besides this, there was between the radii above and below the middle of the web a zigzag ribbon of silk like a ladder, while at the centre itself was a broad disk of similar texture, over, or rather under, which the spider hung; for these webs, like those of the Nephila plumipes, were never vertical, but always a little inclined, with the spider hanging by its eight legs head downward from its lower side. To confirm my belief that these were the cocoon-makers, one of the cocoons was found close by a web, and was evidently of recent manufacture, containing the mass of little yellow eggs nicely inclosed in a bag (Fig. 20), as if the lower of the two plates already described had been continued up so as to meet the edge of the upper plate, as had also been observed in some of the other cocoons opened after the first specimen, in which the lower plate was the smaller of the two (Fig. 3).

Fig. 20.—Bag containing the Eggs. — A, Upper plate, forming a cover to B, the lower plate, which is larger than usual, and hollowed so as to form a bag.

An approaching shower gave me just time to secure a dozen of these spiders, each in a little square box, and to carry them back to Charleston. Here I spent the evening in reeling off some of their silk to ascertain whether it was likely to be useful like that of the Nephila plumipes.

But it was soon evident that there were very decided distinctions between the two species; for the legs of these were comparatively short and strong, and their bodies were shorter and more rounded, so that it was far less easy to handle them; and they snapped their jaws so viciously at any attempt to infringe upon their liberty of motion, that at one time, when, from the insufficiency of the contrivance for holding them upon the reel, several got loose together and crawled about the room in all directions, there was some prospect of a serious interference with the intended experiments. However, I succeeded in securing three of them on the periphery of a wheel which turned at the same time with the reel upon which the silk was wound, and so twisted their several threads into one. This silk was not brilliant like that of the Nephila plumipes, nor, so far as I could ascertain, were there two distinct colors, but was all of a light yellow, while their webs had appeared nearly or quite white.

Like the Nephila plumipes they had six spinning papillæ, or mammulæ, on the lower side of the abdomen near the tail (Fig. 9, A), two pair being large, and the third so much smaller as to be ordinarily concealed by the others, but exposed when they are opened apart from each other, as when the spider wishes to cover a fly with her silk. Unfortunately the precise structure and functions of the spinning organs of spiders are still subjects of so much doubt and discussion that I do not dare to attempt a representation of even as much as is reasonably certain; but the exceeding minuteness of the tubes through which the silk issues may be seen from this, that the free edge of one of the intermediate spinners, which, to the naked eye, appears like a straight line, presents, when highly magnified, many delicate tubes, of which I have counted seventy-five, and am sure that more were concealed below them. In Figure 21 is represented at A about one-sixth of the edge of one of these small spinners, bearing seven of the little tubes. This portion was selected because in all other parts the tubes were crowded so closely in double or triple rows that it would have been less easy to show them distinctly. One or two of them are broken off, and their broken edges show that they are hollow tubes: this is still more clearly seen at B, which exhibits the last tube of A still further enlarged. In this, the top, or cap (2), of the larger segment of the tube (1) has become partly separated from it, carrying back the smaller or terminal segment (3), which also has lost its

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

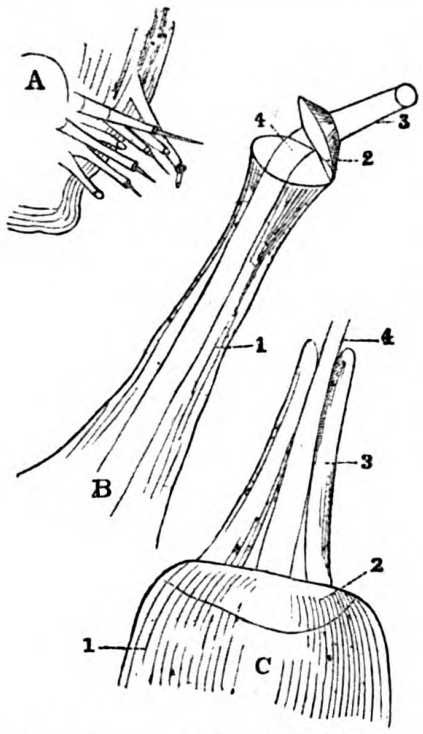

FIG. 21.—A, Part of one of the small intermediate Spinners of Epeira riparia, as seen in profile under the microscope.—B, The last tube still more highly magnified; 1, Lower or larger segment of a tube.—2, Cap of this turned back.—3, Upper or smaller segment of the tube.—4, The filament of silk.—C, Another tube magnified; 4, End of the filament.

extremity; but what is better than all, between the edge of the larger tube and the cap may be seen the filament of silk (4); and at C is shown a larger and thicker tube from a part of the spinner which is not shown at A, the orifice of which is dilated, and the extremity of the thread projects a little way through it (4).

If these tubes are present also upon the larger spinners it is amazing that organs of such exceeding fineness can be, as they seem to be, pressed upon rough surfaces and not be destroyed; but their length, perhaps, accounts for the readiness with which the spider draws out the silk upon her hinder legs, as when securing a fly or other insect. For this purpose, suspending herself from the web by means of her second pair of legs, which, like all the others, are provided with claws, she slowly revolves the insect between her front legs, her palpi (Fig. 1, P), and the third pair of legs, which are shorter than the rest; and at the same time, applying one of the hinder legs to the widely-opened spinners, she draws from them a broad band of white silk, which is carried forward and thrown over the victim, while the other leg is in like manner employed, and carried forward in its turn, the process being repeated until the fly is absolutely covered in a sheet of silk so firm that, though still alive, motion is almost wholly prevented. It was my intention to insert here a representation of the spider thus engaged; but I have not yet been able to satisfy myself whether, in taking the silk from the spinners, the foot is put under the thread already hanging from them, or merely against it, the filaments being, in this case, caught upon the short hairs covering the foot; and as the figure would have to show it in one way or the other, it is better to leave it for some other occasion.

This operation appears to be the same as with the Nephila plumipes, and indeed is common to most geometrical spiders; but there is some difference among them, and even under different circumstances with the same ones, for sometimes the insect is first seized in the jaws and held until nearly or quite dead before it is covered with silk, while at other times this is done at once, and the fatal bite inflicted afterward. What may be the effect of this bite upon animals and men I know not, but will repeat the opinion elsewhere expressed, that the bite of different species is not equally severe. In order to aid in settling the question it is desirable that, when people are bitten and the offender can not be secured for a proper examination, some notice be taken as to whether it is a hunting spider, of a black or gray color, with short, thick legs, or a garden spider, with longer and more slender limbs, and often of brighter colors.

During the same month (August, 1865) the colored man who accompanied me to James Island went a second time with a companion and secured ninety spiders, which, however, remained in the boxes for nearly two weeks before I could attend to them, and then my time was so limited that I only made a record as to how many had died, and what each one had done while in confinement—some having made cocoons, some merely a few irregular lines, some a central nucleus connecting these lines, as if the beginning of the pedicel of a cocoon, and others again having cast their skins. But, so far as my notes contain information on the subject, all these spiders were females—that is, the palpi or feelers were of nearly the same size in their whole length (Fig. 22, P), and never club-shaped at the tip, as is the case with the palpi of most male spiders. These organs are, in all the arachnidæ, subject to strange modifications as to form, being, in some spiders (Fig. 5, P), prolonged so as to appear like a fifth pair of legs; in the scorpions (Fig. 4) still more largely developed into very lobster-like claws; while in the females of most spiders they are shorter than the other limbs, and endowed with such sensibility that, when in use by the Nephila plumipes, and other species with little or no power of vision, they remind one very forcibly of the blind man's feeling-stick; indeed, one can hardly believe that they do not see, when

FIG. 22.—Face of Epeira riparia, showing the eight eyes and the jaws.—P, Palpus.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

they actually turn in their webs and stretch themselves to seize a bit of flesh which has merely been touched by the tips of these palpi. With the males of spiders the last joint of these organs is still more complicated in structure (Fig. 23, P); and, whether or not it secretes the impregnating fluid, it is the organ by which that fluid is conveyed into the body of the female so as to reach the eggs. I can only account for the absence of any males among the ninety females by supposing that, as with the Nephila plumipes, the former are so much the smaller and fewer in number as to have escaped the eyes of the collectors. Nor was this any great discredit to them, since they also escaped the notice of the naturalist Hentz, who has given descriptions and figures of many American spiders, and among them of the female of this species, but makes no mention whatever of the male.

Fig. 23.—A, Palp of a Male Spider (Epeira fusca), enlarged.—B, Last joint of the same, enlarged.

But we thought this was a new spider. By no means, though new to me when I first saw it. You will find a pretty good representation of the female in Fig. 5, Plate XXX., in Vol. V. Boston Journal of Natural History; and in the text a very brief account of it and of its cocoon. But Hentz, though a resident in Alabama, seems to have known so little of the economy of the insect that, after describing the cocoon as always containing young spiders, he asks: "Is this species viviparous?"

And now I hope that those of my readers who have followed so far the story of the James Island Spider, and who may not unnaturally have owed some of their first interest to having taken for granted that it was found only in the neighborhood of Charleston, will not refuse to study its habits and try to solve some of the questions of which we know so little, when they are told that the Epeira riparia is a geometrical spider, found, according to Hentz, throughout the United States; and that specimens from various parts of the country are contained in the Museum of Comparative Zoology at Cambridge, Massachusetts.

OUR EXPECTED GUESTS.

I AM a young married woman. I married a widower some years older than myself, and I have been married—let me see, how long?—why, it is now six years and seven months since I was married; so I might have left out the word "young," for I was full five-and-twenty when I was married.

Excuse me one moment. I want to stop and explain something. You may think—and I dare say you do, and very naturally too—that I have not stated the above facts with as much terseness as I might have done; you think I might have given you all the information contained in my sentence just as well without saying five times over that I was married.

Well, yes, I suppose I might; and then, again, I mightn't; for you must understand that my main object and intent was to fix the idea in your mind at the very outset that I am married; and some people have to be told any thing half a dozen times over, "here a little, and there a little," and by-and-by a great deal, before they can fully take it in. And although you may not be one of that obtuse sort—and I don't believe you are—or you may think it is very unimportant to you, and no sort of matter whether I am married or not, it is of the greatest importance in the world to me, and I can't have it overlooked any way. It is the one great event of my whole life; it is the date by which I reckon every thing else, before or since. My marriage! Why, my birth was not a circumstance compared with it in my estimation! Besides, the fact of my being born is a mere matter of record; I have to take it all upon trust, second-hand, for I can't be expected to remember so long ago. But as regards my wedding, that is all within my own memory. My marriage! It was the great object of my earnest wishes while I was single, and the great subject of my fervent gratitude and self-congratulation ever since it took place.

There! I knew you would laugh at that; I expected you would, so it does not disconcert me in the least. You think I was a silly, commonplace sort of girl, seeking only for adulation, éclat, and wedding finery—looking forward to an early marriage as a lucky chance, a fortunate adventure—or, worse still, a good financial speculation, which should release me from parental discipline and surveillance, and give me independence of action and a much-coveted superiority over the unmarried girls "of our set." But it was not so. I was not that sort of girl at all; I was not, indeed. I just want

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

you to wait and hear my account of the matter, and then I am sure you will do me more justice.

I had been a lonely child, and I grew up a still more lonely girl, the only child of my parents. My young mother died at the time of my birth—her health undermined, as I have been told, by grief for my father, who had died just four months previous. My grandparents on both sides had preceded their children to the "Land of the Hereafter," and I came upon earth only to find it made desolate by the loss of all that makes earth dearest.

I had no relations nearer to me than cousins. Now cousins are very well in their way, no doubt; they are a great deal better than nothing, certainly; a great deal to be thankful for, any way. I think a great deal of cousins in general, and when one happens to be brought up with them in the same family circle, of course propinquity does a great deal, and may elevate them to a brotherly or sisterly place in your affections for life. Yes, you may run with the little chickens, and if the old hen is motherly, and does not peck at you, or rudely pluck out your little pin-feathers, you may almost forget you are a duck, and not one of the original brood. But this was not the case with me and my cousins. I never had lived with them; they were all a vast deal older and wiser than I was. They were married men and women. They gave me a great deal of the best advice, "sage reproof and counsel too," as much as I would take—and more; but, somehow or other, I did not seem to fraternize with them as much as could be wished. Nice people they were too, and made me splendid presents when I was married. But, well—there, you know how it is. I dare say you've met with just such cases before now.

My guardians and trustees were nice people too. I believe they did their solemn duty to me: had me christened and vaccinated and photographed from time to time; had my teeth attended to and my hair cut; put me to the best of schools, and asked me to their houses to pass a week at Christmas-time in regular succession, and managed my money-matters very judiciously; for I had a comfortable little independence left me by my father, which, during my long and unexpensive minority, they had faithfully nursed, and tended, and rolled up, until, at my coming of age, I had quite a pretty little fortune—more than enough to supply all my wants.

Yes; I had every thing I could want but one thing. A home I had not—I never had had. From boarding-schools to boarding-houses this had been my only experience. To have a home was the one great longing of my nature. I saw with an intense interest, amounting almost to envy, I am afraid, other young girls the objects of affectionate and assiduous interest to father, mother, brothers, or sisters; I saw them the unheeding recipients of a thousand little nameless acts of devotion and love for which my lonely soul thirsted in vain. I saw them sharing in all the holy and beautiful amenities of home, apparently unconscious of the blessings they possessed. But I—I had, as the French express it, no chez moi, no home; and how could I have? how could a young girl gather a household around her who had no relations but cousins, and they all settled in establishments of their own?

I reflected upon the subject deeply; I brought to bear upon it all the powers of my intellect; and I could see but one sole remedy. There was nothing for me to do but to marry! To marry? Yes, that was just what I must do; but marry whom?—that was the question! I had beaux enough and to spare. I will not call them lovers—they were not worthy of that good old English word; but I could not marry a man for his dancing or his whiskers. I would as soon have wedded one of the waxen-faced gentry with well-oiled mustache and faultless raiment, who smile upon us from the plate-glass windows of some tailoring establishment. No; I did not want to spend all my life in polkaing and the German; and I did want companionship, protection, and support. I did not need to marry to be free from restraint, to be independent, to have an establishment; to say, "my horses," or "my opera box," instead of "my father." Oh no! I was tired of all that lonely possession, and I longed rather to sink my individuality. I wanted to belong to some one else; to put the reins, of which I was fairly weary, into stronger and more skillful hands; to have an adviser whose interests were identical with mine. I did not mean or intend to renounce my crown and abdicate my throne like the weakling Charles; but, like the good Queen of modern times, I wanted a King-Consort. Ah! how well I remember that it used to seem to me that in summing up all the divine attributes there was none so winning as that which is conveyed in the words, "He setteth the solitary in families," and, for the matter of that, I think so still.

I used to think what a blessed thing it would be if it could be so ordered that, without offending against the conventionality of society, there could be some civil and well-recognized contract by which an earnest, innocent, high-minded woman, who did not choose to marry, might be suffered sans peur et sans reproche to elect for herself a brother, father, uncle, or grandfather, as her taste might dictate or circumstances offer, and create a home which would be doubly blessed to herself and another. I used to think so then for myself, and I think so yet for others. I am sure I know in my own circle of personal acquaintance a score of women, good, true, and warm-hearted, who have passed the season of youth and romance, yet have kept their youth's true romance fresh and pure in their heart's deepest recesses; and who, having never found what their fancy had pictured—for, alas, how "few find what they could or would have loved!"—have bravely determined not to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

carry on the quotation, and marry only because "the strong necessity of loving has removed antipathies;" but to meet the idle scoffs of the world in single life, rather than to desecrate their souls by a heartless marriage without love; and who, learning at last to look upon themselves as among the things "which God has made superfluously, and needed not to build creation with," are quietly waiting his will, wearing out patient, lonely lives in the dull selfishness of a boarding-house; who, enthroned in such a home, and dignified and ennobled by the household cares which are woman's true province, would be a very sun and centre of peace and gladness, a joy to themselves and a source of joy to others.

Oh, ye true sisters of charity! uncrowned martyrs, of whom the world is not worthy, and of whom it may never hear!—ministering angels with yet undeveloped wings! drooping beneath your many crosses—faint not nor be weary; for the hour shall surely come when the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed; and for you there shall yet arise praise and blessing and honor from hearts and homes which your unobtrusive and unappreciated labors of love have kept pure and sweet, though now they may be regarded with only a pitiful endurance.

But I must hasten on, for I am talking too much at right and left now; and my husband, who is a lawyer, says my style is apt to be rather too, too—well, what did he call it? voluminous? verbose? diffusive? ornate? No, no! not just either of these words; I can't think what it was—garrulous, could that be it? no, not just that very word; but I guess it meant a good deal like it, so I must take care.

Well, to go back—I looked about, and I looked about, but all in vain. I was getting on in life; I was almost five-and-twenty, and I declare I began to think, and I used to sing the old Mother Goose song of "How can I be married without any wife?" only by certain verbal variations, suiting it to my own sad circumstances, when that gracious Power that does "set the solitary in families" brought me into acquaintance with Henry La More, and I married him, and I'm very glad I did, and I do not think he has ever regretted it.

Mr. La More is seven or eight years older than I am. I liked that; I could the more gracefully accede to the dictates of his superior wisdom and experience. He was a lawyer in good practice, and I had enough of this world's goods—not to make me a mark for fortune-hunters, but quite enough to make me feel easy in marrying him.

Mr. La More was a widower and had two children. Now I know there is a prejudice against second-hand children: many young ladies do object to them; but I did not. I was glad enough of them. They were something to go to housekeeping with. I was thankful he had them. I always did like a large family; and if he had had a dozen instead of two I think I should have clucked them all in under my motherly wings and brooded them in great contentment. I only regretted he had not an old mother for me to pet, a bachelor brother, or two old maiden sisters to add to the household circle; but he had not, so I took the two little children very thankfully.

Now I dare say you expect that I shall have in the end to say these children have proved the torments of my existence; but it is no such thing. Two sweet, pretty, gentle, loving little girls, they have been every thing to me; and now, when I have three little ones of my own, they are just as dear to me as ever. If any evil should threaten either of our little flock it may be that the mother-instinct in me would assert itself; but I do not at present, upon the closest scrutiny, feel that I love one more than the others—unless it is the baby—and he is our only boy, and so cunning!

As to my predecessor, I don't mind telling you, in confidence, that I should much rather have been my husband's first choice, and that I had naturally rather a prejudice about widowers and second marriages; but then it was too late to remedy that when we met, and as he had never seen me when he married her, it was not the slightest possible slight to me, you understand. And then, again, there were the children; if it had not been for her I should not have had them. That thought brought the balance right again; and, upon the whole, I guess she was a good enough sort of a woman; and so, considering she was our first wife and so one of the family, I got at last to have a very kindly regard to her memory.

But I am getting in advance of my story now. I married him. I do not intend to afflict you with all the details of our wedding. You know all that sort of thing, of course. It was all according to rule, got up in the best taste, and in the most approved fashion; so much lace, so much wedding-cake—flounces, flowers, rich presents, diamond ring, and bridal tour. But in fact I did not care very much for any of these things; flowers and diamonds I had had in profusion, wedding-cake I never eat, and Catskill, Niagara, Sharon, and the White Mountains—why! I had taken them at regular intervals, as dyspeptic people take spring bitters, ever since I left school.

The prettiest part of the whole wedding paraphernalia in my eyes were the cake-boxes marked "Mr. and Mrs. Henry La More's compliments;" that looked so sociable—I can not tell you how delightful it was to me to find an owner; I that had been drifting round the world unclaimed by any near relation; I that had felt myself an isolated thing—a fragment struck off from the great human family—was now part and parcel of a domestic circle; I that had been wandering through life lonely and purposeless as a comet, and almost as much speculated upon, was now moving in harmonious measure in a regular sphere, my motions timed and ordered by one whose wisdom I relied upon.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Yes, we had a grand tour, and I enjoyed it, of course; it could not be otherwise. We went to Saratoga and to the lakes, and I do not know where we did not go; and all the time in my inmost heart I was longing for the day when we should go home and settle quietly down to my housekeeping. Oh that word Home! it embodied so much to me. The pride and delight with which I thought and timidly talked of our garden, our house; even our pig and our cat became very interesting animals to me, because I had a partnership in them. I used to watch eagerly at the hotels to see my husband enter our names as "Mr. and Mrs. H. La More," with a genuine thrill of enjoyment; and when I first saw him sign a check, "H. La More and Co.," I felt a sort of childish jealousy that "Co." did not mean me. In fact, I was so delighted at the idea of a community of goods that I was several times upon the point of saying, "Our hat and walking-stick—our ear-rings and sunshade;" and I think I was only saved from this absurdity by a timely recollection of the hospitable intentions of the mistress of a sea-side boarding-house, who, hearing a young lady boarder vainly regretting she had left her tooth-brush at home, remarked, with equal kindness and naïveté: "Law! dear sakes! don't mind that a bit, I am sure you can use ours just as well as not."

Well! our journeying was over at last, and we went home. And it certainly was a lovely place—so convenient, and fitted and furnished in such good taste; quite out of town, and with such pretty grounds—large enough for all enjoyment, and not large enough to be a trouble or expense to keep them in good order. And the two dear little girls came running out to receive us, and made friends with me at once; and our Cat was a splendid Maltese, and the most dignified and well-bred cat I ever saw in all my life; and I did not like the looks of our old cook at all; but as my husband said I was to change her just as soon as I pleased if she did not suit me, I concluded to try her a while before I made any fuss. And we had such kind and pleasant neighbors, so friendly and so different from city neighbors. And then our Cow, why, she was a perfect lady; I am very fond of milk and cream, and she was, as the astronomers would say, "clearly distinguished in the milky way!"

As to our Pig, though I often talked about him with the children, I must own I did not make his acquaintance. I found he lived in a rather damp basement under the barn; that he was not of a social turn of mind, but kept himself to himself, and did not go into society at all; and as my own temperament did not agree with his, I never called upon him; particularly as the children said he was of a greedy and very dissatisfied turn, always squealing if not fed, and grunting if he was, which seemed very unamiable in him. But I have rather regretted since that I did not do something to make his lonely life more agreeable to him; for, like too many of our human fellow-creatures, it was not until after his sad but virtuous life had come to a sudden and violent close that we fully realized what a pig he was! And when we came to sum up all his excellent parts, from his chops to his trotters, his hams and his shoulders, his spare-ribs and chine pieces, his harslet and middlings, we were fairly astonished at the magnitude of his merits; and as the briny drops fell fast over his cold remains, we looked at each other and said, "We had no idea there was so much in him!"

Altogether I was just as happy as a summer bird, and my heart, like the morning stars, fairly sung for joy, and I— but what was I going to tell you? I know I had something to tell when I began, at least I thought I had; but I have been so—well, yes, we'll call it "garrulous," I have almost forgotten what it was about. Oh yes! I remember now, it was about the first time I expected any of my husband's family to come to make us a visit.

It was the second summer after our marriage. I had been a wife one year and a half, and my baby was just three months old. I had not quite got up my strength, and I suppose I was nervous, for I did so fuss over that first baby; and she was a little, healthy, rugged, easy-going child, too, as ever a mother was blessed with. But my knowledge of babies was at that time altogether theoretic. I loved them intensely; but as to the care of them, I knew no more of that than "the man in the moon," who is, I believe, the received type of ignorance upon all points, though why he should be, with his exalted opportunities of observation, I really never could understand.

Oh, how I did fuss over that baby! I had such a solemn sense of my great responsibility in the charge of a "young immortal" that the very consciousness of my weakness made me distrust the little knowledge and judgment I really had. Fortunately I had a good, kind, practical, common-sense nurse; if I had not had I think I should have worried myself and the baby—not to say the rest of the family—out of existence.

If the baby did not sleep as usual, I was sure she was sick—going to have a brain-fever, possibly. If she slept more than usual, I dreaded she was going into a lethargy. If she cried, I was sure she was ill; and when she did not cry I feared she was in a stupor. I almost put her eyes out holding her in the strong light to be certain she was not born blind; and when the dear little innocent, in her unconscious sleep, indulged in those diabolical grimaces which, I regret to say, the best and sweetest of babies are prone to in their sleep, I was possessed with the idea she was going into convulsions, and poked her awake to be sure she was not, to the disgust of nurse.

I have often thought since of the boy who, in an agony of awe and remorse, cried out that he had "been, and went, and killed a cherubim!" I think I fully shared all his awe and distress;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

only in my case it was not remorse at having killed my cherubim, but overwhelming anxiety lest I should. It was just while matters were in this state that my husband one day brought home a letter—a mere letter of business—from his sister's husband; but at the close it contained the following short but, to me, important announcement: "Love to Mary and the little ones; please tell Mary that Isabella and I mean to run down one of these fine days and spend a week or so with you."

That was all—"only that, and nothing more;" it looked simple enough at first, certainly; nothing very alarming in the idea of a friend and his wife—some of your own family, too—coming to pass a few days with you—and possibly a month or more to get ready in.

Oh, that is the very point! don't you see it? Ah! then it is possibly because you are a man and not a young housekeeper. That vague uncertainty as to the time; and then a whole month given you to get ready in! How much they must expect! Oh, if they had only come now, just out of hand, unexpectedly, it had been so much better! They would not have expected so much; and I should not have aimed at so much. I should have made a very good appearance, taken unawares; and all would have been easy and sociable. But now I had time enough and to spare; and I must look after my laurels, and be sure and have every thing in prime order, for

"From those to whom so much is given,
How much may be required!"

Aunt Isabella (Mrs. Allenbie) was my husband's elder sister; and it must be confessed that at that time I stood a good deal in awe of her. She was a rather formal, dignified, stately personage, much older than I; indeed, she was some years older than her brother, who, I used to think, was somewhat in awe of her himself; at least his respect and attention to her and her opinions amounted almost to reverence. He always deferred to her rules in all that related to domestic matters, and I knew that he considered her a model housekeeper. I was but little acquainted with her myself; we had, of course, met once or twice at the time of my marriage, and she had treated me with great attention and kindness. Still, she had a cold, dispassionate way of looking at me, as if she was gauging me—in some way taking my mental and moral weight, depth, and breadth; and I had a humiliating and most uncomfortable sense that she might think me light weight and short measure. Now that I know her better I love her dearly, and do full justice to all her many excellent qualities; but then I was awfully in dread of her. Sisters-in-law are said to be hard to please, and I felt she would come prepared

"To view me with a critic's eye, Nor pass my imperfections by."

And for my own gratification, and to justify my husband's choice, I was determined to outdo myself; and so, then and there, began a series of petty care-takings, wearying to mind and body both.

First, my cook was rather extravagant, and slightly inclined to dispute my authority, upon the ground of my disparity in years; and I had made up my mind to make a change in that department; but then she did make rich soups, and get up such pretty side-dishes, and such delicate tea and breakfast cakes and relishes, I must keep her until my guests had come and gone; and a present of a new shawl was the flag of truce which I held out with ready hand but reluctant heart.

What a mercy I felt it was for me that the spring cleaning was all well over; to be sure, the white draperies of the guest-chamber had been taken down, and nicely got up, and they were all "laid out," white and stiff as sheeted ghosts, upon the bed. It had been my intention to have them put up again that very week; but then, as Isabella was coming, I wanted to have her find them in all the beauty of their fresh gloss and newness; so they were condemned still to lie in state, and the chamber was left to "scud under bare poles," as the sailors say, for some weeks longer.

The children's summer dresses were all in readiness, and it was quite time to make the change; but they could not put them on then, they must wear their old dresses until their aunt came, for Aunt Isabella is quite particular in the matter of dress. I had intended to have little Belle's hair cut that spring; her father had said her long curls would ruin her eyes; but it would change her appearance so much, and her aunt, for whom she was named, might think, perhaps, that it was just a malicious stepmother's act of cruel power, making a really pretty child look like that. No! I felt the curls must not be cut till Aunt Isabella had been and gone, even if the child did have weak eyes; so I contrived to tie them up with ribbons.

The weeks rolled on; June had come, and our place looked lovely; "the plot thickened;" they might come any day now; but oh! if I had only known when! "If," I said to myself, "they would only happen to come while our beautiful Wistaria is in such full bloom; before the climbing roses fade; if they could only be here while this splendid moon lasts, or while this delightful June weather continues!" as if I, personally, was answerable for all these. Next, I began living in a state of constant watchfulness and preparation. Our own family being small—only ourselves and the children—I fell (in view of the impending visit) into a habit of keeping house "by a system of double entry" (so to speak)—day by day providing not only for the actual but for the possible dinner—the dinner which was to be, and also the dinner which might be, and would be if they came; a corps de reserve in the larder, and reinforcements in ambush in pantry and store-room; the reserve corps of to-day to be the pièce de résistance of to-morrow, and so on and on through the whole week.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Batch after batch of rich cake I had made and kept as an edible "trust fund;" and when it had reached its last limits of freshness it had to be confiscated to the use of the children, for whom it was neither intended nor suitable. Oh, the labor and expense "to a small, genteel family residing in the country," as the newspapers express it, of the visitors who do not come!

It had got to be the last week in June. I felt they must come then; and whenever I went out for a walk or a drive I cast many "a longing, lingering look behind," to survey my premises; to try to judge how they would strike the eyes of strangers; to be certain that all was in perfect order—no scattered threads, no fallen scissors, no turned-down book, to bear mute evidence against me and the tidiness of my habits.

And I left repeated injunctions to Thomas to be at hand to receive our guests and carry up their luggage promptly; and I gave Mary O'Neal private instructions, until we were both weary of the subject, about showing them to their room, asking the lady to lay off her bonnet, offering to brush the gentleman's coat, proffering the Oriental refreshment of cool water and napkins, and deporting herself as a well-trained chamber-maid should do; for I wished Isabella to see that I did have well-drilled servants, if I did live out of town. And every day when I came home I looked in vain for the mark of wheels upon the nicely-kept approach, which John, by my express orders, raked off twice as often as he had been accustomed to do.

One day, on returning from a drive, nurse met me with a troubled face and the information that the two little girls had had a tumble. It appeared that they were running, hand in hand, in the garden walks, when little Lily tripped and fell, dragging Belle down after her. They were not much hurt, she said, only scratched and bruised a good deal; and sure enough, on lifting my eyes, there they were, upon the landing of the stairs, ruefully smiling down upon me through the railing of the balusters, like a pair of most forlorn game chickens in a coop.

Belle had a cut on her lip, and her cheek, chin, and arms scratched by the gravel; and Lily had her forehead and nose badly scratched, and a very black eye. If it had not been for my sorrow I really think I should have laughed, they looked so wobegone, suggesting at once the idea of two little domestic gladiators, who had just come from a regular "set-to" in a private ring in the nursery; and they were such gentle little things too, I do not believe their childish differences ever went beyond "Please, Lily, don't do so!" or "Belle, dear, I don't want you to do that!" And there they were, in a plight such as would naturally suggest a pugilistic encounter to any impartial observer.

But I was thankful they were not more seriously hurt; and I went to work with zeal at once, using cold cream for the cuts and scratches, and fresh butter and wormwood for the bruises, and comforted up their sad little hearts with some extra jam and cake for their supper, and sent them to bed wonderfully relieved by the welcome assurance that mamma did not blame them at all.

But the next morning, when my husband came down to breakfast, after his usual morning visit to the nursery, fond as he was of his children, he could not help laughing,

"Why, Mary, what a looking set you have got in the nursery! Sore, battered, and bruised, they look as if they had had to undergo pretty severe discipline. I shall have to spend all my eloquence to convince Isabella that you are not a regular termagant."

Playful words thoughtlessly uttered; but I leave it to you, could he have said any thing worse? It was the one thought which had haunted me, and he had given it utterance. But then, men never do see such things in the same light we do; and my husband, although the very best of men, is (at least I suppose so) only mortal; so he went off to his office, unconscious of the deadly stab he had given me; and I went back to my cold cream.

The next night I fancied my baby was more restless than usual, nestling and fidgeting round in her little crib by my bedside; but as the night was warm, and I was restless myself, I did not think much of it; but in the morning, when my eyes fell upon her, she looked as if she had been sprinkled from head to foot with red pepper. I was horrified; and with fearful forebodings, and dire but very undeveloped apprehensions of small-pox, erysipelas, scarlet-fever, and measles, all rising in my mind at once, I summoned nurse and pointed in my speechless terror to the child.

The unfeeling woman actually laughed.—"Law, Miss La More! don't, dear, look so scared; that ain't nothing in the world but just the 'red goom!' Nearly all babies has it, more or less, and the fairest complected children has it the worst; it will be all gone in a day or two; law, sakes! that isn't nothing!"

"Nothing" indeed! and it had changed my lily-white babe in one night to the appearance of a boiled lobster or a wild Indian! What the "red goom" was I did not know then, and I am sure I don't know now—perhaps more experienced matrons among my readers may; but nurse was a very firm and resolute woman, she never suffered her experience to be upset by the breath of my inexperience. She said it would all go off in a day or two, and it did.

The last days of June came. Nothing but my pride and self-respect withheld me from asking my husband to write, and ask what had detained them; and even these impediments were beginning to give way under the nervous impatience and anxiety with which, like Mrs. Bluebeard's unmarried sister Anne, I was looking out for our long-expected guests. Still, I hated to speak to him about it; I could not tell him what a bugbear his sister was to me, and gentlemen never understand these things. I was sure he would say, "Don't think a word more about it;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

if they come, let them come, and take us as we are. They don't come expecting us to make strangers of them, or if they do, let them find that we don't expect to do it; besides, we always live well enough—don't fret or fuss yourself about it, my dear Mary." Oh! yes, that is it; nothing is a trouble to those upon whom the trouble does not come.

But one day, when Mr. La More was later than usual to dinner, he handed me a letter as he went up to his dressing-room:

"DEAR HENRY,—The late important commercial news has decided me to go abroad at once. My wife goes with me, of course. As we leave this week, this alters all our plans for the summer; Isabella joins me in love to Mary and the little ones; hope our visit to you is only a pleasure postponed: what can we do for you in Paris?" etc.

And this was all; this was the final result of all my painstaking! Yes: this disappointment was my "portion of all my labor and travail which I had taken under the sun." I could have cried with a hearty good-will; but it was just dinner-time. I have an idea that tears are not in good taste at the head of one's table; and it is ungraceful, not to say awkward, to weep and help to soup at the same time.

Mr. La More came down, and we went in to dinner. "I wonder," he said, "how long Charles and Isabella intend to remain abroad?"

"His letter does not say," I replied, with forced calmness. "Possibly he does not know himself until he gets there. Lily, my dear, do not tip up your plate in that way when you take your soup; that is not ladylike."

A BRACE OF BOYS.

I AM a bachelor uncle. That, as a mere fact, might happen to any body; but I am a bachelor uncle by internal fitness. I am one essentially, just as I am an individual of the Caucasian division of the human race; and if through untoward circumstances—which Heaven forbid!—I should lose my present position, I shouldn't be surprised if you saw me out in the Herald under "Situations Wanted—Males." Thanks to a marrying tendency in the rest of my family, I have now little need to advertise, all the business being thrown into my way which a single member of my profession can attend to.

I suppose you won't agree with me; but do you know sometimes I think it's better than having children of one's own? People tell me that I'd feel very differently if I did have any. Perhaps so; but then, too, I might be unwise with them. I might bother them into mischief by trying to keep them out. I might be avaricious of them—might be tempted to lock them up in my own stingy old nursery chest, instead of paying them out to meet the bills of humanity and keep the Lord's business moving. I might forget, when I had spent my life in fining their gold and polishing their graven-work, that they were still vessels for the Master's use—I only the butler—the sweetness and the spirit with which they brimmed all belonging to His lips who tasted bitterness for me. Then, if seeking to drain another's wine I raised the chalice to my lips and found it gall, or felt it steal into my old veins to poison the heart and paralyze the hand which had kept it from the Master, what further good would there be for me in the world? Who doesn't know in some friend's house a closet containing that worst of skeletons—the skeleton which, in becoming naked, grim, and ghastly, tears its way through our own flesh and blood?

To be an uncle is a different kind of thing. There you have nothing of the excitement of responsibility to shake your judgment. That's what makes us bachelor uncles so much better judges of what's good for children than their fathers and mothers. We know that nobody will blame us if our nephews unjoint their knuckles or cut their fingers off; so we give them five-bladed knives and boxing-gloves. This involves getting thanked at the time, which is pleasant; and if no catastrophe occurs, when they have grown stout and ingenious, with what calm satisfaction we hear people say, "See what a pretty wind-mill the child's whittled out with Uncle Ned's birthday present!" or "That boy's grown an inch round the chest since you set him sparring!" Uncles never get stale. They don't come every day like parents and plain pudding; they're a sort of holiday relative, with a plummy, Christmas flavor about them. Every body hasn't got them; they're not so rare as the meteoric showers, but as occasional as a particularly fine day, and whenever they come to a house they're in the nature of a pleasant surprise.

I meander, like a desultory, placid river of an old bachelor as I am, through the flowery mead of several nurseries. I am detained by all the little roots that run down into me to drink happiness, but I linger longest among the children of my sister Lu.

Lu married Mr. Lovegrove. He is a merchant, retired with a fortune amassed by the old-fashioned, slow processes of trade, and regards the mercantile life of the present day only as so much greed and gambling Christianly baptized. For the ten years elapsing since he sold out of Lovegrove, Cashdown, and Co. he has devoted himself to his family and a revival of letters, taking up again the Latin and Greek which he had not looked at since his college days until he dismissed teas and silks to adorn a suburban villa with the spectacle of a prime Christian parent and Pagan scholar. Lu is my favorite sister; Lovegrove an unusually good article of brother-in-law; and I can not say that any of my nieces and nephews interest me more than their two children, Daniel and Billy, who are more unlike than words can paint them. They are far apart in point of years; Daniel is twenty-two, Billy eleven. I was reminded of this fact the other day by Billy, as he stood between my legs, scowling at his book of sums.

"'A boy has eighty-five turnips, and gives

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

his sister thirty'—pretty present for a girl, isn't it?" said Billy, with an air of supreme contempt. "Could you stand such stuff—say?"

I put on my instructive face and answered:

"Well, my dear Billy, you know that arithmetic is necessary to you if you mean to be an industrious man and succeed in business. Suppose your parents were to lose all their property, what would become of them without a little son who could make money and keep accounts?"

"Oh!" said Billy, with surprise. "Hasn't father got enough stamps to see him through?"

"He has now, I hope; but people don't always keep them. Suppose they should go by some accident, when your father was too old to make any more stamps for himself—"

"You haven't thought of brother Daniel—"

True; for nobody ever had, in connection with the active employments of life.

"No, Billy," I replied, "I forgot him; but then, you know, Daniel is more of a student than a business man, and—"

"Oh, Uncle Teddy! you don't think I mean he'd support them? I meant I'd have to take care of father and mother, and him too, when they'd all got to be old people together. Just think! I'm eleven, and he's twenty-two; so he's just twice as old as I am. How old are you?"

"Forty, Billy, last August."

"Well, you aren't so awful old, and when I get to be as old as you Daniel will be eighty. Seth Kendall's grandfather isn't more than that, and he has to be fed with a spoon, and a nurse puts him to bed, and wheels him round in a chair like a baby. That takes the stamps, I bet! Well, I'll tell you how I'll keep my accounts; I'll have a stick, like Robinson Crusoe, and every time I make a toadskin I'll gouge a piece out of one side of the stick, and every time I spend one I'll gouge a piece out of the other."

"Spend a what?" said the gentle and astonished voice of my sister Lu, who, unperceived, had slipped into the room.

"A toadskin, ma," replied Billy, shutting up Colburn with a farewell glance of contempt.

"Dear, dear! Where does the boy learn such horrid words?"

"Why, ma! Don't you know what a toadskin is? Here's one," said Billy, drawing a dingy five-cent stamp from his pocket. "And don't I wish I had lots of 'em!"

"Oh!" sighed his mother, "to think I should have a child so addicted to slang! How I wish he were like Daniel!"

"Well, mother," replied Billy, "if you wanted two boys just alike you'd oughter had twins. There ain't any use of my trying to be like Daniel now, when he's got eleven years the start. Whoop! There's a dog-fight; hear 'em! It's Joe Casey's dog—I know his bark!"

With these words my nephew snatched his Glengarry bonnet from the table and bolted down stairs to see the fun.

"What will become of him?" said Lu, hopelessly; "he has no taste for any thing but rough play; and then such language as he uses! Why isn't he like Daniel?"

"I suppose because his Maker never repeats himself. Even twins often possess strongly marked individualities. Don't you think it would be a good plan to learn Billy better before you try to teach him? If you do, you'll make something as good of him as Daniel; though it will be rather different from that model."

"Remember, Ned, that you never did like Daniel as well as you do Billy. But we all know the proverb about old maids' daughters and old bachelors' sons. I wish you had Billy for a month—then you'd see."

"I'm not sure that I'd do any better than you. I might err as much in other directions. But I'd try to start right by acknowledging that he was a new problem, not to be worked without finding out the value of x in his particular instance. The formula which solves one boy will no more solve the next one than the rule-of-three will solve a question in calculus—or, to rise into your sphere, than the receipt for one-two-three-four cake will conduct you to a successful issue through plum-pudding—"

I excel in metaphysical discussion, and was about giving further elaboration to my favorite idea when the door burst open. Master Billy came tumbling in with a torn jacket, a bloody nose, the trace of a few tears in his eyes, and the mangiest of cur dogs in his hands.

"Oh my! my!! my!!!" exclaimed his mother.

"Don't you get scared, ma!" cried Billy, smiling a stern smile of triumph; "I smashed the nose off him! He won't sass me again for nothing this while! Uncle Teddy, d'ye know it wasn't a dog-fight after all? There was that nasty, good-for-nothing Joe Casey, 'n Patsy Grogan, and a lot of bad boys from Mackerelville; and they'd caught this poor little ki-oodle and tied a tin pot to his tail, and were trying to set Joe's dog on him, though he's ten times littler—"

"You naughty, naughty boy! How did you suppose your mother'd feel to see you playing with those ragamuffins?"

"Yes, ma, I played 'em! I polished 'em—that's the play I did! Said I, 'Put down that poor little pup; ain't you ashamed of yourself, Patsy Grogan?' 'I guess you don't know who I am,' says he. That's the way they always say, Uncle Teddy, to make a fellow think they're some awful great fighters. So says I again, 'Well, you put down that dog, or I'll show you who I am;' and when he held on, I let him have. Then he dropped the pup, and as I stooped to pick it up he gave me one on the bugle."

"Bugle! Oh! oh! oh!"

"The rest pitched in to help him; but I grabbed the pup, and while I was trying to give as good as I got—only a fellow can't do it well with only one hand, Uncle Teddy—up came a

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

policeman, and the whole crowd ran away. So I got the dog safe, and here he is!"

With that Billy set down his "ki-oodle," bid farewell to every fear, and wiped his bleeding nose. The unhappy beast slunk between the legs of his preserver and followed him out of the room, as Lu, with an expression of maternal despair, bore him away for the correction of his dilapidated raiment and depraved associations. I felt such sincere pride in this young Mazzini of the dog-nation that I was vexed at Lu for bestowing on him reproof instead of congratulation; but she was not the only conservative who fails to see a good cause and a heroic heart under a bloody nose and torn jacket. I resolved that if Billy was punished he should have his recompense before long in an extra holiday at Barnum's or the Hippotheatron.

You already have some idea of my other nephew if you have noticed that none of us, not even that habitual disrespecter of dignities, Billy, ever called him Dan. It would have seemed as incongruous as to call Billy William. He was one of those youths who never gave their parents a moment's uneasiness; who never had to have their wills broken, and never forgot to put on their rubbers or take an umbrella. In boyhood he was intended for a missionary. Had it been possible for him to go to Greenland's icy mountains without catching cold, or India's coral strand without getting bilious, his parents would have carried out their pleasing dream of contributing him to the world's evangelization. Lu and Mr. Lovegrove had no doubt that he would have been greatly blessed if he could have stood it. They brought him up in the most careful manner, and I can not recollect the time when he was not president, secretary, or something in some society of small yet good children. He was not only an exemplar to whom all Lu's friends pointed their own nursery as the little boy who could say most hymns and sit stillest in church, but he was a reproof even unto his elders. One Sunday afternoon, in the Connecticut village where my brother-in-law used to spend his summers, when half the congregation were slumbering under the combined effect of the heat, a lunch of cheese and apples, and the sermon, my nephew, then aged five, sat bolt upright in the pew, winkless as a deacon hearing a new candidate suspected of shakiness on "a card'nal pint," and mortified almost to death poor old Mrs. Pringle, who, compassionating his years, had handed him a sprig of her "meetin' seed" over the back of the seat, by saying, in a loud and stern voice:

"I don't eat things in church."

I should have spanked the boy when I got home, but Lu with tears in her eyes quoted something about the mouths of babes and sucklings.

Both she and his father always encouraged old manners in him. I think they took such pride in raising a peculiarly pale boy as a gardener does in getting a nice blanch on his celery, and so long as he was not absolutely sick the graver he was the better. He was a sensitive plant, a violet by a mossy stone, and all that sort of thing. But when in his tenth year he had the measles, and was narrowly carried through, Lu got a scare about him. During his convalescence, reading aloud a life of Henry Martyn to amuse him, she found in it a picture of that young apostle preaching to a crowd of Hindoos without any boots on. An American mother's association of such behavior with croup and ipecac was too strong to be counteracted by known climatic facts; and from that hour, as she never had before, Lu realized that being a missionary might involve going to carry the gospel to the heathen in your stocking feet.

When they had decided that such a life would not do for him, his training had almost entirely unfitted him for any other active calling. The strict propriety with which he had been brought up had resulted in weak lungs, poor digestion, sluggish circulation, and torpid liver. Moreover, he was troubled with the painfulest bashfulness which ever made a mother think her child too ethereal, or a dispassionate outsider regard him too flimsy for this world. These were weights enough to carry, even if he had not labored under that heaviest of all—a well-stored mind.

No misnomer that last to any one who has ever frequented the Atlantic Docks, or seen storage in any large port of entry. How does a store-house look? It's a vast, dark, cold chamber—dust an inch deep on the floor—cobwebs festooning the girders—and piled from floor to ceiling on the principle of getting the largest bulk into the least room, with barrels, boxes, bales, baskets, chests, crates, and carboys—merchandise of all description, from the roughest raw material to the most exquisite choses de luxe. The inmost layers are inextricable without pulling down the outer ones. If you want a particular case of broadcloth you must clear yourself an alley-way through a hundred tierces of hams, and last week's entry of clayed sugars is inaccessible without tumbling on your head a mountain of Yankee notions.

In my nephew's unfortunate youth such storage as this had minds. As long as the crown of his brain's arch was not crushed in by some intellectual Furman Street disaster, those stevedores of learning, the schoolmasters, kept on unloading the Rome and Athens lighters into a boy's crowded skull, and breaking out of the hold of that colossal old junk, The Pure Mathematics, all the formulas which could be crowded into the interstices between his Latin and Greek.

At the time I introduce Billy both Lu and her husband were much changed. They had gained a great deal in width of view and liberality of judgment. They read Dickens and Thackeray with avidity; went now and then to the Opera; proposed to let Billy take a quarter at Dodworth's; had statues in their parlor without any thought of shame at their lack of petti-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

coats, and did multitudes of things which in their early married life they would have considered shocking. Part of this change was due to the great increase of travel, the wonderful progress in art and refinement which has enlarged this generation's thought and corrected its ignorant opinions, infusing cosmopolitanism into our manners by a revolution so gradual that its subjects were a new people before their combativeness became alarmed; yet so rapid that a man of thirty can scarcely believe his birthday, and questions whether he has not added his life up wrong by a century or so when he compares his own boyhood with that of the present day. But a good deal of the transformation resulted from the means of gratifying elegant tastes, the comfort, luxury, and culture which came with Lovegrove's retirement on a fortune. They had mellowed on the sunny shelves of prosperity like every good thing which has an astringent skin when green. They would greatly have liked to see Daniel shine in society. Of his erudition they were proud even to worship. The young man never had any business, and his father never seemed to think of giving him any, knowing, as Billy would say, that he had stamps enough to "see him through." If Daniel liked his father would have endowed a professorship in some college and given him the chair, but that would have taken him away from his own room and the family physician.

Daniel knew how much his parents wished him to make a figure in the world and only blamed himself for his failure, magnanimously forgetting that they had crushed out the faculties which enable a man to mint the small change of everyday society to the exclusive cultivation of such as fit him for smelting the ponderous ingots. With that merciful blindness which alone prevents all our lives from becoming a horror of nerveless self-reproach, his parents were equally unaware of their share in the harm done him, ascribing to delicate organization the fact that, at an age when love runs riot in all healthy blood, he could not see a Balmoral without his cheeks rivaling the most vivid stripe in it. They flattered themselves that he would outgrow his bashfulness; but Daniel had no such hope, and frequently confided in me that he thought he should never marry at all.

About two hours after Billy's disappearance under his mother's convoy the defender of the oppressed returned to my room bearing the dog under his arm. His cheeks shone with washing like a pair of waxy spitzenbergs, and other indignities had been offered him to the extent of the comb and brush. He also had a whole jacket on.

"Well, Billy," said I, "what are you going to do with your dog?"

"I don't know what I'm a-going to do. I've a great mind to be a bad, disobedient boy with him, and not have my days long in the land which the Lord my God giveth me!"

"Oh, Billy'"

"I can't help it. They won't be long if I don't mind ma, she says; and she wants me to be mean, and put Crab out in the street to have Patsy catch him and tie coffee-pots to his tail. I—I—I—"

Here my small nephew dug his fist into his eye and looked down.

I told Billy to stop where he was, and went to intercede with Lu. She was persuaded to entertain the angels of magnanimity and heroism in the disguise of a young fighting character, and accept my surety for the behavior of his dog. Billy and I also obtained permission to go out together and be gone the entire afternoon. We put Crab on a comfortable bed of rags in an old shoe-box, and then strolled hand in hand across that most delightful of New York breathing-places, Stuyvesant Square.

"Uncle Teddy!" exclaimed Billy with ardor, "I wish I could do something to show you how much I think of you for being so good to me. I don't know how—would it make you happy if I was to learn a hymn for you—a smashing big hymn—six verses, long metre, and no grumbling?"

"No, Billy; you make me happy enough just by being a good boy."

"Oh, Uncle Teddy!" replied Billy, decidedly, "I'm afraid I can't do it. I've tried so often, and I always make such an awful mess of it."

"Perhaps you get discouraged too easily—"

"Well, if a savings bank won't do it there ain't any chance for a boy. I got father to get me a savings bank once, and began being good just as hard as ever I could for three cents a day. Every night I got 'em I put 'em in reg'lar, and sometimes I'd keep being good three whole days running. That made a sight of money, I tell you. Then I'd do something, ma said, to kick my pail of milk over, and those nights I didn't get any thing. I used to put in most of my marble and candy-money too."

"What were you going to do with it?"

"It was for an Objeck, Uncle Teddy. That's a kind of Indian, you know, that eats people and wants the gospel. That's what pa says, any way; I didn't ever see one."

"Well, didn't that make you happy—to help the poor little heathen children?"

"That's just it, Uncle Teddy; they never got a cent of it. One time I was good so long I got scared. I was afraid I'd never want to fly my kite on the roof again, or go any where where I oughtn't or have any fun. I couldn't see any use of going and saving all my money to send out to the Objecks, if it was going to make good boys of 'em. It was awful hard for me to have to be a good boy, and it must be worse for them 'cause they ain't used to it. So when there wasn't any body up stairs I went and shook a lot of pennies out of my chimney and bought ever so much taffy, and marbles, and pop-corn. Was that awful mean, Uncle Teddy?"

The question involved such complications

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google that I hesitated. Before I could decide what to answer, Billy continued:

"Ma said it was robbing the heathen, and didn't I get it! I thought if it was robbing I'd have a cop after me."

"What's a 'cop?'"

"That's what the boys call a policeman, Uncle Teddy, and then I should be taken away and put in an awful black place under ground, like Johnny Wilson, when he broke Mrs. Perkins's window. I was scared, I tell you! But I didn't get any thing worse than a whipping, and having my savings bank taken away from me with all that was left in it. I haven't tried to be good since, much."

We now got into a Broadway stage going down, and being unable on account of the noise to converse further upon those spiritual conflicts of Billy's which so much interested me, amused ourselves with looking out until just as we reached the Astor House, when he asked me where we were going.

"Where do you guess?" said I.

He cast a glance through the front window, and his face became irradiated. Oh, there's nothing like the simple, cheap luxury of pleasing a child, to create sunshine enough for the chasing away of the bluest adult devils!

"We're going to Barnum's!" said Billy, involuntarily clapping his hands.

So we were—and, much as stuck-up people pretend to look down on the place, I frequently am. Not only so, but I always see that class largely represented there when I do go. To be sure they always make-believe that they only visit it to amuse the children, or because they've country cousins visiting them, and never fail to refer to the vulgar set one finds there, and the fact of the animals smelling like any thing but Jockey Club; yet I notice that after they've been in the hall three minutes they're as much interested as any of the people they come to poh-poh, and only put on the high-bred air when they fancy some one of their own class is looking at them. I boldly acknowledge that I go because I like it. I am especially happy, to be sure, if I have a child along to go into ecstasies, and give me a chance, by asking questions, for the exhibition of that fund of information which is said to be one of my chief charms in the social circle, and on several occasions has led that portion of the public immediately about the Happy Family into the erroneous impression that I was Mr. Barnum explaining his 500,000 curiosities.

On the present occasion we found several visitors of the better class in the room devoted to the Aquarium. Among these was a young lady apparently about nineteen, in a tight-fitting basque of black velvet which showed her elegant figure to fine advantage, a skirt of garnet silk looped up over a pretty Balmoral, and the daintiest imaginable pair of kid walking-boots. Her height was a trifle over the medium—her eyes a soft expressive brown, shaded by masses of hair which exactly matched their color, and, at that rat-and-miceless day, fell in such graceful abandon as to show at once that nature was the only maid who crimped their waves into them. Her complexion was rosy with health and sympathetic enjoyment; her mouth was faultless, her nose sensitive, her manners full of refinement, and her voice musical as a wood-robin's, when she spoke to the little boy of six at her side, to whom she was revealing the palace of the great show-king. Billy and I were flattening our noses against the abode of the balloon-fish, and determining whether he looked most like a horse-chestnut burr or a ripe cucumber, when his eyes and my own simultaneously fell on the child and lady. In a moment, to Billy, the balloon-fish was as though he had not been.

"That's a pretty little boy!" said I. And then I asked Billy one of those senseless routine questions which must make children look at us, regarding the scope of our intellects very much as we look at bushmen.

"How would you like to play with him?"

"Him!" replied Billy, scornfully, "that's his first pair of boots; see him pull up his little breeches to show the red tops to 'em! But, Crackey! isn't she a smasher!"

After that we visited the wax figures and the sleepy snakes, the learned seal and the glass-blowers, every where enjoying what we saw all the more because that beautiful girl and child were not far from us. Whenever we passed from one room into another, Billy could be caught looking anxiously to see if they were coming too.

Time fails me to describe how Billy was lost in astonishment at the Lightning Calculator—wanted me to beg the secret of that prodigy for him to do his sums by—finally thought he had discovered it, and resolved to keep his arm whirling all the time he studied his arithmetic lesson the next morning. Equally inadequate is it to relate in full how he became so confused among the wax-works that he pinched the solemnest showman's legs to see if he was real, and perplexed the beautiful Circassian to the verge of idiocy by telling her he had read all about the way they sold girls like her in his geography.

We had reached the stairs to that subterranean chamber in which the Behemoth of Holy Writ was wallowing about without a thought of the dignity which one expects from a canonical character. Billy had always languished upon his memories of this diverting beast, and I stood ready to see him plunge headlong the moment that he read the sign-board at the head of the stairs. When he paused and hesitated there, not seeming at all anxious to go down till he saw the pretty girl and the child following after—a sudden intuition flashed across me. Could it be possible that Billy was caught in that vortex which whirled me down at ten years—a little boy's first love?

We were lingering about the elliptical basin, and catching occasional glimpses between bub-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

bles of a vivified hair trunk of monstrous compass, whose knobby lid opened at one end and showed a red morocco lining, when the pretty girl, in leaning over to point out the rising monster, dropped into the water one of her little gloves, and the swash made by the hippopotamus drifted it close under Billy's hand. Either in play or as a mere coincidence the animal followed it. The other children about the tank screamed and started back as he bumped his nose against the side; but Billy manfully bent down and grabbed the glove not an inch from one of his big tusks, then marched round the tank and presented it to the lady with a chivalry of manner in one of his years quite surprising.

"That's a real nice boy—you said so, didn't you, Lottie? and I wish he'd come and play with me," said the little fellow by the young lady's side, as Billy turned away, gracefully thanked, to come back to me with his cheeks roseate with blushes.

As he heard this Billy idled along the edge of the tank for a moment, then faced about and said,

"P'raps I will some day—where d'you live?"

"I live on East Seventeenth Street with papa—and Lottie stays there too now—she's my cousin—where d'you live?"

"Oh, I live close by—right on that big green square, where I guess the nurse takes you once in a while," said Billy, patronizingly. Then, looking up pluckily at the young lady, he added, "I never saw you out there."

"No, Jimmy's papa has only been in his new house a little while, and I've just come to visit him."

"Say, will you come and play with me sometime?" chimed in the inextinguishable Jimmy. "I've got a cooking stove—for real fire—and blocks and a ball with a string."

Billy, who belonged to a club for the practice of the great American game, and was what A. Ward would call the most superior battist among the I. G. B. B. C., or "Infant Giants," smiled from that altitude upon Jimmy, but promised to go and play with him the next Saturday afternoon.

Late that evening, after we had got home and dined, as I sat in my room over Pickwick with a sedative cigar, a gentle knock at the door told of Daniel. I called "Come in!" and entering with a slow, dejected air he sat down by my fire. For ten minutes he remained silent, though occasionally looking up as if about to speak, then dropping his head again to ponder on the coals. Finally I laid down Dickens and spoke myself.

"You don't seem well to-night, Daniel?"

"I don't feel very well, uncle."

"What's the matter, my boy?"

"Oh—ah—I don't know. That is, I wish I had words to tell you."

I studied him for a few moments with kindly curiosity, then answered,

"Perhaps I can save you the trouble by cross-examining it out of you. Let's try the method of elimination. I know that you're not harassed by any economical considerations, for you've all the money you want; and I know that ambition doesn't trouble you, for your tastes are scholarly. This narrows down the investigation of your symptoms, listlessness, general dejection, and all to three causes—Dyspepsia, Religious Conflicts, Love. Now, is your digestion awry?"

"No, Sir, good as usual. I'm not melancholy on religion, and—"

"You don't tell me you're in love?"

"Well—yes—I suppose that's about it, Uncle Teddy."

I took a long breath to recover from my astonishment at this unimaginable revelation, then said,

"Is your feeling returned?"

"I really don't know, Uncle. I don't believe it is. I don't see how it can be. I never did any thing to make her love me. What is there in me to love? I've borne nothing for her—that is, nothing that could do her any good—though I've endured on her account, I may say, anguish. So, look at it any way you please, I neither am, do, nor suffer any thing that can get a woman's love."

"Oh, you man of learning! Even in love you tote your grammar along with you, and arrange a divine passion under active, passive, and neuter heads!"

Daniel smiled faintly. "You've no idea, Uncle Teddy, that you are twitting on facts; but you hit the truth there—indeed you do. If she were a Greek or a Latin woman I could talk Anacreon or Horace to her. If women only understood the philosophy of the flowers as well as they do the poetry—"

"Thank God they don't, Daniel!" sighed I, devoutly.

"Never mind—in that case I could entrance her for hours talking about the grounds of difference between Linnæus and Jussieu. Women like the star business, they say—and I could tell her where all the constellations are; but, sure as I tried to get off any sentiment about them, I'd break down and make myself ridiculous. But what earthly chance would the greatest philosopher that ever lived have with the woman he loved, if he depended for her favor on his ability to analyze her bouquet or tell her when she might look out for the next occultation of Orion? I can't talk bread-and-butter talk. I can't do any thing that makes a man even tolerable to a woman!"

"I hope you don't mean that nothing but bread-and-butter talk is tolerable to a woman?"

"No; but it's necessary to some extent—at any rate the ability is—in order to succeed in society; and it's in society men first meet and strike women. And oh, Uncle Teddy, I'm such a fish out of water in society!—such a dreadful floundering fish! When I see her dancing gracefully as a swan swims, and feel that fellows, like little Jack Mankyn, who don't know twice two is four, can dance to her perfect admiration;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

when I see that she likes ease of manners—and all sorts of men without an idea in their heads have that—while I turn all colors when I speak to her, and am clumsy, abrupt, abstracted, and bad at repartee — Uncle Teddy! sometimes (though it seems so ungrateful to father and mother who have spent such pains for me)—sometimes, do you know, it seems to me as if I'd exchange all I've ever learned for the power to make a good appearance before her."

"Daniel, my boy, you make it too much a matter of reflection. A woman is not to be taken by laying plans. If you love the lady (whose name I don't ask you, because I know you'll tell me as soon as you think it best), you must seek her companionship until you're well enough acquainted for her to have her regard you as something different from the men whom she meets merely in society, and judge your qualities by another standard than that she applies to them. If she's a sensible girl (and God forbid you should marry her otherwise!), she knows that people can't always be dancing, or holding fans, or running after orange-ice. If she's a girl capable of appreciating your best points (and woe to you if you marry a girl who can't!), she'll find them out upon closer intimacy, and, once found, they'll a hundred times outweigh all brilliant advantages kept in the show-case of fellows who have nothing on the shelves. When this comes about you will pop the question unconsciously, and, to adapt Milton, she'll drop into your lap 'gathered—not harshly plucked.'"

"I know that's sensible, Uncle Teddy, and I'll try. Let me tell you the sacredest of secrets: regularly every day of my life I send her a little poem fastened round the prettiest bouquet I can get at Haupt's."

"Does she know who sends them?"

"She can't have any idea. The German boy that takes them knows not a word of English except her name and address. You'll forgive me, uncle, for not mentioning her name yet? You see she may despise or hate me some day when she knows who it is that has paid her these attentions; and then I'd like to be able to feel that at least I've never hurt her by any absurd connection with myself."

"Forgive you? Nonsense! The feeling does your heart infinite credit, though a little counsel with your head would show you that your only absurdity is self-depreciation."

Daniel bid me good-night. As I put out my cigar and went to bed, my mind reverted to the dauntless little Hotspur who had spent the afternoon with me and reversed his mother's wish, thinking—

"Oh, if Daniel were only more like Billy!"

It was always Billy's habit to come and sit with me while I smoked my after-breakfast cigar, but the next morning did not see him enter my room till St. George's hands pointed to a quarter of nine.

"Well, Billy Boy Blue, come blow your horn; what haystack have you been under till this time of day? We sha'n't have a minute to look over our spelling together, and I know a boy who's going in for promotion next week. Have you had your breakfast, and taken care of Crab?"

"Yes, Sir; but I didn't feel like getting up this morning."

"Are you sick?"

"No-o-o—it isn't that; but you'll laugh at me if I tell you."

"Indeed I won't, Billy!"

"Well"—his voice dropped to a whisper, and he stole close to my side—"I had such a nice dream about her just the last thing before the bell rang; and when I woke up I felt so queer—so kinder good and kinder bad—and I wanted to see her so much that if I hadn't been a big boy I believe I should have blubbered. I tried ever so much to go to sleep and see her again; but the more I tried the more I couldn't. After all, I had to get up without it, though I didn't want any breakfast at all, and only ate two buckwheat cakes, though I always eat six you know, Uncle Teddy. Can you keep a secret?"

"Yes, dear, so you couldn't get it out of me if you were to shake me upside down like a savings bank."

"Oh, ain't you mean! That was when I was small I did that. I'll tell you the secret, though—that girl and I are going to get married. I mean to ask her the first chance I get. Oh, isn't she a smasher!"

"My dear Billy, sha'n't you wait a little while to see if you always like her as well as you do now? Then, too, you'll be older."

"I'm old enough, Uncle Teddy, and I love her dearly! I'm as old as the Kings of France used to be when they got married—I read it in Abbott's Histories. But there's the clock striking nine! I must run or I shall get a tardy mark, and, perhaps, she'll want to see my certificate sometime."

So saying he kissed me on the cheek and set off for school as fast as his legs could carry him. O Love, omnivorous Love, that sparest neither the dotard leaning on his staff nor the boy with pantaloons buttoning on his jacket—omnipotent Love, that, after parents and teachers have failed, in one instant can make Billy try to become a good boy!

With both of my nephews hopelessly enamored, and myself the confidant of both, I had my hands full. Daniel was generally dejected and distrustful; Billy buoyant and jolly. Daniel found it impossible to overcome his bashfulness; was spontaneous only in sonnets, brilliant only in bouquets. Billy was always coming to me with pleasant news, told in his slangy New York boy vernacular. One day he would exclaim: "Oh, I'm getting on prime! I got such a smile off her this morning as I went by the window!" Another day he wanted counsel how to get a valentine to her—because it was too big to shove in a lamp-post, and she might catch him if he left it on the steps, rang the bell, and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 ran away. Daniel wrote his own valentine; but, despite its originality, that document gave him no such comfort as Billy got from twenty-five cents' worth of embossed paper, pink Cupids, and doggerel. Finally, Billy announced to me that he had been to play with Jimmy, and got introduced to his girl.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Shortly after this Lu gave what they call "a little company"—not a party, but a reunion of forty or fifty people with whom the family were well acquainted, several of them living in our immediate neighborhood. There was a goodly proportion of young folk, and there was to be dancing; but the music was limited to a single piano played by the German exile usual on such occasions, and the refreshments did not rise to the splendor of a costly supper. This kind of compromise with fashionable gayety was wisely deemed by Lu the best method of introducing Daniel to the beau monde—a push given the timid eaglet by the maternal bird, with a soft tree-top between him and the vast expanse of society. How simple was the entertainment may be inferred from the fact that Lu felt somewhat discomposed when she got a note from one of her guests asking leave to bring along her niece, who was making her a few weeks' visit. As a matter of course, however, she returned answer to bring the young lady and welcome.

Daniel's dressing-room having been given up to the gentlemen I invited him to make his toilet in mine, and, indeed, wanting him to create a favorable impression, became his valet pro tem., tying his cravat, and teasing the divinity-student look out of his side-hair. My little dandy Billy came in for another share of attention, and when I managed to button his jacket for him so that it showed his shirt-studs "like a man's," Count d'Orsay could not have felt a more pleasing sense of his sufficiency for all the demands of the gay world.

When we reached the parlor we found Pa and Ma Lovegrove already receiving. About a score of guests had arrived. Most of them were old married couples, which, after paying their devoirs, fell in two like unriveted scissors—the gentlemen finding a new pivot in Pa and the ladies in Ma, where they mildly opened and shut upon such questions as severally concerned them, such as "the way gold closed," and "how the children were."

Besides the old married people there were several old young men of distinctly hopeless and unmarried aspect, who, having nothing in common with the other class, nor sufficient energy of character to band themselves for mutual protection, hovered dejectedly about the arch pillars, or appeared to be considering whether, on the whole, it would not be feasible and best to sit down on the centre-table. These subsisted upon such crumbs of comfort as Lu could get an occasional chance to throw them by rapid sorties of conversation—became galvanically active the moment they were punched up, and fell flat the moment the punching was remitted. I did all I could for them, but having Daniel in tow, dared not sail too near the edge of the Doldrums, lest he should drop into sympathetic stagnation and be taken preternaturally bashful, with his sails all aback, just as I wanted to carry him gallantly into action with some clipper-built cruiser of a nice young lady. Finally, Lu bethought herself of that last plank of drowning conversationists, the photograph album. All the dejected young men made for it at once, some reaching it just as they were about to sink for the last time, but all getting a grip on it somehow, and staying there in company with other people's babies whom they didn't know, and celebrities whom they knew to death, until, one by one, they either stranded upon a motherly dowager by the Fire-place Shoals, or were rescued from the Sofa Reef by some gallant wrecker of a strong-minded young lady, with a view to taking salvage out of them in the German.

Besides these were already arrived a dozen nice little boys and girls, who had been invited to make it pleasant for Billy. I had to remind him of the fact that they were his guests, for, in comparison with the queen of his affections, they were in danger of being despised by him as small fry.

The younger ladies and gentlemen—those who had fascinations to disport, or were in the habit of disporting what they considered such, were consulting the looking-glass until that oracle should announce the auspicious moment for their setting forth.

Daniel was in conversation with a perfect godsend of a girl, who understood Latin and had begun Greek. Billy was taking a moment's vacation from his boys and girls, busy with "Old Maid" in the extension-room, and whispering, with his hand in mine, "Oh, don't I wish she were here!" when a fresh invoice of ladies, just unpacked from the dressing-room in all the airy elegance of evening costume, floated through the door. I heard Lu say: "Ah, Mrs. Rumbullion! Happy to see your niece too. How d'ye do, Miss Pilgrim?"

At this last word Billy jumped as if he had been shot, and the bevy of ladies opening about sister Lu disclosed the charming face and figure of the pretty girl we had met at Barnum's.

Billy's countenance rapidly changed from astonishment to joy. "Isn't that splendid, Uncle Teddy? Just as I was wishing it! It's just like the fairy books!" and, rushing up to the party of new-comers, "My dear Lottie!" cried he, "if I'd only known you were coming I'd have gone after you!"

As he caught her by the hand I was pleased to see her soft eyes brighten with gratification at his enthusiasm, but my sister Lu looked on naturally with astonishment in every feature.

"Why, Billy!" said she, "you ought not to call a strange young lady 'Lottie!' Miss Pilgrim, you must excuse my wild boy—"

"And you must excuse my mother, Lottie," said Billy, affectionately patting Miss Pilgrim's rose kid, "for calling you a strange young lady.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

You're not strange at all—you're just as nice a girl as there is."

"There are no excuses necessary," said Miss Pilgrim, with a bewitching little laugh. "Billy and I know each other intimately well, Mrs. Lovegrove; and I confess that when I heard the lady aunt had been invited to visit was his mother, I felt all the more willing to infringe etiquette this evening by coming where I had no previous introduction."

"Don't you care!" said Billy, encouragingly. "I'll introduce you to every one of our family; I know 'em if you don't."

At this moment I came up as Billy's reinforcement, and fearing lest in his enthusiasm he might forget the canon of society which introduces a gentleman to a lady, not the lady to him, I ventured to suggest it delicately by saying:

"Billy, will you grant me the favor of a presentation to Miss Pilgrim?"

"In a minute, Uncle Teddy," answered Billy, considerably lowering his voice. "The older people first;" and after this reproof I was left to wait in the cold until he had gone through the ceremony of introducing to the young lady his father and his mother.

Billy, who had now assumed entire guardianship of Miss Pilgrim, with an air of great dignity intrusted her to my care and left us promenading while he went in search of Daniel. I myself looked in vain for that youth, whom I had not seen since the entrance of the last comers. Miss Pilgrim and I found a congenial common ground in Billy whom she spoke of as one of the most delightfully original boys she had ever met; in fact, altogether the most fascinating young gentleman she had seen in New York society. You may be sure it wasn't Billy's left ear which burned when I made my responses.

In five minutes he reappeared to announce, in a tone of disappointment, that he could find Daniel nowhere. He could see a light through his keyhole, but the door was locked and he could get no admittance. Just then Lu came up to present a certain—no, an uncertain—young man of the fleet stranded on parlor furniture earlier in the evening. To Lu's great astonishment Miss Pilgrim asked Billy's permission to leave him. It was granted with all the courtesy of a preux chevalier, on the condition readily assented to by the lady, that she should dance one Lancers with him during the evening.

"Dear me!" exclaimed Lu, after Billy had gone back like a superior being to assist at the childish amusement of his contemporaries. "Would any body ever suppose that was our Billy?"

"I should, my dear sister," said I, with proud satisfaction; "but you remember I always was just to Billy."

Left free I went myself to hunt up Daniel. I found his door locked and a light showing through the keyhole, as Billy had stated. I made no attempt to enter by knocking; but going to my room and opening the window next his, leaned out as far as I could, shoved up his sash with my cane, and pushed aside his curtain. Such an unusual method of communication could not fail to bring him to the window with a rush. When he saw me he trembled like a guilty thing, his countenance fell, and, no longer able to feign absence, he unlocked his door and let me enter by the normal mode.

"Why, Daniel Lovegrove, my nephew, what does this mean? Are you sick?"

"Uncle Edward, I am not sick—and this means that I'm a fool. Even a little boy like Billy puts me to shame. I feel humbled to the very dust. I wish I'd been a Missionary and got massacred by savages. It may be that like Jonah I am undergoing the wrath of Heaven. I have fled the Nineveh of my life's work—I'm swallowed by the whale of my own horrible, hateful, hopeless bashfulness. Oh that I'd been permitted to wear damp stockings in childhood, or that my mother hadn't carried me through the measles! If it weren't wrong to take my life into my own hands, I'd open that window and—and—sit in a draught this very evening! Oh yes! I'm just that bitter! Oh, oh, oh!"

And Daniel paced the floor with strides of frenzy.

"Well, my dear fellow, let's look at the matter calmly a minute. What brought on this sudden attack? You seemed doing well enough the first ten minutes after we came down. I was only out of your sight long enough to speak to the Rumbullion party who had just come in, and when I turned around you were gone. Now you are in this fearful condition. What is there in the Rumbullions to start you off on such a bender of bashfulness (for it amounts to absolute intoxication) as this which I here behold?"

"Rumbullion indeed!" said Daniel. "A hundred Rumbullions could not make me feel as I do. But she can shake me into a whirlwind with her little finger; and with the Rumbullions came she."

"What! D'you—Miss Pilgrim?"

"Miss Pilgrim!"

I labored with Daniel for ten minutes, using every encouragement and argument I could think of, and finally threatened him that I would bring up the whole Rumbullion party, Miss Pilgrim included, telling them that he had invited them to look at his conchological cabinet, unless he instantly shook the ice out of his manner and accompanied me down stairs. This dreadful menace had the desired effect. He knew that I would not scruple to fulfill it; and at the same time that it made him surrender it also provoked him with me to a degree which gave his eyes and cheeks as fine a glow as I could have wished for a favorable impression. The stimulus of wrath was good for him, and there was little tremor in his knees when he descended the stairs. Welladay! So Daniel and Billy were rivals!

The latter gentleman met us at the foot of the staircase.

"Oh, there you are, Daniel!" said he, cheer-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ily. "I was just going to look after you and Uncle Teddy. We've wanted you for the dances. We've had the Lancers twice, and three round dances; and I danced the second Lancers with Lottie. Now we're going to play some games —to amuse the children, you know," he added, loftily, with the adult gesture of pointing his thumb over his shoulder at the extension-room. "Lottie's going to play too; so will you and Daniel, won't you, uncle? Oh, here comes Lottie now! This is my brother, Miss Pilgrim—let me introduce him to you. I'm sure you'll like him. There's nothing he don't know."

Miss Pilgrim had just come to the newel post of the staircase, and, when she looked into Daniel's face, blushed like the red, red rose, losing her self-possession perceptibly more than Daniel.

The courage of weak warriors and timid gallants mounts as the opposite party's falls, and Daniel made out to say, in a firm tone, that it was long since he had enjoyed the pleasure of meeting Miss Pilgrim.

"Not since Mrs. Cramcroud's last sociable, I think," replied Miss Pilgrim, her cheeks and eyes still playing the tell-tale.

"Oho! so you don't want any introduction!" exclaimed Master Billy. "I didn't know you knew each other, Lottie."

"I have met Mr. Lovegrove in society. Shall we go and join in the plays?"

"To be sure we shall!" cried Billy. "You needn't mind—all the grown people are going to."

On entering the parlor we found it as he had said. The guests being almost all well acquainted with each other, at the solicitation of jolly little Mrs. Bloomingal, sister Lu had consented to make a pleasant Christmas-tide kind of time of it, in which every body was permitted to be young again, and romp with the rompiest. We played Blindman's-buff till we were tired of that—Daniel, to Lu's great delight, coming out splendidly as Blindman, and evincing such "cheek" in the style he hunted down and caught the ladies that I became satisfied that nothing but his eyesight stood in the way of his making an audacious figure in the world. Then a pretty little girl, Tilly Turtelle, who seemed quite a premature flirt, proposed "Door-keeper"—a suggestion accepted with great éclat by all the children, several grown people assenting.

To Billy—quite as much on account of his shining prominence in the executive faculties as of his character as host—was committed the duty of counting out the first person to be sent into the hall. There were so many of us that "Aina-maina-mona-mike" would not go quite round; but, with that promptness of expedient which belongs to genius, Billy instantly added on, "Intery-mintery-cutery-com," and the last word of the cabalistic formula fell upon me—Edward Balbus. I disappeared into the entry amidst peals of happy laughter from both old and young, calling, when the door opened again to ask me whom I wanted, for the pretty lisping flirt who had proposed the game. After giving me a coquettish little chirrup of a kiss, and telling me my beard scratched, she bade me, on my return, send out to her "Mither Billy Lovegrove." I obeyed her; my youngest nephew retired; and after a couple of seconds, during which Tilly undoubtedly got what she proposed the game for, Billy being a great favorite with the little girls, she came back, pouting and blushing, to announce that he wanted Miss Pilgrim. That young lady showed no mock-modesty, but arose at once, and laughingly went out to her youthful admirer, who, as I afterward learned, embraced her ardently, and told her he loved her better than any girl in the world. As he turned to go back she told him that he might send to her one of her juvenile cousins, Reginald Rumbullion. Now whether because on this youthful Rumbullion's account Billy had suffered the pangs of that most terrible passion, jealousy, or from his natural enjoyment of playing practical jokes destructive of all dignity in his elders, Billy marched into the room, and, having shut the door behind him, paralyzed the crowded parlor by an announcement that Mr. Daniel Lovegrove was wanted.

I was standing at his side, and could feel him tremble—see him turn pale.

"Dear me!" he whispered, in a choking voice; "can she mean me?"

"Of course she does," said I. "Who else? Do you hesitate? Surely you can't refuse such an invitation from a lady."

"No, I suppose not," said he, mechanically. And amidst much laughter from the disinterested, while the faces of Mrs. Rumbullion and his mother were spectacles of crimson astonishment, he made his exit from the room. 'Never in my life did I so much long for that instrument described by Mr. Samuel Weller—a pair of patent double-million-magnifying microscopes of hextry power, to see through a deal door. Instead of this, I had to learn what happened only by report.

Lottie Pilgrim was standing under the hall burners with her elbow on the newel post, looking more vividly charming than he had ever seen her before at Mrs. Cramcroud's sociable or elsewhere. When startled by the apparition of Mr. Daniel Lovegrove instead of the little Rumbullion whom she was expecting, she had no time to exclaim or hide her mounting color—none at all to explain to her own mind the mistake that had occurred, before his arm was clasped around her waist, and his lips so closely pressed to hers that through her soft thick hair she could feel the throbbing of his temples. As for Daniel, he seemed in a walking dream, from which he waked to see Miss Pilgrim looking into his eyes with utter though not incensed stupefaction—to stammer, "Forgive me! Do forgive me! I thought you were in earnest."

"So I was," she said, tremulously, as soon as she could catch her voice, "in sending for my cousin Reginald."

"Oh dear, what shall I do! Believe me, I

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

was told you wanted me—let me go and explain it to mother—she'll tell the rest—I couldn't do it—I'd die of mortification. Oh, that wretched boy Billy!"

On the principle already mentioned, his agitation reassured her. "Don't try to explain it now—it may get Billy a scolding. Are there any but intimate family friends here this evening?"

"No—I think—no—I'm sure," replied Daniel, collecting his faculties.

"Then I don't mind what they think—perhaps they'll suppose we've known each other long—but we'll arrange it by-and-by. They'll think the more of it the longer we stay out here—hear them laugh! I must run back now. I'll send you somebody."

A round of juvenile applause greeted her as she hurried into the parlor, and a number of grown people smiled quite musically. Her quick woman-wit showed her how to retaliate and divide the embarrassment of the occasion. As she passed me she said in an undertone,

"Answer quick! Who's that fat lady on the sofa that laughs so loud?"

"Mrs. Cromwell Craggs," said I, as quietly.

Miss Pilgrim made a satirically low courtesy, and spoke in a modest but distinct voice:

"I really must be excused for asking. I'm a stranger, you know; but is there such a lady here as Mrs. Craggs—Mrs. Cromwell Craggs? For if so, the present doorkeeper would like to see Mrs. Cromwell Craggs."

Then came the turn of the fat lady to be laughed at; but out she had to go and get kissed like the rest of us.

Before the close of the evening Billy was made as jealous as his parents and I were surprised to see Daniel in close conversation with Miss Pilgrim among the geraniums and fuschias of the conservatory—"a regular flirtation," said Billy, somewhat indignantly. The conclusion which they arrived at was, that after all no great harm had been done, and that the dear little fellow ought not to be peached on for his fun. If I had known at the time how easily they forgave him, I should have suspected that the offense Billy had led Daniel into committing was not unlikely to be repeated on the offender's own account; but so much as I could see showed me that the ice was broken.

Billy's jealousy did not outlast the party. He became more and more interested in "his girl," and often went in the afternoon after getting out of school, ostensibly to play with Jimmy. Daniel's calls, according to adult etiquette made in the evening, did not interfere with my younger nephew's, and as neither knew that the other, after his fashion, was his most uncompromising rival, my position as the confidant of each was one of extreme delicacy. But the matter was more speedily settled than I expected.

Billy came to me one day and told me that he intended to get married immediately—that he was going to ask his Lottie that very afternoon. He was prepared to meet every objection. He had asked his father if he might, and his father said yes, if he had money enough to support a wife—and Billy thought he had. He'd saved up all the money his Uncle Tom and Aunt Jane had sent him for Christmas; and besides, if he were once married, his father wouldn't see him want for stamps, he knew. Then, too, he was going to leave school and be a merchant next year—and I'd help him now and then, if he got hard up, wouldn't I? If he were driven to it he could be a good boy again, and save up the money to buy Lottie dresses instead of giving it to nasty old "Objecks." He was so much older than when he had the savings bank that he ought to have at least ten cents a day now for being good: didn't I think that was fair? As to his age, if Lottie loved him he didn't care—any way he'd be lots bigger than she was before long—and he'd often heard his Ma say she approved of early marriages; hers and Pa's was one. So he ran off up Livingston Place, the most undaunted lover that ever put extra shine on his proposal boots, or spent half an hour on the bow of his popping neck-tie.

Shortly after Daniel went into the street. Not meaning to call upon his inamorata, but, drawn by the irresistible fascination of passing her house, he strolled in the direction that Billy had gone. As he came to the Rumbullion's something suddenly bade him enter—a whim he called it, but not his own—one of the whims of Destiny, which are always gratified.

"Yes, Sir," said the servant, "Miss Pilgrim is in. I will call her."

His step was always light. He passed noiselessly into the front-parlor, and sat down among the heavy brocatelle curtains which shadowed a recess of one of the windows. He supposed Miss Pilgrim to be up stairs, and while his heart fluttered expecting her footfall at the parlor-door, he heard an earnest, boyish voice in the extension-room. Looking from his concealment he beheld Miss Pilgrim on a sofa in the pier, and sitting by her side, with her hand clasped in his, his brother Billy. Before he could avoid it he became aware that Billy was unconsciously but eagerly forestalling him.

"Now, Lottie, my dear Lottie! I wish you would! I'll do every thing I can to make you happy. If you'll only marry me, I'll be good all the time! Come, now! Say yes! Father's got a real nice place over the stable—they only use it for a tool-room now; we could clear it out and have it scrubbed, and go to housekeeping right away. Ma 'd let us have all her old set of china; I've got a silver mug Uncle Teddy gave me, and a napkin-ring and four spoons. As soon as I make my money I'll buy you a nice carriage and horses, any color you want 'em. Oh, my darling, darling Lottie, I do love you so much, and we could have such a splendid time! Do say yes, Lottie—please, do please!"

Miss Pilgrim looked at the earnest little suitor with a face in which tender interest and com-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google passion quite over-rode any sense of the whimsicality of the situation which might lurk there. Daniel's astonishment at the sight was so great that he realized the entire state of the case before he could recover himself sufficiently to rise and go into the back-room.

Billy jumped up and looked defiantly at the intruder. Miss Pilgrim blushed violently, but turned away her head to avoid the exhibition of a still more convulsing emotion than embarrassment.

"I must beg your pardon, Miss Pilgrim—and yours too, Billy," began Daniel, in a hesitating way, hardly knowing how to treat the posture in which he found things; "but—you see—the fact is—the servant said she'd go to announce me—and really, when I came in, I hadn't any idea you were here, or Billy either."

"Then," said Billy, moderating the defiant attitude, "you truly weren't dodging around and trying to find out what Lottie and I were about on the sly? Well—I'll believe you. I'm sure you couldn't be as mean as that when I'm the only brother you've got, that always brings you oranges when you're sick, and never plays ball on the stairs when you've got a headache. Now, then, I'll trust you. I've been asking Lottie to marry me, and I want you to help me. Ask her if she won't, Daniel—see if she won't do it for you!"

Miss Pilgrim had been trying to find words; but her face was too much for her, and she was obliged to seek retirement in her handkerchief. As she drew it from her pocket a well-worn piece of paper followed it and fell upon the floor. Billy picked it up before she noticed it, and was about to hand it to her, when his jealous eye fell upon a withered rose-bud sewed to its margin. As he looked at it, with his little brows knit into a precocious sternness, he recognized his brother's handwriting immediately beneath the flower. It was one of the daily anonymous sonnets of which Daniel had told me, and the bud a relic of the bouquet accompanying it. Still Daniel was silent. What else could he be?

"Very well! very well, Master Daniel!" exclaimed Billy, in a voice trembling with grief and indignation; "there's good enough reason why you won't speak a word for me! You want her yourself—here it is in your own writing. No wonder you won't tell Lottie to be my wife when you're trying to take her away from me. Oh, Lottie! dear Lottie! I love you just as much as he does, though I don't know every thing, and can't write you poetry like it was out of the Fifth Reader! Daniel, how could you go and write to my Lottie this way—'my —churner'—no it isn't churner, it's 'charmer'—'let me call thee mine?'"

Forgetting the sacredness of private MS. in that of private grief, he would have gone on, with a pause here and there for certainty of spelling, to the conclusion of the poem, had not Lottie sprung up with her imploring face suffused by her discovery for the first time of the identity of her secret lover and the escape of his sonnet from her pocket. It was too late! There he stood before her unmistakably proved, and himself unmistakably proving in what estimation she held his verses and bouquets.

"Oh, Billy! dear Billy! if you do love me don't do so!" So exclaiming she held out her hand, and Billy put the MS. into it with all the dignity of a wounded spirit.

"Mr. Lovegrove," said Miss Pilgrim, "I don't know what to say."

"I feel very much that way myself," said Daniel.

"I don't!" said Billy, now in command of his voice. "I'll tell you what it is—perhaps Daniel didn't know how much I wanted you, Lottie—and perhaps he wants you 'most as bad as I do. But whatever way it is, I want you to choose between us fair and square and no dodging. Come now! You can take just whichever one of us you please, and the other won't lay up any grudge, though I know if that's me or like me he'll feel awful. You can have till to-morrow morning to make up your mind between me and Daniel; and if he won't say any thing about it to Pa and Ma till then I won't. Good-by, dear Lottie!"

He drew her face down to his, kissed her most affectionately, and then marched out of the door, feeling, as he afterward told me, as if he'd blacked his boots all for nothing. Ah me! my dear Billy, how many times we do that in this world! Of what followed when Daniel and Miss Pilgrim were left alone I have never had full details.

But I do know that the young lady obeyed Billy and made her choice. Six months after that both my nephews stood up in Mrs. Rumbullion's parlor to take their several shares in a ceremony of which Miss Pilgrim was the central figure when it began, and Mrs. Daniel Lovegrove when it concluded. Time and the elasticity of boyhood had so closed the sharp but evanescent wound in Billy's heart that he could stand the trial of being groomsman where he had wanted to be groom—more especially since he was supported through the emergency by a little sister of Lottie's, who promises to be wondrously like her by the time Billy can stand up in the more enviable capacity. Neither Daniel nor Lottie would listen to any objections to such a groomsman on the score of his extreme youth; for, as they said, Billy had been quite as instrumental in bringing them together as any agent save the Divinity, which shapes all the ends and ties all the knots in which there are heart-strings concerned as well as white ribbon.

Since then Lu has stopped wishing that Billy were like Daniel, for she sees that, if he had been, there would never have been any Mrs. Daniel Lovegrove in the world.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"RUM CREETERS IS WOMEN."

ALTHOUGH this story will tell of hair-breadth escapes and of the shedding of blood, the object of principal interest in it to me is a girl's heart. That heart was agitated by such strong and contradictory enthusiasms, it was naturally so right and womanly, and it had been taught to be so wrong and unwomanly, that it despotically commands my attention even amidst the exciting drama of events which it wrought out for itself and for others. This strange heroine was a Virginian, of a family well known in the Shenandoah Valley, and a native of that city of many battles, Winchester. I shall not give her true name; I shall call her Fannie Pendleton.

Her seventeenth year found her a school-girl in New Haven, Connecticut, flirting with Frederick Huntington, a student of the senior class of Yale College. Thanks to skating parties on Lake Saltonstall, holding of hands in flying over the ice, stolen asides in smoothly frozen nooks and the laughing familiarity of an occasional tumble in company, this flirting ripened during the winter of 1860–61 into downright love-making and love-granting. There were tremulous confessions, kisses that were brooded over through days of happiness, a throbbing of hearts which was not good for the color in young cheeks, and an engagement of marriage. But the fate of these two children was bound up in that of their nation, and the engagement could not survive the dissolution of the Union. The Southern heart of Pendleton père being fired by the attack on Fort Sumter, he scouted the offer of a Yankee son-in-law, hurried on to New Haven, refused to see Mr. Huntington in spite of a tearful "Oh, papa, do speak to him!" gave the schoolmistress a blowing up, paid Fannie's bills, and got her back to Winchester before Virginia had fairly seceded. Having accomplished thus much for the Confederacy, the old gentleman presently died out of the Union, greatly to his satisfaction, and went to that world where all good secessionists go.

During the war the affairs of the Pendletons prospered like those of their neighbors; their negroes ran away, their stocks became worthless, their barns were burned and their lands laid waste. By the autumn of 1864, when the main interest of this story commences, their income had entirely failed, and the widow and daughter were living on a few hundred dollars in coin which had been laid aside for this very emergency. One son had fallen in battle, and two were with Lee, struggling to keep Grant out of Richmond. Sheridan, lately victorious at Cedar Creek, lay at Middletown between these brave boys and their home; and all around that home raged the murderous partisan warfare between Sheridan's troopers and Mosby's guerrillas. It was at this time that Harkless (Hercules), a white-headed negro, the only remaining "boy" of the Pendleton raising, entered the poverty-stricken house with a saddle and bridle on his shoulders, and proclaimed that a Yankee had just taken away his mule, the last of the many Pendleton "creeturs."

"Oh dear, what shall we do?" groaned the widow, a feeble, pallid woman of fifty, worn to the bone with infirmities and sorrows, and dressed in the rusty bombazine which had mourned through two bereavements.

"Go right straight to the provost marshal," urged Harkless. "That's all we kin do, missus."

"I never have been to the Yankees," sighed Mrs. Pendleton. "Oh, Harkless, I can't!"

"Got to do it, missus. Can't git 'long without the mule nohow. How kin we do our wood haulin? How kin we plant on the farm nex spring? Now, missus, don't you keep your pride up. You's got a heap o' pride. Mus git rid o' some on't. Don't wait, missus, or we loses our chance. Jes walk right straight aroun with me to the provost marshal 'fore the Yank gets the mule out of the town."

"Well, Harkless, I would go. I'll give up my pride. I'll go to these horrible people. But how am I to get there? It is half a mile to the office, and you know how lame I am."

"Sposin I go to Mass Jeemes Jackson and ask him to lend us his carryall," suggested Harkless.

"Mamma, if it must be done let me do it," said Fannie Pendleton.

The two women looked each other in the face for a moment. They were both crying silently, the mother with grief and despair, the daughter with grief and anger. During the three years which had passed since Fannie left New Haven she had not heard from Huntington, had ceased to love him, had almost forgotten him, and had learned to hold the very name of Northerner in hatred. No Southern girl had shouted more exultantly over Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, or wept with more heart-felt sorrow over Chattanooga and Cedar Creek. She was a secessionist; that is, as she believed, a patriot, with enthusiasm, with passion, with anger.

But now there was a shadow at the door like that of the wolf of destitution, and for the moment at least she felt as if the day of defiance and pride was over.

Scared by the same bristling horror the mother accepted the sacrifice which the daughter offered, although conscious of its full magnitude and shrinking from it with aversion. There was one shocking circumstance in it which both were miserably aware of, although neither spoke of it. The daughter was to go on this piteous errand, not because she was stronger than the mother, but because she was younger and handsomer. She was to use her girlish beauty as a plea for favor. It seemed like a prostitution.

"Well, Harkless, let us go," said Fannie, putting on her well-worn cloak and hat.

"Don't you want the carryall, Miss Fannie?"

"No; I can walk. What is the name of the provost marshal?"

"Cap'n Miles. Oldish kind o' man. Kind

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

o' old uncle like. Oh, I reckon he'll give us up the mule right off."

He looked at his young Missus with great satisfaction, foreseeing sure success in the pleading of that handsome face, and aware of no degradation in the use of such an irresistible argument.

Fannie Pendleton, at this time twenty years old, was in the fullest bloom of the beauty of maidenhood. She was not modeled on the usual grand scale of the tall girls of the Shenandoah Valley; nor was she blonde, as they generally are, except that her wavy chestnut hair was slightly tinted with sunlight. She was under the middle size of woman, and rather slightly built than otherwise; but her light form was very straight, and she walked like a queen in fairy-land. Her eyes were clear hazel; her complexion remarkably pure for a brunette; her cheeks almost radiant with color; her features exquisite.

"We wants to see Cap'n Miles," said Harkless to the orderly at the door of the provost marshal's office.

"In there," replied the soldier, motioning them forward, but without removing his eyes from that roseate passing face. He was using his time too well to remember that Captain Miles had been relieved that morning by a Captain Huntington; and if he had thought of it he would not have deemed it worth mention, for the provost marshal was the provost marshal whatever human name he might bear. Thus unexpectedly were the two lovers of other days brought face to face. When Huntington turned toward his visitor her cheeks were flushed and her eyes unsteady with the excitement of humiliation; but the moment she saw him she became pale and stared at him with such a gaze as she might have fixed upon a spectre. Both were fascinated: she could not find will nor strength to retreat; he could not help advancing. As he took her hand his only word was her name, uttered in astonishment or inquiry.

"Yes," she said. Then the blood flew back to her face, and she added, "I didn't know that you were here."

"I am so glad that I am. I am so glad to meet you!" he commenced, impetuously. Then seeing that she drew away from him, he too recollected the years and events that had risen up between them.

"What can I do for you, Miss Pendleton?" were his next words.

Very tremulously and almost unintelligibly the complaint was stated. Saying nothing more to Miss Pendleton the provost marshal took down a description of the mule and of the plunderer from Harkless.

"You shall have your property, Miss Pendleton, as soon as it can be found," he said.

"Thank you, Sir," she replied, and retired without another syllable.

Storms of rain, riotings in the streets, thunders of neighboring battle could hardly have drawn Fannie to a consciousness of outward things as she walked homeward. Soul and body were tremulous with the palpitations of a life which she had supposed to be long since buried. Was it possible, then, that during those years in which she had seemed to hate the thought of her engagement, and to spite herself for having ever loved a Yankee, she had been laboring under a delusion? There is a passion stronger and more vital than hate. The moment she had looked upon him, though dressed in that abhorred uniform, he appeared to her as handsome, as noble, as adorable as ever. It is sometimes useless to be a Virginian when one is also a human being.

On reaching home she told her mother what the provost marshal had promised with regard to the plundered property, but she did not tell her who the provost marshal was. Then she went to her own room and had a violent fit of crying. When she emerged from this shower she had made up her mind in regard to Huntington; she was sure that she hated him, that she did not wish to see him again, and that she would refuse to receive him. The next day she wondered to herself a good deal whether he did not mean to call, and was almost disappointed when the mule was returned because the soldier in charge of it left no message. On the day following she had turns of being indignant at Captain Huntington because he made no attempt to force himself upon her society. Of course she would not allow him to enter the house. Oh no; no Yankee should ever cross their threshold; but then he might at least be civil enough to attempt it. A woman needs to have her principles tried occasionally; or how can she prove to herself and others that she has principles? It is a moral luxury to be afflicted with temptations.

At last the provost marshal presented himself. He did not ask beforehand if he might come; he was afraid lest he should be refused; he came by surprise.

"How could you call on us?" she asked, after a few chilly words of greeting had been exchanged. "We are bitter secessionists. I am a rebel to the bottom of my heart. Don't you know that I hate your flag?"

She was trying faint-heartedly to make him hate her; she hoped, but could not wish, that he would never see her again.

"I know. I supposed so," he answered, shaking his head with a sad gravity which touched her. "Still, I could not help coming. You understand why I wanted to look at you again. Is it so necessary that you and I should be enemies?"

Fannie did not dare try to answer; she knew that her voice would fail her.

"I do not see why we should carry the miseries of our country into all of our individual lives," he went on. "There is hate enough without my hating you or you me."

"I am a Virginian," protested Fannie, but in such a quivering tone that you might readily

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google have suspected her of being the daughter of some much less heroic State.

"I shall come again," he said, after a short conversation. "You see I am not magnanimous about it: I don't ask your permission. If you won't see me you must shut your door in my face."

"Oh! why—?" she asked, and stopped there, unable to beg him not to come.

And so the courtship was resumed—not where it had been broken off by Pendleton the father, but still at a very advanced stage of emotion. They comprehended each other so easily, so instinctively, so spiritually, that only a few disconnected words were needed to send a passionate meaning from one heart to the other. An interview of five minutes was enough to turn Fannie's head and upset her political conscience for the rest of the twenty-four hours. Of course she had severe attacks of good resolutions; she reproached herself violently for seeing this handsome and adorable enemy; she told him that he must go away, that he must not come again, and that she hated the very sight of his—flag. But these spasmodic struggles availed nothing, either against him or against herself.

One would suppose that Mrs. Pendleton might have sustained this failing heroine; but there were several reasons why the poor lady could not see her way clear to be so foolish. She was not a rebel by nature, being one of the meekest and most submissive of her sex; she had found the ways of secession hard to travel, and was well-nigh aweary of their difficulties; and then a gentlemanly provost marshal, who protected from drunken soldiers and caused the return of plundered mules, was a temptation. Doubtless the sensibility of Virginia will be relieved by the statement that Mrs. Pendleton was by birth a Marylander. The waxen temper of this poor woman's soul may be inferred from a conversation which took place between her and Fannie an hour or two after Huntington had made his second call on the family.

"Mamma, I suppose you know who this provost marshal is," said the girl, determined to be frank, and hoping for aid to be noble.

"I suppose I do," replied Mrs. Pendleton, in a low tone, looking very guilty.

"He is the gentleman to whom I was—engaged," persisted Fannie, with a shaking voice.

Mrs. Pendleton answered not a word. She didn't want to talk about it; she couldn't. Fannie gave her a look of desperation, which said, as plainly as possible, Aren't you going to help me?

"I suppose that I ought not to see him," resumed the girl, after a brief silence.

The mother thought so too, but haltingly and ineffectively, for she also thought of their poverty, the recovered mule, and the dreadful drunken soldiers. Thus perplexed she only replied by a nervous twitching of the hands and a comprehensive though feeble groan.

"The neighbors must think it very strange that he comes here," continued Fannie, dropping from the abstract right of the thing to what other people might say of it.

Mrs. Pendleton inwardly hoped that the neighbors would suppose that the provost marshal visited them as an enemy, and not as a friend.

"Oh! when will this dreadful war be over?" burst forth Fannie, with a groan of half a dozen kinds of despair.

"The Lord's will be done!" whimpered Mrs. Pendleton, putting her hands to her face as variously troubled as her daughter.

Humanity is stronger than politics. The eternal laws of creation are more potent than the social passions of any century. These two women thought themselves so unnatural and wrong that they would not say what they really wished; and yet they were in consonance with the instincts which vitalize our race, and they were as right as the stars in their revolutions. It is better and holier to love than it is to hate.

Fannie saw how it was; she would receive no help from her mother; if she was to be heroic, she must be so unaided. She soon went to her room, and cried, let us hope, as much as was necessary to cover the circumstances.

Her next phase of feeling was a resolution to make her Yankee lover, whom she could not get rid of and could not help loving, subserve the interests of the Confederacy. She would persuade him to desert the Federal ranks and wield his sword for the good cause; or, failing in that, she would draw from him Sheridan's plans of campaign and transmit them to Early. All female rebeldom in Winchester soon became aware of these projects; for she felt the necessity of justifying herself to the public for her intimacy with a Yankee. Huntington himself heard of her intentions, and smiled rather sadly at the story, but did not the less continue his visits to the Pendletons. I do not enter into an analytical history of this young fellow's emotions for two reasons, one of which is that I have not space, while the other and most important is that he was a man. With the masculine creature love is an episode, and is not worthy of being related with that richness of detail which it deserves when the sufferer is of that other sex whose inner life is epitomized in the word Affections. I will simply state concerning Captain Huntington that he was constant in his attentions to Fannie Pendleton; but that he neither joined the rebel army nor revealed how Sheridan proposed to outwit Early.

"Just think how much nobler it would be in you to befriend the weak than the strong!" said Fannie.

"My dear friend, why don't you set me the example?" replied Huntington, with a patient smile. "You know my weakness. I told you three years and more ago."

For a few seconds Fannie could not speak and could not look at him; and when she regained her utterance she did not use it to ask him to be a traitor. The truth is, that during

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 several minutes she forgot all about the interests of the Confederacy, and thought of nothing and nobody but marriage and Captain Huntington. Pretty much in this manner ended all her attempts at bringing over the provost marshal. I dare say that the whole matter would have shortly ended in a renewal of the old engagement, and perhaps in a hasty wedding, but for Mosby's guerrillas, and the momentum of a train of events which they set in motion.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Nearly all the war that there was at this time in the Shenandoah Valley was carried on by these audacious and indefatigable troopers. To force Sheridan back, or to at least prevent him from advancing, they continually assaulted the wagon trains which brought his provisions over the long road from Martinsburg to Middletown. As self-protection is a law of nature, Sheridan shot the guerrillas, and the guerrillas in return shot their prisoners. This warfare, like all warfare of the kind, became a series of murders, the responsibility of which was charged by each party upon the other.

The country people harbored Mosby's men, the citizens of Winchester sent them information, and both were charged with joining in the raids as opportunity offered. The result of this was an order of depopulation. Every able-bodied man was carried off to Pennsylvania. To our provost marshal fell the duty of executing this tremendous command, and against him, of course, were directed the curses and threats of the sufferers and their sympathizers.

In this stage of the public feeling Lieutenant Charles Mason Merton, a first-cousin of Fannie, and an officer in Mosby's cavalry, entered Winchester in disguise, and reached the house of the Pendletons. At sight of him Fannie flushed crimson with a consciousness of political guilt, but nevertheless rushed at him and gave him one of those kisses which brave rebels doubtless deserve from fair ones. By-the-way, it is possible that the girl's blush did not arise altogether from reasons of state, inasmuch as it is quite a common matter in Virginia for cousins to fall in love with each other, and this lieutenant cousin was an uncommonly handsome fellow. But the provost marshal?—but Captain Frederick Huntington? you will suggest. Oh yes, of course; but then it is one of the peculiarities of woman that she is much like man; she can love two persons at the same time—a little. You know how it is, ladies: an old friend is away, and you partially forget him; he comes back, and you remember him!

"But what dreadful danger you are in, Charlie!" said Fannie. "Do you know it? I hear that these wretches kill all of Mosby's soldiers wherever they find them!"

"I know," answered Charlie. "It's pretty much so. They don't give our fellows long to say their prayers. I didn't fancy this job much. Of course the Yankees would shoot me for a spy if they should catch me. But I couldn't help myself. The Major asked me if I would undertake the duty, and I couldn't refuse."

"Oh! you are on duty, then?"

"Of course I am—not a bit of pleasuring about it! Do you suppose I would spend a leave of absence here? Winchester is a pretty place for a Confederate officer to pass his time in! My God, what a place it is! It would be like a city of the dead if it wasn't for this gang of infernal Yankees about the streets. Do they trouble you much, Fannie?"

"No," answered Fannie, with a guilty look, as she remembered the protecting provost marshal.

"You rather frightened me by recognizing me so quick," resumed the Lieutenant, changing the subject. "I thought I was well disguised, but you knew me right off."

"Oh yes, I knew you; any body would. You mustn't stir out of the house while you are here."

"But I must stir out of the house. I tell you I've got a mighty big duty to discharge, and I must attend to it. See here, Fannie! perhaps you can help me; of course you will if you can."

"Of course I will, Charlie."

"I have been sent in here to see if some plan can't be started to bag this infernal provost marshal, who has been sending our poor people North, to leave their families in starvation."

Fannie turned deadly pale, and drew back from her cousin.

"Oh, Charlie!" she gasped, "he—he can't help it!"

"I don't suppose he can," returned Charlie, without noticing her emotion. "He is an officer, and must obey his orders. But I can't help it either; I must obey my orders. That is the long and short of it. I must bag him if I can."

"It will be terribly dangerous!" murmured Fannie, trembling as if with cold. "I don't see how you can do it. I don't, indeed, You will lose your life if you try. Oh, do pray go back! Tell them you couldn't do it!"

"I will, if it actually can't be done. Seems to me you are very gloomy about it," returned Charlie, staring at her in some wonder, but discovering nothing.

That evening he went out, lurked about the forsaken town, consulted good rebels, and returned wise.

"Fannie, I know all about this provost marshal," he said to his cousin next morning.

Fannie had a fit of moral fever and ague, with the chills and flush on at the same time.

"He comes to see you," pursued the pitiless Lieutenant. "I understand, from the name and other things, that he's the fellow you sacked in New Haven. Why didn't you tell me this last evening?"

Charlie looked stern with virtuous indignation, and Fannie cowed down before him like a guilty woman.

"It's very extraordinary conduct!" continued the accuser. "I don't see what you mean by it. I don't see how you can receive him."

"He has protected us," whispered Fannie.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Then, regaining a little of her voice, she added: "He sent back our mule when he was stolen by a soldier."

"Oh, he did, eh? Well, it was his duty. You needn't thank him nor endure him because of that. It's his business to keep order here, and prevent his riffraff from plundering."

"Yes, but—he was very gentlemanly about it."

"Oh, of course!" sneered Charlie. "Look here, Fannie! I may as well speak plainly—this fellow is courting you. He is taking advantage of his position to force his attentions upon you. And you?"

"Charlie, I don't care that for him!" returned the girl, snapping her fingers and raising her head with a toss of desperation. Driven to the wall, conscious of guilt in loving a Yankee, she lied outright.

"Of course not," exclaimed the Lieutenant. "A Virginian girl! one of our family!—by Jove, that would be too much! Of course you don't. So, Fannie, you'll help me out with this job, will you? I'll tell you how. I've learned to-day that he has been appointed Adjutant-General of a division, and will leave town as soon as he can turn over his business. Find out when he goes, and let me know."

During the evening of that day Huntington called on the ladies. The moment Fannie saw him she resolved that she would not ask him when he would leave the city, so that she might have nothing to communicate concerning his movements to her cousin. But he told her of his own accord. He had come to bid her the first of two or three farewells; of course he told her, watching her anxiously the while to see if she was not a little sorry. There was agitation enough in her face to flatter him, ignorant as he was of the cause of it.

"I shall leave for the army day after to-morrow morning," he would say, in spite of her internal prayers that he might say nothing. "I regret the change much, but I can not help it."

Now Fannie had in her own hands the choice of life and death for her lover. Should she have him bushwhacked for the good of her darling Confederacy, or should she save him to adore her and fight for the hated Union? It is probable that she would have decided according to nature and against her conscience but for that now dreadful patriot her cousin.

"Well, when is he going?" demanded the Lieutenant, entering the parlor a few seconds after the Captain had left it.

"I—I didn't ask him," stammered Fannie.

The Lieutenant (a cavalryman, be it remembered) swore such a long and wicked string of oaths that I dare not shock the virtuous public by repeating it. Under ordinary circumstances Fannie would have flamed up in resentment, but now her conscience sided with her cousin, and likewise cursed dreadfully. Before this couple of accusers, representing pretty much all that she had been taught to consider just and noble, she crouched humiliated, and in her abjectness let slip a fatal confession.

"But I heard him say something, Charlie." And here she hesitated, conscious that all was lost, but unwilling as yet to surrender her secret.

"Well, what did he say?" shouted Charlie. "Good Heavens, Fannie! don't you know that time is precious? I must ride twenty miles, perhaps, before I can give the information, and then twenty back to get on his route. Out with it, Fannie!"

"Charlie, I won't tell you. No, I won't. I won't join in a plot to have this man bushwhacked. He has treated us kindly. If he has been harsh to other people it was his orders, and not—"

Here the girl very nearly carried her point by bursting into tears. I have yet to see the man who likes to go at a pretty woman when she is crying, unless it be his own wife or other quite domestic antagonist with whom he feels intimately acquainted. A sister Charlie could perhaps have bullied vigorously; but a cousin is quite a different person, at least in Virginia.

"Look here, Fannie. I—this is very singular," he began, after staring at her perplexedly for some seconds. "Come now; let's talk about it. Don't you see? it's my orders. And then the public good requires it. It isn't merely to punish him; that isn't all by any means. But the idea is to get hold of his reports and dispatches, and see what the enemy are about. Why, Fannie, it's of the greatest importance to seize this man. The welfare of the Confederacy may depend on it. It's all for the Bonnie Blue Flag, cousin. I don't see how a Virginian, a daughter of the South, one of our family, can hesitate a moment."

Although our heroine was all those fine things in one, she still hesitated.

"Look here, Fannie. Have you turned traitor?" demanded the Lieutenant, sternly.

"No!" blazed up the little secessionist, with a fine flush of confederately patriotic anger.

"I don't believe you," said Charlie.

"He is going on Thursday morning," returned Fannie, with a passion of defiance and anguish that sharpened her voice to something like a shriek.

"Thursday morning," repeated Charlie. "I have thirty-six hours to do it in. I can catch him easy."

He moved away and had nearly reached the door when the girl sprang after him and caught him by the arm.

"You are not going now?" she said. "There is no need of your going now."

"No. But I shall go in about an hour. I must get beyond the Yankee lines before daylight."

She still clung to his arm until he kissed her and promised that she should certainly see him again before he left. Charlie was greatly flattered by her agitation, feeling that it was a delightful thing to have a pretty cousin so anxious

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

about him, and trusting that the day would soon come when he could reward her by offering her his hand and all his estate of Confederate bonds and runaway negroes. Her aversion to betraying the Yankee provost marshal into Mosby's ambushes he attributed to feminine softness of heart and an untutored sense of honor. Concerning the engagement he believed what the deceased Pendleton had thought it best to state; that is, that Fannie had refused Huntington of her own motion, and because he was a natural enemy of the Confederacy.

During the hour which Charlie spent in preparing for his departure Fannie debated whether she should beg him to spare the life of Huntington. Patriotic sense of duty and maidenly pride forbade it; but a sentiment far grander than either, a sentiment which is a law of nature, urged it: and the opposing counselors were in the most perplexing fury of their argument when the Lieutenant re-entered. Up to the moment when he kissed her good-by the internal contest continued, and she remained speechless on that subject.

"How cold you are!" he said, tenderly. "What is the matter with you?"

"Oh, Charlie!" she cried, suddenly seizing his hands, "don't kill Captain Huntington. Promise me that you will spare his life. Oh, Charlie, do! I love him."

Intellectually blinded by her urgent trouble she forgot that she and her cousin had once flirted, and that he might still be her lover.

In his astonishment, his sudden misery, and his anger Charlie pushed her from him. She caught at a table, leaned against it a moment, and then, before he could support her, sank upon the floor. "Fannie!" he called, lifting her; but she did not answer—she had fainted. Mrs. Pendleton came in, the girl was gently cared for; no explanations could be made; and Charlie went off in despair.

Unfortunately for Huntington the girl did not soon recover; she had hysterics and spasms nearly all night; next day it was nervous prostration. Consequently he did not see her when he called to say good-by, and did not receive the warning which she might have given him. The next morning, unhappy enough, though not perhaps the most wretched of the three, he set out with an escort of eight cavalrymen for the head-quarters of his division near Middletown.

He had ridden about five miles, and had passed a quarter of a mile beyond a little wood, which was considered the most dangerous spot on the road, when out of a little hollow in front of him charged a dozen or fifteen horsemen clad in the butternut clothing and sombrero hats of the Confederate army. Huntington's troopers fired instantly, without waiting for orders, bringing down a couple of the assailants. The next instant they were on their way back to the wood at full speed, meaning to use it as a cover from which to skirmish with their Spencer rifles. Huntington followed them, somewhat astonished and perplexed, for he was an infantry officer and knew nothing of cavalry fighting. The plan was good enough, and might have resulted in a victory or a drawn battle, but a new and unexpected element marred the calculation of the ready-witted troopers. Out of the wood itself, directly toward them, rode another party of rebels. They were in a complete trap; they were scientifically bushwhacked.

"Keep together, men!" shouted Huntington. "Straight down the road. Charge!"

He led the way; he was in the highest excitement of animal spirits; it was new fighting for him, but he felt up to it. The rebels did not meet them with the sabre, but they did worse; they fired as the Yankees passed through, and then mingled with them in an arm's-length pursuit. Huntington had discharged two barrels of his revolver, with what effect he could not see, when his horse slackened speed, faltered, and went on his knees. The death of the animal saved the life of the rider, for by this means Lieutenant Charles Merton missed his aim; and when he rode back to the spot a moment after, the hated provost marshal had surrendered and was a prisoner of war. One after another the fugitives were put hors du combat; two were killed, two severely wounded, and four captured unhurt.

"What is to be done next, Major?" inquired Merton of the chief of the party.

"Take a guard of fifteen men and carry the unwounded prisoners to the mountains," replied the Major. "When you get to a safe place send back all the men you can spare; we want them down here. As for this man, this provost marshal, don't let me hear of him again. You understand?"

In two hours after these orders were given the prisoners were in a wood at the base of a mountain, at least eight miles beyond the usual sweep of Sheridan's cavalry. There Merton halted, sent back ten of his fifteen men, untied his captives from the sorry hacks on which they had been mounted, and suffered them to lie down for half an hour. He had not spoken a word to one of them, but he had stared strangely at the provost marshal. Huntington, who knew nothing of Merton, had noticed these looks, but had been able to make nothing of them except that they were not friendly, and consequently had not attempted to open a conversation.

"Come, Yanks, hand over your watches and almighty dollars," said a rebel sergeant. "You won't want 'em, and we shall."

"No use looking at the Lieutenant," he added, addressing Huntington. "It's the orders."

Watches, money, and trinkets were produced and divided among the soldiers. Huntington noticed, and hailed it as a sign of hope, that the Lieutenant refused to accept any portion of the booty. "He must be a gentleman," he thought, "and surely will not murder us."

"I say, sergeant, what are you going to do

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google with us?" asked one of the troopers, a little trumpeter of not more than seventeen.

"I s'pose we're going to shoot you," replied the sergeant, coolly.

"What's that for? The fight's over."

"Don't you shoot our fellers?"

The trumpeter gasped and said no more for a while. But presently he recovered hope, and added, "If you're going to shoot us why don't you do it here?"

"Because it's jest as well they shouldn't find your carkisses," was the rationally ferocious answer.

A minute afterward the trumpeter stretched himself on the ground in such a position that his head was close by Huntington's, who was also lying down.

"Captain," he whispered, "there's a Spencer rifle hung to my saddle."

"Can't you load it?" answered Huntington, in the same tone.

"'Tis loaded, but 'tisn't capped. I guess I can cap it."

Under the pressure of the emergency Huntington thought rapidly.

"When you get it capped, whistle Dixie," he said.

"Yes."

"And when you hear me say, A good riddance, then fire."

"Yes, Captain," returned the brave little fellow. And with these soldierly words the interview closed.

Huntington now felt the necessity of engaging the attention of the commandant of the squad which was guarding him to his place of execution; and no sooner were they all in the saddle again than he pushed alongside of Merton, with the remark:

"I suppose, Lieutenant, that we are to make a long journey to-day."

"You will make a longer one than I shall," was the cruel reply.

"Probably," replied the Captain, with a shudder. Then, collecting himself, "Well, I am ready."

"Do you know how we came to surprise you?" continued Merton.

"I have no idea."

"You are acquainted, I believe, with my cousin, Miss Fannie Pendleton?"

"What! is she your cousin?" exclaimed Huntington, with such evident pleasure that Merton glared at him savagely. "Is it possible?" continued Huntington, smiling. "Why, I am almost glad to meet you."

Merton flushed with anger at this speech, and answered it with this vindictive utterance:

"I was at her house on Tuesday evening, and she told me when you would leave Winchester."

Huntington nearly fell from his horse with the shock. Even at the portals of death the keenest sting of the moment was the perfidy of the woman whom he had loved. In this moment of torture, so keen that he forgot in it the perils of his position—forgot the desperate plan by which he had hoped to escape from it, he heard the little trumpeter behind him whistling the first bars of Dixie. He made a mighty effort; for the sake of life and vengeance he collected himself; he turned to Merton in the calmness of intense fury.

"Well, Lieutenant," he said, "if that is so, then I have only to say it is a good riddance."

He leaned sideways; he clasped Merton with both arms; the horses stopped; he held him. In the same moment he heard shots behind him, screams of anguish, rushes and tramplings, blows and groans. Then the horses separated with a start, and both the riders came to the ground together, the one still grasping the other and pinning his arms to his sides. There was another flash, which blinded Huntington, and loosening his hold he sprang to his feet. The contest was over and the salvation perfect. The trumpeter had shot three rebels in as many seconds; two others had had their brains beaten out before they could fire; a ball in the head had finished the wrestlings of Merton.

"What next, Captain?" asked the trumpeter.

"We can't go back the way we came," said Huntington. "We must take to the woods, separate, and each one shift for himself."

"But we want our money and things first," remarked the trumpeter, proceeding to rifle the bodies with the dexterity of an expert.

After thirty-six hours of solitary wandering, lurking, and starvation, Huntington reported at the head-quarters of his division, and found that all of his fellow-adventurers had preceded him. It was thought strange by his fellow staff-officers that he showed no signs of elation over his extraordinary escape. We can understand it. He was cut to the very soul by the sanguinary perfidy of Fannie Pendleton. At times, too, he grieved for her, remembering that he had aided in killing her cousin, and questioning whether that cousin might not be an accepted lover.

Meanwhile how fared it with Fannie? After one day in bed she was so haunted by the horror of what might have happened that she could lie there no longer. Haggard in face, and weak with incipient fever, she went from house to house among her friends, asking for news, especially curious as to whether any fighting had occurred on the road between Winchester and Middletown. There was much to hear of. Sherman was making great progress, and Hood was in trouble. But all this was nothing just now to Fannie; she was woefully unpatriotic. I doubt whether at this moment she cared half as much about the independence of the Confederacy as she did about the life of this Yankee provost marshal whom she had just handed over to the mercies of Mosby. She had reached the point of praying for him in secret—yes, and of sending up agonizing, speechless supplications for his safety, as she walked the streets, when she heard of his capture, and no more. Immediately she wrote a letter to her cousin, petitioning for the life of the prisoner.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Charlie, if you will only save him from being murdered," implored this letter, "I promise you that I will never see him again. Oh, Charlie, I could not beat to have him die through my means!"

This prayer sent off by a hired messenger whom she could ill afford to pay, she passed a sleepless and miserable night. Oh that the war were ended! that it had never been begun! that Confederate independence had not been thought of! that nothing had been as it had been! The next morning, painfully weak, but unable to remain quiet, she commenced another tour of newsmongering, and chanced upon a friend, Mrs. Barham, who was going to the Yankee camp near Middletown to recover a vanished horse, supposed to have been spirited away by soldiers.

"I will go with you," said Fannie, jumping at the thought that she might hear news of Huntington.

"Oh, thank you, dear!" said Mrs. Barham. "I am so glad to have company going among those wretches! And then you may help me," she added, with a roguish smile. "The late provost marshal here is Adjutant-General of the division that I must visit."

Mrs. Barham, it seems, had not heard of the fate of Huntington; and Fanny, you may be sure, could not muster the heroism to tell her of it.

That morning the little trumpeter, now orderly at division head-quarters, went to the tent of the Adjutant-General, saluted, delivered the message—"Captain, two ladies wish to see you;" and was very much astonished to observe the Adjutant-General turn as pale as a sheet. Huntington, looking through the door of the tent over the orderly's head, had recognized the face of the girl whom he loved, and who had betrayed him to death.

"Tell them I will be out in a moment," he mumbled, and sat down upon his camp-bedstead very nearly palsied in mind and body.

"Does she love me?" he wildly thought; and then he rejected the absurd fancy savagely; was angry with himself for grasping at it.

"It is for her cousin," was his next idea. "She loves him and wants news of him. She shall have it."

Revived by indignation, he rose and went out to execute his vengeance. His face was still ashy pale, but his brown curls waved beautifully about his forehead in the autumn wind, and his port was superbly defiant, like that of the triumphant Apollo. Probably in all his life he never looked handsomer than in that miserable moment.

Fannie saw him, uttered a faint scream, and leaned toward him with a visage as white as his and eyes dilated.

"It is for her cousin," thought Huntington again, and boiled through every vein with an anguish of fury.

Mrs. Barham looked from one to the other completely dumbfounded.

"You have come to inquire for your cousin?" said Huntington, addressing Fannie, and hardly conscious of any other presence.

Neither of the ladies answered; both stared at him without stirring.

"Your cousin," he repeated. "I left him in the road—on his back—dead."

Here he stopped, with a sob, and turning square on his heel went back into his tent.

"Let us go!" gasped Fannie, clutching Mrs. Barham's arm. "Oh, let us go!"

Being a woman of ordinary humanity, Mrs. Barham signed to her coachman, and the barouche started homeward.

A day or two afterward it was known all over Winchester that Lieutenant Charles Merton had been murdered by the Yankees, and that his cousin, Fannie Pendleton, who was doubtless in love with him, had thereupon gone into a brain-fever.

It is firmly believed by certain philosophers that it is the monkey's tail which spoils the monkey, using up, as it does, an amount of spinal marrow which might otherwise become brain and beget rationality. So there is a tail to this story, which I fear much to exhibit, lest it should injure the dramatic unity of the impression. Nevertheless, as this sequel is perhaps the strangest part of the whole affair, and as it will probably be very satisfactory to some human though not æsthetic natures, I judge best to make it public.

About a year after the surrender of Johnston Captain Frederick Huntington, of Norwich, Connecticut, was married to Miss Fannie Pendleton, of Winchester, Virginia. There was a passion of love in these two young hearts which could make them forgive and ignore the terrific past.

"Why not forgive her?" said Huntington to a near relative, who wondered at him. "I have forgiven all the men who attempted my life. I have forgiven every Confederate soldier. I would shake hands with Merton, poor fellow! if he were alive. Why not forgive a woman?"

"But to love her!" gasped the near relative.

"Oh, that is the easiest thing in the world!" laughed Huntington.

A very easy thing, say all who know her.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE VIRGINIANS IN TEXAS.

CHAPTER X.

OUT IN A NORTHER.

WITHOUT a thought in the world except antelopes Venable dashed across the prairie, greatly inconveniencing Slow by the excessive application of both his enormous spurs.

He rode keeping the clump of timber between the antelopes and himself. Arrived at its edge he crept cautiously through it, leaving his horse behind, and peered out with leveled rifle upon the spot where he had seen them feeding. He might as well have expected to have found still resting on the brown grass the shadows of yesterday's clouds. As lightly, and far more fleetly, the drove had swept on almost at the instant the young Texan had first driven spurs into his horse's sides after them; for of all animals they are at once the most timid and the keenest of hearing and of scent.

A few hundred yards beyond where they had been feeding the prairie rolled up into a vast billow that concealed all beyond. In his eagerness the boy ran half-way up its slope before he remembered that he had left his horse. Hastening back he untied and mounted him with trembling haste, sprang upon him, and was soon near the crest of the hill. Alighting here he threw his coil of lariat off from the horn of his saddle upon the ground. One end was already secured around Slow's neck, at the other end the lariat was knotted to an iron spike some ten inches long. Sticking the sharp end of this into the earth he drove it in to its head by a few stamps of his heel, thus securely staking out his pony. Then with his rifle ready in his hand he crept carefully to the summit of the hill, burrowing as he went into the long, thick, dry grass.

Looking over he saw that the ridge he was on was as the rim of a vast bowl, circling miles around, and in the very bottom of the bowl he could see the antelopes feeding, seeming more like a drove of goats than any thing else. As he gazed he observed another and larger herd running toward them from the east; and he noticed that they did not bound along with occasional "lopes" like deer, but moved much more swiftly and evenly over the ground in a rapid trot, making the movement of the drove more like the flying of the shadow of a cloud across the grass than any thing else.

The antelopes were very nearly the color of the brown grass. None but a Texan could have seen them at all. Venable had by this time considerable practice in looking for cattle and game upon the vast prairies; and, like a sailor used to the sea, he could detect small objects very far away on the expanse. It is practice—practice! A music-master by perpetual practice trains his fingers to astonishing agility on the keys of a piano. So a rope-dancer can train his feet to the narrow path of an inch rope till he can tread such a thread-path for a long distance and with Niagara roaring far beneath him. There is no telling to what degree practice in any thing will carry a man. Only patient, persevering practice, and the end is certainly attained. Thus, what comes to very few indeed, not one in a hundred million, as the result of genius, can be attained by any one who will only lend himself persistently to practice toward it.

Thus Venable came to see twice as far and as distinctly as he could when his father's wagon-wheels first struck Texas soil. Untiring energy attains all the results of genius. But where the eyes are at all weak the prairies of Texas, by their vastness, are terribly trying. New-comers have often to travel with goggles on, making them look like owls exactly; and to come out of the narrow hollows and thick forests of other States into the unbounded magnificence of the prairie is as the flight of an owl from its dark nook into the splendor of open day. They say that living amidst such vast expanses makes a man large-hearted and open-handed. Sailors certainly are just that. If you have ever traveled in Texas, I will not affront you by even asking you whether or no you found Texans to be such. Perhaps their strong tendency to exaggeration and enthusiasm may be traced to the same cause. At any rate, Venable had become twice as animated and expanded—a nobler, manlier youth in every respect since coming out West.

In Virginia he certainly never would have dared to leave his uncle so impulsively, and he now turned his fascinated gaze from the antelopes, half remorsefully, in search of his uncle. He could see nothing of him. He knew him too well, however, to suppose that he could offend him seriously when game was the cause.

"I'm in for it, as I was that day uncle left me in deep water," he said to himself. "And my only way is to do now as I did then—strike out for the other bank—go through with it! And your best plan, my young friend," he continued to himself, "is just to go back, get Slow, ride around down out of sight around this biggest of bowls till you get entirely around on the opposite side—they are nearest that side—then take a crack at them. Even if you miss you will drive them toward uncle, and he never misses." No sooner said than done, I was going to add, only it took him much longer to make the circuit on his pony than he had imagined.

There is nothing so deceiving as a prairie. You may journey all day toward a prairie knob that seems not ten miles off when you start for it in the morning, and camp at night far enough off from it yet. It is the singular transparency of the atmosphere which produces the delusion.

It was near sunset before Venable reached

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the other side. And then, when he had staked his pony, and crept so carefully up to the summit of the ridge, as he lifted his head out of the brown grass to look, off went the drove of antelopes in a fleeting cloud like a pinch of gunpowder from the ground when a spark is applied. On and on they went due West, with such incredible smoothness and speed that it was a pleasure, even to the disappointed hunter, to see them, till they disappeared over the very spot where he had knelt on the opposite side of the bowl.

"Never mind, my fine fellows!" said Venable, as he saw them vanish. "As sure as you live I'll get you some of these days—see if I don't!"

The sun was fairly down as the boy mounted and turned toward home. He did not fear to lose his way, for right to the west of his father's house towered Mount Hoogenboom, as the boys had named the cedar brake in honor of the Dutch rail-cutter whose cabin was perched thereon. This lofty point could be seen far over the prairie, and served as an excellent landmark; it was destined to be seen farther over the prairie than ever before that night. As the boy struck a straight line across the bowl for the opposite side he strained his ears, expecting every instant to hear the crack of his uncle's rifle at the antelopes.

But it grew rapidly darker and colder, and a chill struck into the heart of the young hunter as he reached the opposite crest, after a swift gallop, and could see nothing of his uncle, and could barely detect the dim outlines of Mount Hoogenboom through the gathering night. A sense of desolation and alarm filled him as he spurred on such as he had never before known.

At this instant a singular sound behind him caused him to look around. Far down in the north hung a low black cloud, in which the lightning came and went incessantly. It was but the banner, black and fire-starred, of a tremendous foe, rushing with such artillery and forces upon the field as man can never marshal or withstand. On it came like a solid body across the prairie, gathering fury and force as it came—a Niagara of wind. The instant before it reached the flying boy the air was as calm and cool as on a pleasant summer day, the next the Norther was upon him, furious as a tornado, cold as midwinter. For the first time in his life the youth was absolutely terrified. With all his urging his tired pony seemed to creep rather than fly over the ground. The darkness, too, had become appalling. He could only urge his pony along in the direction in which he had aimed when he last saw Mount Hoogenboom. What rendered it worse the blankets were with Frank, and almost bitter thoughts rose in his mind that his uncle should have so deserted him.

He had heard often enough about the Northers, and how often people overtaken by them on the prairies had perished.

"If I could only get to that knot of timber where we first saw the antelopes," thought he, "I could shelter myself."

But he had gone too much to the left to hit it; and even if he had entered it the trees were so small and the elevation so great that there would have been no sufficient shelter.

Still he rode on, till at last the cold became insupportable. As a sudden thought he jumped off and endeavored to screen himself behind his horse from the mad fury of the wind. There was no shelter in this. Suddenly the shivering boy uncoiled his rope, threw it around the legs of his horse about the hoofs, and pulling the lariat to him, at the same instant pressing against the side of the animal, he succeeded in throwing him over on his side on the thick brown grass. The creature seemed to understand his master's object, and lay still, while Venable endeavored to nestle himself on the grass inside the legs of the animal. Some little protection from the fury of the wind was thus obtained by the body of the horse interposed.

The storm, however, seemed to grow in violence, as the boy, exhausted with fatigue and cold and alarm, sank into a kind of doze. It seemed to him as if the very grass must be torn up by the roots; as if the very globe would be thrown out of its orbit; but it was only a moment or two that his doze lasted. Strange that he did not think of his saddle-blanket, but it never once occurred to him. Even if it had its protection would have been insufficient. As it was, he was shivering, was perishing with cold, the sudden change causing the temperature to affect him even more than it would otherwise have done. And the cold continued to increase, and hail began to fall. Soon the horrors of a furious hail-storm were added to the darkness of the dreadful night.

"O God, have mercy on me!" said the poor boy, clasping his quivering hands together on his breast. And notwithstanding the bitter cold, he thought of all his occasional disobedience of his parents, his unkindness to Will and to Bessie. He thought especially of an oath he had uttered—it was the first and it had been the last that had ever passed his lips. Associated for a time with some wicked boys, there had one day sprung up in his mind a singular craving to use profane language like theirs—a craving the direct and powerful temptation of Satan. He had yielded to it on the instant, and now he thought of it with horror. He dreaded to die—that oath, that oath! If God would but spare his life this once, this once, he would try to be a better boy, to love and serve God. Not a sin of all his past life, not a prayer for him at family worship by his father, not a quiet talk with him and fervent prayer offered for him by his mother, kneeling by his bedside at night in the dark and silent room, but rose to his remembrance. For the first time in his life did he pray fervently, sincerely, there lying on the grass in the black and bitter storm.

And miles away another was also praying for

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

him—his mother kneeling with Will beside her by the bed at home, praying, O how fervently! for her boy. And seated far above the roaring storm, God was hearing them both—"a very present help.....therefore will not we fear though the earth be removed." The disjointed words kept ringing in the ears of the boy; he did not remember having ever heard them before.

As he held his hands clasped upon his breast he had felt something hard there for some time. It now occurred to him that it was a box of matches his uncle had handed him that morning to carry—he had not thought of them since. Instantly he had them out. Making an arch of his body among the horse's legs, by resting his head and knees on the ground, he endeavored to strike a light under him near the ground against the stomach of the horse. Over and over again the flame caught and was instantly extinguished by the wind. Pressing himself still closer against the animal, sheltering the flame still more carefully by his hollowed hand, at last there was a blaze. It is a wonder it had not exploded the powder-horn, which hung down by its strap from the young hunter's breast, actually into the blaze, with only a paper stopper. At the instant, however, that Slow felt the smart of the new element, and saw its sudden light, he struggled to his feet, and Venable with him, holding on to the lariat, and trembling lest the storm should extinguish the feeble flame.

But no, the grass was a yard long, very thick and matted, besides perfectly dry. The whole prairie was like an immense straw mattress, three feet thick, with the ticking off. It seemed to the boy that it was but an instant before the grass was on fire for twenty yards before him. Mounting his horse he reined him back, and gazed with terror at the rapidity of the conflagration. The flame could not rise upward at all, but was driven by the wind in long tongues of fire, level with the earth, into the thick, dry grass ahead, traveling through the brown tinder-like hay with incredible speed and fury.

Venable had supposed that the fire would only spread from him before the wind. He now observed that it eat its way with only less rapidity toward him, and against the wind. The truth is, he had kindled the fire only to warm himself without any thought beyond that. And now he reined his terrified horse farther and farther back before a danger more appalling than the storm. With his little match he had set that awful tempest on fire! The thought filled him with horror and dread inconceivable. He would gladly have extinguished it if he could. He even attempted to do so. The fire, just before imprisoned in the little red drop on the end of a splinter safe in the box in his pocket, had now escaped like a wild animal from its cage—like the awful giant of Arabian story from the fisherman's box. On the wings of the storm it rushed along red and roaring, and as unchainable and past his control as the storm itself.

The cold was forgotten, as was the night, in the heat and glare of the conflagration—escape was the only thought. At one instant he turned to ride backward, but he could not endure the idea of riding a step from home; besides, the fire seemed to travel almost as rapidly in that course. Then he thought of putting spurs to his horse and dashing straight ahead through the fire; he even put the stopper of his powder-horn into his mouth, and moistened it thoroughly for this purpose, lest a spark should get at the powder.

Suddenly he thought of the instinct of animals, and, dropping the rein upon the neck of the struggling horse, with a loud cry and applying both spurs he let the animal take his own course. Plunging once or twice, it turned and dashed off to the right till it got beyond the fire, then it turned again to the left. This brought it again in the very track of the wind and the fire, but it was the straight line to its stable; and beyond this its instinct could not go. So thick and matted was the grass, however, that it could advance but slowly—at least so it seemed to the rider.

Once or twice the horse fell with his rider in the unevenness of the way. Once Venable was thrown completely over his head, but he lighted on the soft, thick grass, the coil of the lariat in his hand, and speedily regained his seat. All this time the fire was pursuing them like some fiendish foe, exulting in its red fury, roaring and blinding them. Whenever Venable glanced back at the blaze the night, when he looked forward again, was only doubly black before him, until at last he determined to look back no more, but to ride on, the hail rattling about his ears, as fast as possible.

In a short time he felt, by the unevenness of his horse's gait, that they had reached a "hog-wallow prairie." This is a prairie pitted, as with a gigantic small-pox, all over with hollows, all alike, of about eight feet diameter, and one to three feet depression, formed, as is conjectured, by the cracking of the ground during long droughts, the earth afterward filling in. Why the depressions should be so regular and systematic is not accounted for.

Hardly had they advanced a hundred yards into this, when Slow suddenly stumbled forward over something in his way with more violence than ever before, throwing his rider far over his head. The grass had now become much more thin and bare, and the boy struck with considerable violence on the earth. Before he could regain his feet Slow had disappeared like a dream. In vain his master attempted to whistle or call—his voice was drowned at his lips by the roaring of the storm and the beating of the hail. Exhausted with terror, cold, and fatigue, he crouched upon the ground powerless for the moment. As he did so he felt beneath him the object over which Slow had stumbled. It was the wreck of an ox, which had bogged and perished in one of the hog-wallow pits years before. The bones had been

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google cleaned and scattered around by the ravenous wolves; only the hide remained whole—shriveled up on the ground like the shell of a turtle—and it was over this that the pony had stumbled.

But the sound of the approaching fire awoke Venable from his stupor. He turned around and saw that the sea of fire would sweep its red surges over the spot on which he then was in a few minutes. As to escaping on foot, that would have been impossible in any case; and as it was, he was far too much bruised and overcome by weariness and cold. Almost instinctively he tore his powder-horn from his neck and cast it from him as far as he could hurl it. Then, murmuring incoherent prayers to God for help, and holding to his darling rifle even in death, he crept under the hide, coiling himself up beneath it as well as he could, with his face against the earth, and submitted to his fate.

CHAPTER XI.

THE NIGHT OF THE FIRE.

ALMOST before Uncle Frank had disappeared in the darkness Hark, Scip, Rohamma, and Will, led on by Mr. McRobert, were hard at work "fighting the fire."

Before fencing in his field Mr. McRobert had, under his brother's advice, plowed up the earth for thirty feet without the line of fencing. Thus a comparatively bare space lay between the cedar rails which inclosed the field and the thick grass of the prairie. The field lay between the prairie and the timber in which the house was built; so that, if they could only keep the flames off the rails all would be safe. Even if the fire had seized upon the rails only it would have been a terrible loss. Almost a single spark, under such a wind, would have burned all the long line of fence, containing thousands upon thousands of rails, into merely a black line upon the ground, like that left by a train of powder when fired. Each rail cost on the ground nearly five cents; besides, it would be impossible to inclose it again in time, so that all the next year's crop was involved. In a word, before morning Mr. McRobert was to be several thousand dollars poorer even than he then was unless the fire could be kept off; and if you had stood there that night where Will stood and seen the oncoming ocean of fire you would have thought, with him, that it was hopeless. So his father feared; yet he was determined to do what he could; and trusting in God, aided by every busy hand there, he fought the fire. With water, of course, you say? No, Sir. It would have taken all the Colorado for that. With fire. There is a practice in medicine called homeopathy—that is, the conquering a disease in any one by employing the same agent of disease, only in a very much smaller quantity. "Similia similibus" is the motto—the use of poison to drive out poison. I am sure I do not personally know whether homeopathy and humbug are identical or not, but this was the practice adopted by Dr. McRobert that night for the saving of his imperiled property. Under his direction, all hands being employed, the prairie was set on fire all along some sixty feet from the fence. With the help of the storm all the grass was thus speedily consumed up to the very rails, but without setting them on fire, as they were closely watched, and the conflagration had not headway enough to be unmanageable. Thus, all along the fence there was, in half an hour, a broad, bare, blackened belt sixty feet wide, upon which there was not left a straw unconsumed as fuel for the approaching conflagration. The same process was repeated further out, and soon the belt had been widened eighty feet broader all along. But now it behooved them to bestir themselves indeed. The storm of fire was by this time full in sight. Busy as he was, Mr. McRobert could not but pause a moment to gaze upon it, ever keeping Will close to his side. Right across the prairie, more vivid for the blackness of the night, more terrible for the roaring of the tempest of wind and hail, was an horizon of red fire, curling high in the air, darting hither and thither upward, crackling and roaring even above the storm. But the most appalling of all was the swiftness of its advance. But just now it was a mile or two off, and now it was almost upon them. To gaze upon the inrolling of the crimson ocean it seemed the folly of a child even to attempt to check it from sweeping all the world before it. But small time was there to admire its sublime splendor. Already the wind came hot and full of sparks and smoke upon them from the approaching furnace. Another belt must be burned, at least, or all would be in vain. At least a hundred feet beyond the blackened line ran Rohamma and Hark, each with a blazing torch. Hurrying Will in to his mother with Scip, Mr. McRobert was at work too. But Hark was the hero of the fight. Notwithstanding the storm he had cast off his coat, and, with his old hat drawn down over his eyes, he ran with almost superhuman energy along the line of grass he was firing, stooping every step as he ran to thrust his torch an instant into the grass. It was close work, for the heat from the approaching fire was almost intolerable. By the time Hark ran out at one end of the line Mr. McRobert and Rohamma had ran out at the other, and all the grass was in a fierce blaze. It was a close race between the two fires. But the large fire assisted the smaller by casting in its storm of sparks and cinders. Having done all man could do, seated on the fence, Mr. McRobert watched with breathless interest the result—as well as the stifling smoke would permit. Never before had he been so thoroughly aroused in all his life. Whatever the result of the fire, he could never again be the same listless, somewhat sluggish, Virginia planter he had before been. From a sudden development of this sort no man ever can wholly recede.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Dey tell me, Mass Morton," said Hark, standing beside him, steaming with perspiration and smoke, "dat de Dutchman—Squeezleborn I belebe his name is, de farmer down de ribber—allus hauled his rails home after he gathered his crap, carried dem out again next spring when he done planting his seed. Folks here laugh at him. I nebber laugh at him any more after dis night."

"Nebber hab such doings in Ole Virginny," groaned the panting partner of his bosom. "Nebber see such crazy wind as dis dare; nebber see such world on blaze as dis dare; nebber lebe bed fighting fire all night in Virginny. Oh, how I hate de country! All dis worser dan ole Watkins eben. And where Mass Venable all dis time?"

Where, indeed! The excitement and intense struggle against the fire had not kept that thought an instant out of his father's mind. But what could he do? And that storm of fire, whose billows were now breaking in upon his very feet; had it indeed passed over his boy—his brave, noble boy? He did not know before how he loved his boy—how he was beginning to look to and lean upon his manly growth. As he sank his head upon his bosom a hand was laid upon him from behind. He turned with surprise to see his wife standing quietly behind him on the inner side of the fence on which he was seated.

"Never fear about me," she said, in reply to his exclamation. "I am so strong and well the storm will not hurt me. Besides, I am warmly clad. I left Scip in the house with Will and Bessie all safe. I came out for a moment to see if I could help;" and she shielded her face against the blast.

"Work's done, Miss 'Manda," said Hark, eagerly. "See, our fire done burned out; and prairie fire just reached its far edge—good two hundred and fifty feet from here."

Sure enough—the conflagration rushing magnificently on, reaching the edge of the burned belt, had suddenly subsided for lack of fuel—was rapidly sinking. Still the air was almost unendurable; not so much from heat as from the smoke and sparks.

"Get two buckets of water each as quick as you can, you and Rohamma," said Mr. McRobert to Hark; "one go one way, the other the other way, along the fence, lest some of the sparks should lodge in the cedar bark of the rails. When all is safe come to the house, Hark, with Rohamma. There'll be supper there for you."

As soon as they returned with the water Mr. McRobert, assisting his wife through the darkness across the plowed ground, hastened to the house.

"I am not so much alarmed about Venable," she said, cheerfully, as they sat down by the fire. "It's my belief that it was he who started the fire to warm himself, not knowing. Then, he has only had to keep up with it on Slow to keep warm in spite of the Norther. What do you think? But can that be the wind roaring so?" she added.

"Just what I always think, my dear," said her husband, turning upon her with half the anxiety gone from his brow, "that all things are for our best interest in some way if we only do our duty. It always has been so, it always will be so with us. As to Venable—"

But the remark seemed to meet with a flat contradiction on the spot.

"Cedar's on fire, Mass Morton," interrupted Scip, putting his head in at the door.

Mr. McRobert sprang to his feet. "Hark and your mammy are there still!" he exclaimed as he grasped his hat and rushed out.

"Lor, no, massa, dey's at de fence. It's de cedar brake dat's on fire!" and a ruddy glow upon the midnight sky to the west explained it all. Hastening down the spring a hundred yards below the house and turning, Mr. McRobert beheld the sublimest scene he had ever witnessed. As has been said, on the other side of San Hieronymo from the house the rocks ran up into a mountain crowned almost to the summit with mountain cedar. This had been the vast storehouse from which both of the brothers had cut and hauled all their logs and rails for building and fencing, for years in the case of the younger brother. A great deal, too, had been sold to neighbors around, until the best of the cedar nearest the house was cut off. There was still an immense quantity of cedar left, but some of it was farther off west, and most of it lay upon the mountain on the other side of the river. The fire had scaled the mountain from the prairie and was now raging upward like a furnace. The direction of the Norther drove the conflagration rather off to one side from the house, so that there was no danger so far as it was concerned. Mrs. McRobert had by this time joined her husband, and stood beside him, watching the magnificent spectacle. As the flame reached higher and higher, feeding eagerly upon the lopped-off branches and heaps of brush left from the axe of the rail-cutters, the whole mountain was literally on fire. Vesuvius could not be more awful, for here the flame ascended not from a central crater but from the sides as well as the summit—a solid pyramid of light, a mountain of fire. The wild contortions of the spires of flame, broad at the base and narrowing to a long flexile tongue each till the lofty points were lost in the dull orange of the smoke overhead; the awful roar, rising high above the storm, the prairie on fire was tame in comparison. The house, the spring, the river, all were lighted up by the glare, the shadows of the garden-posts fell clear and distinct on the earth. Notwithstanding the cold, and wind, and sleet, the husband and wife stood fascinated, unable to move their eyes.

"Well," said Mrs. McRobert at length, "if Venable did start the fire from a match—not that I blame him in the least, dear fellow, he will certainly have an illustration to last him all his life of one passage of Scripture at least."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"What is that?" asked her husband.

"Why, 'Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth!' But what about Hoogenboom, and Francisco too?" she continued, suddenly.

"I don't know; I have not forgotten them, but what can we do?"

"And there is a fire in the east too!" exclaimed Mrs. McRobert, as they turned toward the house, pointing to a ruddy glow through the smoke rising from the prairie.

"Yes," replied her husband; "but that is a fire of God's own kindling—it is day that is breaking." So saying he hurried on with her to the house.

"Now for Venable," he said, as he passed on toward the stable. There he found that Hark had already saddled his master's horse in anticipation.

"By-the-by, when did you see Duke last?" he asked, as he mounted.

"Mass Venable tied him up before he left yesterday," replied the black; "but he howled so 'bout dark dat I let him go. Habn't seen him since, massa," continued the negro, drawing nearer as he spoke, and sinking his trembling voice into a whisper, "Slow is in de stable. I found him whickering at de bars dis morning an let him in; but whar Mass Venable?" he continued, with deep anxiety, laying his hand on his master's knee.

Mr. McRobert sprang from his horse, hastened to the stable, there stood Slow eating at his manger as if there was nothing unusual.

"I lef de saddle and bridle on him jus as he come; his rope was trailing, an I take it off," said Hark. Mr. McRobert walked once or twice around the animal with eager eyes, but nothing could be elicited.

"Hark!" he exclaimed, suddenly, and in a voice so altered that the negro did not recognize it, "tell the rest to say nothing to Mrs. McRobert of this. Get a mule as quick as you can, and follow." And he spurred out of the yard. Before him lay the expanse of the prairie, black and bare as far as the eye could reach. The sleet had now ceased, but the wind still blew with unabated violence, driving before it the smoke and ashes. Reaching the first eminence, Mr. McRobert halted till Hark could join him, sweeping the desolate landscape with his eye, eager yet dreading to detect any unusual object. Nothing to be seen save here and there the blaze from a fallen mesquit-tree.

"I hear Mass Frank say dey gwine by de ten-mile knot," said Hark, closing with his master.

"Very well, we'll aim for that first," replied his master; "it's all we can do." And they galloped on in the teeth of the wind.

"Dere's no wolves on de prairie, massa, any how," said the black, after half an hour's swift ride. "De fire done drove 'em out into de ribber bottom. I saw whole pack running 'fore de blaze last night. Mass Venable's body—I mean Mass Venable safe from dem for to-day."

Mr. McRobert could not reply. It was the darkest hour of his life. Though he could scarce keep his seat for the fury of the wind his glance ran incessantly on every side as he rode, without a thought of any thing but his son. It might have been the balmiest of summer mornings to him instead for what he observed of it.

"Why didn't we think of it?" he exclaimed, suddenly drawing up. "We might have tracked the way Slow came in."

"No, massa, no," said his companion, shaking his head. "I tried dat dis morning hard. De wind cover de tracks wid ashes 'tirely."

Again they drove on at full speed. On the summit of every rise they would pull up; and though the wind seemed as if it would tear them from their saddles, they scanned the expanse closely—fearfully yet closely. Not a living thing; black, bare; the heretofore hidden rocks and ravines showing plainly in the increasing light as the sun struggled, as if itself against the wind, above the murky horizon. In another hour they had come in sight of the ten-mile knot. Yesterday it was a green clump of live-oaks; now it stood a dwarfed and shriveled group of leafless trunks.

"Oh, massa!" exclaimed Hark, suddenly, "I see a man on a horse riding toward de knot. But Lor, Mass Venable hab no horse."

A few minutes' gallop, and they could see that it was Uncle Frank and alone. There was no gladness in his haggard face as they joined him at the knot.

"Not a thing of him, not a thing of him!" he exclaimed. "I've been riding around the edge of the fire—into it for that matter," he continued, pointing to the singed fetlocks of his horse, "and I can see nothing of him. I've been here a dozen times since day broke, sweeping the prairie with my spy-glass. Nothing can I see. I'll try again." He did so slowly and thoroughly, then shook his head, and handed the glass to his brother. In vain his brother attempted the same; the trembling of his hand and the dimness of his eyes made it useless.

"Let me try, Mass Morton," said Hark, and taking the glass and rapidly adapting it to his focus—for he had often used it for cattle—he carefully scanned the whole expanse—once, twice, thrice. "Hah!" he exclaimed, suddenly, but then in an altered voice, "Psho, it's only hide of ox burned so black. Yes," he continued, "and yonder's a wolf—you fool nigger. No, it's Duke circling round and round! Hi on dog! good dog! Hi on! Hunt him, boy!" he exclaimed, at the top of his voice, and slamming the tubes of the glass together he thrust it in his bosom, and was off in a moment, followed by his companions. It was with difficulty they could detect the form of the dog, for it was Duke, now on a crest, next lost in a hollow, as he ran with his nose to the ground.

"He got 'larmed 'bout Mass Venable las night," said the excited negro, "but de ground too hot for his foot—too hot now, but he hunting up his massa. Hi on, boy! hunt him fel-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

low! good dog!" he exclaimed, almost beside himself with eagerness, though the dog was still far beyond sound of his voice. It was but a few moments, however, before they were up with him, rising an elevation as they did so. The dog was running before them toward a burned and blackened heap lying in a hog-wallow, motionless.

"Hold up, Morton, for God sake!" exclaimed the Texan, seizing upon his brother's bridle and reining both horses back, while the tears gushed from his eyes and rolled in torrents down his cheek and beard. "This is no sight for you to see. Be a man, brother! be a man! Here, Hark," he continued, sharply, "stop! you stay with your master!"

Mr. McRobert had caught sight of the object yet distant, and, yielding to his feelings, sank, as his brother spoke, upon the pommel of his saddle in unutterable grief. He had dreaded it—it was what he knew must be, but the reality was too painful. The strong arms of the negro were around his master in a moment, and both seemed convulsed equally with grief as the Texan rode ahead alone. Suddenly he dismounted—it was to pick up a powder-horn lying on the ground, exploded and black. A moment more and he was beside the dread object. Suddenly the negro and his master started with surprise.

"Oh, you everlasting scamp!" was the exclamation they heard. "If I only had a mesquit branch handy, if I didn't let you have a taste of its thorns I wasn't at San Jacinto, that's all! I have seen folks play possum before," he continued, as his companions ran up, "but this beats all!"

He had seized upon the shriveled hide of a long-ago-dead ox, and there, beneath it, coiled up in the smallest space, lay Venable, just waked out of a sound sleep, his rifle beside him.

It were vain to describe the revulsion of feeling as they assisted the young hero to his feet. Even Duke himself ran round and round with delirious barking, knocking his young master over once or twice in his exuberant joy.

"The wind blows too hard and cold to stop to hear about it now," interrupted Mr. McRobert, at length. "Up behind me, Venable, and home to your mother as fast as we can go."

The Norther was now upon their backs, and seemed even to help them on with its force as they rode. Never summer breeze filled happier homeward sails. It seemed but a few moments before they were near the edge of the timber, Mount Hoogenboom still smoking with fitful flames upon their right. In his eagerness the father had ridden with his son quite ahead.

"Massa Frank," said Hark, earnestly, drawing back the Texan as they approached the house, "I want to show you something. I clean forgot all 'bout it till dis moment, looking for Mass Venable. He's in my cabin. Dis is de way it was—"

"Who's in your cabin?" asked the Texan.

"Lor, massa, dis is de way it was. I see him once, twice, before las night—day he saved Mass Will from ribber, and odder times. Las night I see him fightin de fire like mad. He keep at my end ob de fence, in dark, so Mass Morton couldn't see. He hope me mightily, I tell you. Did more'n I. 'Don't tell your marster, boy,' he said, ebry time we come togedder in de smoke and wind. After de fence saved Mass Morton go to de house, and I hurry down to odder end ob fence, and dare he lay, where I seen him fall—in corner ob fence. Rohamma and me we take him up—he limber as if dead—and carry him in our cabin, put him in bed. 'Don't tell any one, don't tell any one!' he groan. But, Lor, I mus tell. I keeps nuffin from my massa. I thought I tell you fust."

By this time they had dismounted and reached the cabin of the negro. Throwing open the door and entering, there on the bed, bearded, emaciated, covered to the chin in blankets, his sunken eyes sealed as in death, lay the wild man who had so long haunted the house and the woods around.

CHAPTER XII.

MR. ROLAND.

"Mass Frank say he and Hark gone over to de ranch; back arter while," was the announcement of Scip to the family as they sat down to the breakfast-table, not without thanks to God first around the family altar for the preservation of the past night. Now that it was all over, it all seemed more like a dreadful dream than sober reality.

"But it wasn't so wonderful at last my escape," said Venable at length, when he had somewhat brought up the arrears of his long fast. "Only," he continued, "it does seem fortunate that Slow should have thrown me just in the hog-wallow. If I had kept on him only a little longer, he would have been in the thickest sort of prairie grass; and Slow was getting to be so slow that I do believe he could not have kept ahead of the fire to save our lives. We would have been burned up, certain."

"But I can't imagine how being in the hog-wallow prairie saved you," said his mother.

"Why, ma," exclaimed Venable, "didn't you ever notice how thin and green and short the grass always is in those damp hog-wallows? But it's well the hide was there, too. I declare it does seem as if the very things that seem worst for us at first turn out afterward to be the very best things that could possibly happen. I didn't want to go into the brake that morning at all; yet I killed my first buck by going. I didn't want to be sent back that other morning by Uncle Frank; and it led at last to my killing that big bear. If I had shot one of those antelopes—I'll kill one yet one of these days—I do believe I would have perished out in the cold. The very hide that pitched me off of Slow was my salvation from the fire. You see,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I crawled under, and pretty near gave up, I was so worn out. I was hardly safe under, when there came tearing along a herd of something—wolves I believe—running from the fire. One of whatever it was actually stood on the hide above me to look back on the fire. It was only a moment, and he was off like a shot. I could hear the fire roaring and crackling nearer and nearer. The smoke got dreadful bad. If it hadn't been that the wind was so strong, I would have been smothered sure. I drew in my feet close, put my mouth with my hands beside it close on the damp ground, and breathed as slow as I could. The hail made the grass harder to burn too. Somehow it was on me and past me in a flash, like; and after that I fell asleep, although terribly cold, I was so worn down. But I thought my feet were frozen when Uncle Frank stirred me up."

"Next time, my dear boy," said his mother, "don't be so impulsive—it is growing on you."

"But you wouldn't have me hang round like cousin Gus, would you, ma? He isn't older than I am, and he chews and smokes and idles about all day so fat and lazy."

"No fear of your being a lazy man," replied his mother, with some little maternal pride as she glanced at her son — black-eyed, black-haired, straight as an Indian, and almost as brown, lithe, and active in every member, his face sparkling with animation.

"No," said his father; "but there is no use going to either extreme. When I was at college at old Hampden-Sydney there were two youths in the Freshmen class with me—Bob Winslow was one. He was rich and short and heavy, extravagantly fond of good eating. He went to bed at eight, and was never up at chapel hardly, scarcely out to breakfast even, except when it was the season for buckwheat cakes. He never learned a lesson well in his life. We called him 'Log,' because he drifted along like a log on a current. The very opposite of him was King or Rex, as we used to call him. He was thin, poor, sharp, active, eager. Up earliest of all, to bed last of all. Hard at it all the time. He went into mathematics like a skater on ice, into shinny on the Campus in the same way. He would never take less than a half dozon books out of the Society library on Saturdays at one time. He was the fastest walker I ever tried to keep up with. And what was the result? He was the swiftest and shallowest man I ever knew. He was everlastingly stumbling, he went so fast. It was no pleasure to converse with him, he was perpetually interrupting you; before you could finish half a sentence he would have the other half finished for you. You couldn't keep his eye in yours a minute. He was a fussy man—a headlong, hap-hazard, harum-scarum. Don't be either, Venable; be just between the two, neither too slow nor too impulsive. The noblest style of men are those who combine in themselves opposite excellences without the extremes of either."

"An even mixture of Texas and Virginia, father, I suppose," said Venable.

"Without the extremes of either," added his mother; and she continued, "it must be the climate of Texas, or the strong winds, or the broad prairies, or all these combined; but I never heard so much exaggeration in my life. In all this neighborhood, if any body is sick they are always reported as very sick. And if really and seriously sick, it is immediately said that they can not possibly live. It is always terribly hot or awfully cold, pitch-dark or splendidly bright. Every thing is either the very biggest or smallest, the very best or the very worst ever known. Both of you boys are catching this Texas brogue fast enough."

"Oh, it's the country, ma," said Will. "Nobody ever saw such a grand fire as we had last night in good, dull, easy old Virginia; and I am certain I never heard such a Norther as this there in my life. And such splendid long-eared rabbits, and such heaps of grapes and pecans, and such great big flowers on the Spanish dagger-tree."

"That's right, Will; stand up for Texas always," said Uncle Frank, entering; for the family had lingered long around the table. "All safe over at the ranch," he added, drawing up to the fire. "Hoogenboom was driven down to it with his family from the fire in the brake," he continued; "he will stay there till the fire is done burning. He thinks his cabin has escaped, as there was a clearing all around it."

"There must have been immense mischief done?" asked Mrs. McRobert.

"Oh, I am so sorry," said Venable. "I declare I would almost rather have frozen to death. The fact is, I never once thought about it."

"You never mind," replied his uncle. "If the prairie's burned over it will only help the young grass when it rises in a month or two now. As to the brake, it was mostly trash from where we cut rails that were burned. A good deal of good cedar is burned too, but there's plenty left. Mustn't be so headlong next time, Venable. A rifle too quick on the trigger is almost as bad a one as one of these old Yagers that keep snap, snap, snapping all day at a deer without going off. Besides, you'll never kill antelope that way all your life. Cool, patient, persevering, that's the way."

"How long will this Norther continue, I wonder," said Mrs. McRobert, lifting the curtain, and gazing out upon the stormy scene.

"Just three days exactly," replied the Texan, "and then a lull of half a day, and back all the wind comes again from the south, dampened by the Gulf, till matters are balanced again. I hate the return wind worst of the two, it's so chill."

"I'm afraid our cattle will suffer," said his brother.

"They would if we lived farther from the mountains," answered the Texan, "but they can find something to eat there all winter. It's

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google astonishing how thick and rich the mesquit grass grows up to the very tops of the mountains, out of holes drilled by the rain in the rocks; and it's the richest grass for stock in the world."

"But I have often seen skulls of cattle on the prairies," said Will.

"Well, very often they do die from one cause or other, though Texas is the best stock-raising country in North America, at least; never have to feed; prairies always open, and fat with grass. And it's the most profitable business, too," continued the Texan. "You know that white calf I gave you, Will, last spring. Five years hence, without any care on your part except to drive up once a year and brand the calves, that one calf will have increased to no less than thirty head of fine cattle. By the time you want to get married and "set up" a ranch for yourself, say ten years after that, you will have from that one white calf a herd of one hundred and fifty head to begin the world with, at the lowest calculation. As to the skulls you speak about, most of them are buffalo skulls, as you can tell by the shortness of the horns."

"But it is such a dry country," said his brother; "that is the grand objection to it."

"Well, it is dry for two or three years at a time," replied the Texan. "But you ought to have seen Hoogenboom this morning. Down he had come from his cabin in a hurry from the fire, hardly time to bring any thing but his wife and children; yet he had managed to bring with him a block of wood, cut from a post oak, about six inches long and eight or ten across. I thought it was a stool to sit on; but he took and showed it to me. It was the section of a tree, and he had planed and polished and varnished one end so as to show the rings—the yearly growths of the tree. He had told me about it before. There were eighty or a hundred rings, showing the growth of the tree for that number of years past. He could tell the wetness or dryness of all the seasons for that time back by the comparative thickness or thinness of the rings. He had made out a table, and found that the seasons went wet or dry in separate groups of six or eight years each; but a large number of the seasons had been very wet, and a majority of all favorable in the highest degree. He says similar experiments all over Texas have proved the same, and that he has tested his tree-almanac by what is well known in regard to seasons for the last twenty years. Its rings for that time and the facts agree. He is a learned man, Hoogenboom; it's his broken English makes him seem ignorant. I think a great deal of him."

"As you would of any body, Frank, who says a good word for Texas," said his sister.

"But we are so out of the world here," said his brother, "you can hardly reason that away."

"Only till railroads are built," replied the Texan, warmly; "and their tracks are already graded for them over the country in every direction by nature itself. The cedar brakes are full of cross ties, ready. Coal for the locomotives plenty — the mountains crammed with it."

"Coal?" asked his sister.

"Yes, iron too, in abundance, copper, and lead. As to gypsum Texas has the largest known bed of it in the world. Only wait a little and the world will know what Texas is, I tell you!"

But there was one thing which the Texan did not tell them. As the result of a rapid conversation with the man whom he had found in Hark's cabin, he had bundled him up, and, aided by Hark, had hurried him through the tempest over to his own ranch, and there put him securely and comfortably to bed under the care of Francisco. And from that moment there sprang up a singular interest in his warm heart toward the stranger. As he slowly recovered during days after, under the care of the Texan, many and long-continued were the conversations between them, no allusion ever being made to the family at the San Hieronymo of his being at the ranch. So carefully—for whatever reason—had the matter been kept secret that six or eight weeks had passed before it was known to the San Hieronymo family that there was such a person. One day, however, Venable came suddenly into his uncle's ranch in search of a powder-horn to supply the place of the one lost in the fire. He was startled as he entered to observe a grave-looking gentleman seated by the fire absorbed in reading. The stranger sprang to his feet at first, greatly alarmed and embarrassed, and the boy noticed that he had turned ashen pale, sprang up as if on the point of flying from the spot, then stopped with a hesitating, palpitating manner like a snared bird. Venable, confused by the confusion of the other, was retreating when the gentleman, as by a sudden and strong effort, resumed his composure, and begged him in courteous tones to be seated. As he complied with his request Venable observed, in a glance, that his companion was a closely-shaven, pale-faced, sad-eyed, student-like man. "Looked like a minister," said the boy afterward. The quick glance of the young Texan showed him, too, that his companion was plainly but neatly dressed in black, and had the appearance of great mental suffering and long-continued ill-health. It was some time before either party could be perfectly at ease. At last, after some hesitating conversation, Venable spied the horn he was in search of hanging against the wall, and, taking it, he was about leaving.

"Are you going directly home?" said the stranger, suddenly, as Venable bade him good-by.

"Yes, Sir," said the boy.

"Be so good as to wait a few moments," said the stranger, "and I will accompany you;" and he withdrew into the next room.

Venable waited some time for him to reappear. At last he rose and sauntered to the book-case, which was a set of rough shelves nailed up against the logs which partitioned off

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the two rooms. As he stood there with a book in his hand his eye fell through a crack in the wall upon the stranger in the adjoining room. He had knelt on the floor beside his bed, and, with face buried in his hands upon the coverlet as silent and as still as a statue, seemed engaged in prayer. With a glow of shame on his cheek for having thus unwittingly intruded upon the privacy of another the boy stealthily resumed his seat. In a few moments the stranger reappeared, hat in hand, and with an aspect of perfect composure, and they proceeded on their walk.

There was a certain gentleness and refinement in the face and bearing and tones of his companion that impressed Venable with a sense of respect and almost awe toward him. Both education, society, and suffering had united to give to him, apparently, that indescribable air of purity and refinement so unmistakable, yet so difficult to analyze. The boy felt that he walked with one superior to the mass, though why he felt so he could not have told. As it was he felt strongly drawn toward him. On reaching his father's house he showed him into the parlor, while he informed his mother—his father being absent—of the arrival.

"Permit me to introduce myself, Madam," the visitor said, rising and bowing as Mrs. McRobert entered the room. "My name is Roland. I am a minister of the Gospel. I have been on a visit to your brother at his place. I have taken the liberty to accompany your son home this morning to have the pleasure of becoming acquainted with yourself and husband."

There was something in the tones of his voice which caused Mrs. McRobert to hesitate a moment, coloring and embarrassed in spite of herself, and without knowing why. Soon recovering herself, however, she engaged in conversation, and learned that it was his intention to remain in the neighborhood for some time, in accordance with the request of Mr. Frank McRobert, making that house his home. Mrs. McRobert learned, too, in the course of the conversation, that Mr. Roland was a minister of the same communion as her husband and herself, and that it was his intention to preach and visit as a minister of the Gospel as he had opportunity. This was glad news to her, as both herself and family had long yearned once more for the public worship of the Sabbath and the sanctuary: it was the greatest of their privations so far; and upon this the conversation became more animated and interested until Mr. McRobert came in. In accordance with their cordial and repeated request Mr. Roland remained to dinner. Long before he left a total change had come over him, his eye kindling, his wan cheek flushing with a new life.

The conversation of the family, the artless prattle of Bessie, seemed to give him exquisite pleasure, as if long ignorant of such things. It was late in the afternoon that he rose to leave, his face mantled with smiles and pleasurable excitement, a pleasure reciprocated by the rest, who were charmed as in the society of one of the most fascinating men they had ever met, even in the most select circles of their old home. At this moment Uncle Frank suddenly entered the room. At sight of Mr. Roland he uttered a sudden exclamation of astonishment, which he endeavored to cloak, first by a cough and then by pleading that he had not known that Mr. Roland had come over. He soon, however, recovered himself in the calm composure of the minister's manner.

"You see I could not wait for you to introduce me, Mr. McRobert," he said, "so I came over myself."

"I trust that we may often have the pleasure of seeing you," said Mr. Morton McRobert, accompanying him to the door.

"Thank you sincerely," said Mr. Roland, as he stopped in the doorway, his hat in his hand. "I should have told you," he continued, "that my daughter Agnes will soon be with me. She is an orphan, has no mother now, and I hope—I think, you will like her. I fear she will be very lonely during my absences."

"Where can I have seen him before?" thought Mrs. McRobert often during the rest of the evening, pausing in her sewing to think. "In Virginia? where can it be?"

It was but a short time, however, before all felt as if Mr. Roland had been known to them for years. On the Sabbath after his visit worship was held, at Uncle Frank's special request, in the largest room of his ranch. He and Hark had constructed some rude benches in addition to the seats already there—that is, unplaned planks supported upon chairs. At the appointed hour not only the family from the San Hieronymo, but several other families, had gathered in. A small cedar table had been placed on one side of the room as pulpit. When the hymn had been read, to the astonishment of all Uncle Frank raised an old familiar tune in a bold, clear, and sweet voice—one he had learned from often hearing it in his father's family. Hoogenboom sat beside him growling a deep bass, almost equal to an organ; while all the rest, male and female, joined in cordially and harmoniously. Rough as was the sanctuary and small the audience, it was none the less the solemn worship of Almighty God. Every heart was stilled, and warmed with devotional feelings long unknown to most there. A fervent prayer, the very breathing of childlike feeling, by the minister, in which he solemnly and touchingly dedicated the room they were in for the time as a sanctuary to God; another familiar hymn, and then, in a simple and natural manner, the minister expounded to his hearers a passage of Scripture. His manner was unstudied, easy, colloquial, familiar, yet solemn, and full of rich and instructive thought. The hearers could not but listen. It was a conversation held as with each of them, personally, upon the momentous questions of the soul and eternity. There was no lack of animation in

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the speaker, nor any strong gesticulation or uplifting of voice unsuited to the small room in which they were assembled. The attention of all was held unslackened to the close. Then another prayer, gushing from the heart of the speaker, and sweeping all other hearts there upward with it to Heaven—another hymn, closing with an old-fashioned doxology, and the benediction was laid upon the bowed heads of the audience like a reality of good—and the services were over.

Notice had been given, before the conclusion of the services, of future services by the same minister there and at other points around. No language can express the gratification of the family as they walked slowly back to the San Hieronymo. It was the sudden, unexpected supply of just what they most desired.

"And could we possibly have had a better preacher?" said Mrs. McRobert. "Surely he comes among us sent of God. Where did I know him before?"

LAURA'S LOVERS.

EVERY one in Summertown thought that it was all over with Laura. There wasn't a soul in the neighborhood but had settled her long ago as the dependent drudge in some cousin's family when her aunt should die; for though Mrs. Devon had "worldly goods," as the Rev. Mr. Lovett characterized her stocks and stones—she owned an interest in a marble quarry—still there were so many nearer heirs that Laura stood a fair chance of coming off with a mourning-ring and crape veil merely: very insufficient means for beginning life on one's own account, as an impartial observer—viz., not one of the said heirs—would acknowledge. But this is only supposition. However, at the time of which I speak, Laura had been booked for the outside; there positively was no hope for her, in the opinion of Summertown. In the mean while, whether or no Laura was herself confirmed in this belief of her friends and neighbors who shall say? No little manœuvre of hers betrayed anxiety or despair; no word pro or con escaped her—she received and kept the confidences of others, and if she had any little passages of her own she kept those too. Nobody knew exactly how things stood with her, but every one fancied he did, which made it comfortable all round. Still, there was one incident—trifling enough, if you please—which perhaps served to mitigate her misfortunes. Very likely there had come a day when Laura, looking about her a little curiously, had seen herself reflected in no other eyes—unless it was when she wiped the cherry stains off Geordie's mouth—and had wondered somewhat sadly why she was so uninteresting, why the young men made love to her cousins, laughed and chatted with the married ladies, without appearing to observe her any more than one would a shadow; why nobody said pretty things to her such as Rose sometimes repeated, or begged her to let him button her glove, or sent her presents, or flushed when she spoke; why her handkerchief always fell unnoticed and her questions unheard; why no one asked her opinion on any earthly topic. "It would be so pleasant if somebody would just take the least bit of interest in one."

So thinking a little about these things, observing every thing, and sensitive as the mimosa, she drifted, maybe, into the natural conclusion, and put the thought aside, as a problem that would work out its own answer in time or eternity.

But leading Geordie up and down the gravel-walk one morning for a constitutional, Major Thorne's crutch was heard in staccato movement over the gravel, falling into the legato as he joined them. There was a little thud of pleasure down somewhere in Laura's being, rather neutralized by the remembrance that Major Thorne was one of Geordie's slaves. Now the Major was no hero: he had lost a leg, to be sure, if that is any qualification—lost it by the accidental discharge of a gun, not in any Balaklava or Blenheim; and, though bred a soldier, since that had doffed the sword and donned the crutch; then, in a financial point of view, he was not so picturesque as a beggar, for nothing makes so much interest for a lover as a limited income, a hat with the nap a trifle rubbed off, a crutch won in the fray, and a pair of eloquent eyes. Now the Major had none of these, poor fellow! but the very questionable crutch and the eyes, and when he turned these last full upon Laura she felt as if something were being said beyond her comprehension, some language was uttered of which she had never been taught the A B C; therefore the Major, finding that he spoke an unknown tongue, undertook to be his own interpreter, and put into English what he had previously put into his glance.

It was the confusion of tongues; Laura was confounded: she had met him, on and off, for six years or so, lived under the same roof with him six weeks, sat beside him at the table, fallen in with him on the grounds. He had talked with her at the dancing-parties—Laura's partners were like angels' visits—they had played chess together to oblige each other; she had picked out with great trouble the air of some little songs he had composed expressly to keep himself before her eyes, but all unsuspected by her; he had indited numerous sonnets for her delectation, which figured in the Poet's Corner of the local gazette, but which, unfortunately, she never read; he had declined a shooting expedition and a yachting voyage, of both which he duly and significantly informed her, and she had wondered if Rose were the attraction; in short, she had put herself so entirely out of the question that this confession appeared incredible, and consequently the Major experienced a defeat. So it passed by, and Major Thorne changed his mind and went yachting after all, and no one guessed what had happened.

"I can't understand what has sent the Ma-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

jor off so suddenly," said Mrs. Devon. "No fault of yours, I hope, Rose?" And Rose simpered and tossed her fine head, leaving it to be inferred, while if any one had noticed the color that flew over Laura's face at the mere name the story would have been only too plain.

"However," said Rose, "it's only an exchange of officers: Major Thorne goes, and Captain Laurence arrives."

"Who is Captain Laurence?" asked Laura, glad to change the subject.

"Heaven only knows; some one Harry has picked up—one of his violent friendships."

"I hope he will prove an addition," said Mrs. Devon; "for, now that the Major is away, every one seems a little downcast."

"Nonsense, mamma! Major Thorne is your hobby. I don't see what there is to admire in him; do you, Laura?" He never could dance a step—a positive thorn in the flesh!"

The following day, toward evening, as Laura came up from the garden with a bowl of gooseberries which she had been picking—her eyes on the ground and her thoughts, maybe, a little way out at sea—what should she do but trip, and let the bowl dance out of her hand and splinter itself and scatter the contents.

"Even Hebe has her ups and downs!" said a voice at her elbow—a voice sweet and suave, as if some nectarous blossom had spoken instead of the bending figure beside her. There was yet enough light to show Laura the bold, black eyes that seemed to interrogate her; the smiling outline of expressive features; the soft, rich tint of complexion. In the mean while she had just enough wit left to put two and two together, and conclude that the intruder was Captain Laurence, who had strayed into the garden to enjoy a quiet smoke.

"I am afraid that you have me to thank for that false step," he continued; "I startled you, did I not?"

"Indeed, Captain Laurence, I shall not thank you, then; see all my berries rolling in the gravel!"

"The ruins of Carthage," said he; "but how do you know I am that Captain Laurence?"

"By induction, Sir; certainly not by introduction," Laura replied, laughing lightly.

"You are more fortunate than I," he returned, echoing her laugh. "I have no data from which to deduce whether you are Fair Rosamond or a Nun of St. Hilda."

"You might take me for a Gooseberry Fool," she answered, in allusion to her labor lost. "But don't let me interrupt your Havana; besides, some one is calling me."

"Let us listen then; it will save the ceremony of introduction. When I was a boy I used to hide in the garden and enjoy the uproar that ensued when no one answered to my name. Laura, or Laurence? Is it you or I, or both of us, that is wanted? Miss Laura, it is quite dark in this alley; you are apt to trip; my arm is at your service. We will make it dramatic by appearing together on the scene."

"What a piece of impertinence!" thought Laura, but took his arm nevertheless.

"My dear Laura," quoth her aunt, "it is long past Geordie's bedtime."

"Oh, indeed! I didn't know it was so late. Bridget was anxious to get off early to a wake, so I offered to pick the berries for her. But where is Geordie?"

"I put him to bed!" said Rose, as if it were some unheard-of sacrifice on her part; and directly there came from over the balusters a stentorian cry:

"Laura! I want my Laura! Can't somebody find my dear Laura? Oh, my head aches, and I do want my Laura!" saturated with a supply of sobs and tears, which subsided into evident chuckling as soon as she replied to his tender appeal. For King George was in the habit of making the household bow before his mandates, and of never seeking his pillow but in company with Laura and a fairy tale or song; the last usually one of Major Thorne's efforts, and though hardly adapted to infantine appreciation, he seemed to like it heartily, and, readily catching the air, would add a voice of most inappropriate volume, till, falling into a hushed diminuendo, it became perhaps only the sweetest of echoes in dream-land. So that night, as Rose and Captain Laurence paced up and down the piazza in desultory flirtation, Laura's lilt came rustling down to them, like the murmur of a distant beck, and Captain Laurence found ears to listen to it while he led Rose onward through a labyrinth of nonsense.

In fact, Geordie was very tiresome on that particular night. He lamented the departure of the Major, who used to ride him on the pony, repair his toys, make his whistles, and lose marbles to him.

"I tell you what, Laura," said he, confidentially, "there's nobody like the Major! Why, I won twenty marbles of him, right off, one day. And do you know, Laura, the morning he went away he came into my room, before I was up, to say good-by; and he asked who kissed me last. Wasn't that odd?"

"Was it?" asked Laura.

"Why, yes—don't you think so? It wasn't any matter who kissed me last, you know," he continued, bent upon telling his own tale; "but I said it was you who always kissed me on my eyelids, that I mightn't forget you. 'Then,' said he, 'I'll kiss you there too.' And, Laura, I couldn't help it—I just put my arms round his neck and hugged him tight, he is such a dear old Major! And he had such a queer look in his eyes, just as if he'd got hurt and was trying not to let any one know it; but he never cried a drop—men never do; I sha'n't when I'm grown up. Laura, don't you wish he hadn't gone? Laura, Laura! are you there? You may sing now, please." Geordie's good manners were always after-thoughts.

It was not quite sunrise one morning, about a month later, when the summer's dissipation had been already prefaced with drives and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google dances, that Harry tapped at Laura's chamber-door.

"Are you awake, Laura? Could you come down and pour the Captain and me a cup of coffee? I don't dare disturb the other magnates, and we want to be off to the beach before the sun gets too high."

"I'll be down in a moment," said she; and directly she presented herself, dressed in a white morning-wrapper, ruffled within an inch of its life—the great waves of her brown hair entrapping the light with every silken thread, and just a breath of rose-color palpitating on her cheeks.

"So you rise with the lark, Miss Laura," said Captain Laurence; "and I happen to know already that you sing like him."

"And to complete the simile, we are bound on a lark," said Harry.

"Are you going to the singing beach?" asked Laura.

"I believe so; but unless you go with us I sha'n't be able to say whether it sings in the minor or major key. I shall be utterly adrift on the sand-bars of music."

"What a predicament!" cried Laura. "Shall I fill your cup?"

"If you will fulfill my request."

"That's right," put in Harry; "make her go with us, Bell; she can ride like a bubble on the wind."

"Oh, I should like it so much; but you know, Harry, that I haven't ridden these two years; and then—oh, it's quite out of the question, your mother would be anxious."

"Nonsense, you're not a minor, are you? There's Simoon you can have as well as not. I'll go out and have him saddled."

"No, no, Harry! I positively can not go."

They rose from table as she spoke; Captain Laurence drew near so that his Vandyke beard almost swept her cheek, as he bent low and murmured:

"Not for my sake?"

The heavy lids fell over the troubled eyes. It was quite too early to be mastered by that strong gaze; sooner or later, she felt it would work her mischief, but not yet, not yet; she must struggle while she might, before the spell was hopelessly finished. So she turned to him saucily.

"You are quite right, Captain Laurence. I shall stay at home for Geordie's sake—it is his birthday."

"I wish I were Geordie, lucky cherub!"

"And six years old to-day?"

"And six years old to-day, if I might enjoy his perquisites, if you would look after my birthdays."

Poor Laura, she was so unused to gallant speeches that these little things went a great way with her.

All the morning that flush of pleasure never faded from her face, that smile forgot to leave her lips; up stairs, before her mirror, dressing for dinner, she paused to regard herself, paused half regretfully, half surprised, as if, just to-day, some unsuspected blossom had sprung up in her place.

"Why, I am almost pretty to-day," she whispered; "if—" and checked herself, leaving unsaid the willful thought that traced with a thread of gold the gracious possibilities of life, then as for penance she turned resolutely away from the glass and indulged in no second glimpse.

Tea was served that evening out under the willows, whose great plumes entangling the reflexes of a hundred tints, swung indolently in the breeze; then there was dancing on the lawn till Geordie could no longer keep his eyelids in order. What an evening it was for more than Geordie! How freely Laura forgot herself beneath the lustre of those ensnaring eyes—how her wayward pulses quickened with each caprice of flute or violin—how her foolish little heart beat measure for measure! She thought afterward that a swallow's summer flight across the blue heavens could describe no more delightful arabesque than those dancing feet upon the green turf.

Well, by-and-by the stars slipped, one by one, into their places, and the early moon just showed the tip of her silver horn above Holiday Hill, and then Laura must leave it all to pilot Geordie happily across the waters of oblivion into the Land of Nod. Through the pauses of her fairy-tale she could catch the rhythm of the dance; sometimes a little jet of melody flew up, like a bird, to seek her; sometimes a ripple of laughter found her out; sometimes the wind came following with a breath from the willows, as it were some sweet thought sent after her, and all the while Echo went wandering into the distance with stolen snatches of the festivity. It nothing availed to cut the story short, to bring the beautiful Princess into hasty possession of the two magic crystals which held her crown and kingdom. Geordie only grew garrulous and used all his powers of fascination, in order to detain Laura by his side, till, exhausted by his arts, Nature took the matter in hand and reduced him to subjection.

By that time the dancing was over, the lawn deserted, the musicians had departed; above all there brooded the sweet solemnity of night, broken only by some footfall on the piazza below. Laura went to the window and looked out. One star, shining large and luminous overhead, seemed to point at Captain Laurence, pacing up and down there like some caged creature, as if some impalpable limits shut him out from the Promised Land. "I wonder what he is thinking about," pondered Laura; she had almost said "who." If she had only known!

One morning Captain Laurence was a little late at breakfast; but before the meal was half through he sauntered into the room with that easy grace of his, bent an instant over Laura with some syllables half tender, half jest, and dropped into the seat beside Rose.

"The sweetest dreams, I understand, come

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

with daybreak," said that subject, "and surely since then you have had time for a whole nosegay."

"But faulty if the rose were omitted. Since dawn I have seen the sunrise break through Tangle Wood. You must go there with me sometime, Miss Laura," he added, turning to her.

"Is it not a great way off?"

"The further the better," he replied.

"What is the programme to-day, Rose?" asked Harry.

"That stupid picnic of Mrs. Bryant's."

"Why stupid?" inquired Laurence.

"Oh, because every body gets cross and hungry, and you lose the people you want to find and find the people you want to lose; and some one is sure to tread on your dress—it actually seems as if there were a detachment for that especial duty—"

"The long and the short of it," put in Harry.

"Shall you go, Captain Laurence?" asked Rose.

"Go! after such a warning?"

"But you have no unfortunate gown to be trodden on; consequently no danger of losing your temper."

"You forget, Miss Rose, the danger of losing what is not so easily recovered."

"Nothing so easy if you offer a sufficient reward."

"Ah, fair Pagan! I am afraid there is no need for me to run any further risks."

"Indeed! I have heard of the beautiful Dulcinea, have I not?"

Laurence gave the least perceptible start, and the least suspicion of a frown darkened on his brow.

"No; have you? What is she like—Gipsy Jane?"

Now Rose had really heard nothing, only she thought it wise, before reeling off into a flirtation, to beat about the bush a while and knock down all the last year's nests.

"She has dark-brown hair, long and wavy," she began; "eyes the color of my sapphire ring; see—Harry gave it me, the extravagant; she has an ear like a little pink shell. You would take her for alabaster if a ripple of color upon her white cheek didn't remind you of an opal. When she laughs you hear the 'silver falling' of the fountain of perpetual youth; when she sings you remember the sirens; when she walks you follow."

"Thank you," said the Captain, reassured.

"Miss Laura, your cousin has been taking your picture."

"Why didn't you tell me I was sitting that I might have called in 'prunes and prisms' to my aid?" she answered, just on the point of leaving the room.

"'When she walks you follow,'" quoted the Captain, looking back at Rose with a laugh as he turned away to join Laura in the drawing-room.

"Do you mean to humor this stupidity of Mrs. Bryant's?" he asked, taking his seat beside her.

"I think not."

"The poor Bryant, what will become of her—and all her cakes and ale?"

"Oh, the others are going."

"And why not yourself? The moon might as well excuse herself from rising, because there were sure to be plenty of stars out."

"Captain Laurence! what if any one should hear me listening to such nonsense? Some one must stay to see after Geordie."

"Miss Rose has just denounced picnics, perhaps she would fancy that recreation."

"Oh no," said Laura, very honestly, "that was only one of her little caprices, she doesn't want to anticipate too much. Rose is very bewitching at times, don't you think so?"

"I know some one who is always bewitching."

"Ah! who is that?" very simply.

"It's a great secret of mine."

"Oh, excuse me."

"Not at all. I'll tell you—in confidence. No, I'll write it on this oak-leaf; the wind blew it in on purpose. There;" and he passed her the leaf bearing the word "Laura" merely, followed by something like a superfluous flourish, as if he had designed to make the name alliterative but wavered.

A little spark of delight flashed from Laura's wide-open eyes.

"Petrarch's Laura," she said, smiling.

"I didn't mention Petrarch; I was speaking of myself."

"Oh! are you going to this picnic yourself?"

"It is a vexed question; what would you advise?"

A little signal ran up her cheek, plainly showing what would be too charming to think of.

"You will find it very agreeable," said she.

"Impossible; I shall not find you there."

"But you will meet the Mores from the Cliffs, the Thorpes from the Upper Parish, the Gilberts from Crane-neck Hill, and I can't say how many others."

"Positively I'm afraid to encounter so many strangers without a guardian angel. Can't the cherub go with us?"

"Children are not invited."

"But surely the maids can take charge of him."

"He might give them the slip; why, one day we went to Cragstowe and left him in their care, and he went down to sail his brig in the brook—they call it a brook, but it's both deep and wide; some reapers, happening to pass by, found him making out into the middle of the stream, where his brig lay becalmed, the water already up to his shoulders; and Laura came near losing sight of her dear boy," she added, as that young desperado administered an emphatic hug, crying:

"The Major, Laura; you forgot the Major."

"Oh, did I forget the Major?" she said, the color deepening a shade.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"The reapers, you know, only called me back, but the Major walked right in after me, with the crutch and all, and caught me up on one arm just as if I were nothing but a fly; but I kicked some."

"Naughty boy!"

"But, Laura, there was the brig in danger; I didn't know he was going back after it, and he looked so cross too. And he wouldn't let me get out of bed the rest of the day, that was the worst of it; and when you came you told him you didn't know what you could do for him, and he said he did, but he didn't say what. I suppose he wanted you to sew on a button or mend his glove—Harry always does."

"Sapient youth," laughed the Captain, "won't you wade in the stream again that I may emulate this Major?"

"Oh, but you haven't any crutch," said he.

An hour later the carriages were on the way to the picnic.

"Why didn't Captain Laurence ride with us, Harry?" asked Rose, with some vexation.

"Laurence? Oh, he had letters to write; he didn't come."

"I hope they'll miscarry," quoth the sweet Rose.

Late in the afternoon, when Laura went into the drawing-room with her work, Captain Laurence met her half-way.

"When did you return?" she queried.

"I haven't been away; I had letters to write, which only the pleasure of escorting you could induce me to postpone."

"Thank you. And you have had no luncheon."

"I beg pardon, 'twas brought to my room. Won't you come out on the veranda and sit? I've improvised a luxurious divan of piled cushions for you, and the most fragrant of south winds is ready to fan you if you won't let me."

"Do you know," he continued, after they were agreeably seated, "I've half a mind to quarrel with this Major of Geordie's. What business had he to know you before I was so fortunate?"

"Oh, he is only a friend of my aunt's; he is always coming here more or less," she answered, demurely.

"So much the worse; and in the mean time you are always walking with him, more or less, and playing chess with him—"

"How do you know that?"

"From Geordie. He challenged me to a contest and I declined, whence he inferred that I wasn't half so good as his Laura, which, of course, is a weak expression of a strong fact; 'for she used to play lots with the Major whether she wanted to or not.'"

"Poor Geordie, he tells all he knows, and a good deal which he imagines."

"Then you didn't dislike playing with the Major?"

"Oh, no indeed, we both played so badly that it was very nice."

"You are making me very uncomfortable."

"No indeed; am I? How?"

"It's too plain that I can never be such an old friend as this Major; he has stolen a march on me."

"Yet—" She had it in her heart to say that old friends were not always the most valued, but bethought herself in season.

"Yes, I see; you want an excuse. Pray don't mind breaking my heart, 'tisn't worth much."

"Nonsense; I dare say if you come here two or three summers aunty will like you as well as the Major."

"Consoling—and how about aunty's niece?"

"Oh, the Major is nothing to me, truly; if you mean that."

That was not precisely what he did mean, but it was a pleasant assurance.

"Then," said he, touching her hand with his lips, "I wouldn't be the Major for any thing. But as for coming here two or three summers, I might as well suffer a chronic voyage round Cape Horn."

"Why, are we so tiresome?"

"By no means; only the experiment is so dangerous. Do you hear what a pretty canzone the wind is singing through those honey-suckle vines? I dare say you sang to the Major?"

"Sometimes. I know nothing but his songs."

"So he made songs for you, eh? I think I should like to hear one, if you please; it is well to understand the policy of the enemy."

"It was simply amusement."

"Well, I am listening."

Laura's voice was not in the least strong nor full, but there was a something touching in the clear treble peculiar to herself; a something plaintive without complaining, fresh as if the dewy morning pervaded it, sad as if the twilight were advancing. Once heard it would return to you again and again, long after the singer was forgotten.

"Are you quite in earnest? My voice is the merest bird-call," she said, and sang:

"Oh, were my love the wind that blows
O'er hill, and field, and lonely sea,
And I the sweetness of the rose
To follow where he beckoned me,

"No storm so cold, no night so dark,
Would daunt me on his restless wing,
And when the sun awoke the lark
We'd higher soar and louder sing."

And directly the family carriages rolled up the drive and conversation became a Babel.

"Every body was so sorry you weren't there, Captain Laurence," said Rose.

The Captain thought he knew of two exceptions, and Laura was equally certain of one.

"I am sincerely obliged to every one," he said.

And thus, step by step, Captain Laurence advanced in informal wooing; a sort of experimental affair with him, in order to assure himself if love were more potent than the other power struggling for mastery—in short, "if the game were worth the candle."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

But Laura, we know, had a different point of view. She had lived in peace till Major Thorne opened her eyes, just in time for them to be dazzled by this new luminary. By-and-by, when she becomes accustomed to this beautiful radiance, the twilight will have quite set in. Well, perhaps even there the stars may shine.

The following day opened with a grand overture of the elements; the rain hung like a curtain before the eye, but Laura never missed the sun. Captain Laurence, now always beside her, read the last new novel to an attentive group; it was the simple narrative of the sufferings of one who chose disinheritance rather than renounce the woman he loved.

"What an everlasting spooney!" cried Harry, as the book was ended.

"Do you think so?" asked the Captain, turning to Laura.

"It seems to me," she answered, "that there was but one way open to him and he took it. I can't conceive of his doing otherwise."

"Very true," said Aunt Devon, "all the money in the world wouldn't have purchased him a love like Jacqueline's."

"I agree with you," said Laurence: the trouble was, that he couldn't agree with himself.

When the gossips of Summertown perceived the turn things were taking, they began to lose faith in their own predictions. Henceforth wherever Laura was seen Laurence was sure to be not far behind; they might be met morning and evening on the beach with Geordie straggling in front. Many a good woman of the place toiled up her scuttle stairs, glass in hand, to satisfy herself if yonder sail-boat weren't Harry Devon's Bluebird skimming down to Rock Creek, with "Laurie and that Cap'n of hern."

On the family excursions to Cragstowe they invariably adopted extremes, either dropping far behind the main party, perhaps losing their way and returning home to spend the day in splendid seclusion, or galloping miles ahead, till no suspicion of the detestable third person intervened. Once the Bluebird was caught outside the bar in a fog, with the unseen breakers muttering in their ears, and Laura thought it was as if they were shut into a great pearl alone, without giving more than a thought to the possibility of being run down by some other craft, or dashed to atoms in the tumult of the waters, till presently the fog blew off, and they flew homeward as if fear and danger were fables of the story-books; only as he lifted her ashore he held her one swift instant in a grasp of steel, murmuring,

"If we had died it would have been together."

"But it is so much pleasanter to live," said Laura, artlessly.

Once, too, they encountered a party of strolling gipsies encamped at the Witch's Well, one of whom gave Laura an amulet of aromatic seeds.

"To keep your heart light," the crone said.

"And I must never give it away?" asked Laura, just to humor her.

"When you give it you give yourself," was the reply. But, sauntering home, Laurence took possession of it.

"I did not give it to you, remember," said she.

"I did not ask for it," he returned. "I take my own wherever I find it."

Sometimes they galloped to Tangle Wood, returning before breakfast with wreaths of wild-flowers, deserted birds-nests for Geordie, and pretty eggs for his collection.

"Do you know," said Laura, on one of these occasions, "there is a legend, that if you lose yourself in Tangle Wood you are never able to find the way out again?"

"Let us try the experiment," said he.

"And starve to death?" queried the practical Laura.

"Ah, I didn't take that view of it!"

"But, you see, that is the view to take. The story goes, that a young man who was to be married the next day came into this wood to gather flowers and never returned home. Every one thought that he had deserted his sweetheart; but long years after they found his bones here and the ring she had given him."

"I certainly shall not come here the day before my marriage unless you come with me," he said, laughing.

And now even the Rev. Mr. Lovett congratulated himself upon a new proselyte as he observed the dark, handsome face every Sunday in the Devon pew; and no wonder that the simple country folks regarded it as a matter already foreclosed, and that old Mrs. Grew, who had baked wedding-loaves for the Devons time out of mind, began to look up her recipes.

To be sure there were days when Captain Laurence seemed possessed with a strange melancholy; when his glance never brightened except it met Laura's; when he permitted another to fill his place beside her, to bring her shawl when the dew fell, to cut her flowers, or take off her hands the never-to-be-concluded tail of Geordie's kite—for now that she had found favor in the Captain's eyes all the others were ready to be commanded—dour and threatening periods, when it seemed as though he hesitated to rivet the chains he loved well to wear, when even Geordie's query, "You aren't cross with my Laura, are you?" met with no rejoinder.

But these were only spots on the sun—so rare and peculiar that you would have said they were merely strategic freaks of a lover who accentuated his devotion by contrasts. And presently the hour arrived when he resigned himself to Fate, and the dear, blind boy, when delight overflowed the brief moments, when together they surprised the wild azalia in its swamps, when they made the woods echo with catch and chorus, and drew enchantment from the cool depth

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of the Witch's Well, from early purple dawns, and starry spaces of evening sky, from

"The light that never was on sea or land."

Life was growing idylic with Laura.

One day, as they returned from a drive, a traveling carriage whirled by them, then wheeled suddenly about and overtook them, while a gentleman from within cried, "Laurence, Laurence, is that you or your wraith?" and directly was out, and testing the matter with a vigorous hand-shake; then:

"Are you staying in this neighborhood?" asked the stranger. "Is the Empress with you? I understood that you were both stopping at Engelhardt's."

Laurence kept a frown at bay with the ghost of a smile, as he replied, somewhat evasively:

"I was at Engelhardt's for a time, but alone; the Empress went to the Springs with an invalid friend."

"You had better look out for your laurels," laughed the other, as he drove away.

"Thank you," returned the Captain; "mine are just within reach." And he bent himself anew to Laura.

"Who is the Empress?" asked Laura, carelessly.

"The Empress!" indifferently. "Oh! Matilda—my cousin."

And Laura never dreamed what empire she called her own.

So the summer was wearing away untarnished, brimming with a new meaning to Laura. The high heavens seemed to bend and bless her; the stars to come out only to look at a happy mortal; the river to ring its silver chimes in union with her thought; the very hedgerows to blossom and sing because she smiled; while even the sober, everyday sunlight wore a touch of romance. But when she drew her curtains at night, across which the trees and the moonlight wove beautiful designs, she used to wonder if all her summers would prove as sweet. Can it be possible that ever she anticipated the equinoctial?

And one day there was the Major back again. He had a weed on his hat, and looked as if yachting hadn't agreed with him. And Geordie foreswore the Captain on the instant, and returned to his old love, which he prefaced with the pleasing report that "the Captain was hand in glove with his Laura; he heard Harry say so." The Major made no reply, but put Master Geordie down, and devoted himself to telling Mrs. Devon that the death of a friend in the neighborhood, of whose estate he was executor, had brought him back thus unexpectedly.

Laura and the Captain had gone across the fields with a basket of fruit for a sick woman, and Geordie ran to meet them half-way with the latest news.

"And now you won't be going off all the time with the Captain, will you, Laura? And you'll stay at home and play chess with the Major, and I can look on and see the bishops catch it—won't you, Laura?"

"And what is to become of me?" asked the Captain.

"You!" said Geordie, nonchalantly. "You can look on too, I suppose—can't he, Laura?"

As for the Major, he took it all in, and confirmed Geordie's fact at a glance.

"She is more like an angel than ever," he thought. "Confound the fellow! he's handsome as a picture too. Well, it's good to think that she isn't thrown away, at least. There are always crumbs of comfort falling from the rich man's table, and if she is satisfied I can go hungry."

And perhaps he wasn't so talkative the remainder of the evening, but you would never have suspected from his air that he was a disappointed lover.

He didn't make his stay at the Devons, however, but was there from time to time, as business allowed. I doubt if it was always quite a pleasure to him to see Laura and the Captain together constantly; but it was his only chance of seeing her at all, and he strove to persuade himself that he enjoyed her happiness as if it were his own. Perhaps it was the one honeyed drop in a deadly draught.

At breakfast, one morning, while they arranged for the day's pleasure, a servant brought in the letters from the mail.

"Ah, Laurence, you are always in luck!" cried Harry. "Here's a budget for you."

"No congratulations, pray, till we see if it is not a dun." He looked at the address as he spoke, and put it down with a little start.

"Why don't you read it?" asked Geordie. "I always read mine right off."

"Mine" consisted of one which the Major had written and Laura read to him.

"It doesn't look promising," answered Laurence; but directly after breakfast he had a horse saddled, and was off at a furious pace, as if ten thousand demons were in pursuit.

"Doesn't he go like time!" said Geordie, admiringly. When the Captain was quite clear of hamlet or homestead, with nothing but pasture-land and woodland, bounded by a blue line of water, within view, he reined in his horse, and proceeded to digest his letter. It was not appallingly long, and written in a firm, clear hand, as if the writer had been too sure of her cause to suffer any tremors of doubt to ruffle her nerves. It ran thus:

"DEAR BELL,—I don't believe you deserve any thing half so affectionate from me as that; but then, you know, my heart always runs away with my head, or I shouldn't be writing this to you after all your neglect. It is very gay here, at the Springs; but people are constantly asking about you, and I have to invent all manner of stories, rather than let them suppose I don't know all your hithers and yons. I can't endure this much longer; if I don't see you soon, what shall I think? I shall think, naturally enough, that you wish every thing at an end between us, and I shall act accordingly.—Your devoted MATILDA.

"P.S.—By-the-way, Lytton told me that he met you driving 'a lovely jelly-fish'—his very words—about

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the country. Now I thank my stars that I haven't a jealous temperament, or I should feel inclined to run over and look into the business; but you know Lytton always makes the most of every thing, and I couldn't help being amused at the sympathetic glances I received, and the interesting remarks my appearance interrupted after his arrival. However, I flatter myself that my sang-froid has rather turned the tide of opinion.

"Have you heard that Chillington is here?—one of my old flames. He made a large fortune in India a few years ago, and has returned a widower. Lytton, who knew them out there, says that his wife was a fac-simile of myself, though I believe he exaggerates; however, I received a basket of delicious fruit from him yesterday, smothered in flowers.

"When shall I look for you? I want to talk over the investment of Uncle Burton's legacy. What do you think of Government Securities?"

Captain Laurence didn't dally long over this tender love-letter, but tore it into inch pieces, which the breeze floated along, like a swarm of white butterflies. Then he turned about and rode home very slowly, and went, with a heavy tread, straight to his own room without any preliminaries. Somewhat later Harry knocked at his door, but obtained no answer; and when Captain Laurence appeared in the drawing-room, an hour or two after, he said he had been taking a siesta, but looked as if he had been taking poison.

"Was it a dun?" asked the indefatigable Geordie.

"One of the worst sort," replied Laurence.

Mrs. Devon had a sick headache next morning, and Laura, going down early for remedies, met the Captain in the hall.

"Up so early?" said she.

"'The early bird,' you know, 'catches the worm,' and in order to catch the train I follow his example."

"Are you going away?" she asked, almost in a whisper, as if the words hurt her, and sitting down upon a stair.

"I must go," he answered, letting his gaze settle any where but upon her. "I was waiting for you; I made my adieus to the family last night. Laura, it is a hateful obligation that drags me away from you; believe that of me whatever befalls."

"But you will come back?" she gasped.

"With the swallows," he quoted, in his evasive manner; "but I don't deserve you should miss me, Laura. Forget me if you can."

"I never can." She smiled back at him, all her confidence in fortune returning. "There is Harry waiting to drive you down; good-by, if I must say it—what a disagreeable word! I shall look for you every day."

He didn't tell her that she might as well look for "red roses blooming in the snow," because he wasn't quite sure that his latest decision would last him to the Springs, but that, half-way there, he should turn from a rogue to a hero; exchange a heavy figure for a light heart; marry Laura, and commit Matilda and her Government Securities to the flames.

It seems to me that the calm trust visible in those sapphire eyes must have haunted him long years after—must have risen before him like a beautiful ghost, and looked out at him from every star of heaven, and flecked the sunshine, and poisoned success, and sharpened misfortune; an avenging glance, hoarding all that was most tender and most bitter in his unhappy life.

So this was a new phase of existence into which Laura passed—a phase as unexpected as the other, only, oh so barren in contrast! It seemed like reversing the order of development—retrograding from her winged estate into the dismal hermitage of a cocoon.

During the weeks when she heard nothing from him, when even the family had left off saying, "It happened when Captain Laurence was here," or "How lonesome it is now that the Captain's gone!" she went about like one in a trance, doing every thing just as it would have been done if her mind had been upon it, conscious of no pangs of the body. If the Devons thought seriously about her affairs at all, it was that she had played with him—that the demure Laura had turned flirt at the first opportunity; but the Major, looking through the shows of things, perceived the great void in her life, and set himself to repairing it as best he might with gentle words and unobtrusive attentions. He came a little oftener now, especially in stormy weather; never without the last new book, the jolliest caricature, or the latest Paris confection; never without bringing a cheery face into a sad place; never without some stirring reminiscence of his frontier life, some pleasing incident by the way, some impossible day-dream of his boyhood—any thing, in short, to warm Laura into a passing interest, to let the sunshine in upon her till she smiled in spite of herself.

But when he did not come, and she had leisure for introspection, she used to creep up stairs by herself, and look over the precious trifles which recalled her brief summer: a faded flower, still sweet; the picture of an angel bending out of heaven, which Laurence had said was her very self; a ribbon brocaded with gold bees he had brought from a fair; the treasured oak-leaf, bearing her name; the wing of some tropical bird, "to brush the cobwebs out of your sky," he had said; a South American beetle sepulchred in gold; a fantastic shell they had found on the beach, wherein he had scrawled,

"Life is sweet, love is sweet, use to-day while you may:
Love is sweet, and to-morrow may fail;
Love is sweet, use to-day."

Each one a solace and a wound.

It was getting late into October, and the maples under which Major Thorne had met his disaster were each a burning-bush, and the willows beneath which Laura had danced with Captain Laurence were losing, day by day, their fresh youth; all the fields were turning brown and barren, and the naked nests began to show through the scant drapery of the woods, and the early morning air had a tang of frost, an odor of ripe apples and lusty grapes.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Harry had been out during the day at a neighbor's, where he stumbled upon Ned Breeze —a college chum of his—whom he brought home to dine with him; and a merry time they were having of it, touching up their pranks at the University, discussing the pros and cons of half-forgotten races, the muscle of Le Breton, and the mathematics of Brooks.

"And what are they doing in the city?" inquired Rose, growing weary of Brooks and company.

"Pretty much as usual. Somebody or other has composed a new Opera, which is to be brought out directly by some other body. I'm not strong on the Opera, you know, but I can give you a list of the latest marriages, if that will make amends."

"Have any of our friends sacrificed themselves?"

"Let me see—there's Laurence—his came off just before I left—"

"Not the Captain?" cried Harry.

"Not the Captain? Why not the Captain? I don't mind giving my affidavit that it was no other than Captain Belisarius Laurence, and high time too; why, he's been engaged to his cousin Matilda these five years—rather a lukewarm affection on his part, I hear—an affair of plus or minus; but a while ago he followed her to the Springs and hurried matters up, just as if he were afraid of doing something rash, as Lytton says. She's a very fine figure, they tell me, financially speaking. Will you have something more, Miss Laura? Sha'n't I help you to the forbidden fruit? Do make me useful, if only for the sake of a balance of power."

"Thank you," said Laura, with a little smile—and her voice was never so full nor freer from tell-tale tremolo—"I don't see that I can oblige you in that way; but if you are ambitious of usefulness, I pray you go on with the matrimonial quotations for the sake of Rose and Harry."

"Is it your Captain Laurence?" asked mischief-making Geordie, climbing on the back of her chair, and patting her cheek with his chubby fingers.

"No, dear."

And the gentleman stroked his mustache, and stared at Laura, before proceeding with the chronicle.

I think it was very little that Laura heard of the succeeding gossip, her mind returned swiftly to that day when the Empress Matilda first crossed her path merely as a name. Besides, she was going over those dear scenes for the last time, those scenes that had moved across her lovely sky like some lovely mirage, like the image of Sir Launcelot across the magic mirror of the Lady of Shalott. By the time Harry's friend had exhausted his budget and they rose from table she was ready to close that chapter of her life forever and aye; then she stole up stairs again and lighted a flame in her little grate, and made a holocaust of those sacred treasures which had afforded her such sad pleasure, with a feeling as if she were turning to stone and had no longer any tears to shed—only, as the last flame flickered and fled, dropping a handful of white ashes on the hearth, a sense of the irrevocable subdued her and wrung from her one agonized sigh—no more.

So she became the same Laura as of old—with a difference.

She no longer went to Cragstowe with the family, nor rode to Tangle Wood at its coronation, nor slaked her thirst at the Witch's Well; you never saw her lingering in the fields at sunset, nor dancing beneath the willows on Geordie's fête-days, nor watching the fishing boats from the Causey; she was never heard of at Christmas festivals nor St. Valentine's ball, at picnic or party.

People knew that she had lived one summer, and they knew little more about her, perhaps cared still less.

Rose married and went her way, and Harry followed her illustrious example, and settled on the old place, and Geordie grew into a handsome lad, and was sent off to rough it at school, while Laura sat at home, and read to her aunt, or took up runaway stitches in her knitting work, did the fine sewing of the household, looked after the housekeeping in lieu of Harry's fashionable wife, kept the children's faces clean, and their clothes and manners in something like order; "a model old maid," as their grateful mother called her, though not quite thirty.

All this time Major Thorne came and went as before; he had purchased the estate of his dead friend, and there had been some talk of his marrying the widow, of which, however, he had never heard. Mrs. Devon was fond of him, and Mrs. Harry was fond of society, while Laura listened to him well pleased, made him happy with her commissions in the city, allowed him sometimes to read in her stead, sometimes sang to him a little. He was always about her, as Laurence had been, but he never pressed himself upon her, never recurred to that great epoch of his; but she knew that he loved her well, saw it shining in his eyes and trembling on his lips, heard it in each tone of his voice, a steadfast love that knew no eclipse,

> "Fain to earn, with long essay,
> What the winner's hand threw by."

Ned Breeze, who had brought the news of Captain Laurence's marriage so many autumns ago, came down to talk over old times again with Harry; and Harry and his wife had agreed to ride over to the Cliffs with him to see the Mores, who were relatives of his. But when the appointed day arrived Mrs. Harry had a headache and a dress-maker, and Laura was unwillingly pressed into the service, and mounted upon Arrow, a horse that had but lately found its way into Harry's stables; but she went over the ground safely enough; indeed, a half hour in the saddle revived her old pleasure in the exercise, fanned a color into her cheeks, and made her almost gay. Then the Mores were so

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google cordial, had so much to say, so many improvements on the place to show, so many new songs to trill and last words to chirrup, that it was far into twilight when they turned their horses' heads homeward; and even then Harry must go round by Crane-neck Hill to leave a note at the Gilberts and bring away a recipe for gooseberry wine, with which his wife had commissioned him, with earnest emphasis, not to forget it, and a blue ribbon knotted about his little finger as a reminder.

It was an ugly road, rough and rocky between the Mores and Gilberts, but to Ned Breeze, who had ridden through tortuous cañons of South America and along the rude flanks of Californian mountains, it was like a lawn, and his flow of words faltered no more than his horse's feet.

"Do you think," said he, at last, "I met Laurence last week!"

"Laurence? Ah, how was he looking? I haven't seen him these six or seven years—which is it, Laura?"

"Why, you see," Ned resumed, "he's been very unfortunate, and he looked so seedy and wretched that I almost passed him before I could settle if it was himself."

"Laurence seedy!" cried Harry; "that's a new character for the Captain."

"'Tis indeed; he used to be the best-dressed man in the city. But he ran through with his wife's money before you could say 'Jack Robinson;' and, to be even with him, only last fall she ran away with a sort of sporting fellow, whom he had invited to his house a number of times. It told upon him sadly, though they led a cat-and-dog's life together—she always reproaching him with marrying her for her fortune and squandering it, and he retorting that nothing but her fortune could have reduced him to such an extremity; but—"

There was a noise just behind them like the stumble of a horse, a little moan, and then Arrow shot past them with an empty saddle and galloped into the darkness. He had started at something in the road, when Laura, who had dropped behind a step absorbed in listening, drew the bridle a little sharply, and he reared and threw her.

A young moon hung over the crest of the distant wood and made a sort of glorified twilight in the place, while they improvised an ambulance of fallen boughs and rails from the nearest fence, cushioned and pillowed with their coats, upon which they laid Laura and bore her home, leading their horses with one arm passed through the bridle, hardly conscious whether she were alive or no—a ghastly retinue.

There was a great stir at Devon Place that night—domestics running hither and yon, Mrs. Harry in hysterics, the children waking up in terror at the confusion, neighbors whispering together in hall and chamber, Mrs. Devon wringing her hands, and Ned Breeze and Harry galloping after the doctors; but when the morning sun filtered in through the Venetian blinds Laura opened her eyes wearily, and seemed to look for some one, asking, with difficulty, if the Major had come in; then she dropped into a dull, heavy stupor again, and the doctors shook their heads over her. So the day wore through, bringing the Major, with a face like a mask of ice, and he made his way straight to Laura, and besought her to speak to him once more, not to leave him so utterly desolate; but her lips only moved as if she tried to smile, and her breath labored, while presently she sobbed to herself as though already she had forgotten he was near.

"Oh, if I had never loved Captain Laurence!"

Then she sighed deeply, and opened wide her eyes, and a great light filled them with a sudden, glad recognition of some sweet truth, as she fixed them upon him and said:

"I love you."

And so the lids dropped.

Laura had "gone over to the majority."

Laura's grave was green before Geordie saw it—she would have liked that best; and from time to time, as he came home on his vacations, he used to sit beside it with the Major, and recall her words and deeds, the tones of her voice, the gleam of her luminous eyes, till, by-and-by, as he grew older, and other interests and pleasures engaged him, she became a dim, pictorial being, whose actual features he found it hard to remember though leaning over her resting-place; so at last it was only the Major who found his way daily through the long, scented grass to one green mound, fragrant with lilies of the valley in their season—only the Major, to whom she was something more than a name—a living, radiant presence.

It was more than twenty years later, when Major Thorne had long reposed beside Laura, and their graves were almost lost beneath a tangled growth, known best to bird and bee, that a man, bowed and withered, his face seamed with many furrows, his hair white before its time, was found kneeling against the stone in death, an amulet of aromatic seeds shut into his cold hand. No one in the neighborhood recognized him, but it could have been no other than Captain Belisarius Laurence.

So they wait—"'till the day break, and the shadows flee away."

HOW WE GET OUR NEWS.

METROPOLITANS, and all readers of the metropolitan newspapers, will remember to have heard a great deal a few months since about a mysterious character who was alluded to as "the American Reuter." Sometimes the title was used as a term of reproach; at others it would seem to signify the highest of praise; but was at all times spoken mysteriously until one was tempted to demand who this dreadful Reuter and his more dreadful American ante-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

type might happen to be. It was evident from all the articles that "the American Reuter" was a dealer in news, for entire pages of some sheets praised his "news enterprise," while whole columns of others were devoted to showing that his news was "bogus," and that he was endeavoring to establish a "great, grasping, and soulless monopoly," like that which we are told "controls and stagnates the European press, and makes London dailies so much inferior to those of New York."

Many of those readers who did not peruse these mysterious warnings understandingly trembled at the prospect of being deprived of their daily intellectual bread, or at least of being served with a staler article in consequence of this new news-vendor and the establishment of another "Associated Press." The American public are a little superstitious about the "Associated Press," and the feeling results from that common and natural cause of all superstition—ignorance. So it was with quite a feeling of satisfaction that they beheld the rivalry suddenly cease; that they saw "the terrible American Reuter" disappear, leaving behind him only an explanatory card; while the newspapers went on the even tenor of their way. The quarrel served one purpose—it excited an interest in the workings of the "Associated Press," and furnished this opportunity for explaining "how we get our news." The story of the creation and existence of the New York Associated Press is the whole history of the newspaper press of the country; but as it covers but a very short period of time and a very brief page of narrative, and is necessary to an explanation of the machinery or system by which we get our daily news, I shall state it here very briefly.

Although numerous papers existed in the United States before the year 1827, there existed no such business as that now known as the "Newspaper Trade," no such profession as "Journalism." Previous to that time a general or common-school education was considered sufficient qualification for an editor; ability to write plain English was the only requisite necessary to begin the profession; judgment of the value or knowledge as to the effective arrangement of news were then unknown qualifications. Journals did not aspire to be "newspapers;" they were mere personal or political organs, and aimed to influence public opinion by arguments—not to enlighten the public mind with facts. Frederick Hudson, for many years the Managing Editor of the New York Herald, and who recently retired the acknowledged head of his profession in America, used to allude to the papers which existed before and at the date I have mentioned, as belonging to the "Silurian Period of Journalism," and to add, laughingly, that they formed a substratum of mud. Hundreds of these papers existed all over the country, some of them wielding power and exerting influence. The principal of the class which existed in New York city were the Gazette, edited by Lang; the Advertiser, edited by Theodore Dwight; the Mercantile Advertiser, published by Amos Butler; the Sun, edited by Moses Y. Beach; the Courier, edited by Major Noah; the Enquirer, edited by James Watson Webb, and the Journal of Commerce, managed by Arthur Tappan through David Hale, and edited by William Maxwell and Mr. (now the Reverend Doctor) Bushnell. Political interests had started and sustained them all. Arthur Tappan spent thirty thousand dollars in teaching his favorite doctrines of abolitionism through the Journal of Commerce. The Jackson political interests and party sustained the Courier and the Enquirer, while lesser political interests upheld the others. More attention was devoted to political editorials than to the news department of these papers. The only news given with dispatch or in detail were election returns; and special ability in the collection and arrangement of these made the reputation of the two most noteworthy editors of that day—Richard Haughton and Gerard Hallock. Except in this particular no effort was made to obtain news. It sometimes drifted into the offices and was discussed by the proprietors, but very frequently was not published at all. The editorial force of an office of that period consisted of two or three political writers and one news editor, who was at the same time general reporter, "paste and scissors," and money editor.

Arthur Tappan soon grew tired of losing money and gaining few proselytes in managing the Journal of Commerce, and in 1828 gave it up to David Hale, his former representative, and Gerard Hallock; and the revolution in journalism began. The first American journalist worthy of the name developed himself at this time. David Hale had endeavored to induce Arthur Tappan to make a newspaper of the Journal of Commerce; but Tappan had lost money enough, and could not be induced to spend more. When he retired, and Hale came into chief control, with an able writer in Hallock to sustain him, he determined to carry out his own ideas. Mr. Hallock had little idea of news, though he comprehended political events and parties. He wrote well and forcibly, and soon established the character of the Journal for honesty and conscientious regard for the truth. David Hale, as its business manager, gave it the reputation which it soon won for enterprise. He first conceived the idea of collecting news. "He was a man of fine powers, firm will, and exalted principle," writes his surviving co-laborer. "As a business manager," once said Frederick Hudson, who knew Hale in his palmiest days, and who knew, too, the requisites of a newspaper manager, "Hale had all the tact, industry, courage, foresight, and independence requisite to success."

The first effort of Mr. Hale was the organization of a plan to obtain European news in advance of his contemporaries. Steamers and magnetic telegraphs were then unknown, though sailing vessels made the voyage across the At-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

lantic in eighteen or twenty days; and there was a semaphoric (signal) telegraph at Sandy Hook which could announce arrivals, but little more. The mode practiced then was to board these vessels after they had come to anchor in the upper bay, using small row-boats, and obtain the latest papers and prepare the copy at the offices. David Hale bought and equipped a small, swift schooner, calling her the Journal of Commerce, and cruised for news in the lower bay, and even off Montauk Point. Here incoming vessels from Europe would be boarded, and the newspapers secured. While all sail was then crowded for the Battery the editor on board the schooner culled the news and had his "copy" prepared for the printers by the time the office was reached; and thus the Journal of Commerce was often enabled to give the news before the boats of the other papers had reached the vessel that brought it. When the project was first started the rival papers ridiculed it as an extravagance which would ruin the Journal; but the result proved otherwise. That paper not only by this means obtained its news ahead, but its enterprise advertised it all over the city and country. The semaphoric telegraph at Sandy Hook would make the announcement that "the Journal of Commerce is in the offing, standing in," and later, "the Journal of Commerce is passing the Hook," thus notifying the whole metropolis of the approaching news-boat. Crowds of interested citizens would collect in the office to hear the news, as they did during the war to hear the war-telegrams and read the war-bulletins. When the arrivals of the news-boat occurred in the daytime the news would be delivered in the shape of an "extra" or "evening edition;" and this was the origin not only of the Journal of Commerce, Jun., but also of that peculiarity of American journalism, the "Extra."

The success of this effort was so great, and attended with such happy pecuniary results, that Hale and Hallock were compelled to build another boat; and the Evening Edition—the first news-boat ever built in America—was equipped. This success also inspired enterprise in others; and the Gazette, Advertiser, Courier, Enquirer, and Mercantile Advertiser united in "an association for the collection of ship-news," They purchased an old pilot-boat named the Thomas H. Smith, with which they cruised in opposition to the Journal of Commerce boats. This first American News Association was not very strong, either in finances or energy, and gradually one after another of the papers composing it dropped off and out of existence, until the two with most vitality and political patronage, the Courier and the Enquirer, joined fortunes, became the Courier and Enquirer, and for a long time proved a worthy rival of the energetic Journal of Commerce. This rivalry ran high, and was characterized by scenes and incidents often of an exciting and amusing nature. Neither paper hesitated at its means for defeating the other; and even the appropriation of each other's news was considered legitimate, and was frequently practiced. On one occasion the Journal of Commerce was badly "sold" by the Courier and Enquirer with "bogus" European intelligence in this manner: Whenever one paper had "exclusive news," i.e., ahead of its rival, the other paper would delay going to press until its more successful neighbor had been printed and distributed throughout the city. A copy would then be obtained, surreptitiously of course, the "exclusive news" hastily set up, and the other paper would make its appearance, a few hours late, but still with the news in full. This trick had been played several times by both parties, when the Courier set a trap, and the Journal fell into it. The ship Ajax had arrived, and the Courier had its news exclusively. James Watson Webb, then its editor, had a small edition printed containing a long batch of highly important but bogus news, concocted in his office. This small edition he carefully distributed in such a way as to insure that a copy of the paper should fall into the hands of the Journal editors. The consequence was that the Journal appeared with the "bogus" news. The Courier gathered up its false edition, circulated the true one, and exposed the trickery of its rival. Although similar attempts are occasionally made nowadays, they are not as often successful as in the days of the first journalists, the age when even Locke's preposterous Moon Hoax found believers. For a decade or two there have been no successful impositions of this kind, unless it be that of Lincoln's proclamation by Howard. Howard deceived every paper in the city but the Times. It was thrown out of that office, and was not circulated in the Herald, though received there as genuine. One of the compositors of that office, while en route home, heard it discussed by compositors on the Times, in which office the hoax had been discovered, and he immediately returned to the Herald office and related what he had heard. The presses were at once stopped, after about ten thousand papers had been printed, and other matter being substituted, the paper appeared without the bogus proclamation.

The first "news boat" of David Hale was soon followed by the first "pony express" which ever existed in the newspaper interest, but it was on a small scale, and looked only to the collection of State news. Hale's idea was early adopted and improved upon. As early as 1830 Richard Haughton, who had made his reputation as editor of the political and election news of the Journal of Commerce, and who had subsequently started the Boston Atlas, made some highly successful efforts with "pony expresses." He established a system by which he was enabled, using horses and the few railroads then in Massachusetts, to publish election returns from every town in the State by nine o'clock of the day after an election. This is nothing remarkable at this day, when the result of a general election in all the States is announced simul-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

taneously in all parts of the Union at the next morning's breakfast; but it was not bad for our forefathers, without telegraph and railroad lines. Hale's original express was very much improved and enlarged upon by James Watson Webb, or at least by the Courier and Enquirer, to whom or to which the credit of establishing the "pony express" between New York and Washington belongs. The Courier established this line in 1832, but in 1833 Hale and Hallock started a rival line, by which they were enabled to publish Washington news only two days old. Now it is published two hours old. So admirably did this line work that papers in Norfolk, 229 miles southeast of the capital, copied the Washington news from the Journal of Commerce, received by sea, in advance of its reception by the direct route down the Potomac River. Finding that the better organized line of the Journal continually beat his, the Courier and Enquirer sold its line to the Government.

Naturally these improvements suggested others. When the Long Island Railroad was finished the news-boats were regularly stationed off Montauk Point, the eastern extremity of the island, and the news obtained from passing vessels was sent by rail to Brooklyn, and thence by "pony expresses" to Philadelphia and Washington. A not unfrequent figure seen hurrying through Fulton Street, not with "Excelsior" but "Latest news" on his lips, was that of a news expressman of one or other of the rival papers. When news was expected ferry-boats were held in readiness to convey the messengers across East and North rivers and hasten them on their way to the Capital.

The establishment of the Courier and Enquirer's Washington Express necessitated the employment of a Washington agent, and thus "Washington correspondents" came into existence; the first of that remarkable and peculiar class of reporters being James Gordon Bennett, who was a correspondent of the Courier. Other specialties were also developed, and thus there came to be "departments;" and in course of time men of peculiar talent made reputations in these "special departments." "Money and market reports" was a department originated, like that of the Washington agency, by James Gordon Bennett, and he was the first who ever published a report of Wall Street operations. "Verbatim reporting" became another specialty, and was made a feature of newspapers as early as 1837, in spite of all efforts by the first public speakers of the country to prevent it. A reporter, familiarly known as "Bill Attree," of better memory than habits, made a brilliant reputation as a verbatim reporter, and once elicited from Daniel Webster, though bitterly opposed to reporters, the highest praise for correctness.

The "ship-news" column, as now published, daily giving as it does the movements of the entire American merchant ships all over the world, was originated in 1837. In this department Frederick Hudson made his first reputation. He possessed a remarkable memory and great activity in his youth; and when a "ship-news reporter" he collected his items without making use of a note-book, and wrote out the arrivals, departures, disasters to ships, with names of captains, owners, consignees, and every other fact of interest, from memory. As his daily labors frequently required him to carry in his mind as many as two or three hundred proper names of vessels, captains, owners, etc., this was no ordinary task. He knew by heart the name, description, rate, etc., of every vessel in the New York trade, and the name of every captain in the merchant service; and was thus enabled to keep the changes accurately noted in his mind. This memory failed Mr. Hudson as he grew older, and alluding to it once he told me that he believed it was because he had as he grew older showed a lack of confidence in it, and memory, thus doubted, had deserted him. When he assumed the management of the Herald, distrustful of his memory, he kept "a diary of events to occur," noting down every thing that required future attention and after-thought. This habit grew on him to the neglect of the proper exercise of his memory, and, much to his regret, he found it gradually failing him.

I met years ago with one other journalist who possessed a similarly strong memory. He was a German named Joseph Bernd, and at that time, 1858 or '59, was local and commercial editor of the Louisville Journal. Bernd employed his afternoons in collecting the commercial items for his paper by passing through the principal business street of Louisville and getting quotations from the more prominent and reliable merchants. He would make no memoranda save in his memory; and after hearing hundreds and hundreds of quotations of sales and prices of dozens of different articles, would return to his office and either write them down in the order in which he received them, or take a proof of the previous day's market report and correct or change the figures to suit his new quotations.

The Telegraph revolutionized Journalism; and the mode of obtaining news became changed as the machinery was improved. "Pony expresses" gave way to railroads and the telegraph; and the news-boats were driven out to that extreme end of telegraphic communication known as "Farther Point." But it was soon found that the telegraph was an inadequate though very rapid machine, and the few wires then existing in the country were unable to convey half the matter offered for the press. All the papers of the country, and particularly of the metropolis, undismayed by the heavy increase of the cost, would have been glad to use the telegraph wires to any extent; but the telegraph company established what was called the "fifteen-minute system," and virtually put a stop to news enterprise. This "fifteen-minute system" required that in the transmission of the telegrams to the press the operator should send to one paper for a quarter of an hour, then to another for the same period, and so on until each was served in turn. This placed all the papers

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

on a par; the slow ones having an equal chance with the enterprising ones. Some remedy was demanded, and again David Hale came to the rescue, and going to James Gordon Bennett of the Herald, proposed to him a combination of the papers in the collection of news by telegraph. The two agreeing in their ideas, they modeled a News Association, somewhat on the plan of the original "Ship-News Association," and inviting the co-operation of the Times, Tribune, Sun, and Courier and Enquirer, framed what has ever since been known as the "New York Associated Press." This corporation grew in strength, and extended, and enlarged, and improved its complicated machinery and its influence until it came to be a magnificent monopoly, controlling, and in a great measure inspiring, the tone of the entire press of the country.

About 1863 the papers on the other side of the Alleghanies, headed by the powerful ones established in the great news centres of the West (Chicago, St. Louis, and Cincinnati), formed an association intended to be subsidiary to that of the New York Association, but really meant to protect the "country press" from real or fancied aggressions on the part of the "Metropolitan News Monopoly." This proved at last the rival of the old association, and in November of 1866 it abandoned it and set up one of its own; so that for a time the news of the country was supplied by two associations instead of one. The old one, the New York Associated Press, was composed of the Herald, Times, Sun, Tribune, and Journal of Commerce, in New York City, a greater number of the State papers and a few throughout the country; while the new association, called the "United States and European News Association" was composed of the World, in New York City, and the principal papers of Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Louisville, Memphis, New Orleans, Mobile, Charleston, Washington, and, indeed, the greater proportion of the "country journals." This made both concerns very powerful, and the rivalry was promising several results highly beneficial to the public when, owing to the inability of the telegraph companies to transmit the two reports in time, a compromise was effected and the breach healed. Rivalry in the collection of news will always be for the mutual benefit of the public and the larger and more substantial papers, and against the interests of the smaller papers. The results, in which the public are interested, would be that the amount of news given daily would be increased in quantity and improved in quality while the price paid for the paper containing it would be lessened; the journals would be improved in appearance and character while the number of them would be reduced to the really able ones; and the last, but by no means the least, beneficial result would be that only powerful and vital political, commercial, educational, and moral interests would be able to set afloat and sustain a paper of power for good.

The description of the machinery which at the present time collects our news will be found not less interesting than the history which has been sketched of those of our forefathers. The "head-quarters" of all American news must, as a matter of course, be New York City as long as the journals of that city maintain their present supremacy and superiority, just as it must always—and for the same commercial reasons—be the centre of business of every character. The "Rooms" of the New York News Association are at the corner of Broadway and Liberty streets. Like all other news offices of New York City, the Associated Press Rooms appear to have been located and fitted especially with a view to the repulsion of "loungers." It is a singular fact that in this city, noted for the convenient arrangement and elegant style of the offices of professional and business men generally, there has never been a respectable suit of editorial rooms. There is nothing attractive in the interior appearance of any newspaper office in New York. The editorial rooms of the new Herald building, not yet finished, are to be handsomely arranged and elegantly furnished. They are to be protected from the impositions of "loungers" by a new process. At the head of the stairs for visitors a "reception-room" will be furnished for the accommodation of visitors. An usher or chamberlain is to be in attendance, to whom all callers will be expected to explain their business or deliver their cards to be sent to the room of the editor whom they wish to see. An editor can at once receive a visitor thus announced or decline as he may think best, and thus frequently get rid of bores—a consummation not yet reached, but one very much to be desired. The rooms of the News Association are in no respect superior to those of the newspapers as at present regulated; and nowhere can such lofty and dingy "sky parlors" be more laboriously approached by steep and high ascents of stairways than those of the New York News Agent. The "Rooms" are really only one large, carpetless room, filled with old and ugly oak desks or tables; one corner devoted to the reception of the dust, and dirt, and broken furniture, and general refuse of ages, with very little to charm or interest any but the curious who desire to know "how we get our news."

The force employed in these rooms consists of an agent, with one or two assistants capable and experienced enough to take charge in the former's absence; half a dozen copyists, and two or three messengers, the latter mere lads of fifteen or sixteen of a somnambulic turn of mind, for though always somnolent, they are also always active. Business begins about eleven o'clock in the morning, and, with an interregnum of a few hours in the afternoon, lasts until two o'clock in the morning—not hard but rather inconvenient hours. The first duty of the day is to serve the afternoon papers—not those of New York merely, but of the whole country—with the news of the morning. The

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

first telegraphic copy for New York afternoon papers must be delivered by or before one o'clock, and then as rapidly as possible until the several editions which each paper issues every afternoon have been struck off. Nothing more is then delivered until perhaps ten P.M., when the copy is sent to the offices of the morning papers. The various agents of the Association throughout the country telegraph their "morning reports"—as the first dispatches of the day are called—at such an hour as will secure their delivery at the New York or central office in time for the afternoon papers; and hence the work of copying in the New York office begins about eleven o'clock. The telegrams received are elaborated from the abbreviated form which all agents employ, and copied on "manifold paper"—a process by which as many as ten copies can be easily made at a single writing. The address and signature of the telegrams are of course omitted in copying them, only the date being given, and the dispatch is written out just as the public subsequently see it printed, except that the "caption" or title is varied by each office as suits the taste of its editor. The messengers who deliver these to the various newspaper offices are required to get a receipt from the editor giving the exact moment of delivery. While one set of wires from all parts of the country, one set of operators in the office below, and one set of copyists and messengers are engaged in conveying, receiving, copying, and delivering the news to the New York evening papers, another set of wires, operators, and copyists are as busy furnishing the telegrams to the country papers, as all outside of the metropolis are called by metropolitans. These, as a general thing, embrace the "spirit of the morning press," and profess to give the opinions and exclusive or special news of the several morning journals. In the mean time the news from all points, which is being delivered to the New York evening papers, is also being delivered at the same time to the country evening papers, thus securing its simultaneous publication all over the country. The process is repeated at night for the benefit of the morning papers, the only difference being that the labors of the night are heavier.

The Association has agents—they are not called reporters—at every important point in the country. As a general thing, a Press agent is not selected on account of his superior ability as a reporter, his principal duty in that line only requiring him to forward the news obtained in the local papers of the point at which he is stationed. They are poorly paid—twenty-five to thirty and thirty-five dollars per week being the maximum of salaries paid. Under the old organization of the New York Associated Press the chief Agent's pay was only about three thousand dollars per annum. Many of the agents at minor points—such as Nashville, Tennessee, Columbus, Ohio, and even more important State capitals—receive only about fifty or sixty dollars per month.

The modus operandi of sending a dispatch to New York (that is, of collecting the news) is very simple; that of distributing it from New York is more complicated. To illustrate the mode of collection we will suppose that the New Orleans agent wishes to send a news telegram. He dates it "New Orleans," and adds the day of the month without naming the month, leaving it to be inferred; and addresses the telegram to "Simonton and Press," Simonton being the name of the New York agent; the word "Press" signifying the papers of the country taking the news of the Association. The New Orleans agent, or, as he is familiarly called, "New Orleans," then gives the substance of his news in as few words as possible, omitting all the prepositions and articles whose absence will not render the telegram unintelligible or dubious of meaning. The full date and omitted or "catch" words are of course supplied by the copyist, who receives it. The address, Simonton and Press, insures the "dropping" of the dispatch as it passes over the wires at every point at which there are Press agents receiving the dispatches of the Association for the press of that city. Thus a telegraphic dispatch from New Orleans—sent by both sea-board and Western lines—will be taken off the wires of the former at Mobile, Montgomery, Milledgeville, Atlanta, Savannah, Charleston, Raleigh, Wilmington, Richmond, Washington, Baltimore, and Philadelphia; and from the wires of the latter line at Vicksburg, Jackson, Memphis, Cairo, Nashville, Louisville, St. Louis, Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, Albany, Cincinnati, Columbus, Pittsburg, Harrisburg, and dozens of other intermediate points too numerous and too insignificant to mention. This secures a very general distribution of the news, and has the further advantage of dividing the "tolls," or charges of the telegraph company, among a great many.

The work of distributing the New York news is more complicated. New York must have the news of all other points in full; but she does not give hers to all the country press alike. The telegrams which are prepared here for the West and South are cut down about one-half at Buffalo before being sent to the West; and at Louisville the curtailed dispatch is reduced fifty per cent. more for Southern distribution; so that New Orleans has but the mere shadow—and yet the substance—of what New York publishes; but the New Orleans publisher has the consoling reflection that, though brief, his news is cheap. The full text of the telegrams which are published daily in New York is sent to the New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland State papers, and to the Washington journals. Buffalo and Pittsburg are the condensing points for the West; Washington and Louisville for the South; and the news of New York makes but a very small display at New Orleans after having passed through these sieves; though these condensed reports contain all the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

national news of interest; and to the great majority of American people who "read as they run" are really preferable to the voluminous reports of the New York papers.

The necessity of condensing dispatches to the smallest number of words, in order to save expense, sometimes produces singular errors; and the sender is often surprised to see what nonsense the receiver has made of his message. A special cable dispatch to the Herald, received on the night of August 8, 1866, was couched in the following words: "Colorado lisbon arrived plymouth sailed cherbourg frolic with mace goes fought two thousand mace won twenty-one rounds."

This was variously rendered in the next morning papers. The Times and Tribune made it read: "The yacht Frolic has had a cruise, with the prize-fighters, Mace and Goss, on board. They fought for $2000. Mace won in 21 rounds." It was only after serious consultation that the Herald got it right. The "Naval Editor" remembered and explained that the Colorado was Admiral Goldsborough's flag-ship, and that the Frolic was her tender, and suggested that that part of the dispatch should read: "The Colorado, Admiral Goldsborough's flag-ship of the United States squadron, from Lisbon, has arrived at Plymouth and sailed for Cherbourg;" and it was so published in the Herald. The "Sporting Editor" being hunted up explained the remainder, and another dispatch in the Herald read thus: "The great prize-fight for the championship of England between Jem Mace and Jo Goss took place to-day, August 7. Twenty-one rounds were fought, when Mace was declared the winner."

Very few people know that the greater part of the matter contained in American newspapers is transmitted by telegraph; and less have any idea of its cost. All or very nearly all the news appearing in a New York daily under the head of "Washington," though not designated as "our special dispatch," is sent by telegraph, often, indeed regularly, to the amount of six, eight, and ten columns per day. The voluminous reports of Congress, including the speeches in debate of both Houses, are regularly telegraphed. On days of great interest at Washington these reports often make as many as two pages of a New York paper. The European dispatches are necessarily brief, much of the lengthy details and correspondence published as supplementary to the dispatches being received by steamers. All other than local reports—those designated as "City," "Brooklyn," "Police," and "New Jersey Intelligence," and under the heads of "Courts" and minor items collected by reporters—are sent by telegraph from all parts of the country.

The daily cost of these dispatches will often amount to a very formidable sum. The following table of the "tolls" or charges which papers have to pay for their dispatches will give the reader an idea of the expense which the New York papers incur for telegraphic matter:

TABLE OF TELEGRAPHIC TOLLS.

From Valentia Bay to New York city, per word in gold—(about) $2 90

		First Ten Words.	Per Word for all after Ten.
From New Orleans to New York	..	$3 25	23 cents
" Washington	" ..	50	5 "
" St. Louis	" ..	2 55	17 "
" Chicago	" ..	2 05	14 "
" San Francisco	" ..	7 45	57 "
" Boston	" ..	30	3 "
" Albany	" ..	55	4 "
" Montreal	" ..	1 20	7 "
" Quebec	" ..	1 82	12 "

An idea of the aggregate cost of dispatches may be had by a short calculation. The Herald calculates a line of its type at nine words, and there are two hundred and fifty lines of "solid nonpareil" type in a column, thus giving a total per column of 2250 words. A column of Washington dispatches would consequently cost $132 50. The Herald seldom has less than a column of Washington "specials," for which it pays at this rate; but it also has from five to six columns daily of a report of Congress sent by the Associated Press agent. This is paid for at the same rate; but as the report is divided between five or six papers in New York city the expense to each one is very insignificant—amounting to less than a cent per word. The charges to the other papers throughout the country still further reduce this expense, making it really insignificant. Almost daily the morning papers contain from a quarter to half a column of European telegrams. A dispatch from Europe which, when published, makes half a column, or 1125 words, did not amount to more than 800 in its original or "condensed" shape, and the charge of the Atlantic Cable Company is therefore only on the 800 words actually transmitted. These 800 words cost $2320 delivered in New York city. When this sum is divided between the Herald, Times, Sun, Tribune, World, and Journal of Commerce, the cost to each—$391—does not look so formidable. The famous "great Cable dispatch," known at the time as the "King of Prussia's Peace Speech," was sent specially to the Herald, and came into my hands for enlargement by supplying the omitted words. The dispatch contained 1010 words, and cost, at the old rate of $5 per word, the neat sum of $5083 in gold, or about $7100 in "greenbacks." This sum was divided between six papers, averaging a cost to each of nearly $1200. Under the old organization of the Associated Press two-thirds of this expense was charged to the country Press, so that the New York papers did not really pay such a tremendous sum for that famous telegram as appeared at first glance. Under the old organization of the Associated Press the telegrams furnished by that agency to the New York papers cost about $800 per week to each paper. During the first four weeks after the "split" and the establishment of the "United States and European News

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Agency"—a movement which resulted in withdrawing from the New York Press the support of the greater part of the country Press—the average cost to each New York paper was $2100. The "special telegrams" cost more—very considerably more—than those of the Associated Press; so that it may be safe to calculate the weekly expenses for telegraphic matter of each of the New York dailies at about $2000 to $2500. Often it is less, but oftener much more, the Tribune and other papers having occasionally boasted of expending $10,000 in a single week for telegrams. The last boast of this sort which I remember to have noticed in the Tribune was coupled with a statement that its circulation amounted to about 56,000 daily. When it is remembered that this circulation is sold at two cents per copy, and the sales of a week will amount to only $6720, it is not easy for the uninitiated to see how the money is made. It is the advertisements that pay the profit; though even the best advertising patronage would not justify the regular expenditure of $10,000 per week in telegrams.

Few or none of the larger and wealthier papers of the country now depend entirely on the Associated Press for their dispatches; but employ "special correspondents," and publish what are called "special dispatches." By an old rule of the New York Associated Press all "special dispatches" from "special correspondents," except those stationed at Albany and Washington, are public property, and must be tendered to the other papers. Thus, if the Tribune's correspondent at Boston, or Quebec, or New Orleans, or any other point than Albany or Washington, sends a telegram to that paper, it must be printed on "slips," or "proofs," at the Tribune office and sent to the Herald, Times, and all other city papers belonging to the Association. They may use it or not as they choose. If they publish it, they are expected to pay an equal share of the "tolls," or expenses; if they omit it from the next morning's paper, they are not expected to pay for any part of it, and the Tribune foots the bill. This rule does not apply to the country papers, and each one is at liberty to employ its best talent exclusively. There are several papers at the West who publish as much special matter as the New York papers, as, for instance, the Cincinnati Gazette, and Commercial, and the Chicago Times, and Tribune. The force of special correspondents employed on each of these is only second to those of the New York papers; and as a general thing they are equal in merit and average ability. The special correspondents of the several New York papers are nearly if not quite as numerous as the regular agents of the Associated Press; and the system of special correspondence is even conducted on a more extensive scale.

Take, for instance, the system of the Herald—I quote its workings more frequently here because more familiar with its system than that of any other paper. It has always two and often four correspondents in Washington, and two in Albany—the points from which it may obtain news that it can use "exclusively." All other points in the country are covered by the Associated Press agents; and depending chiefly on them, the Herald merely keeps three or four roving correspondents, who go from point to point on the scent of news, and who are expected to "be in at the death" wherever news is to be had. Where the Associated Press agents are not you may be sure to find the "specials;" and, if of no other paper, certainly that of the Herald. A Spaniard writes by every steamer from Havana, and another from Vera Cruz. You can always find one "special" and one "occasional" Herald correspondent at the city of Mexico; another dances attendance at Juarez's head-quarters; a third at Matamoras; and a fourth roves with Minister Campbell in search of the mysterious capital of the Republic of Mexico. There are stationary correspondents at San Francisco, Panama, Rio Janeiro, and Shanghai, China; and Americans in these ports find the "New York Herald Rooms" the most pleasant of lounging places. There are also correspondents, but no "rooms," at Lima, Peru, and Valparaiso, Chili; while every United States Legation at the petty capitals of Central and South America contains an "occasional" correspondent among its attachés. Crossing the ocean, you will find these specials, two or three in number, at London and Paris; one each at Brussels, Berlin, St. Petersburg, Vienna, Venice, Florence, Rome, Constantinople, Madrid, Lisbon, etc.; and they are ever present with such expeditions as the American squadron in the Mediterranean, the allied army in Paraguay, the armies in Candia and Corea, and the Collins Telegraph Company in Kamtchatka! The special corps of the Herald will number at least thirty men, and costs, in salaries and traveling expenses, rent of rooms, etc., not less than eighty thousand dollars per annum. The salaries paid to foreign correspondents will average about $40 in gold per week. Home correspondents are paid less than that amount in currency—thirty and thirty-five dollars and expenses being by some singular reasoning thought good pay. The correspondents enumerated, however, furnish but a portion of the correspondence, and the figures given do not represent the total expense incurred. The "occasional" correspondents of the Herald are innumerable. Every person who has news to communicate writes to the Herald, and if his letters are published they are paid for at the rate of about ten dollars per column, great care being taken to pay for them promptly in order to encourage further contributions. Compilations on subjects of temporary interest, such as are referred to in the news of the day, find ready sale at the Herald office, and if the person is likely ever to have similar information on hand he is never underpaid. A gentleman of some prominence in the late rebellion once waited on the editor of the Herald office with an

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

article exposing the operations of the rebel Commissary, and showing how supplies for the rebel army were obtained from the North. He was referred to the sub-editor having such matters in charge. The article was appropriate, and was purchased at the author's own modest price of eight dollars per column. Mr. Bennett on reading it, when published in his paper, was much pleased with it, and calling for the editor who had accepted it he asked who the author was. On being told he made a minute of the name. "How much did you promise to pay him for it?" was the next question. "Eight dollars a column," was the answer. "How much did it make?" "Six columns." Running the calculation over in his mind the editor-in-chief remarked, "Forty-eight dollars—that ain't much. Give him a hundred. He may have something else as good." The shrewd surmise was not without foundation, and the author soon after turned up with another interesting exposé of the then just defunct Confederacy.

Great events of course increase the number of special correspondents, or concentrates them in great numbers at the points of interest. More correspondents than Fenians appear to have swarmed over the Canadian border during the Canadian invasion, for, judging from the trials which have taken place, only correspondents and priests appear to have been captured. The Herald had fifteen or twenty correspondents engaged in that wild-goose chase, and spent in a month at least twenty thousand dollars. The same paper sent eight men, and the other papers one or two each, to witness the war in Europe, but none of them got there in time. During the rebellion they were more successful; the Herald maintained a corps of sixty-three of the most enterprising, though by no means the most learned, correspondents. But a fair knowledge of English, united to plenty of energy and some ingenuity, was all that was required by the Herald. Promptness in action, not perspicuity in English; a clear head, not a concise style; and common-sense, not a collegiate education, were the qualifications demanded in a Herald war correspondent. Not elegance of description, though it was not objected to, was urged on the correspondent; but he was carefully impressed with the idea that to be "ahead" of his rivals was to be successful. The correspondents were told, in a printed circular issued by the editor of the Herald, that there was no particular merit in being "up" with his rivals; dismissal was to be expected if he fell behind them, but advancement in position and salary would follow if he came in "ahead." Every thing was done to encourage the energetic, to get rid of the drones. The successful correspondent did as he pleased; his wishes were consulted, his advice asked, his requests granted, his accounts unquestioned, his salary advanced unsolicited. The unsuccessful correspondent handed in his account with fear and trembling; every item was examined and questioned, and paid with apparent reluctance; while the items of the successful correspondent's bill were never questioned, not even examined, and paid with a compliment. The consequence of this was that, before the war had advanced to a battle—before the troops had been got beyond the "awkward squad" drill—the Herald's correspondents were veterans. Their esprit du corps was superior to that of any similar body I ever saw, and nothing could have been more admirable. This spirit was not confined to the Herald correspondents, however, though not so much developed and encouraged in other offices; and some of the Western papers had most admirably energetic as well as able correspondents, such as Reid and Furay, of the Cincinnati Gazette, and Cadwallader, of the Chicago Times; while energy and ability were equally united in such of the Eastern correspondents as Coffin ("Carleton"), of the Boston Journal, Swinton, of the Times, Smalley, of the Tribune, and others. The spirit of rivalry engendered by this system of discipline, and the circumstances under which the correspondents always labored, naturally produced some singular incidents. During the war it was customary for a correspondent, after a battle, to start for the office of his paper with what notes he had collected during the engagement, and write up his account as he went. This practice saved time, though it paid dearly for postage. On one occasion I was en route for New York, from Nashville, Tennessee, with important news, accompanied by Mr. W. S. Furay, of the Cincinnati Gazette (correspondents of non-rival journals frequently collected and used their notes of a battle in connection). We were compelled to take at Nashville a military train, which was being sent through to Bowling Green after reinforcements, and it happened that the engine-driver was a rebel, though he was not suspected as such. He thought it to the interest of the Confederacy to delay the forwarding of reinforcements to Rosecrans, and managed to have his train run into by a second, which was in the rear, and smashed up. I happened to be in the rear car, writing, and when the alarm was given jumped from the car, dropping some of my papers as I did so. Although the danger was imminent, I could not resist the temptation to stop and pick them up. I did so, and again started to get out of the way of the rapidly-approaching train. Other slips of paper fell from my grasp. I gave a look at the coming train, a glance and a grasp at the papers, and then ran for it, laughing in spite of myself at hearing, above the screech of the locomotive, the voice of Furay loudly beseeching me not to "lose the list of killed and wounded!"

After some hours' delay, in which Furay and I wrote at our accounts instead of assisting at the repair of the cars, the two demolished trains were patched up so as to make one whole one, and off we started with the rebel engineer, who had thus far escaped suspicion, again in charge. When within about ten miles of Bowling Green,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Kentucky, I was looking out of the door of the box-car in which Furay and myself had taken passage, when I noticed that the locomotive of the train was detached from the cars, and was some distance ahead, still standing at the bottom of a heavy grade, down which the train was going with great rapidity. I saw what the consequences of the threatened collision must be, and called Furay's attention to the approaching crash. As the first car struck the locomotive it split in two and fell on either side of the road; the second car did the same, as did the third and fourth; and the train was fast becoming a total wreck when Furay exclaimed to me, "Jump!" I did so at the word. I had not been blind to the danger, but, strange enough, as the train was going to pieces I was thinking not how to escape, but how to get to Bowling Green, where we could get another train, and go on toward our destination without delay. While in the act of jumping the solution of that problem came to my mind; and I had no sooner alighted safely on the ground than I called out to Furay—"Get on the locomotive; that will carry us to Bowling Green!" For the sake of any reader who may be interested in the sequel I will add that my surmise proved true: the locomotive did carry us to Bowling Green, where we stated the facts and our suspicions of the engineer to General Manson; and the rebel was arrested, tried, found guilty, but never executed, for the reason that he escaped from confinement and got into the Confederacy.

The same gentleman who participated with me in this adventure once had a not dissimilar one in Georgia. A rival correspondent with a very full and valuable list of the killed and wounded in one of the Atlanta battles was on a train with Mr. Furay, both en route to Cincinnati with full details of the battle. The train was thrown from the track at night, and the car in which the correspondents were seated broken into fragments, and several passengers killed and many wounded. Fortunately both correspondents were unhurt, and managed to extricate themselves from the ruins. The ruling passion was strong amidst death, and ten minutes after the two correspondents met each other groping about in the dark, each looking for the other's dead body and notes of the battle! It was a grim joke, but each enjoyed it.

This system of carrying one's own account of a battle to the office of course cost considerable money; but army mails were not to be trusted, and the money thus spent was never begrudged by the publishers. It was these expenses which made the cost of the war correspondents so heavy, for they were not paid large salaries. The expenses of a correspondent were frequently as heavy as his salary; and thus the battle accounts of the Herald often cost a pretty handsome sum. Its account of the capture of New Orleans cost that paper $1000, and it paid for its account of the battle of Chickamauga at the rate of about $250 per column; while the siege of Chattanooga cost the same paper over $400 in starved horse-flesh alone.

The collection of the news by agents and correspondents is not the last process through which it passes before being given to the printers, and by them to the public; it has yet to be prepared —i. e., "edited;" and this process is not less interesting than that already noticed. A very large force is necessary, or at least is employed, in every New York newspaper office to edit the news, and this force is generally carefully divided into distinct classes or departments. There are in the Herald Editorial Department eight separate and distinct departments, giving employment to about 40 persons. There are first of all eight or nine "Writing Editors," who hold about the same rank to the other editors that seniors in college do to their fellow-students, but do not command quite so much consideration. These gentlemen write the original articles which appear upon the fourth page of the paper, and which are known as "Editorials." They meet in the private room of the Editor-in-Chief daily, the Chief or the Managing Editor presiding, discuss for an hour or two the topics of general interest, and suggest subjects for the editorials for the next day's paper. After comparing the various opinions with his own the presiding Editor, either Mr. Bennett or his son, decides how each subject is to be treated, and assigns it to the sub-editor best calculated to "work it up" in the peculiar vein or style of the Herald. These meetings are often very interesting, and the editors look forward to them with positive pleasure. I was once present at an "editorial council" when the card of Senator Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, was handed to the senior Mr. Bennett. He read it aloud and ordered the porter to show the gentleman in. When Mr. Wilson entered he was somewhat surprised at the evidences of a literary levée, but recovered his composure as soon as Mr. Bennett introduced the gentlemen as "his editorial staff." The Senator at once sat down and conversation recommenced. For two hours a sharp discussion between the Senator and the Editor ensued, the "staff" joining in whenever occasion offered or warranted, and a very agreeable, entertaining, and rambling debate on political topics in general, and Congressional proceedings in particular, was the result. At last Senator Wilson, rising, apologized for disturbing the "Council," and as he was leaving the room remarked that he would understand better hereafter "how a great paper is edited." "Will he?" remarked the Editor-in-Chief, as the door closed on the Senator, and a peculiar smile on his countenance indicated to those who knew him best that something funny was in the "old gentleman's" mind. "He thinks he'll understand how the Herald is edited, does he? I want each of you," he added, "to take some one idea Mr. Wilson has expressed, state it briefly in one paragraph, and answer it in a second. I want them all short." If Mr. Wilson read the Herald of the next morning he

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

must have been very much astonished and amused at the way the "great Herald" was edited, for every editorial article referred to him, and rehearsed his ideas expressed the day before.

One would imagine that with such a number of writers the articles in the same issue would frequently "clash" and be contradictory, yet the editors are "well trained," and have learned by long intercourse the ideas, and caught something of the peculiar style, of the Editor-in-Chief. In all other offices in New York the editorial writers are more independent in the choice of a subject and manner of its treatment than in the Herald office—and one may trace individuality in the editorials of the World, Times, or Tribune; but there is only the peculiar style of Mr. Bennett visible in the editorial columns of the Herald.

The "City" or "Local Department" of the New York dailies is considered the most important, and each paper employs in that department from ten to twenty men, known as "Reporters," and under the immediate supervision of a "City Editor." The collection and preparation of city items, reporting of speeches, proceedings of the courts, public offices, prisons, and station-houses, etc., depend upon these; and upon the City Editor depends the final arrangement and approval of the city reports. New York reporters are the worst paid men in the profession in any part of the country. Reporters for Chicago or Cincinnati papers command much better salaries than the same class in New York. There are any number of reporters who work on New York dailies for twenty and even fifteen dollars per week; and shorthand reporters are to be had, and are had, at twenty-five and twenty-eight dollars per week. The annual editorial expenses of the various papers vary greatly. The Tribune probably pays more money for this service than any other paper in the country. In 1865 it paid $51,884 05, and in 1866 $81,775 40 to editors—sums almost as large as it paid for its news by both telegraph and mail.

Each paper has also what is called a "European Editor"—that is, a person to prepare the cable telegrams and the European correspondence, and to cull the English papers which arrive by every steamer. His duties are explained by the title which he bears. They are very laborious, requiring attention until a late hour at night, and the position is not looked upon as a sinecure, yet men are to be had to do it for the insignificant pay of a thousand a year. The "Exchange Editor" has similar duties to perform with regard to the papers of the country, known in editorial parlance as "domestic papers." In the larger offices, like that of the Herald, the duty of editing the "home correspondence" devolves upon another than the "Exchange Editor," no proper or distinctive title applying to him. In the Herald office the editor who attends to the "home correspondence" also has charge of the records of public individuals, and writes the obituaries, and is commonly known as the "Obituary Editor."

One would hardly suppose from glancing at the "ship-news" column of a morning paper that the post of "Ship-news Editor" is one of the most interesting and entertaining on a daily paper. It would look like dry work to daily collate a column of such apparently uninteresting stuff from the various papers and correspondence which comes to hand, but such it is not. A smattering of several languages—more particularly French, Spanish, and Portuguese—are necessary qualifications of the "Ship-news Editor," as his column is made up from papers printed and correspondence written in all languages from English to Chinese. He has to read and write of shipwrecks and other disasters at sea. He is the directory for sailors' wives and sweet-hearts, and hardly a day passes that some poor lone woman does not come to him to tell her sad story, and make anxious inquiries about absent ones and the ships on which they sailed. It is not an unfrequent thing to have a jolly-looking sailor burst upon the Ship-news Editor's privacy to report an arrival or shock his nerves by announcing a wreck. These "jolly tar reporters" never fail to display their eagerness to know if they are the first to give the news, for it is well known to every sailor that the first "bringer of [such] unwelcome news hath [not] a losing office." Every wreck is worth to the sailor who first reports it enough currency to keep him in tobacco for a month or two. The Herald, as early as 1836, made a rule of paying handsomely for all such reports; and not unfrequently sailors have been known to take the train from points on the Long Island Railroad and rush off to the Herald office to report disasters, satisfied of better pay as reporters than as wreckers.

Other departments and other editors receive and prepare "financial news" and "politics" or "election news," the sources for such matter being principally the exchange papers and the telegraph. The larger offices also employ a "translator," who besides translating the correspondence also culls the foreign papers which are printed in other than the English language; a "Librarian," who has charge of the volumes used as reference, and a person who is known as "the Index," and whose duty it is to keep an index of the paper in such a manner that any document published can be at once found if reference to it is demanded. A very handsome Index published by the Times has proved an index not only to that but to all other New York papers.

There must, of course, be besides a head to each of these departments, a head for them all, the "Central Organizer" into whose hands all the "copy" thus separately prepared must come to be arranged. The natural arrangement of news, and the one now generally adopted, is in "topics;" and when in type, ready to be placed in the forms, the news thus collected from hundreds of sources by hundreds of hands, and ar-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ranged by a dozen others, is naturally arranged in topics. A "display head" announces the "topic" in a single line, and a few other lines tell the "features" or "points" of the news embraced under that topic. Thus the head-line "Disasters," generally used by papers all over the country because brief as well as expressive, striking and attractive to the eye, may refer to wrecks at sea or on the lakes, railroad collisions on land or colliery explosions in England; a separate and smaller line, called a "sub-head," distinguishing one report from the other. And thus a paper may come to be composed—as is the one before me and picked up at random—of several topics expressed by the "head-lines" "Canada," "The Fenians," "The Ocean Yacht Race," "Connecticut Politics," "Europe," "Mexico," and the inevitable "Washington," which has come to be considered expressive of all that is interesting about Congress and the President and scandalous in national politics. It is thus arranged in topics that, late at night, the news comes to the hand of the "Central Organizer"—the "Managing Editor," whose duty it is to decide the position in the paper of each article—in other words, to decide on the artistic appearance of the paper. From his hands the matter set in type passes to those of the stereotypers and pressmen. Hoe's presses throw off the printed sheets with lightning rapidity. Thousands of news-boys and expressmen and mail-carriers eagerly gather them up and serve them out to the not less numerous and eager consumers, hungry for their morning meal of news.

ALEXANDER T. STEWART.

IN 1823 a young man, then scarcely twenty years of age, landed in the city of New York. He was of Irish birth and parentage, but more remotely descended from a Scottish ancestry. He had inherited with his blood the spirit and latent power of that Scotch-Irish race which has been dominant in the North of Ireland since the days of Cromwell, and which has given to this country, as well as to England, so many men eminent in all the walks of life. His letters of introduction from members of the Society of Friends in Ireland to prominent merchants of that Society in New York gave him access to the best social circles, and where he was soon distinguished both for his pleasing address as a gentleman, and his attainments as a fine classical scholar. It was the first visit of Alexander T. Stewart to the city which for more than forty years has been his home, and where he has risen to wealth and prominence as a merchant, and the extent of whose business in that pursuit has probably never been excelled, and rarely, if ever, equaled in this or any other country.

He was born not far from the city of Belfast. Before he was eight years of age an elder sister and both his parents died, and he was left an orphan without any near relatives except his maternal grandfather. This good old man, a member of the Methodist Society and of great piety, took the orphan boy to his home, and his heart yearned toward the youth, his only descendant. It was his earnest wish and hope that the grandson should become a minister of the Gospel, and with this purpose in view the boy was at once put upon a course of academical studies to prepare him for the University. At an early day, and while at school, the coming man began to appear. Whether in the sports of boyhood or in the studies of the school he resolved to be first. With a frame not robust but yet lithe and active he was foremost in the race, and with a tenacity of purpose never relaxed, by diligent study, united with good natural abilities, he reached and maintained the position of "Dux" or leader of his class during both his academical and collegiate life. He took his degree at Trinity College, Dublin. But, alas! before he completed his course of study the pious old grandfather had followed the parents to the grave. The young, ambitious student was alone in the world. And he might have repeated the lament in the words of Outalissa—

"All perished. I alone am left on earth,
To whom nor relative nor blood remains;
No, not a kindred drop that runs in human veins."

After the death of his grandfather a Quaker friend was chosen and appointed the guardian of Mr. Stewart. He was a friend indeed; and to his advice and the pious instructions of the grandfather connected with the successful prosecution of his studies the great merchant has been heard to attribute much of his success in after-life. It was through and by this guardian the letters of introduction were procured when the young Irish scholar determined to seek fame and fortune in the New World. For a brief time after his arrival in New York he was employed as a teacher, thus turning to good account his excellent scholarship. And there are those now living who recur with great interest and affection to the period when they were introduced by him to the Grecian and Roman classics.

Accident made him a merchant. Where he was to be in connection with an experienced business man and to contribute capital he suddenly found himself principal alone, charged with the rent of a store, and with the whole responsibility devolving on him. With that indomitable will and wonderful energy which has marked his whole life he at once went back to Ireland, converted into money the moderate fortune which he had inherited, invested that fortune in goods—principally the laces which were manufactured at and around his birthplace—and then returned to New York and opened his store.

And in this connection may be mentioned an incident of touching interest—one of many showing, perhaps, somewhat of the Scottish blood in his veins, which, if it rarely forgives an enemy, never forgets a friend. A young

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

lady whose acquaintance he had made said to him on the day preceding the opening of his store: "You must not sell any thing on the morrow till I come and make the first purchase; for I will bring luck." True to her promise, she drove up in her carriage early in the day, and purchased goods to nearly two hundred dollars in value, principally of Irish laces. Long years passed; the lady married and removed with her husband to a European city. Mr. Stewart was in that city on business, and there learned that his first customer was still living, but in very reduced circumstances. Her husband was dead, but before his death had squandered her fortune. Procuring good apartments, he caused them to be furnished in a style corresponding with her former position in life. Then calling upon her and renewing his acquaintance, and after conversing on old times and former friends, asked her to take a drive with him around the city in his carriage, which stood at the door. After looking at some objects of interest he took her to the new residence, saying: "This, if it meets your approbation, is your future home." He settled an annuity upon her, and during the residue of her life she lived not only in comfort but in comparative affluence, supported entirely by his bounty. Truly, if she brought luck to the young merchant, that first morning's purchase was a lucky one for her.

But there was another incident connected with the sales of merchandise on that first day of far more importance in its results, though apparently trifling in its character. One of the clerks stated to a purchaser that a piece of calico was of a certain quality, that the colors were "fast" and would not wash out, and if not so, the article would be taken back and the money returned. The remarks were overheard by Mr. Stewart, and he called the clerk to him and spoke with indignation: "What do you mean by thus saying what you know to be untrue?" The clerk, perhaps astonished at thus being called to account, replied that the woman would not return the goods, and if she did she could easily be put off by stating that she must be mistaken, and the purchase must have been made at some other store. But no; that was not the point. A lie had been told to induce a purchase; and no goods must be sold in his store or in his name under any misrepresentation whatever. The clerk could conform to that rule or at once vacate his place. This interview between him and one of his first clerks was narrated to the writer a few years since, when in a familiar conversation the direct question was asked: "To what do you attribute your great success as a merchant?" "That I have conducted my business from the first on the basis of truth. Truth, truth," he added, with great emphasis, "is the talismanic word; and if I have any one earthly wish or desire greater than another, it is that in this respect my example may be commended and followed by young men entering into business, and especially by young merchants."

There is in his business one price for all. From this fixed price no person employed is permitted to depart; and every purchaser of merchandise, whether of the value of shillings or of tens of thousands of dollars, gets the precise articles sold. No deceit or misrepresentation as to the condition or quality of the goods is tolerated, and hence the unbounded confidence which he has obtained in every State and almost every village in our country. To carry out such a system requires a rigid discipline, and it sometimes occurs that a young man of an easy conscience finds the restraints too severe. The exceptions are rare, and when found out, as they are, sooner or later, never pass without rebuke, and generally the offending party is dismissed. There is a military precision required and exacted, and it is thus that the whole vast machinery works, as it were, by electric touches.

It was often said during the late war, that while there were many officers who could command well a regiment of men the number was small of those who could successfully direct the movements of large armies on the battle-field. Mr. Stewart has the elements of a great general, quick to discern, prompt to act, fearless and energetic in all his movements. To these may be added a quick insight, almost intuitive as it were, into the characters of men. In this, as must always happen to those so extensively engaged, he has been sometimes though rarely deceived. The right man is generally in the right place. It is that perfect system and that thorough discipline that enables one master-mind to control and direct such a vast mercantile business—a business which connects itself not only with every State in the Union, but with almost every state and kingdom of Europe. The business, too, includes those of Retailer, Jobber, Importer, Manufacturer, and even, in some cases, grower and producer of the raw material. If reports through the papers are correct the last year's net income was over four millions of dollars, and an income tax was paid of over four hundred thousand dollars—the latter amount being sixteen times greater than the annual salary of the President of the United States, and larger than the expenses of several of the States for the ordinary support of their State Governments. All this vast business is done not upon credit but upon an actual capital, and the whole machinery is worked and directed by one energetic and controlling mind. It would seem as if the lamp of Aladdin had been found.

Though born on the other side of the Atlantic the Latin maxim

> Cœlum non animum mutant
> Qui trans mare currunt, can scarcely be said to be applicable to him. The true theory of our Government, and the one embraced and maintained by Mr. Stewart, is, that when a citizen or subject of a foreign Government emigrates voluntarily, and for his own advantage, and abjures all foreign alle-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

giance, and takes the oath of allegiance to the Government of his choice, he should, in all respects, become, as it were, a whole not a half citizen—there should be no divided allegiance. The proudest title should be that of an American citizen, not an Irishman or a British subject. Hence he has avoided all connection with Societies formed exclusively of men of foreign birth. Yet as it is said the heart of the Scotchman warms to the tartan, so his heart warms toward the people of his native island.

A few years ago, when there was a famine there, he adopted a course unique and perfect in itself, and illustrating one of the peculiar characteristics of the man. First, he sought for a ship to charter. A British vessel was offered and refused; he wanted a ship of his own country, an American ship. Such a one was found, new, in fine order, with an American captain and an American crew, and was at once chartered. He then sat down and ascertained the amount of the fortune which he brought from Ireland, and added the interest thereto, and there was a very considerable sum of money which he considered he owed to Ireland, and he resolved to pay the debt. The vessel was loaded entirely by him with both necessary and costly provisions, and with the American flag floating proudly at the fore entered the harbor of Belfast. It was one of America's contributions to Ireland, and was so intended by the giver. The arrival of that vessel and the distribution of the valuable cargo among the suffering poor produced, as may well be imagined, a profound impression. An ovation yet awaits the donor should he ever afford the warm-hearted people of his native land the opportunity to give him an Irish welcome.

But the enterprise was not yet complete. The agent at Belfast was directed to advertise for young men and women who desired to go to America, and a free passage was given to as many as the vessel could carry, the only requirement being that each applicant should be of good moral character and able to read and write. A circular was issued by Mr. Stewart himself, and sent to his numerous friends, stating the fact that he expected a large number of young people, and asking employment for them. When the vessel reached the harbor of New York places had been found for almost every one of the new emigrants. The circle was then complete. It was a thorough and finished work.

To a friend who asked him how he would employ his time should he retire from active business, his prompt answer was, "Go to school." Amidst all his vast and widely-extended business transactions he has found time to pursue the studies of his youth. Now past his threescore years, the classical works which he read in his younger days are not allowed to rest on the shelves, but are frequently in his hands. Few professional men in our land amidst the busy and absorbing pursuits of life preserve their knowledge of the classics. Still rarer is the example of a merchant engaged in extensive business devoting his few hours of leisure to the languages of Greece and Rome, and thus keeping green and fresh the learning of his college days.

With the love of classical learning he cherishes a warm love for all that is rare and beautiful in art. The noble dwelling going up in Fifth Avenue will have its gallery, where will be gathered some of the choicest contributions from the chisels and easels of American sculptors and painters. The public press has recently noticed his intention of making a large gift, in the shape of tenement houses, to be erected in the city, after improved and better plans of construction. How royal this bounty may be will doubtless depend, in part at least, upon the system adopted to preserve it, and its future increase for the purposes to which it is devoted. When that system shall be matured we venture the assertion that it will be found perfect in all its details, and so far as human foresight can go will guard against corruption and swindling and the perversion of the objects of a great charity.

Mr. Stewart goes out to Paris the present year as one of the representatives from the United States to the great world's exhibition. As President of the Honorary Commission appointed by the Government he will be truly an honor to the land of his adoption. Familiar with the language and the customs of France, he will be at home in his new office—the first, we believe, which he has held, and all the more creditable as it came to him unsought. He will be still true to the flag to which he swore allegiance over forty years ago, and to which during the war, as well as during all the years of his citizenship, there has not been one throbbing of his heart which has not been loyal and patriotic. It was an appointment eminently fit to be made. The Commission will be headed by one who may well be said to be now the first merchant in the United States, and probably in the world, and who unites in himself the qualities of a distinguished man of business with the acquirements and polish of a scholar and a gentleman.

We may say, in conclusion, that Mr. Stewart was married soon after his settlement in New York to an accomplished young lady—a member of a prominent and influential family—and that his married life has been one of uninterrupted harmony and happiness. It was around the domestic hearth that the writer, in times past, gathered up in familiar and friendly conversations, and treasured up in his memory the incidents some of which have been related in this imperfect sketch. Imperfect it necessarily is—for it is written far away from the city, without any memoranda, and entirely without the knowledge of him the mere outline of whose life and character it purports to give—if it shall inspire any young merchant to follow his example, walking always in the paths of soberness and truth, there may be good grounds for pardon in thus making public the conversations of friends in the private and social circle.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Editor's Easy Chair.

WITH the opening year the American bird was in fine feather. The yacht Henrietta had crossed the ocean in thirteen days and twenty-two hours; and the Royal Yacht Club, and Lord Wilton, and Sir John Timon, and the QUEEN, and Osborne House, and "grand banquets," and excitements in Paris, and the personal compliments of the Emperor and Empress, and challenge to all known yachts, and the great match with the Duke of Edinburgh, were names and rumors that came thronging in delightful tumult over the ocean cable. The details of the race are familiar, but it is worth while to put them upon record here.

The Henrietta, the Fleetwing, and the Vesta agreed to sail from New York to Cowes in the month of December for a sweepstakes of ninety thousand dollars. The Henrietta belongs to James Gordon Bennett, Jun. She is a schooner of two hundred and five tons, and is one hundred and eight feet long; of twenty-five feet beam, and ten feet depth of hold. The Fleetwing belongs to George A. Osgood. She is a schooner of two hundred and twelve tons. Her length is one hundred and six feet. She is twenty-four feet beam, and her depth of hold is ten feet. The Vesta belongs to Pierre Lorillard. She is a schooner of two hundred and one tons, one hundred and eight feet long, and, unlike the other two, is a centre-board vessel.

The preparations being made, the yachts sailed on the 11th of December at noon from the bay of New York. The day was bright and all the auguries fair; but there was a vague feeling that the adventure was the result of after-dinner banter or bravado, and this was deepened by the fact that the only owner who sailed in his yacht was Mr. Bennett. There was, therefore, some apprehension of the event of the winter cruise, which was not allayed by the reports of vessels which arrived a few days afterward, and reported meeting the yachts in rough weather. One of the vessels indeed stated that she had nearly run down a yacht in a snow-gale, during which the little craft was evidently well managed. Nothing further was heard until Saturday evening, December 29, when news came by the cable, the working of which had been interrupted, that on the evening of Christmas-day the Henrietta arrived at Cowes in thirteen days and twenty-two hours from New York, the Fleetwing following in about eight hours, and the Vesta in about nine and a half hours later.

There was but one incident which clouded this gratifying result, and that was the loss of four of the crew of the Fleetwing, washed overboard during a gale. This melancholy event cast a gloom over the whole story; and the Yacht Club will of course see that the families of the men do not suffer.

The Henrietta sailed upon one tack from port to port, and on one day made two hundred and eighty miles. The reports of the voyage by telegraph were of the rosiest hue. There had been all the comfort of a steamer upon the yacht; and the impatient vessel was apparently flapping her sails with eagerness for new yachts to conquer. Then came the letters and logs, and the whole story was familiar to the whole country.

The authorities have been very busy discussing the international significance of the race, and we have been refreshed with much maritime learning and grave speculation upon the moral and political influence of the victory. But Yankee yachts have crossed the Atlantic before, although not in December. The fame of the America is still tenderly cherished. Mr. Anthony Morse crossed in his yacht three years ago; and last summer Mr. Thomas G. Appleton's yacht Alice, of only twenty-seven tons, made the voyage under the superintendence of his nephew, Mr. Charles Longfellow, son of the poet. Moreover four hundred years ago Christopher Columbus sailed from Palos in a vessel of ninety feet keel, accompanied by two small, undecked vessels, and ever since the ocean has been constantly traversed by all kinds and sizes of craft. The passage of a yacht is, therefore, not a new thing; and that of three yachts will hardly revolutionize the nations. The result, however, does show that we can build very small vessels which shall be also very swift, and that Yankee seamanship is fully equal to their management. And taken with the history of our iron-clads and monitors at home, and the visit of the Miantonomoh to Europe, the arrival of the yachts may suggest to Britannia to inquire whether she does really continue to rule the waves, except in the pleasing lines of the favorite hymn.

Unquestionably such episodical events emphasize the impression which greater American events make upon the world. But they are not matters of national vanity for ourselves only. Whatever calls general popular attention to this country reveals to it, not chiefly Americans, but man under American conditions. The use of this country is to show what a system of fair-play for all men will do. It teaches that the time has come when the cumbrous old systems are not only unnecessary to achieve the best results of civilization but actually obstruct them. The lines of communication between this country and Europe are now fully established, and America will prove a tremendous battery. Toryism may seize with despair Mr. Parton's article upon the misgovernment of the city of New York as a final argument against a popular system. But Toryism will not see nor say that every great political experiment is to be tested by its general, not by its particular or local, result. Against the misgovernment of the city of New York we put the attitude and conduct of the loyal people of the United States through the war. So will the good sense of mankind: and some sagacious Englishman, looking at the white-winged Yankee yacht, will sail away in imagination to the happy day when human energy, under constantly fairer conditions, shall produce constantly more beneficent results.

LORD HALIFAX believed that "trimming" is the highest political wisdom, and Macaulay tells how pleasantly he maintained his proposition. Mr. Seward, pleading for the Union in his last chief speech in the Senate before the war, when he came to state what he would be willing to do to avoid the menacing catastrophe—knowing how

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

distasteful it would be to many of his oldest and warmest friends—said, with pathos: "If in the expression of these views I have not proposed what is desired or expected by many others, they will do me the justice to believe that I am as far from having suggested what, in many respects, would have been in harmony with cherished convictions of my own. I learned early from Jefferson that, in political affairs, we can not always do what seems to us absolutely best. Those with whom we must necessarily act, entertaining different views, have the power and the right of carrying them into practice. We must be content to lead when we can, and to follow when we can not lead; and if we can not, at any time, do for our country all the good that we would wish, we must be satisfied with doing for her all the good that we can."

"I dare say," says a late writer, speaking in a friendly tone of Mr. Emerson, and wishing to point a sneer sharply at politicians—"I dare say if he were in Congress he would be looking at the expediency side." Would the critic have him look at the inexpediency side? Is it the business of a legislator to do what is inexpedient? And may it not often be inexpedient to insist upon putting your individual convictions into law when you know perfectly well that they are not the convictions of the people? Do right, and leave consequences to God. Certainly, but "right" methods are always subjects of consideration. The "right" is the goal. The expedient is the road to it; and the longest way round may often be the shortest way home.

There are two duties which are often confused in our estimate of public men and measures: that of the independent citizen, and that of the public agent. A man may sincerely think that women ought to vote; but can he be fairly considered a time-server, a hypocrite, or a knave, because he swears to execute laws under a Constitution which does not recognize the voting of women? As a citizen he may and will reason with the community to persuade it to change the law; but as an officer he will decline to receive the votes of women. Or there is John Bright. He holds that five millions of Englishmen are unjustly deprived of the right of suffrage. He demands it for them. He agitates the land, and shakes a little perception and common-sense even into the London Times. Then Mr. Gladstone says, "Let us enfranchise four hundred thousand of them." Does John Bright retort, "You abominable swindler, the four million six hundred thousand are just as much entitled to vote as the four hundred thousand?" By no means. Mr. Bright says, "I will support your bill with all my heart, for it gives me so much clear gain." Why does he do it? Simply because it is an expedient to secure the purpose at which he aims.

The Right and the Expedient are often treated as if they were essentially opposed. But in politics it is becoming pretty plain that nothing is truly expedient which is not right. Prove that it is expedient to do a thing, and you have proved that it is right to do it. It may not be so easy to prove the expediency as at first appears, for the question may go deeper and further than the easy assertion seems to imply. But the statesman may be very sure that what is really expedient for the state is not wrong. If his own ambition, if his base views of human nature sophisticate him so that he believes injustice to be expedient, he must bear the responsibility. The result will show him his error. Right or Justice being the goal, whatever measure tends toward greater justice is always expedient. If, then, Mr. Seward's words are to be closely followed, to do all that we can for our country is to demand justice, and not to refuse as much as will be granted at any time. Because John Bright accepts the franchise for the four hundred thousand he does not relax his effort for all the rest. That gain is not the price of his silence and inaction. It is merely the pledge of his persistence and success.

Lord Halifax and the trimmers, however, falsify their own philosophy. Instead of urging the highest justice and revealing its advantage, they show that they are faithless, and so betray their cause. Instead of saying, with the eloquence of profound conviction, "This is what ought to be done. How much will you do?" their shivering insincerity invites both defeat and contempt, as they smile that poor human nature requires great allowance.

The duty of a citizen is plain: it is to sub-soil public opinion, to make it deep and porous, then to sow it with the soundest seed. The duty of a legislator is not less plain: it is to put the highest public opinion into the form of law; and the test of his excellence as a statesman is his capacity to know what is truly public as distinguished from private or individual opinion. To estimate this justly he must not mistake a whim or a passion for a tendency or a conviction, and he must confide in the good rather than the ill instincts of human nature.

THE charade in our January Number has been variously answered. One correspondent, J. M. K., says, "The Atlantic Telegraph." Another, in Missouri, sends the following ingenious reply:

In castle Lisle a lady dwells,
Her eyes are dim with tears,
She's promised soon to be the bride
Of one beloved for years.
What though the castle moat is deep,
The castle walls so high?
Her woman's wit has found the way
To 'scape the warder's eye.

The youngest cornet of the set,
Who sings a nasal psalm,
His breakfast makes ere morning breaks
Off slice of ruddy ham.
He scanneth dome and barbacan,
Gray wall and donjon keep,
And fears full soon the sunrise gun
Will call his troop from sleep.

Down the long vale the Witham glides
Through meadows far away,
Like snowy ribbon for a bride
Upon a morn in May,
His Mildred comes, she's drugged the bowl,
How bright her dark eyes gleam!
Now Heaven speed the bonny bark
Afloat upon the stream.

The three following come from various parts of the country:

When far and near the cavalier
Succumbed to Roundhead valor,
And Cromwell bold with troops enrolled
Spread broadcast fear and pallor,
Town after town fell swiftly down
And many a one did burn,
Till he at length did lay his strength
By Lisle herself in TURN.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

At early day a cornet gay
Whose head-top unto heel
Was covered o'er—behind, before—
With armor wove in steel,
With PIKE in hand did watchful stand
And eyed Lisle castle o'er,
When soon to view a maiden true
Came from the castle door.

Love oft has laughed at locksmith's craft—
The warder slumbered deep—
And Mildred dear could have no fear
To pass him in his sleep.
Oh swiftly speed the flying steed
As if on wings of wind!
The TURNPIKE'S won—swift press they on—
Lisle castle's far behind.

"Grim warder of our Castle Lisle,
Look well unto thy charge;
Thy head shall pay the forfeit, man,
Should she be set at large."
Thus fiercely spake Sir Launcelot,
And turned upon his heel,
But what was done, at rising sun,
The charade does reveal.

Dame Fortune long may favor those,
Who reckless plans pursue;
But there's a turn in men's affairs,
And gentle maidens' too.
Those castle walls were high and strong,
Its lord both brave and bold,
His men of might all armed with pike,
Most fearful to behold.

"Up, up!" he cries, "our prisoner flies,
Ho! vassals all awake;
A purse of gold each man shall hold
If ye the jade retake.
Away, away, brook no delay,
Fling wide the castle gate!"
The die was cast, the Turnpike passed,
Pursuit was all too late.

Oh! turn the wheel and turn the mill,
And turn the hoe-cake round;
And take your turn and play your turn,
And so my first is found.

Then throw a pike and catch a pike,
And "keep a pike" perchance,
And surely in that solitude
My next will on you glance.

My whole's the most prosaic thing
By which our ways are sped,
"As stupid as a turnpike road"
The worst that need be said.

LAST month, in speaking of Mr. Bancroft's Ninth Volume, we said that he had not spared some of the most cherished reputations of the Revolution, and had somewhat depreciated the one leader whom we have all been accustomed to regard as the peculiar friend of Washington, General Greene. Yet we said that there was no personal malevolence, however disagreeable to the descendants of the General the statements might be.

The volume has been attacked in many quarters. The historian is represented as squaring off against all comers, and cracking a crown wherever he sees it. It is alleged that no reputation is sacred to him, and that the ruthless iconoclast knocks together the heads of our most cherished idols and scatters them in dust. And the object of all this breakage and pulverization is declared to be a consuming desire to aggrandize Washington, and a conviction that his superiority will suffer if all his contemporaries and friends are not depreciated. We suspect the historian of nothing so extremely foolish, and we ought manfully to remember that we have all been educated in an extraordinary hero-worship. Our earliest impressions are that our Revolutionary Generals were demi-gods, and the people a church of patriotic saints. As school-boys we feel that Putnam could have given Hannibal odds, and that Starke could have captured Napoleon Bonaparte in bed at the Tuileries. Why, under such circumstances, three millions of enthusiasts, led by inspired heroes, were seven years in overcoming a hireling foreign force which was never as much as thirty thousand strong in any battle, we do not undertake to say, because we never reflect upon it. The Revolution has been our heroic traditional period. Achilles was more than mortal to the Greeks. So with us it has been a kind of sacrilege to scrutinize Revolutionary characters.

But our late war has broken the spell. We have seen that men even in great moments are of very mixed clay. Our own fresh and palpitating experience explains the phenomena which we have hardly cared to observe. The plain, historical fact is that, if the hireling foreign force was not thirty thousand strong, the domestic array was still less. If we were horror-struck when Patterson's Pennsylvania troops, because their time was up, demanded to go home from Charlestown, in Virginia, in July, 1861, just as the first battle of the war was to be fought at Bull Run, we now see that Washington was deserted again and again in the same way until he was almost ready to swear that such people deserved nothing better than British rule. So if we seem never to have understood what envy was until we watched the conduct of certain officers in the Potomac army at the very cruel crisis of the war, it is because we have not pondered the story of Gates, Charles Lee, and Conway. If the timid, hesitating fidelity of many of our late chiefs exasperates us, we may comfort ourselves that we have not degenerated when we contemplate Joseph Reed.

Now in his late volume Mr. Bancroft has unsparingly scattered the glamour of tradition. Greene, Putnam, Wayne, Sullivan, Schuyler, the choicest and best he describes as unskillful and sometimes incompetent; while Horatio Gates, Charles Lee, Conway, Reed, and all the malcontents, he lashes with refreshing rigor. Against his judgment of the first their friends, as we said, are protesting. We look for a fortunate and instructive revival of interest in our Revolutionary history from the discussion.

First in the field with a pamphlet of ability and excellent temper, not without some natural indignation which yet does not affect his rhetoric, is George Washington Greene, a grandson of the General, an accomplished, historical, and belles-lettres scholar, and author of an "Historical view of the American Revolution," which is full of very valuable information. Mr. Greene is in possession of his grandfather's papers, and his special study of them with the intention of writing a full biography, signally qualifies him for the labor of love which he has accomplished. In the judgment of Mr. Greene the questions at issue between himself, as the champion of his ancestor's fame, and Mr. Bancroft who assails it, are to be decided only by an appeal to the original documents. First, the letters of Washington in Sparks's collection; and second, those of Greene, some of which are published in Force's "American Archives," but the most of which

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

are still in manuscript. After these come the contemporary historians of the war, and among them Gordon, as the fullest and most trustworthy! Relying upon these authorities, and mainly upon General Greene's own letters, his grandson invokes judgment, proudly saying: "Every stroke of his pen, if I do not greatly err, is a triumphant, although an unconscious, vindication from the aspersions which Mr. Bancroft has cast upon his name."

Mr. Bancroft charges General Greene with despondency, upon the ground of his own letters to John Adams. The pamphlet quotes the letters in full to show by the context that when Greene says "desperate" he does not mean hopeless but very difficult, and the proof seems to be conclusive.

In answering the question whether Greene "reflected" upon Washington, the pamphlet seems to us unnecessarily to impugn Mr. Bancroft's intention; and there is needless sensitiveness in the remarks upon the Staten Island expedition.

Upon the point of the evacuation of Fort Washington the pamphlet establishes that Mr. Bancroft's headings in the table of contents are unjust to Greene, for Washington, although differing in opinion, had clearly left the movement, as was natural, very much to the discretion of Greene. The pamphlet also successfully rebuts the charge of "an easy, sanguine disposition" in Greene, if by that phrase he meant negligence or want of devotion. The letters of Greene and the undoubted confidence of Washington are conclusive upon this point, as upon the other charge of "reposing" in the sense of inaction. So the delay in arriving upon the field at Germantown is explained by the character and condition of the roads.

Indeed it seems to us that upon the essential points General Greene is conclusively defended against some of the judgments of Mr. Bancroft; although we do not think the spirit of the historian is fairly appreciated. He has plainly nothing but the truth in view. He can gain nothing by aspersing Greene, and certainly Washington needs no aspersion of his friends for the security of his own eminence and glory. Moreover, a descendant will naturally look upon every word and act in the most favorable light, while the historian passionlessly considers them in the light of the ordinary motives of human nature. How differently, yet with how honest a difference, men will read the words and judge the acts of others, we all know. Let us then read and write with exceeding charity.

A SERMON by the Rev. Washington Gladden, of North Adams, in Massachusetts, upon the use and abuse of amusements, is curiously suggestive, by its mild and earnest protest against a false view of the subject, that what is technically called "the Christian world," or a very large part of it, actually regards amusement as sinful. It is difficult to conceive fairly the state of mind which begets such a theory, and yet it is perhaps not more extraordinary than many of the views of human life and society held by those who with questionable modesty complacently assume to be distinctively "Christian."

In a retired and delightful village which we know, full of noble trees and green spaces and a most friendly people, the pleasant game of croquet is very popular, and on every bright summer day picturesque groups are gathered to play the game. It is hard to imagine any occupation more simple and innocent. The composition of sermons which condemn to a very hot future those who do not agree with our religious opinions is scarcely more harmless, and it is not surprising that sensible clergymen feel that they can play croquet for an hour without running the risk of committing the unpardonable sin. Therefore among the players in the shade, urging the innocent ball with the artless mallet, the contemplative spectator is glad to see more than one of the pastors of the village. Yet when a severer divine descended one day into the rural street from the remoter hills he was appalled to behold one of his brethren carnally clicking the wicket and triumphantly driving his antagonist's ball far from the goal. Painfully concerned for the cause of good morals and true religion he rushed hastily into a neighboring parsonage, and there recovering breath, he said solemnly to his excellent friend the pastor,

"Dear brother, I was shocked beyond expression as I came into town to see Brother James gambling."

"Gambling! Good Heavens! And in the public street? What was he doing?"

"He was playing croquet."

"Oh! croquet! Why, Brother Shadrach, half an hour ago you would have found me gambling with him."

What must religion be, and Christianity, its most humane form, to a man who thinks croquet a sin! The graceful, genial impulses of childhood, the cheerful diversions, the manly games, the fireside play, are all to such a man wickednesses and spiritual crimes. Does the severe divine among the remoter hills throw up his window on the summer mornings and denounce the robins and the thrushes? Does he walk gloomy and awful through the June meadows and condemn the bobolinks to the everlasting pit—a rustic John Knox anathematizing the pretty Court of Mary? Does he accuse the rose of wanton perfume, the carnation of carnal color, the lily of alluring charm? The pictures of the sunset sky, the evanescent arabesques of Jack Frost, the spotless sculpture of the snow, the passion of music, the poetry of the dance, the blithe hilarity of skating, the elegance of billiards, the glow of bowling—all these, because men are often foolish and wicked and abusive, and misuse food and drink and dress, are they only snares and abominations and delusions of the devil? Ah! good Shadrach of the hills, your brain is cobwebbed, your heart is chilly, your blood is stagnant. Morbid and perverted, your mind has gone astray. You are no Christian teacher for living men. Your parish should be the Catacombs, your congregation mummies. In your dry homilies runs no sap of the Teacher's sweetness. Your jaundiced eyes can not consider the lilies of the field. Whoever long regards men as devils will inevitably come to consider the world as ——.

Against this folly—which indeed seems incredible until its depth and extent and corrupting influence are revealed by the deferential tone and guarded statement of such a sermon as Mr. Gladden's—we are glad that a voice should be

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

raised so plain and sensible as this. It is ludicrous that a minister should have to say to grown men and women that they may dance a quadrille or play checkers without imperiling their souls. But it is true that it must be said, and the truth reveals the condition of what is technically called the Christian mind. Mr. Gladden's discourse is of much more than its apparent and immediate intention. It aims to show those to whom it was preached that amusement is not in itself sinful, and that the ecclesiastical prohibition of it fails to save young men and women from the downward path. But its broader and deeper lesson is, that the spirit which affects superior piety is but a modification of that which sent Stylites to the top of his pillar.

Is that the true spirit of Christianity? It is that from which springs the technical mortification of the flesh, the flagellations, the macerations, the hair shirt, the spiked collar, the starvations, the exposures, the celibacy, monasticism, inquisitions, burnings, and horrible spiritual despotisms and slavery, and unimaginable tortures and tragedies, which disfigure the religious history of the world. Is this the fair, natural fruit of Christianity, or its foul graft? Mother Shadrach in the hills, you gnash your teeth at the murders wrought by Pole and Gardiner and Bonner and bloody Mary, but your heart warms sympathetic with the later Puritan crusade against the Maypoles; but it was the same old mole working its way in human nature. In both these aspects it was the same mistaken view of God and man and their relation. It was the same pride and indwelling devil, the same want of respect for the individual conscience, the same mental perversion which confounds our own miserable obstinacy and dogmatism with the divine will.

The Easy Chair is betrayed into a sermon, good Master Shadrach. But it is reaching the "lastly." You have yourself preached from the text that God is a spirit, and must be worshiped in spirit. It is the spirit, then, which is the vital thing. It is not what we do, but how we do it, which avails. Some sermons of yours may have been much less truly religious works in the writing and the preaching than the croquet played by your neighboring pastor under the village trees. Yea, and the spiritual pride with which you denounced him at the parsonage—was there not a strain of the Pharisee in it going to the temple? And if not spiritual pride—if it were an honest prompting of sincere conviction and conscientious duty, ought you not to revise that theory of duty which could confound recreation with sin? Do you never take sugar in your tea, Brother Shadrach? Do you forbid sweet marjorum in the stuffing for your Thanksgiving turkey? Do you never guess a conundrum, or, in the days of your young fatherhood, did you never ride the lesser Shadrach to Banbury Cross? Yet these were recreations all and solace to the sense. Indeed, do you hold that the senses were given us only to be snubbed, as the elder schoolmasters held that boys were gifted as cherubs are not—for one great purpose? Let us at least respect sense enough to be sensible, O Shadrach the severe! and if the Easy Chair seem to you but a mere latitudinarian scoffer, he gladly remits you to the humane and sincere ministration of his friend and brother Gladden.

After much and various suffering N. P. Willis is dead. He was one of the oldest of our authors, older than his years would seem to justify, for he was famous and flattered while a mere boy. His active literary career continued from that time, although it must be frankly confessed that he never fulfilled the promise of his beginning. Or was it that the fault was with the public, which gladly hailed any literary promise at a time when our authors were few, and was more mindful of quantity than of quality?

That this was not wholly so in the case of Mr. Willis is shown by his "Pencilings by the Way," which is still a delightful vade mecum of the usual European tour. It is not its descriptions merely, nor indeed any particular excellences which make its charm, but a kind of freshness and bloom of youth without extravagance of expression. Indeed the extravagances of his style came later, when he thought that the taste of the public was palled, and must be stimulated by strong spices. His impulses were generous and kind, but his experience was not fortunate. With great facility of address and anxiety to please, he is said by those who knew him in youth to have been personally fascinating. But it was his misfortune that his boat was launched before it was well ballasted, and it could never gain an even keel. In the sudden and dazzling glare of his early success his ideal was lost before he had fairly beheld it, and he seems to have had no further glimpse of that superior and reproving muse which has been the guardian of so many natures not richer than his own.

So kindly was the feeling for him of his brother authors even when they were much younger, and so generous the habit of silence which they have cherished toward him; so persuasive also is the appeal of his whole life to those who knew him, that it will be very hard for any competent hand to write the truth about him. Indeed there is little necessity of saying more than farewell. His name had ceased to be very conspicuous. His influence is probably past. We shall all recall his pleasant, generous qualities; the school readers will still retain his Scripture verses; some who will long survive him will remember with tender regret the melody which they once found in his poetry; many a younger author will repeat with gratitude the words of sympathy with which Willis greeted him. Of no man shall we say more willingly or with more sadness, "De mortuis nil nisi bonum."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

CONGRESS reassembled, after the holiday recess, on the 3d of January. Our Record, which closes on the 31st of January, is devoted mainly to a resumé of the action of the Government upon the important measures now under consideration.

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SUFFRAGE BILL.

On the 7th the President returned, without his approval, the bill regulating Suffrage in the District. His objections to the bill were essentially these: Congress having the power of legislating for the District ought "to have a like respect for the will and interests of its inhabitants as is entertained by a State Legislature for the wishes and interests of the people for whom they legislate." The people of the District, at a special election held in December, 1865, by a vote almost unanimous (7369 to 35) voted against the extension to negroes of the right of Suffrage. In 1860 the population of the District was 60,000 whites and 14,000 people of color; now there are 100,000 whites and 30,000 colored; the augmentation of the colored population is owing mainly to the influx of escaped fugitives from Maryland and Virginia. Having heretofore been held in slavery "and denied all opportunities for mental culture, we should inquire whether, after so brief a probation, they are, as a class, capable of an intelligent exercise of the right of Suffrage, and qualified to discharge the duties of official position." The President is clearly of opinion that they are not. And, moreover, "clothed with the right of Suffrage, their numbers largely in excess of the demand for labor, would soon be increased by an efflux from the surrounding States; and hardly yet capable of forming correct judgments upon the important questions that often make the issues of a political contest, they could readily be made subservient to the purposes of designing persons; and it would be within their power in one year to come into the District in such numbers as to have the supreme control of the white race, and to govern them by their own officers, and by the exercise of all the municipal authority—among the rest, of the right of taxation over property in which they have no interest." The President says that this law, "imposed upon an unwilling people, placed by the Constitution under the exclusive legislation of Congress, would be viewed as an arbitrary exercise of power, and as an indication by the country of the purpose of Congress to compel the acceptance of negro suffrage by the States. It would engender a feeling of opposition and hatred between the two races which would prevent them from living together in a state of mutual friendliness." He proceeds to argue that the extension to them of the power of suffrage is not necessary to enable persons of color to protect themselves in their rights and interests; and urges that there is great danger in the extension of this right to any new class of the population. He refers to the checks which are interposed in the way of the naturalization of emigrants, who are required, in addition to a residence of five years, to prove good moral character. It can not, he says, be supposed that the negroes, "from their previous condition of servitude are, as a class, as well informed as to the nature of our government as the intelligent foreigner who makes our land the home of his choice."——The bill was passed notwithstanding the veto of the President (in the Senate, by 29 to 10—13 Senators not voting; and in the House by 113 to 38—41 members not voting). More than two-thirds of each House voting in its favor; the bill becomes a law.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Measures looking to the impeachment of the President by the House of Representatives before the Senate have been introduced.——On the 7th of January, Mr. Ashley, member of the House from Ohio, rose and said that he had to perform a painful but imperative duty, the execution of which should not be postponed; and confident that the loyal people demanded some such proposition as he was about to submit, he was determined that no effort on his part should be wanting to see that their expectations should not be disappointed. Upon his responsibility as a Representative he charged Andrew Johnson, "Vice-President and acting President of the United States, with the commission of acts which, in the estimation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors," for which he ought to be impeached. He thereupon presented the following:

"I do impeach Andrew Johnson, Vice-President and acting President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

"I charge him with a usurpation of power and violation of law:

"In that he has corruptly used the appointing power;

"In that he has corruptly used the pardoning power;

"In that he has corruptly used the veto power;

"In that he has corruptly disposed of public property of the United States;

"In that he has corruptly interfered in elections, and committed acts which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors. Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby authorized to inquire into the official conduct of Andrew Johnson, Vice-President of the United States, discharging the powers and duties of the office of President of the United States, and to report to this House whether, in their opinion, the said Andrew Johnson, while in said office, has been guilty of acts which are designed or calculated to overthrow or subvert or corrupt the Government of the United States or any Department or office thereof; and whether the said Andrew Johnson has been guilty of any act, or has conspired with others to do acts, which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes and misdemeanors, requiring the interposition of the Constitutional power of this House; and that said Committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to administer the customary oath to witnesses."

This resolution was agreed to by a vote of 107 to 38—45 members not voting.

On the same day Mr. Kelso, of Missouri, introduced into the House a resolution declaring that it was the duty of the present Congress to take such action as will accomplish the following objects:

"To impeach the officer now exercising the functions of the office of the President of the United States of America, and his removal from office, upon the conviction in due form, of the crimes and high misdemeanors of which he is manifestly and notoriously

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

guilty, and which render it unsafe any longer to permit him to exercise the powers he has unlawfully assumed; and to provide for the efficient administration of the Executive Department according to law."

This resolution gave rise to animated and protracted debates, continued from day to day. In the course of a speech delivered on the 14th Mr. Loan, of Missouri, made remarks which were considered as charging the President with complicity in the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. He said that the leaders of the rebellion comprehended the advantages of having such a man as Mr. Johnson in the Presidential chair, and knew that but one frail life stood between him and the Chief Magistracy, and, he continued,

"Hence the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. The crime was committed. The way was made clear for the succession; an assassin's hand, wielded and directed by rebel hand, and paid for by rebel gold, made Andrew Johnson President of the United States of America. The price that he was to pay for his promotion was treachery to the Republic and fidelity to the party of treason and rebellion."

Mr. Loan was called to order; but the chair decided that he was not out of order, because the resolution under debate charged the President with high crimes and misdemeanors, and Mr. Loan had the right, under his own responsibility, to make this specific charge. An appeal was taken from this decision, but the decision of the chair was affirmed by a vote of 101 to 8.

NEBRASKA AND COLORADO.

During the last session of Congress bills were passed for the admission of these Territories as States of the Union. The latter bill was vetoed by the President; and he took no action upon the former, which was presented to him at the close of the session, as heretofore noted in this Record. These bills were brought up practically as new measures, and after protracted and elaborate discussion bills were finally passed admitting both Territories as States (the Nebraska Bill, in the House, by 103 to 55—33 members not voting; in the Senate, by 28 to 14—10 Senators not voting: the Colorado Bill, by a vote very nearly equivalent in the Senate; the vote in the House being 90 Ayes to 60 Nays—41 members not voting). These bills are essentially the same in form. They recite, in substance, that Congress had passed Acts enabling the people of these Territories to form Constitutions and State Governments; and that upon compliance with certain specified conditions the States thus formed would be admitted into the Union; that these conditions had been complied with; and that therefore each of these States is "declared to be one of the United States of America, and is hereby admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever." But to each of these bills was appended the following additional section:

"And be it further enacted, That this Act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within [the States of Colorado and Nebraska] there shall be no denial of the elective franchise or of any other rights to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed; and upon further fundamental condition that the Legislature elected under such State Constitution, by a solemn public Act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said Act, upon the receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon the said fundamental condition shall be held as a part of the organic law of the State; and thereupon, without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete. Said State Legislature to be convened by the Governor-elect of said State within sixty days after the passage of this Act to act upon the condition submitted herein."

On the 28th the President returned the Colorado Bill without his approval. In addition to the reasons given for the veto of the previous bill, as noted in this Record for July, the principal one being the small population—only 28,000—the President urges that the concluding proviso of the bill contravenes and sets aside (as indeed it was intended to do) a provision of the Constitution as adopted by the people of Colorado. By that Constitution all the laws of the Territory in force at the time of its adoption are continued in force. Among these laws is one excluding negroes and mulattoes from the right of sitting as jurors; the bill provides that these people are citizens, and entitled to all the rights of citizens. This the President considers to be making a State for the purpose of admitting it into the Union—a power not conferred by the Constitution. Moreover, the House of Representatives of this Territory have protested against the admission without the question being submitted to the people. The protest was based mainly upon two grounds: "First, that we have a right to a voice in the selection of the character of our Government; and second, that we have not a sufficient population to support a State Government." The President also objects to that clause which directs the Governor-elect to convene the State Legislature for the purpose of acting upon the proviso; for as by its own terms the Constitution does not take effect until after the ratification of the proviso, there is and may never be any such person as the Governor of the State; and, moreover, it is not laid down who constitute that Legislature. The terms of all the members of the House, and of half of the Senators expired on the first Monday in January; so that it is doubtful whether there is now any valid Legislature, and no provision is made for the election of a new one. But even if the powers of the former Legislature continue, many of the members have ceased to be residents of the Territory, and in the sixty days within which the Legislature must be convened to take action upon this bill there would not be time to fill the vacancies by a new election, there being many counties with which from November to May there is no communication except by persons traveling on foot.

"The admission of a new State," says the President, in conclusion, "has generally been regarded as an epoch in our history; but after the most careful and anxious inquiry on the subject, I can not perceive that the proposed proceeding is in conformity with the policy which, from the origin of the Government, has uniformly prevailed on the admission of new States. I therefore return the bill without my signature."

On the 29th the President sent in his veto of the Nebraska Bill. The essential point is the same as in the Colorado veto; that the proviso attached to the bill being "neither more nor less than the assertion of the right of Congress to regulate the elective franchise of any State hereafter to be admitted, is in clear violation of the Federal Constitution.....Congress may, under the Constitution, admit new States or reject them; but the people of the State can alone

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google make or change their organic law, and prescribe the qualifications requisite for electors." The President, moreover, says that, out of 7776 votes cast in the Territory upon the question of forming a State Constitution, "the majority in favor of the Constitution did not exceed 100; and it is alleged that, in consequence of frauds, even this result can not be received as a fair representation of the wishes of the people, and as upon them must fall the burdens of a State organization it is but just that they should be permitted to determine for themselves a question which so materially affects their interests."

TENURE OF OFFICE BILL.

In the Senate the most protracted and exhaustive debates have occurred upon the bill regulating the tenure of office. The general purport of this bill is to limit the authority of the President in making official appointments. Its general provisions are, that any person (members of the Cabinet excepted) holding any office to which he has been appointed, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall continue in the office until his successor has been in like manner duly appointed, except in cases otherwise provided for in this bill. The principal exceptions are, that when any officer—members of the Cabinet and Judges of the United States Courts excepted—shall, during a recess of the Senate, be shown, by evidence satisfactory to the President, to have been guilty of misconduct, or in any other way rendered incapable of performing the duties of his office, in such case, and no other, the President may appoint a person to fulfill temporarily the duties of the office until the Senate shall have acted upon the case. But the President must, within twenty days after the opening of the session of the Senate, report his action and the reasons therefor to the Senate, and if this body concurs in the removal the President may absolutely remove the officer, and with the consent of the Senate appoint another person in his place; but if the Senate refuse to concur the suspended officer shall resume his functions, and the authority of his substitute shall cease. The President may fill all vacancies happening during a recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of the next session; and if no appointments are made by the consent of the Senate these temporary appointments shall cease, and the functions of the office shall be exercised by such other person as would by law discharge them in case of a vacancy. This act thus prevents the President from making any permanent removals from or appointments to office, members of his Cabinet only excepted, excepting by the advice and consent of the Senate.

The debates upon this bill took a wide range, covering a discussion of the entire course, policy, and conduct of the President, as well as the constitutional questions involved. Many severe charges were brought against the President by Senators who supported the bill. Senator Johnson, of Maryland, was the foremost opponent of the bill. While he admitted that the President had said many unwise things, yet he maintained that the framers of the Constitution had wisely vested the appointing power in the President, and the Senator did not think that the Government had been ill-administered in consequence. This power, he said, was proposed to be taken from the present President on the ground that he was unfit to exercise it; but the Senator believed that however grave had been the failings of the President, he had never erred consciously, had never usurped power knowingly, and had never entertained a thought inimical to his country. What he had done was just this: He had "first sought to reorganize the States that seceded precisely in the same manner and upon the same terms as his predecessor had done; he had secondly, consistent himself with the principles upon which he was elected by the people to office, desired to have brought into the Union the States that were once in rebellion as his predecessor did." The bill passed in the Senate, January 18, by a vote of 29 to 9—14 Senators not voting.

RECONSTRUCTION.

In the House, the most prominent topic of discussion has been the Bill presented by Mr. Stevens, the substance of which was given in our Record for July, this being a substitute for that presented by the Committee on Reconstruction. For this Mr. Ashley presented a long substitute in the form of an amendment, declaring in substance that the State Governments now existing in the lately seceding States are invalid, and all their acts null and void except so far as they shall be ratified by State Governments hereafter legally organized. That all male citizens, without regard to race or former condition of servitude, who have the requisite qualifications of residence, and take a prescribed oath, are invited to take part in the formation of new State Governments. Voters are required to swear that on the 4th of March, 1864, and since, they would willingly have accepted the terms of the President's proclamation of December 8, 1863; and since that time they have not given any voluntary aid to the rebellion, and that they will henceforth bear true allegiance to the Government of the United States, and to the State Government to be organized. Conventions to be called, the delegates to which must swear that they have not voluntarily borne arms against the United States, nor held office under or given voluntary allegiance to any government hostile thereto; that they will endeavor to maintain the perpetuity of the Union of these States, and will uphold within their own States "a Government completely republican, in which all men shall enjoy equal protection and equal rights." Delegates taking this oath are to organize the Convention and determine whether they are willing to adopt the terms proposed by the Congress of the United States, and recommend their adoption by the people of the State. These terms are in substance as follows, and are to be made by ordinance forever irrevocable without the consent of Congress:

1. All persons in the State are free and equal before the law, so that no man can hold another as a slave.
2. The State shall never assume or pay any debt contracted in aid of insurrection.
3. The State will establish free schools for all children between six and fourteen years of age, from which no child shall be excluded because of race or color.
4. No person who has held office under the recent revolutionary Governments, State or Confederate, shall hold any office until the Legislature by special Act, and by a two-third vote, shall have granted a full and unconditional pardon.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

5. Whenever the constituted authorities of the State, aided by a sufficient number of the people thereof, shall attempt to dissolve the relations of the State with the Government of the United States, or enter into alliance with a foreign power, or levy war against the United States, then the State shall be deprived of its representation in Congress, and Congress shall have the right to do any act not inconsistent with the rules of civilized warfare to bring back the State upon such conditions as it may prescribe.

The proposed amendment contains full and elaborate provisions for carrying into effect the formation of these State Governments. If the Convention votes affirmatively upon these propositions, it shall proceed to choose "five citizens distinguished for their loyalty and fidelity to the Union of these States, and the persons thus selected shall act as a Provisional Committee of Safety for the State until a Constitutional State Convention shall assemble and elect a Provisional Governor, as hereinafter provided." This Committee is to take charge of the election of delegates to a State Convention, which, after declaring its assent to the foregoing fundamental conditions, shall appoint a Provisional Governor and other State officers, and frame a State Constitution, which, "when formed, shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence;" they are to present this Constitution to the people of the State for their approval or rejection; if approved by a majority of the legal voters, the fact shall be certified by the Provisional Governor to the President and to Congress; and Congress shall determine whether or not the foregoing conditions have been complied with; "and if Congress shall approve of the Constitution and ordinance submitted to them, said State shall be declared entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities, and be subject to all the obligations and liabilities of a State in the American Union." If, however, in any of the States the Conventions decline to accept these terms, they are invited to present to the Congress of the United States, for approval, modification, or rejection, a plan of their own. But this plan must embody the following points: (1.) The Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land. (2.) The Constitution shall guarantee freedom and equality of all persons before the law. (3.) Voting shall be by ballot, and suffrage impartial without distinction of race or color. (4.) No debt incurred by the State in aid of the war, nor claim for loss of property during the war, nor for compensation for the loss or emancipation of any slave, shall be made upon the United States, or be assumed or paid by the State.—This proposed amendment also provides that the Convention of Texas may divide that State into two parts, the boundaries of which are laid down. Beyond these leading subjects the amendment embodies a multitude of directions for carrying these provisions into practical effect.

We have given at length the important features of this proposed amendment, but the debates have referred mainly to the proposition introduced by Mr. Stevens One of the most significant speeches was made on the 24th of January by Mr. Raymond of New York. He had at first concurred in the President's plan for the reconstruction of the Union, and still thought that if this had been early adopted it would have conduced to heal the troubles of the body politic. But it did not follow that because it was the best policy then, it was the best policy now, any more than that the wise prescription of a physician in the earlier stages of a disease should be continued when it had become serious. He thought the people had decided that "they would rather trust to Congress to adjust the subject and restore the States to the Union than to trust the Executive of the United States." They had, moreover, decided that "the Constitutional Amendment of the last session was the wisest and best basis of adjustment of which the question, in its present aspect, was susceptible." He thought that this Amendment should be pressed upon all the States, with a further Amendment that should any State hereafter attempt to secede, it should lose its representation in Congress. He opposed the bill of Mr. Stevens, and the Amendment of Mr. Ashley. Mr. Stevens thereupon gave notice that he found so much diversity of opinion upon the subject that he should probably, next day, move that his bill should be laid upon the table. The matter, however, rested until the 26th, when Mr. Ashley, at the suggestion of Mr. Stevens, withdrew his substitute. On the 28th the matter was for the present disposed of by referring the whole subject back to the Reconstruction Committee.

FINANCIAL MEASURES.

Various topics bearing directly upon the financial condition of the country have been subjects of protracted and elaborate discussion. The main points are whether there should be a regular diminution of the paper currency with a view to bring it as speedily as possible to a specie basis; and whether taxation should be continued with a view to the payment of the National Debt within the present generation, or whether it should be reduced to an amount adequate to produce a revenue sufficient to pay the current expenses of the Government and the interest upon the debt, leaving the principal to be disposed of hereafter.——A new tariff bill has been elaborated by the proper committee, and its provisions are one by one going through a minute examination in the House. The general principle of the bill is an increase in the rate of duties; but until it is perfected and proposed as a whole we do not think it necessary to note its progress through the various preliminary stages.

BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS PASSED.

Bill to enforce the Amendment prohibiting Slavery.—This recites that whereas in certain parts of the Union persons adjudged to be free citizens of the United States, convicted of offenses, have been sold for life, or for a shorter period, thus re-establishing chattel slavery, that it is now declared that the true intent of the Amendment is, that slavery and involuntary servitude in all forms is abolished, "except in direct execution of a sentence imposing a definite penalty according to law, which penalty can not, without a violation of the Constitution, impose any other servitude than that of imprisonment or other restraint of freedom under the immediate control of officers of the law and according to the usual course thereof, to the exclusion of unofficial control of the person so held in servitude." The Bill declares all such sales void, and prescribes a penalty of imprisonment for not more than ten years,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

or a fine of not more than $10,000, or both, upon any person who shall sell, or attempt to sell, or issue an order for such sale, or shall participate in any such sale.

Franchise in the Territories.—This bill provides that there shall "be no denial of the elective franchise in any of the Territories of the Union to any citizen thereof on account of race, color, or previous servitude;" and all laws inconsistent with this Act are declared null and void.

Meeting of Congress.—Provides that Congress shall meet on the 4th of March, the day on which the term begins for which it was chosen, on the first Monday in January next thereafter, and on the second Monday in November next preceding the end of the term for which it was chosen.

Payment for Enlisted Slaves.—Joint Resolution directing that the section of the Act of March 3, 1863, providing for the payment of $300 to the loyal owner of any slave who should enlist, should be suspended until otherwise provided by law.

The Coolie Trade.—Joint Resolution declaring "that it is the duty of this Government to give effect to the moral sentiment of the nation, through all its agencies, for the purpose of preventing the further introduction of Coolies into this hemisphere or the adjacent islands."

Amnesty and Pardon.—Bill repealing a section of the Act of July 17, 1862, empowering the President to grant amnesty and pardon to those engaged in rebellion.

MOTLEY AND SEWARD.

Mr. Motley, the historian, our Minister at Vienna, has offered his resignation. The immediate occasion was a dispatch from Mr. Seward, stating that he had been informed by an American citizen that most of our diplomatic representatives abroad were "bitterly opposed to the Administration, and expressed that hostility in so open a manner as to astonish Americans and leave a very bad impression on Europeans. He adds that you do not pretend to conceal 'your disgust,' as he says you style it, at the President's whole conduct. That you despise American Democracy, and loudly proclaim that an English gentleman is the model of human perfection. That the President has deserted his pledges and principles, in common with Mr. Seward, who, you say, is hopelessly degraded."

Mr. Motley replied that, while he had endeavored faithfully to discharge his duties in conformity with his instructions, he had no wish that there should be any doubts as to his political sentiments as a representative of the foreign politics of the Government. As to home questions, especially that of reconstruction, his views had never been asked by the United States Government, and he should have thought it unbecoming to volunteer a public expression of them, but would have thought it his duty to express them frankly whenever they were officially demanded. After the letter of Mr. Seward he thought it his duty to say a few words. He had always believed that strong guarantees should be taken against a recurrence of the rebellion and the establishment of slavery before the seceded States should be readmitted to representation in Congress; and latterly he was inclined to think the safest course would be an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting any distinction of race or color in regard to the elective franchise, accompanied by a general amnesty to be proclaimed by the President. He had not concealed these views in the privacy of his own household or to an occasional American visitor. The other charges he pronounces to be "pitiful fabrications." "Any one personally acquainted with me," he writes, "or who has taken the trouble to read my writings, whether political or historical, knows that a more fervent believer in American democracy than I am does not exist in the world.....That I have called Mr. Seward 'hopelessly degraded' is a vile calumny, and it wounds me deeply that you could listen for a moment to such a falsehood. In conclusion, I have only to add that I beg herewith respectfully to resign my post as United States Minister to Vienna."

EUROPE.

The main subject of interest in Europe since the date of our last Record has been the war in Candia, or Crete, and the complications resulting from its prosecution. Of late the struggle has been pushed by both parties with great vigor, has extended to the neighboring islands, and even threatens to involve all Eastern Europe in a war against the Ottoman Empire. The insurrection of the Cretans against the dominion of the Turks began in 1866. The Turks had exercised their authority with great cruelty, and after the war had begun exhibited bitter hatred against the Christians, slaughtering men, women, and children indiscriminately. A feeling of sympathy early aroused the people of Greece to action in behalf of the Cretans, and numerous volunteers and large supplies of military stores were conveyed through the Turkish blockade to the Island. The Grecian authorities, however, took no open action, though their sympathy for the Cretans was confessed. A tragic event which occurred in November, 1866, served, however, to awaken not only Greece but all the Christian nations of Europe to action. This event was the destruction of the monastery of Arcadi, and the massacre of the entire Christian garrison which held it. The Christians, who had shut themselves up in the monastery, had to resist from the 20th to the 22d November the attack of four Turkish battalions and several cannon. The Turks cannonaded the convent for a whole day, and succeeded in effecting a breach in the defenses. An assault then took place, and the troops having effected an entrance, a desperate round of fighting took place in the convent yard. Driven from this, the Christians took refuge in the cellars of the building, the women and children barricading themselves in the refectory. The cellars, however, were soon rendered untenable, and all defense of them made impossible, by the shells thrown in by the Turks; the insurgents, after a short council, resolved on blowing up the room which served as a powder magazine. This resolution was carried into effect by a priest named Manisi. A terrific explosion followed the ignition of the powder, and the greater part of the vast building was reduced to a mass of ruins. It is said that there were 200 men and 316 women and children in the convent. Of these about 50

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 women and children and some 20 men who had been sheltered by a wall which withstood the shock, were saved; all the others perished. The loss of the Turks is said to have amounted to about 3000 killed and wounded. This and subsequent events—among others a great victory gained by the Cretans about the middle of January, 1867, and the publication of an address of the Cretan authorities to the European Powers—created great feeling throughout all Europe, and the principal nations have proposed to interfere and put an end to the quarrel. The French, Russian, Austrian, and Prussian Governments resolved jointly to negotiate with the Porte. The announcement of this intention led to the offer of terms of peace by the Sultan to the Cretans. These terms were, however, scornfully rejected, and hostilities were hastily resumed, and the war had spread, as we have stated, to the neighboring islands.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The announcement of the resumption of hostilities by the Turks and Cretans naturally led to further complications of the Eastern question; and war appears at the date at which we write to be inevitable. Russia and Turkey are positively announced to be preparing for the conflict. The former had ordered that all military furloughs should end by March 31, 1867; and the latter power had called out 150,000 of its reserve forces. The Grecian army had been increased to thirty thousand men. The general impression prevailed at Constantinople that these complications and preparations must result in war; but whether the destruction and obliteration of the Turkish Empire or its maintenance as a balance of power in Europe will be the result yet remains in doubt. French and Austrian scruples with regard to aiding the Turks against a Christian power may be conveniently forgotten in the desire to prevent Russia from reaching the Mediterranean; and though first aroused to action by sympathy for the Cretan Christians, France and Austria may finally be seen in league with the Mohammedan to put down the Cretan insurgents and oppose the progress southward of the Russians. How far the United States may become involved in such a contest has been made a matter of much discussion. Already our fleet in the Mediterranean has played an active though amicable part in the Cretan struggle, and our vessels have become the refuge of the women and children of Candia. General Constantine Canaris has been deputed a special embassador to this country to ask for aid; and in other ways America has prominently figured in the Cretan insurrection. The relations between this country and Russia are well known to be of the most amicable character; and friendship for the one and sympathy for the other nation may, it is thought by some, lead the people and authorities of this country into an expression of opinion and feeling which will materially affect the issues in Europe.

The concessions of Victor Emanuel to Pius IX., by which the possession of Rome has been conceded to the Papacy during the lifetime of the present Pope, have proved very unpopular to the Italians, who desire to hasten the unification of the kingdom. The difficulties between the King and Pope were settled on the basis of propositions to the effect that Florence, not Rome, should be made the capital; that the Cardinals of Rome should be made Princes of the Kingdom of Italy, their salaries doubled and amply secured; that Rome should be declared a free city under the absolute control of the Pope; and that the Pope should acknowledge and crown Victor Emanuel as King of Italy. These conditions were finally agreed upon, and the Pope now holds Rome under the protection of Italy, his temporal power being confined within the walls of the city. His troubles do not appear to have made the Pope conservative in policy or charitable in disposition; as among his first acts on being assured of the temporal control of the city of Rome was to expel the Scotch Protestant worshipers beyond the walls. He also threatened the discontinuance of Protestant worship at the American Legation; but his action in this regard appears to have been confined to mere threats. The complications of the temporal affairs produced by the expulsion of the Austrian and French troops had induced the Pope to call a council of all the prominent prelates of the Church to meet at Rome in June, 1867.

The revolutionists of Germany still continue their agitations. The Croatian and Hungarian Diets voted for separate governments from that of Austria; and the Emperor had been forced to concede them constitutional governments of their own, with representation in the Austrian Diet. Prussia had also made concessions to Poland, restoring to the people their ancient rights of representation. But the principal efforts of Prussia had been toward consolidation. Prince Augustenburg of Schleswig-Holstein has been forced to concede his rights to Prussia; and the province, which is of great importance as possessing a maritime frontier, has been annexed to Prussia and is now absorbed in the kingdom.

The revolutionists in Spain have forced the Narvaez ministry to high-handed measures in order to maintain its supremacy. Marshal O'Donnell was invited to form a new government, but declined. The Queen, Isabella, then determined to sustain Narvaez at all hazards, and the revolutionists were put under strict surveillance. Finally, the Cortes was violently dissolved, the leaders arrested and banished, and military law prevailed at our latest dates throughout the kingdom.

Europe otherwise has remained comparatively quiet. The French Ministry was quietly dissolved in January, the question upon which it disagreed being the reorganization of the army. The Reform movement still agitated England; Lord Derby declined to adopt it as a cabinet measure. Bread riots had occurred in various parts of the kingdom, and the poor were suffering greatly from the unusually severe winter.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Editor's Drawer.

A CLERICAL friend writes:

As you receive contributions for your excellent Drawer from the clergy, and considering myself its debtor, I send you the following:

The poverty of ministers is proverbial, and probably, as the Queen of Sheba said of the wisdom of Solomon, "the half has not been told." But an old lady in Schuyler County has finally given the finishing touch to the picture, and it is now ready for the Academy of Fine Arts. It happened on this wise: The old lady was conversing with a young friend who had called to see her, and counseling her never to marry a minister, giving this as a good and sufficient reason: "Don't marry a minister," said she, "for if you do you'll never have any soap-grease. I have often lived near by them, and I never knew one to have any." The young lady was then "keeping company" with a Methodist minister—though her aged friend was ignorant of the fact—and in a few weeks married him, not having the fear of even such poverty before her eyes.

IN a certain town in Michigan lives B——, a very good sort of man, who once in a while unintentionally gets off something pretty good. He attended a political meeting during a recent campaign, where the gentleman appointed to the chair made a long, rambling speech, which very much disgusted B——. After the meeting was over he gave vent to his feelings in the following manner:

"What business had C——" (the chairman) "to get up and talk so long? In these meetings they always appoint the poorest material they have to the chair—the man that they don't want to hear speak. Why, in Wisconsin, where I came from, I was chairman more than fifty times."

A RURAL New Yorker writes to the Drawer:

During the war, and shortly after the surrender of Slidell and Mason, and when the matter was still much talked of in our rural village, Mr. B——, a member of the Masonic brotherhood, died here, and was buried by the fraternity according to the form in such case made and provided, much to the wonder of the juvenile portion of the community, one of whom, on being told by her mother that the reason the deceased was buried in that manner was that he was a mason, replied, "Mother, was Mr. B—— one of these Slidell Masons?"

A LITTLE fellow, some four or five years old, and who had never seen a negro, was greatly perplexed one day when one came by where he and his father were. The youngster eyed the stranger suspiciously till he had passed, and then asked his father:

"Pa, who painted that man all black so?"

"God did, my son," replied the father.

"Well," said the little one, still looking after the negro, "I shouldn't 'a thought he'd 'a held still."

A LAUGHABLE incident occurred at the dépôt in Savannah, Georgia. The train from Mobile brought up several barrels of shell oysters. A number of country negroes stood by, and never having seen oysters before, were somewhat surprised at the appearance of the bivalves. "Where he mouf?" exclaimed one of the most inquisitive. "How um eat? Golly! I think am nothing 'cept gum. Yah! yah!" he continued, laughing at his wit. "I spec sum white man tink nigger a fool when he call that ister." Just then he discovered an open oyster, and seizing it, he eyed it closely. Not satisfied with the examination he placed it to his nose, but no sooner was that organ inserted between the shells than they closed. Nigger howled with pain, and called out, "Pull um off! pull um off!" but the more the oyster was pulled the more he would not let go; and as poor Cuffee danced and yelled his frantic efforts to rid himself of his uncomfortable nasal ornament were both ludicrous and painful. "Hit um wid a stick," suggested a buxom wench, and in a moment the oyster was knocked right and left with a hearty will; but Cuffee's head went with it. "Pinch his tail," cried a little nig, "and he sure to let go!" But there was no tail to pinch, and poor Cuffee seemed doomed to wear the oyster forever. At this moment an "intelligent contraband" whipped out a knife and with it soon severed the oyster. Cuffee looked at the shells with amazement, and finding the oyster toothless, threw it away with the remark, "Um got no teeth, but he gum is powerful!"

A DELAWARE reader says:

Your "revenue-stamp" man reminds me of a good thing of Wilmington origin. Among a number of young fellows in Dr. J——'s office one evening was Nicholas M——, a bit of a wag when he takes a notion. The universal book-canvasser got in somehow, and finding no subscribers, Nick offered him ten cents to look at the pictures in his sample-book—some twenty odd in number. The offer was accepted in true Yankee style, and after half an hour's admiration of the first engraving, and many far-fetched critical remarks, the canvasser interrupted him with, "See here, stranger, I'll be gol darn'd if you ain't meaner than the nineteen dollar an' ninety-nine cent man! If you go on that way you'll git five dollars' worth out o' that book and keep me here all night!" And he would.

THE two following come from an intelligent friend of the Drawer beyond the seas:

A great savant, whom we may here call Brown, was at a meeting of the British Association held some twenty years ago in Oxford, England. He, with his son, a school-boy of thirteen, occupied by invitation a suit of rooms in Christ Church College. Hospitality was the order of the day and night, and the Browns, senior and junior, wended their way to dinner at the common hall of another college. They entered, and the great savant, according to custom, entered his name in the visitors'-book, affixing thereto a portion of his many scientific titles, and then passed on through the hall to the feast. Meanwhile Brown, Jun., was on thorns of impatience. He sniffed up savory odors, and in-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

stinct told him that something better than school "duff" and pea-soup was in prospect. He burned to write, and, taking the pen, wrote rapidly his own name under his father's, adding, in his haste, under the titles of his father, "Do., Do." Over his shoulders peeped an Oxford Don, Dr. Z——, of a punning college, and determined to take a "rise" out of his illustrious father. The interest of the meeting had turned mainly on the Dodo—the extinct Dinonnis of New Zealand. Learned Dons held lofty converse on the by-gone lengths of its toes, and old maids sipped their tea while musing on this struthious bird. Knowing this, Doctor Z——, across the table, drew Professor Brown into general conversation, cunningly sliding toward the Dinnonis, and asking: "Professor, don't you think that ornithologists in those days would have had great advantages over us?" "Yes, indeed," said Professor Brown; "and I think it a great pity that these gigantic birds should have been lost." To which Z——, now sure of his prey, replied, with a formal bow: "Well, I'm glad to see that the father of the Dodo, at least, is not extinct." B. looked mystified, and those who were in the secret made the glasses ring with hilarious peals, and Brown, Jun., was held to have gifted the college with a precious though involuntary pun, and till the meeting closed rejoiced in the sobriquet of the Dodo.

A SINGULAR old man shows the lions of the Cathedral of Chester, England—the Pearson's tomb, with its jeweled saints; the mosaic pictures, and the tapestry—to strangers. All these he goes through, and entraps the ladies to sit in the "misery" chairs, ingeniously contrived so as to upset any of the old monks who might fall asleep under a sermon of purgatorial length. As showman he must undertake to explain every thing; and, carrying this habit into his secular hours, undertakes to give a "because" for every "why?" A stranger made a heavy bet that he would give John a poser. They both spoke in an English provincial dialect, hard to be jotted down verbatim, and with a sort of burr, hybrid between the incipient growl of a dog and the pleased purring of a cat. "John," said the stranger, "how is it that your hair is gray and your brother's red?" John paused, and the stranger instantly clutched the stakes; but in a moment he picked himself up, and sung out in the nasal chant he had got into from long cathedral attendance: "Whoy, Zir, ũ zees Bull and ee wus a zleeping out and in the rain, and Bull's airr turrned kind of rusty, and mine turrned kind of mouldy!" John departed victor.

AN old lady, the wife of a Deacon in a town in New Hampshire, recently visited an Eastern city, with her husband, for the purpose of doing some shopping. After the business was done the Deacon went for the horse, leaving his wife at one of the hotels, but before he got round to the door the wagon was overturned and the Deacon seriously hurt. He was taken into a house near by, and his wife and the doctor sent for. The physician soon arrived, and found his patient nearly insensible. He suggested that a little brandy be administered for the purpose of reviving him; and it was here the old lady's temperance scruples showed themselves, for, turning with a grave face to the doctor, she said: "I am so sorry; but, if he must die, do, dear doctor, let him die sober!"

OUT at Columbus, in Ohio, lives a little, weazen, dried-up, shabby-looking politician, named Joe G——. He is the most insignificant-looking specimen of humanity one would meet in a month, but smart as a steel-trap, and any one who takes him for a fool will find himself sadly deceived. He is notorious for furnishing the finest specimens of cool impudence of any man in Ohio. The following anecdote, illustrative of this trait of his character, is told of him:

Some years ago, being in Philadelphia, he received an introduction to a prominent divine of that city. The reverend gentleman invited Joe to attend his church on a certain Sunday, which invitation was accepted. They entered the sacred edifice together. It was one of the first churches in the city, and its members were fashionable and aristocratic in the extreme. The minister put Joe into an elaborately-furnished pew well to the front. Joe nestled comfortably down into one corner of the same, and looked about as interesting and contented as a toad under a cabbage-leaf.

After a while the owner of the pew arrived, and at once gave signs of intense disgust and indignation at the presence of the interloper. He looked at Joe, looked at the pew, scowled magnificently, and finally, after fumbling through his pockets some time, drew forth a card and wrote on it with a pencil: "This is my seat, Sir!" and, with an air of the loftiest contempt, tossed it over to Joe.

The latter took it up; read it with lamb-like meekness peculiar to himself, and then, with the most delightful coolness, wrote in reply: "It's a devilish good seat! What rent do you pay?" and tossed the card back to its owner. The latter took it, looked at it with the most profound astonishment a minute or two, and then a broad grin overspread his countenance. He evidently enjoyed the sublime brass and coolness of his new acquaintance, and when service was over he approached Joe, apologized for his rudeness, invited him to his house, gave him the best he had, and treated him with the utmost respect and consideration during his sojourn in the city.

WE think our three-year-old Charlie as "cute" as any of the many little boys whose names are immortalized in the Drawer. Here are two of his sayings:

He came in the other day saying that he had fallen and hurt his lip. "Which one?" asked his sister, without looking up from her play. "The lip that my nose grows on!" responded Charlie.

One evening last October we had a glorious sunset. The whole western sky appeared as it were "a sea of fire." Little Charlie left his play and gazed with rapt astonishment. At length he turned to his mother, his earnest little face all aglow with wonder and delight, and exclaimed: "Oh, mother! just see where the Lord is coming out!"

DEAR DRAWER,—In the town of Kennebunk it was the custom, many years ago, for each family to take turns in killing their hogs, so that, by distribution, all could have fresh pork

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the season round. One individual, who had enjoyed his fresh roast pork, and pork and beans, having had many of the like favors showered thick upon him, thought it no more than right that he should return the compliment to his neighbors. Meeting a neighbor, Mr. Gill by name, he told him that he thought he should reciprocate; but the great trouble was, his pork was only a "little pig," and would not go half round the village. "Well," said Gill, "I'll tell you what to do: you jest kill the pesky critter and hang him outside your barn, so that the people will see it, and at twelve o'clock to-night you jest come out and take him in, and swear somebody stole him—do you see?" "Jess so!" says the other; and straightway slaughtered his pig, and hung him in view of all passers-by. At about midnight he went to take his defunct squeeler in, when behold it was missing! He went to bed, troubled in mind and body, but on rising the next morning went straightway to find Gill, and the following conversation took place:

Mr. J——. "Gill, my friend, by the powers, my pig, that I killed yesterday, was stolen last night!"

Mr. G. "You don't say so?—goodness me!"

Mr. J——. "Yes; I hung it out on the barn, and when I went to take it in I found it gone."

Mr. G. "That's the way! keep it up—keep it up! If I did not know you were lying I'd swear you told the truth!"

Mr. J——. "But I tell you, confound ye! I'm telling the truth. My pig was stole!"

Mr. G. "That's it! How wonderful! You beat the best actor I ever seen! It's a big joke, by Cain!"

Mr. J——. "But, d— it, it's no joke to me! The pig was stolen last night, and that's Gospel truth!"

Mr. G. "Well, if you tell all the village with such an earnest manner, every man, woman, and child will surely believe ye."

Mr. J——. "But I tell you— Well, no matter."

And Mr. J—— left his friend Gill with curses loud and deep. It transpired that Gill was the cruel one who stole the little pig away.

A good thing occurred at Leavenworth, Kansas: Judge P——, a most genial and companionable gentleman, and in full practice, though not fully posted in the Latin language, had a lively student, C——, who was pursuing the study of the law most diligently. On one occasion the student came across, in his reading, the Latin expression respondeat ouster, and not being able to comprehend it, asked Judge P—— what it meant. Judge P—— did not want to seem ignorant to his student, and after clearing his throat he said: "Well, it means—it means let the respondent be ousted."

The following is one of the most laughable instances we ever knew of the complete absorption of the mind in one thing to the exclusion of every thing else:

We had occasion lately to call on the celebrated geologist and chemist, Dr. J——. We found him engaged in the chemical analysis of a dirty-looking substance on a table before him, and were obliged to wait some time to get his attention. In the course of the business with us he had occasion to give the names of his family. He commenced to write them. Several were put down readily enough, and then he stopped, thought a moment, commenced again, and again stopped. Finally said he: "I'll give it up. I am very sure—I know I've got four children. There's John, and Mary, and William, but what's the other one's name for my life I can't tell. I'll ask my wife; I guess she will know." And, sure enough, he had to give it up and ask her.

From Buffalo we have the three following:

Who shall say that the parrot is not a wise bird? I heard the other day of one which, having been brought up in a well-ordered household, would always say the customary "grace before meat" whenever the family in which she was kept seated themselves at table; and not content with that, invariably repeated the service as often as a fresh course or any new dish was brought in. Sometimes Poll's memory seemed to fail her, causing a moment's hesitation. On such occasions, clapping her claw to her bill, she would cough two or three times in a deprecatory way, and then finish the grace.

I have a better story than this, for the literal truth of which I am ready to pledge my word, having received it direct from a "reliable gentleman." The Rev. Dr. Blank, of this city, has in his possession a very fine parrot, whose loquial, if not colloquial, powers are certainly extraordinary. Recently, at his morning family worship, the Doctor took occasion, as I suppose he is in the habit of doing, being a loyal citizen, to pray very earnestly for the country, and, among other things, to implore a special blessing on the President. At this point Poll sung out: "Oh, pshaw, Dr. Blank!" I hope she did not mean to question the Doctor's sincerity, or to express a doubt of the utility of prayer for that subject.

Now for another true story—not of a parrot:

Visiting, some time since, at a friend's house who had an exceedingly bright and interesting little daughter, some four or five years of age, I bantered the child about coming home with me and being my little girl.

"No," said she, "I can't."

"But I have no little girl, and I want one very much."

"Well, you must just have a little girl of your own, and not try to get other folks' little girls."

"But all the little girls that I know belong to somebody, just like you. What am I to do?"

"Why, you must go right to God. He's got lots, and I guess He'll give you one—if oo be dood."

This, I say, is not a story of a parrot, as I suspect many child stories are.

In the western part of the State of New York Mr. L——, a farmer who had been member of the Assembly from his county, was serving on the jury at the County Court. Late in the afternoon, one day, the judge and some of the attorneys engaged in the case then on were discussing the propriety of adjourning or going on with the case that evening. Mr. L——, who was one of the jurors drawn in the case, said he

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google hoped the court would adjourn, as he was out with a jury all the night before, and did not feel able to sit during the evening. The judge at last decided to go on, when Mr. L—— rose and said: "I move we now adjourn. According to parliamentary rules a motion to adjourn is always in order." The judge decided that as he did not run his court by Jefferson's Manual he would not put the motion.

Some years ago Henry H—— was employed in the custom-house on the frontier. When the change of officers occurred in 1861 H—— received notice, with others, that his services were no longer required. H—— was drafted in 1863. He took the notice which was served on him and went to the provost marshal, and said:

"It appears by this that I have been drafted."

"Yes."

"There is some mistake about it, I am sure," said H——, "for two years ago I received a note from the collector at —— saying 'that the Government had no farther use for my services,' and I do not think I ought to accept this."

Mr. Dawson, of Baltimore, expended a very large amount of money in building the navy of the Republic of Texas, and after the passage of the compromise measures of 1850, giving to Texas ten millions of dollars, he was a regular attendant at the sessions of our Legislature, endeavoring to get his claim allowed. He was a most genial gentleman, and laughed louder and longer at his own or any body else's jokes than any other man in Austin. We have, or had, living near here an old land locator and surveyor, named Bart Sims, whose loud and hearty laugh was a by-word. Some wags on one occasion got the two together, and made bets on the result of their laughing powers, all of which was kept secret from the parties. Of course there was plenty of wine (or something stronger) and good stories, and Dawson and old Bart roared. Finally, when the night-cap was drunk, the two were informed of the bet, and the crowd decided that Dawson had won, as he had laughed the loudest, the longest, and the heartiest. Old Bart was at first a little crest-fallen, but recovered his good-humor by remarking: "It is all right, gentlemen, but there is this difference between us: Dawson is laughing for a million, and I am only laughing for fun." That brought down the house.

A correspondent in Austin, Texas, writes:

I send you some scraps to make up for the many hearty laughs and certain unaccredited pilferings from your department of which I have been guilty these many years:

I was once traveling by stage from La Grange to Austin, having in charge two young ladies. Among the other passengers was a school-teacher from Bastrop, who had been North for his wife, and they were just returning to his Southern home. We had not eaten the miserable supper of the landlord at La Grange, and after we got fairly started the ladies began abusing the hotel at a round rate. One of my charges declared that she would die rather than eat such stuff as was prepared for supper. I remonstrated against such an extreme as that, and told her the story of one of Strain's party, in the survey of the Isthmus of Darien, who picked up and ate the head of a frog that one of his companions had rejected. The school-marm turned to her husband and remarked: "My dear, don't you recollect that we read it in Harper?" My charge still insisted that she would die rather than eat any part of a frog, and this led me to remark on the obstinacy of women, and to relate the "scissors" story. "My dear," again exclaimed my vis-a-vis, "don't you recollect the story? We read it in Harper." This nettled me, and turning upon her I said: "Yes, Madam, but Harper did not publish it as I sent it to him. I live on the Rio Grande, and our Mexican neighbors are noted for being very uncleanly, and the woman of the story had called her husband a "piojóso" or verminous fellow, and that had enraged him so much that he had resolved to drown her; and at the third dip, instead of working her fingers like a pair of scissors, she had worked her thumb-nails as if destroying vermin. That is the story as I sent it to Harper." During the day I stole several other good things from the Drawer, but was not again exposed. I had spiked that gun.

General Houston was as great a whittler as any Yankee, as every one knows who ever saw him in the Senate Chamber, where a quantity of soft pine and a waste-basket were always furnished him by the attendants. I was once present when a countryman from Guadalupe County called upon him while he was Governor of this State. Country wanted to know if he could bring his wife into the office to see the Governor. "Certainly, certainly!" exclaimed old Sam, with that pleasing grace of which he was master; "by all means invite the good lady in." The pair soon returned, and had a very pleasant chat with the old hero. Just as they started, old Sam presented her with a lot of silk-winders and other little mementos of his whittling. The old lady laughed very heartily, and said, "Well, Governor, Mrs. Henry M'Culloch told me that you would be certain to give me some silk-winders, and she told me to ask you to make her a butter-paddle!" At this the General and all of us roared. The next day I called upon him and found him "spreading himself" on the butter-paddle.

I was on a coroner's jury once in Starr County, in this State (Texas), and the evidence showed that the deceased came to his death from a blow inflicted by H. Clay Davis, which dislocated his neck, causing instant death. It was proven that the deceased had greatly outraged Davis's family, but that Davis had laid down a billiard-cue and struck him with his fist. I sat down to write out the verdict in accordance with the facts, but the jury insisted that the word "accidentally" should be inserted, and after an angry discussion on my part of its absurdity, the following verdict was rendered: "We, the jury, find that the deceased came to his death accidentally, by a blow inflicted by H. Clay Davis!"

Phil Claiborne is a lawyer of Bastrop, and sometimes, in the absence of the regular minister, fills the pulpit of his church. On one occasion of this sort he announced his text, and remarked: "Breethren, you will find that ar text

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

somewhere between the lids of this here old Bible; and let me tell you, fellow-sinners, it is a Book that you should all read, for you will find it a good egg!"

About twelve years ago the Rev. Mr. W—— had charge of the Baptist church in the town of Somerset, in the western part of the State of New York. He was very much addicted to smoking, and some of the members of his church had spoken to him about it, that it was wrong, and was setting a bad example, etc., etc. One Sunday morning, for some reason, the church was filled with smoke. When the minister rose to commence the service he very gravely remarked: "If it is wrong for a minister to smoke, is it not a great deal worse for a meeting-house to smoke?"

Chicken-stealing has almost become epidemic about Greenville, Mississippi, and the prosecutions for that offense are very numerous. The attorneys of the place, for the fun of the thing, enter with zest into these cases. In a recent case the plaintiff was an aged colored man, who had long been known about the town, and had pretty fairly proved the defendant "guilty." The counsel for defendant, who is not too nice to have the marks of sunshine about him, desirous to catch the old man on some point, asked the question: "Can you tell me what kind of legs this chicken you say was stolen from you had?" The old man, eying the counsel, replied: "Yes, Sah! dey was purty dark; about de color ob your hands!" and perceiving his answer had caused considerable sport, he added: "I 'spects dey were white once!"

In a New Hampshire town there lived an ignorant, irreligious, worthless family, Ransom by name, no member of which had been seen inside a church within the "memory of the oldest inhabitant." The village pastor, after years of failure, had at length "almost persuaded" two of the younger scions to promise attendance for one Sabbath; but the fear that they would be made the subjects of some personal remarks still deterred them. They were in great terror lest they should be publicly upbraided with their misdoings, and called to account for their wickedness. After much exertion their fears were quieted, and on the following Sunday the eyes of the good pastor's congregation were astonished at the unwonted presence of the aforesaid Ransoms. All went pleasantly enough until the reading of the second hymn, which was the familiar

"Blow ye the trumpet, blow!" etc.

Imagine the effect when, at the end of the line

"Return ye ransom'd sinners home,"

the older of our heroes seized his hat, and, with long strides toward the door, shouted: "Come along home, Bill! I knowed they'd be flinging at us if we came here!"

During the late war there was established a military hospital at J——, and the citizens of the place were very generous and active in sending delicacies to the soldiers under treatment there. In order to send those things most needed, and in the proper proportion, meetings were held from time to time, and it was there decided what each would do. Among the assembly at such a gathering was an old lady, rather deaf; and as one and another were asked to send this or that to the hospital during the coming week, a young man of the "committee" asked the old lady, in a voice suited to her circumstances, if she could not "give a little milk to the sick soldiers?" "Oh! la me, no! I hain't gi'n milk for over thirty years!" Certainly the old lady thought that more was expected of her than the "committee" had any idea of asking.

After the battle of Gettysburg I was, as steward, to remain with the wounded at Seminary Hospital, in that place. A colored servant of one of the officers wishing something one day from the kitchen, asked a Sister of Charity for it, addressing her as "Missus;" and received the usual reply of her Order: "Call me Sister." "Oh yes, I would; but I'm a black man!" was the reply. The solemn, sad face of the Sister relaxed into a smile as she gave him what he desired.

Dear Drawer,—The Christian Reporter, a publication issued at Concord, New Hampshire, contains in one of its last numbers the following editorial notice:

"An Omission.—By forgetfulness the usual collection to aid the Ministers' and Widows' Charitable Fund, immediately after the opening sermon of the General Association, was not taken up at the recent meeting of the body at Dover. Unless the deficiency in the funds occasioned by this omission shall be made up by other means, one widow less, at least, will be deprived of aid!"

The italics, which are ours, will mark the gem of this Hibernian style.

"Deacon H——" is welcome to the Drawer whenever he brings such a good contribution as this:

Near the town of C——, in Indiana, lives one Hi Arbuckle, who is noted for the prodigious feats that he relates of himself. One day a crowd of jovial fellows were sitting on the steps of the court-house, telling old tales. Hi was in his glory: he had just won $10, so he said. Of course all were anxious to know how he won it. Well, he said he was passing neighbor P——'s, when the neighbor told him he would give any man $10 that would lift that beam, which was of enormous weight. Hi said that he took hold and lifted it with ease. P—— then remarked that he would give any other man the like sum who would do the same thing. Hi called up his brother John, who won the same sum. The crowd passed no comments on the account, knowing that it was beyond all reason to believe it true. Finally Captain R——, late of the Confederate army, commenced a story by saying that he once had an excellent black man, whom he had never punished. One day he asked Pompey if he had ever been whipped. "Yes, mas'r, once—only once: my ole mas'r whip me once for carrying rail cuts into de shade to split 'em." "And you know," said the Captain, "green oak is very heavy."

Near C—— there lived one Simpson, who formerly held the office of justice of peace. John M——, an influential citizen, was brought

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

before S. on a charge of assault and battery brought by a shiftless fellow named Jack V——. As soon as they were in the room Simpson exclaimed: "Well, John, tell us how this thing happened." John replied that the fellow had insulted him, and then he (John) went into him. "Well," says Simpson, "I'll fine you a dollar, though you ought to have killed him." He then adjourned court.

At another time there were two men before him on a charge of assault and battery. After hearing the testimony he declared that "one was justifiable, and the other wasn't."

ALICK C—— doubted a long time whether he ought to marry a widow or a maid. He finally married a widow. One day he was conversing with one of his friends on the absurdity of ladies using cant phrases. "Why," said he, "even Mrs. C—— used a slang word the other day. She knows that I am very fond of buttermilk, and the other day she had some on the table, and after taking a glass I asked her: 'Mrs. C——, is this good buttermilk?' Says she: 'It is bully.' I remarked to her: 'Mrs. C——, perhaps it is more cowey than bully.'"

IT is exceedingly amusing for Northern housekeepers to notice the novel and very simple views of our friends at the South in regard to the employment of hired servants. Their ideas of wages, duties, privileges, and forfeitures being as fresh as the system of labor among them. A very rich illustration, which will make many a lady reader laugh when she thinks of the Biddy down stairs, who does more damage every day than poor Melissa could be charged with in a year, is told by an officer of the Freedman's Bureau, whose post is in the capital of one of the Southern States. He writes:

I send you inclosed a copy of a bill just brought into my office. The Rev. Mr. S——, of this place, one of the most violent of the rebel chivalry, hired a freedwoman named Melissa to do his housework, promising her eight dollars per month. At the expiration of the first month he refused to pay her more than five dollars and a half. Melissa complained to me, and the gentleman accounted for the settlement he had made by sending in this bill by the hands of his son, a very airy young gentleman, who expatiated volubly upon the magnanimous manner in which they treated their servants, instancing, as an example, that Melissa was not charged in the bill with a pot she had cracked:

Freedwoman Melissa in ac't with Rev. Mr. S——.

	Dr.
Melting spout out of boiler	25 cts.
Failing to keep cook vessles clean from time to time	25 cts.
General filthiness and uniform disobedience	50 cts.
Waist of suit (waste of suet)	25 cts.
Bringing raw meat to table several times	25 cts.
Persistently refusing to cook such character of victuals as directed	50 cts.
Destruction of cup towels	50 cts.
Total	$2 50

A WRITER from the "piney woods of Georgia," who tells as well as appreciates a good story, sends the four following:

Farmer H——, a thrifty, hard-working, close-fisted son of the soil, not long ago lost his wife by death. The funeral took place in the afternoon, and was over by four o'clock. After remaining in town a short time the clergyman who officiated started on his return home, by a road which led by the farm of H——. What was his surprise to find that worthy in his working dress, with coat off and hammer in hand, busily engaged in repairing his garden fence. To his statement of the impropriety exhibited in such apparently unfeeling conduct he received as excuse: "Wa'al, I didn't mean any such thing; but you see, it being a kind of a broken day, I just thought I would use it up in mending the gates."

WHEN the division of General —— was lying at Yorktown a great deal of trouble was occasioned by frequent cases of intoxication among the troops, and a strict order was issued to prevent liquor being brought them. As a result, the men would slip off to Fortress Monroe, and then return, fully supplied internally, and with a surplus for others. Early one morning Captain R——, the Provost Marshal, started for the fort on horseback, having some important business to transact. On the road he overtook a man in civilian's dress, whom he thought he recognized as having been repeatedly brought before him for excessive vinous hilarity. Instantly wheeling his horse he accosted the man, when the following conversation took place:

"Where are you going, my man?"

"Home."

"What do you mean by home? What are you doing away from your regiment?"

"I don't belong to any regiment, your Honor."

"Why, you infamous liar! haven't you been brought up before me half a dozen times for drunkenness?"

"Never, never, your Honor! I'm a poor man, and work hard for me living on me own land."

"Why, you infernal rascal, I know your face well! Do you mean to say you don't know who I am?"

"No, your Honor; I kape to me own home, and know nothing of any man round here."

"Do you mean to tell me that your name ain't Malone, and that you don't belong to the ——th Vermont?"

"Ah no, your Honor; I'm Pat Maloy, and I live at Bethel."

At his wit's end for proof, and a little in doubt if he was not in error, Captain R—— hesitated, when all at once a thought struck him. "Say whisky," said he. Not a sound was uttered by the man. "Say whisky," he again ordered. But the man's lips never moved. At the third repetition of the order the man drew himself straight up and brought his hand to a salute, bursting out with, "Ah, Captain, thure a Yankee is threwder than a fox." In his alphabet th had to stand for s.

IF not smart enough for a Yankee, Pat proved himself too much for a Teuton. The cook (a German) of Surgeon J—— had one day prepared some apple-sauce for the supper of the medical staff, made from the Brigade Commissary's dried apples. After thorough boiling he left the sauce in a pan in the kitchen-tent to cool, while he went to set the supper-table. On returning he found half his apple-sauce gone, and running out saw a soldier, a notorious joker and regi-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

mental scamp, making hurried tracks for the company quarters. An appeal to the Colonel by the cook sent a guard down to arrest the man and bring him to regimental head-quarters. He was found in his tent, apparently asleep, but with several circumstantial evidences of the theft about him, such as a tin plate moist with some sweet substance, a spoon with a little apple-sauce adhering to it, etc. The circumstantial proofs being so strong the Colonel decided upon his punishment, and was about ordering him to the guard-house, when the man asked leave to put a few questions to the cook himself, which he thought would clear him. On permission being given he began:

"Was the sauce made out of dried apples?"

An affirmative reply was given.

"Were they not put into cold water first?"

Again came an affirmative reply.

"Didn't they then swell up large?"

Still an affirmative.

"Well, then, you nimmahaun lager beer," he thundered out, "when they got cold again wouldn't they shrink?"

I don't think the Dutchman has got it into his head to this day why this should not be the fact; but he still holds a lurking suspicion of the man.

At the beginning of the war I acted as Regimental Postmaster, being authorized to frank "soldiers' letters." Among the letters received one day was one from some town in Lower Canada, directed to "Francis D——, Private, —— Co., —— Regiment, New York Volunteers, Alexandria, Virginia," the last word being written small. At the side was indorsed, "Not Alexandria in Egypt." The Bluenose postmaster had given it a journey of five months.

My room-mate at ——, Captain S——, who had been suffering for a week with severe toothache, woke me up one night, vowing that his tormentor was to come out there and then, but insisting that he would take chloroform. On looking for the bottle of that article I found it gone, and then remembered that I had left it at the lodging of an officer and friend a short distance off, who had been using it as an application in neuralgia. I at once dispatched my colored servant for it, who in a short time returned without it. On asking the reason I was told that the Major said he hadn't got such a thing. I then inquired what he had asked for, when I was told, "Doctor P—— wants his clothes-press." I again dispatched the "intelligent contraband," after repeating over to him the word several times, and again he returned without it. This time he informed me he had asked for a "clothes-horse." Making up my mind that it was useless to send the boy again, I decided to go myself. After giving a thundering rap at the door a window was thrown up overhead, and I was greeted with the following outburst: "Now you infernal nigger, if you don't keep away from this house I'll put a ball through you! I suppose you have come after a mangle this time. Now you tell Doctor P—— to go to the devil, or I'll come up there and mangle him!"

A small town in the Western part of the country contains more than its share of widows. At a Christmas festival eight of these "sorrowful sisters" just happened to be standing around the chair of a promising young widower, transporting him with their bewitching smiles.

A married lady present, who has a keen sense of the ridiculous, appreciated the situation at once, and determined to have some sport. With a cry of alarm she rushed across the room, and, pushing the widows right and left, shouted at the top of her voice: "For Heaven's sake, ladies, give the man air!" at the same time plying a large palm-leaf fan she happened to find with the utmost vigor.

The thing was done so naturally, and the revulsion of feeling was so great after they saw there was no immediate occasion for alarm, that the crowd cheered wildly, and continued to repeat their cheers as often as it was mentioned during the evening, much to the annoyance of the widows.

Lutie is a three-year-old, and astonished her mother the other morning in bed by—"Mamma, there's a marble in bed by my feet. Put your hand down and feel." Mamma's hand, guided by Lutie's, felt the protuberant bone of Lutie's ankle. Humoring the idea, she said: "Why, how did it get there?" when the little elf replied: "Guess I must have swallowed it!" Satisfactory, wasn't it?

Dear Drawer,—One of your correspondents having furnished an item about an exceedingly mean man, and having asked the question, "Who ever knew a meaner one?" calls to mind an incident that illustrates the meanness of a man in this Western section:

Mr. D——, who is a man of considerable wealth, had an acre of buckwheat which, while in blossom, was often visited by the bees of a neighbor. Thinking that he was imposed on by this state of affairs, he called and presented a claim for damages to his neighbor, who could not get rid of the troublesome Mr. D—— without first agreeing to pay him two cents per month pasturage for each hive of bees!

That came from Indiana; here's another from a town in Massachusetts:

A young lady, member of a family which, although not wealthy, was comfortably off in this world's goods, was to be married. Handsomely-engraved cards were sent out to the relatives and friends, but about two weeks before the wedding it was found that there were not cards enough to "go round." Instead of having more struck off, the mother of the young lady called on some of her neighbors and asked them to return the cards that had been sent them, as she wished to send them to others! Cap that.

This comes from Ohio: Passing through the public park the other day I observed two gentlemen approaching each other—one with a limping gait, as if he had just returned from the war with a wound in one of his pedal extremities. Said the other to the lame man:

"Why, Ned, what's the matter?—sprained your ankle?—cut your foot?"

"No, not quite so bad as that—got the cornucopia."

"Cornu what?"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Cornucopia."

"And, pray, what kind of a disease is that?"

"Why, man, you a Latin scholar and don't know what cornucopia means! I was down to my doctor just now, and he told me it was Latin for tender corns!"

A BOSTONIAN writes: Little folks sometimes say things that are too good to lose. Here is one:

A little girl came into our office a few days since and inquired for a man who, she said, was employed here. We told her that no man of that name was here. She insisted there was, and told where he lived, etc. We suggested that perhaps she had mistaken the name, to which she replied: "I am quite sure that is right; at any rate, that was his name before he was married!" Imagine the smile that crept over the faces of those who heard it.

A CERTAIN Government claim agent in Boston is noted for his quick dispatch of business. The other day a friend of mine called and requested me to go and certify to his identity, as he was about putting in his claim for bounty. The papers being filled out and signed, we were, as usual in such cases, required to make oath to the truth of our statements. Just before holding up our hands my friend inquired how long it would be before his claim would be cashed. The answer and the oath came in a breath, as follows: "You severally solemnly swear that the statements subscribed by you are true, so help you God, you will receive your bounty in a short time, Mr. Young!"

AT the close of college term in a New England school, a number of students determined to wind up with a soirée, as 'twas called.

The party assembled, each with one or more of the fair ones of the place, borrowed or imported for the occasion. One of the students taking a little too much of the "overflowing bowl," in attempting to get out happened to get into the ladies' dressing-room, where he was discovered by a class-mate, who took compassion upon him and snugly stowed him away in a secluded corner to sleep off his "over-indulgence." After remaining there some three hours or more, a couple of the young ladies came from the hall to dress up a little for the last dance, when the following conversation ensued:

"Julia, did you hear any one say any thing about me?"

"Yes, Mary. John B—— said you were the prettiest girl in the hall. Did you hear any one say any thing about me?" said Julia.

"Yes," said Mary; "Mr. S—— said—"

At this point John, who had begun to revive a little, raised up his head, much to the astonishment of the girls, and drawled out:

"Did you hear any one say any thing about me?"

DEAR DRAWER,—Professor H——, the noted phrenologist, lectured in Akron, Ohio, one night last month. After his lecture he examined the "bumps" of an individual named F——, whom the audience selected, and proceeded to give him a "bad name," calling him mule, infidel, etc., and raising a laugh at Mr. F——'s expense. Next evening, toward ten o'clock, the Professor growing tedious and the audience sleepy, Mr. F—— gravely arose from his seat, paced on tip-toe, deacon-fashion, to the Professor, who ceased speaking, and leaned forward to hear what he had to say. He said nothing, but quietly pulling out an old bull-eye watch showed the astonished Professor the time o' night. The laugh was turned; in vain the Professor said "a story;" he could not go on; he lost his temper, and finally concluded in as few words as possible.

THIS comes from Western New York:

DEAR DRAWER,—The anecdote in the December Number about the old lady who responded in meeting, puts me in remembrance of an old lady who lives in these parts. She enjoys attending camp-meetings very much, and sometimes becomes rather noisy. One time she was more than usually so, and it was determined to remove her in such a manner as to prevent her returning. She lived at a distance of nine or ten miles from the ground, and a man was procured who, for the consideration of twenty-five cents (specie), promised to convey her to her home. She submitted quietly, and when they had arrived at the end of their trip she gave the man another quarter to take her back! Imagine the surprise of the brethren to see the man drive on to the ground with the old lady by his side!

AN "Old Subscriber" is welcome to the Drawer with his story:

Some five-and-twenty years ago, when this part of the Empire State was but sparsely settled, it was a work of no small difficulty to get a jury together, especially as the inhabitants were notoriously disinclined to the pleasures of litigation. The court had been forced to adjourn many times, from day to day, because the Sheriff as often came in and reported an incomplete panel. Finally, things came to a crisis. The Judge fixed a day beyond which no further forbearance could be exercised. When that day arrived the enthusiastic Sheriff rushed into the court-room, and exclaimed: "It's all right, your Honor! we'll have the jury by 12 o'clock. I've got eleven of them locked up in a barn, and we are running the twelfth with dogs!"

A NAVAL OFFICER in California writes:

DEAR DRAWER,—It is a long time since you heard from me, but I can not keep out of the Drawer, and I think the following genuine child's story is worthy of a place in it: I have a cousin out here, a bright little girl of five, who said, one dark night a few weeks ago, "Mamma, I don't think God is at home to-night, he hasn't hung the moon out!"

HERE is one from Buckskin, Colorado:

Squire H——, of F——, an inveterate joker, had business there a few days ago, and stopped at the Pacific Hotel. S——, the county surveyor, and civil engineer to all who need his services, boards at said hotel. On the second day of the Squire's stay said he to S——, "Have you said any thing to them here about my being your guest?" "Yes," said S——. "They asked me if you had any money, and I said I guessed [guest] you had!"

"MA WHALLEY" is a character in our village.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

She is now an old woman, and lives in a small cottage off the main street. A few days ago she was going to the store with a basket, to make some purchases, when she met a lad driving a fine load of hay to market. She stopped him, inquired the quality and price of the article, and, after much deliberation, ordered the boy to drive his horses into her yard. The place was rather strait for the wagon to enter, but he finally managed to drive in, and prepared to unload. Looking up to the lad—who, pitchfork in hand, was about to toss off the hay—she said, with great simplicity: "You may give me about enough for a hen's-nest; I've been wanting it for some time!"

CHATTING with one of her neighbors not long since, she related her experience when converted, many years ago, as follows:

"I used to be very gay, and fond of the world and all its fashions, till the Lord showed me my folly. I liked silks and ribbons and laces and feathers, but I found they were dragging me down to hell—so I gave them all to my sister!"

ABOUT twenty years ago, when Franklin Pierce and the present Senator Clark stood at the head of the Hillsborough bar, in New Hampshire, there was upon the docket a celebrated suit called the "Horse Case," which, from its long continuance before the courts, became familiar, by name at least, to nearly every one in the county. The action was one brought by Smith and Jones, livery-stable keepers, of Manchester, against one White, to recover the value of a pair of horses alleged to have been killed by the defendant while conveying an insane man from Manchester to the asylum at Concord. There was plenty of proof that the horses died soon after their arrival there; but the defendant took the ground that they died of disease, and not from being overheated, and that a sufficient time had been allowed them to travel that distance with ease. Then it became necessary to show the jury the time of starting and the time of arrival at Concord. Plaintiffs brought to the witness-stand many citizens from Manchester and Concord; and, among the latter, a tall, bony, slab-sided, lanky, sleepy-looking fellow, who officiated as hostler at the stable. I think it was Mr. Clark who conducted the cross-examination of this witness, and I give you the substance of the concluding portion:

"What time, Sir, did I understand you to say it was when the horses were driven up to the stable?"

"Just as I was goin' to dinner."

"What time was it when you went to dinner that day—by the clock?"

"Just twelve."

"To a minute, Sir?"

"Yes, Sir."

"What time was it when you went to dinner the day before—by the clock?"

"Just twelve."

"To a minute, Sir?"

"Yes, Sir."

"What time did you go to dinner the day before that—by the clock?"

"At twelve."

"To a minute, Sir."

"Yes, Sir."

"And what time did you go to dinner a week previous—by the clock?"

"At twelve."

"To a minute, Sir?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Now, Sir, will you be good enough to tell the jury what time you went to dinner three months before the last date—by the clock?"

"At twelve."

"To a minute, Sir?"

"Yes, Sir."

"That is all, Sir," said the counsel, with a gleam of satisfaction on his face and a glance at the jury, as much as to say, "That man has settled his testimony, gentlemen." And so we all thought till, just as he was leaving the stand, he turned to his questioner with a curious comical expression on his face, and drawled out, "That 'ere clock was out o' kilter, and hadn't been goin' for six months." There was a general roar in the gallery where I sat. Mr. Clark sat down, and I noticed that the judge had to use his handkerchief just then.

ELIZA H—— ran away from her home with a sad scape-grace, and married him against the wishes of her parents. As is usual in such cases, she found that the roses of her imagination were rather thorny when she came to pluck them; and ere long a letter came to the father from his repentant child. The letter was of some length, and closed with these touching sentiments:

"Dear Father, I can't be happy while you are displeased with me. Do, please, send my blue circular and your forgiveness. Your dutiful daughter,

"ELIZA."

The paternal breast was moved.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:

One of the brethren in our church, though a very good, is rather an illiterate man, and sometimes amuses those who are present at the meetings, where he exhorts occasionally. Shortly after the death of President Lincoln he was moved to make a few remarks upon that melancholy event, which he prefaced with the following rather unfortunate sentence: "My friends, I see in this bloody act the wise design of an unscrupulous Providence." He was not conscious of doing injustice to Providence by substituting unscrupulous for inscrutable, and no one hurt his feelings by a correction.

IN the year 1824, writes a Pennsylvanian, I took boarding in F——'s Hollow, near Germantown. The lady of the house was no admirer of fancy cooking. She would put a big kettle on filled with potatoes, turnips, cabbage, and beef, all cooked together, and brought on the table meal after meal until all was used up. A basin of milk placed on the centre of the table, with a saucer floating therein, for one and all to use in turn. I concluded to look for another boarding-house, and found one. At the first breakfast the first cup of coffee was good. The flow ceased at pouring the second cup. The lady applied her mouth to the spout, blowing the impediment away, and tried again. A little coffee came, but not enough to fill the cup; a spoon was introduced, and nothing but a baby's shoe prevented the flow. I thought it was about time to look out for another boarding-house.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

No. CCIII.—APRIL, 1867.—Vol. XXXIV.

THE DODGE CLUB; OR, ITALY IN MDCCCLIX.

YANKEE DOODLE.

VII.

DOLORES.—AN ITALIAN MAID LEARNS ENGLISH.—A ROMANTIC ADVENTURE.—A MASQUERADE, AND WHAT BEFELL THE SENATOR.—A CHARMING DOMINO.—A MOONLIGHT WALK, AND AN ASTOUNDING DISCOVERY.

THE lodgings of Buttons and Dick were in a remarkably central part of Naples. The landlord was a true Neapolitan; a handsome, gay, witty, noisy, lively, rascally, covetous, ungrateful, deceitful, cunning, good-hearted old scoundrel, who took advantage of his guests in a thousand ways, and never spoke to them without trying to humbug them. He was the father of a pretty daughter who had all her parent's nature somewhat toned down, and expanded in a feminine mould.

Buttons had a chivalrous soul, and so had Dick; the vivacity of this very friendly young lady was like an oasis in the wilderness of travel. In the evening they loved to sit in the sunshine of her smile. She was singularly unconventional, this landlord's daughter, and made many informal calls on her two lodgers in their apartment.

An innocent, sprightly little maid—name Dolores—age seventeen—complexion olive—hair jet black—eyes like stars, large, luminous, and at the same time twinkling—was anxious to learn English, especially to sing English songs; and so used to bring her guitar and sing for the Americans. Would they teach her their national song? "Oh yes! happy beyond expression to do so." The result, after ten lessons, was something like this:

"Anty Dooda tumma towna
By his sef a po-ne
Stacca fadda inna sat
Kalla Maccaroni."

She used to sing this in the most charming manner, especially the last word in the last line. Not the least charm in her manner was her evident conviction that she had mastered the English language.

"Was it not an astonishing thing for so young a Signorina to know English?"

"Oh, it was indeed!" said Buttons, who knew Italian very well, and had the lion's share of the conversation always.

"And they said her accent was fine?"

"Oh, most beautiful!"

"Bellissima! Bellissima!" repeated little Dolores, and she would laugh until her eyes overflowed with delighted vanity.

"Could any Signorina Americana learn Italian in so short a time?"

"No, not one. They had not the spirit. They could never equal her most beautiful accent."

"Ah! you say all the time that my accent is most beautiful."

One day she picked up a likeness of a young lady which was lying on the table.

"Who is this?" she asked, abruptly, of Buttons.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by Harper and Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"A Signorina."

"Oh yes! I know; but is she a relative?"

"No."

"Are you married?"

"No."

"Is this your affianced?"

"Yes."

"Ah, how strange! What will you be?—a soldier or an advocate?"

"Neither. I will be a priest."

"A priest! Signor, what is it that you tell me? How can this be your affianced lady?"

"Oh! in our country the priests all marry, and live in beautiful little cottages, with a garden in front."

This Dolores treated with the most contemptuous incredulity. Who ever heard of such a thing? Impossible! Moreover, it was so absurd. Buttons told her that he was affianced five years ago.

"An eternity!" exclaimed Dolores. "How can you wait? But you must have been very young."

"Young? Yes, only sixteen."

"Blessed and most venerable Virgin! Only sixteen! And is she the most beautiful girl you know?"

"No."

"Where have you seen one more so?"

"In Naples."

"Who is she?"

"An Italian."

"What is her name?"

"Dolores."

"That's me."

"I mean you."

This was pretty direct; but Dolores was frank, and required frankness from others. Some young ladies would have considered this too coarse and open to be acceptable. But Dolores had so high an opinion of herself that she took it for sincere homage. So she half closed her eyes, leaned back in her chair, looked languishingly at Buttons, and then burst into a merry peal of musical laughter.

"I think I am the most beautiful girl you ever saw."

It was Buttons's turn to laugh. He told Dolores that she was quite right, and repeated her favorite word, "Bellissima!"

One evening when Dick was alone in the room a knock came to the door.

"Was he disengaged?"

"Oh, quite."

"The Signora in the room next—"

"Yes."

"Would be happy to see him."

"Now?"

"Yes, as soon as he liked."

The Signora did not have to wait long. In less time than it takes to tell this Dick stood with his best bow before her. How he congratulated himself on having studied Italian! The lady reclined on a sofa. She was about thirty, and undeniably pretty. A guitar lay at her feet. Books were scattered around—French novels, and manuals of devotion. Intelligence beamed from her large, expressive eyes. How delightful! Here was an adventure, perhaps a fair conquest.

"Good-evening, Signor!"

"I kiss the hands to your ladyship," said Dick, mustering a sentence from Ollendorff.

"Pardon me for this liberty."

"I assure you it gives me the greatest happiness, and I am wholly at your service."

"I have understood that you are an American."

"I am, Signora."

"And this is your first visit to Naples?"

"My first, Signora."

"How does Naples please you?"

"Exceedingly. The beautiful city, the crowded streets, the delightful views—above all, the most charming ladies."

A bow—a slight flush passed over the lady's face, and Dick whispered to himself,

"Well put, Dick, my boy—deuced well put for a beginner."

"To come to the point," said the lady, with a sigh.—("Ah, here we have it!" thought Dick —the point—blessed moment!)—"I would not have ventured to trouble you for any slight cause, Signor, but this nearly concerns myself."—(Keep down—our heart, murmured Dick—cool, you

I KISS HANDS.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google dog—cool!)—"My happiness and my tenderest feelings—" (Dick's suffused eyes expressed deep sympathy.)—"I thought of you—"

"Ah, Signora!"

"And not being acquainted with you—" (What a shame!—aside)—"I concluded to waive all formality"—(Social forms are generally a nuisance to ardent souls—aside)—"and to communicate at once with you."

"Signora, let me assure you that this is the happiest moment in my life."

The Signora looked surprised, but went on in a sort of preoccupied way: "I want to know if you can tell me any thing about my brother."

"Brother!"

"Who is now in America."

Dick opened his eyes.

"I thought that perhaps you could tell me how he is. I have not heard from him for two years, and feel very anxious."

Dick sat for a moment surprised at this unexpected turn. The lady's anxiety about her brother he could see was not feigned. So he concealed his disappointment, and in his most engaging manner informed her that he had not seen her brother; but if she could tell him his name, and the place where he was living, he might be able to tell something about him.

"His name," sighed the lady, "is Giulio Fanti."

"And the place?"

"Rio Janeiro."

"Rio Janeiro?"

"Yes," said the lady, slowly.

Dick was in despair. Not to know any thing of her brother would make her think him stupid. So he attempted to explain:

"America," he began, "is a very large country—larger, in fact, than the whole Kingdom of Naples. It is principally inhabited by savages, who are very hostile to the whites. The whites have a few cities, however. In the North the whites all speak English. In the South they all speak Spanish. The South Americans are good Catholics, and respect the Holy Father; but the English in the North are all heretics. Consequently there is scarcely any communication between the two districts."

The lady had heard somewhere that in the American wars they employed the savages to assist them. Dick acknowledged the truth of this with candor, but with pain. She would see by this why he was unable to tell her any thing about her brother. His not knowing that brother was now the chief sorrow of his life. The lady earnestly hoped that Rio Janeiro was well protected from the savages.

"Oh, perfectly so. The fortifications of that city are impregnable."

Dick thus endeavored to give the lady an idea of America. The conversation gradually tapered down until the entrance of a gentleman brought it to a close. Dick bowed himself out.

"At any rate," he murmured, "if the lady wanted to inspect me she had a chance, and if she wanted to pump me she ought to be satisfied."

One evening Buttons and Dick came in and found a stranger chatting familiarly with the landlord and a young hussar. The stranger was dressed like a cavalry officer, and was the most astounding fop that the two Americans had ever seen. He paced up and down, head erect, chest thrown out, sabre clanking, spurs jingling, eyes sparkling, ineffable smile. He strode up to the two youths, spun round on one heel, bowed to the ground, waved his hand patronizingly, and welcomed them in.

THE YOUNG HUSSAR.

"A charming night, gallant gentlemen. A bewitching night. All Naples is alive. All the world is going. Are you?"

The young men stared, and coldly asked where?

"Ha, ha, ha!" A merry peal of laughter rang out. "Absolutely—if the young Americans are not stupid.—They don't know me!"

"Dolores!" exclaimed Buttons.

"Yes," exclaimed the other. "How do you like me? Am I natural?—eh? military? Do I look terrible?"

And Dolores skipped up and down with a strut beyond description, breathing hard and frowning.

"If you look so fierce you

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google will frighten us away," said Buttons.

"How do I look now?" she said, standing full before him with folded arms, à la Napoleon at St. Helena.

"Bellissima! Bellissima!" said Buttons, in unfeigned admiration.

"Ah!" ejaculated Dolores, smacking her lips, and puffing out her little dimpled cheeks. "Oh!" and her eyes sparkled more brightly with perfect joy and self-contentment.

"And what is all this for?"

"Is it possible that you do not know?"

"I have no idea."

"Then listen. It is at the Royal Opera-house. It will be the greatest masquerade ball ever given."

"Oh—a masquerade ball!—and you?"

"I? I go as a handsome young officer to break the hearts of the ladies, and have such rare sport. My brave cousin, yonder gallant soldier, goes with me."

The brave cousin, who was a big, heavy-headed fellow, grinned in acknowledgment but said nothing.

A PERPLEXED SENATOR.

The Royal Opera-house at Naples is the largest, the grandest, and the most capacious in the world. An immense stage, an enormous pit all thrown into one vast room, surrounded by innumerable boxes, all rising, tier above tier—myriads of dancers, myriads of masks, myriads of spectators—so the scene appeared. Moreover, the Neapolitan is a born buffoon. Nowhere is he so natural as at a masquerade. The music, the crowd, the brilliant lights, the incessant motion are all intoxication to this impressible being.

The Senator lent the countenance of his presence—not from curiosity, but from a benevolent desire to keep his young friends out of trouble. He narrowly escaped being prohibited from entering by making an outrageous fuss at the door about some paltry change. He actually imagined that it was possible to get the right change for a large coin in Naples.

The multitudes of moving forms made the new-comers dizzy. There were all kinds of fantastic figures. Lions polked with sylphs, crocodiles chased serpents, giants walked arm in arm with dwarfs, elephants on two legs ran nimbly about, beating every body with huge probosces of inflated India rubber. Pretty girls in dominos abounded, every body whose face was visible was on the broad grin. All classes were represented. The wealthiest nobles entered into the spirit of the scene with as great gusto as the humblest artisan who treated his obscure sweet-heart with an entrance ticket.

Our friends all wore black dominos, "just for the fun of the thing." Every body knew that they were English or American, which is just the same; for Englishmen and Americans are universally recognizable by the rigidity of their muscles.

A bevy of masked beauties were attracted by the colossal form of the Senator. To say that he was bewildered would express his sensations but faintly. He was distracted. He looked for Buttons. Buttons was chatting with a little domino. He turned to Dick. Dick was walking off with a rhinoceros. To Figgs and the Doctor. Figgs and the Doctor were exchanging glances with a couple of lady codfishes and trying to look amiable. The Senator gave a sickly smile.

"What'n thunder'll I do?" he muttered.

Two dominos took either arm. A third stood smilingly before him. A fourth tried to appropriate his left hand.

"Will your Excellency dance with one of us at a time," said No. 4, with a Tuscan accent, "or will you dance with all of us at once?"

The Senator looked helplessly at her.

"He does not know how," said No. 1. "He has passed his life among the stars."

"Begone, irreverent ones!" said No. 3. "This is an American prince. He said I should be his partner."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

EXIT SENATOR.

"Boh! malidetta!" cried No. 2. "He told me the same; but he said he was a Milor Inglese."

No. 4 thereupon gave a smart pull at the Senator's hand to draw him off. Whereupon No. 2 did the same. No. 3 began singing, "Come e bello!" and No. 1 stood coaxing him to "Fly with her." A crowd of idlers gathered grinningly around.

"My goodness!" groaned the Senator. "Me! the—the representative of a respectable constituency; the elder of a Presbyterian church; the president of a temperance society; the deliverer of that famous Fourth of July oration; the father of a family—me! to be treated thus! Who air these females? Air they countesses? Is this the way the foreign nobility treat an American citizen?"

But the ladies pulled and the crowd grinned. The Senator endeavored to remonstrate. Then he tried to pull his arms away; but finding that impossible he looked in a piteous manner, first at one, and then at the other.

"He wants, I tell you, to be my partner," said No. 1.

"Bah!" cried No. 2, derisively; "he intends to be mine. I understand the national dance of his country—the famous jeeg Irlandese."

"MRS.!!!"

The Senator shouted this one word in a stentorian voice. The ladies dropped his arms and started.

"I say, Mrs.!" cried the Senator. "Look here. Me no speeky I-talian—me American. Me come here just see zee fun, you know—zee spoart—you und-stand? Ha? Hum!"

The ladies clapped their hands, and cried "Bravo!"

Quite a crowd gathered around them. The Senator, impressed with the idea that, to make foreigners understand, it was only necessary to yell loud enough, bawled so loudly that ever so many dancers stopped. Among these Buttons came near with the little Domino. Little Domino stopped, laughed, clapped her hands, and pointed to the Senator.

The Senator was yelling vehemently in broken English to a large crowd of masks. He told them that he had a large family; that he owned a factory; that he was a man of weight, character, influence, popularity, wealth; that he came here merely to study their manners and customs. He disclaimed any intention to participate in their amusements just then, or to make acquaintances. He would be proud to visit them all at their houses, or see them at his apartments, or—or—in short, would be happy to do any thing if they would only let him go in peace.

The crowd laughed, chattered, and shouted "Bravo!" at every pause. The Senator was covered with shame and perspiration. What would have become of him finally it is impossible to guess; but, fortunately, at this extremity he caught sight of Buttons! To dash away from the charming ladies, to burst through the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google crowd, and to seize the arm of Buttons was but the work of a moment.

"Buttons! Buttons! Buttons! Help me! These confounded I-talian wimmin! Take them away. Tell them to leave me be. Tell them I don't know them—don't want to have them hanging round me. Tell them I'm your father!" cried the Senator, his voice rising to a shout in his distraction and alarm.

About 970 people were around him by this time.

"Goodness!" said Buttons; "you are in a fix. Why did you make yourself so agreeable? and to so many? Why, it's too bad. One at a time!"

"Buttons," said the Senator, solemnly, "is this a time for joking? For Heaven's sake get me away!"

"Come, then; you must run for it."

He seized the Senator's right arm. The little Domino clung to his other. Away they started. It was a full run. A shout arose. So arises the shout in Rome along the bellowing Corso when the horses are starting for the Carnival races. It was a long, loud shout, gathering and growing and deepening as it rose, till it burst on high in one grand thunder-clap of sound.

Away went the Senator like the wind. The dense crowd parted on either side with a rush. The Opera-house is several hundred feet in length. Down this entire distance the Senator ran, accompanied by Buttons and the little Domino. Crowds cheered him as he passed. Behind him the passage-way closed up, and a long trail of screaming maskers pressed after him. The louder they shouted the faster the Senator ran. At length they reached the other end.

"Do you see that box?" asked Buttons, pointing to one on the topmost tier.

"Yes, yes."

"Fly! Run for your life! It's your only hope. Get in there and hide till we go!"

The Senator vanished. Scarcely had his coat-tails disappeared through the door when the pursuing crowd arrived there. Six thousand two hundred and twenty-seven human beings, dressed in every variety of costume, on finding that the runner had vanished, gave vent to their excited feelings by a loud cheer for the interesting American who had contributed so greatly to the evening's enjoyment.

Unlucky Senator! Will it be believed that even in the topmost box his pursuers followed him? It was even so. About an hour afterward Buttons, on coming near the entrance, encountered him. His face was pale but resolute, his dress disordered. He muttered a few words about "durned I-talian countesses," and hurried out.

Buttons kept company with the little Domino. Never in his life had he passed so agreeable an evening. He took good care to let his companion know this. At length the crowd began to separate. The Domino would go. Buttons would go with her. Had she a carriage? No, she walked. Then he would walk with her.

Buttons tried hard to get a carriage, but all were engaged. But a walk would not be unpleasant in such company. The Domino did not complain. She was vivacious, brilliant, delightful, bewitching. Buttons had been trying all the evening to find out who she was. In vain.

"Who in the world is she? I must find out, so that I may see her again." This was his one thought.

They approached the Strada Nuova.

"She is not one of the nobility, at any rate," he thought, "or she would not live here."

They turned up a familiar street.

"How exceedingly jolly! She can't live far away from my lodgings."

They entered the Strada di San Bartolomeo.

"Hanged if she don't live in the same street!"

A strange thought occurred. It was soon confirmed. They stopped in front of Buttons's own lodgings. A light gleamed over the door. Another flashed into the soul of Buttons. The Domino took off her mask and turned her face up to Buttons. That face, dimpled, smiling, bewitching; flashing, sparkling eyes; little mouth with its rosy lips!

"Dolores!"

"Blessed saints, and Holy Virgin! Is it possible that you never suspected?"

"Never. How could I when I thought you were dressed like a dragoon?"

"And you never passed so happy an evening; and you never had so fascinating and charming a partner; and you never heard such a voice of music as mine; and you can never forget me through all life; and you never can hope to find any one equal to me!" said Dolores, in her usual laughing volubility.

"Never!" cried Buttons.

"Oh dear! I think you must love me very much."

And a merry peal of laughter rang up the stairs as Dolores, evading Buttons's arm, which that young man had tried to pass about her waist, dashed away into the darkness and out of sight.

VIII.

ADVENTURES AND MISADVENTURES.—A WET GROTTO AND A BOILING LAKE.—THE TWO FAIR SPANIARDS, AND THE DONKEY RIDE.

THE Grotto of Posilippo is a most remarkable place, and, in the opinion of every intelligent traveler, is more astonishing than even the Hoosac Tunnel, which nobody will deny except the benighted Bostonian.

The city of Pozzuoli is celebrated for two things; first, because St. Paul once landed there, and no doubt hurried away as fast as he could; and, secondly, on account of the immense number of beggars that throng around the unhappy one who enters its streets.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The Dodge Club contributed liberally. The Doctor gave a cork-screw; the Senator, a bladeless knife; Dick, an old lottery ticket; Buttons, a candle-stump; Mr. Figgs, a wild-cat bank-note. After which they all hurried away on donkeys as fast as possible.

The donkey is in his glory here. Nowhere else does he develop such a variety of forms—nowhere attain such an infinity of sizes—nowhere emit so impressive a bray. It is the Bray of Naples. "It is like the thunder of the night when the cloud bursts o'er Cona, and a thousand ghosts shriek at once in the hollow wind."

There is a locality in this region which the ancients named after a certain warm region which no refined person ever permits himself to mention in our day. Whatever it may have been when some Roman Tityrus walked pipe in mouth along its shore, its present condition renders its name singularly appropriate and felicitous. Here the party amused themselves with a lunch of figs and oranges, which they gathered indiscriminately from orchards and gardens on the road-side.

There was the Lake Lucrine. Averno and the Elysian Fields were there. The ruins of Caligula's Bridge dotted the surface of the sea. Yet the charms of all these classic scenes were eclipsed in the tourists' eyes by those of a number of pretty peasant girls who stood washing clothes in the limpid waters of the lake.

It was in this neighborhood that they found the Grotto of the Cumæan Sibyl. They followed the intelligent cicerone, armed with torches, into a gloomy tunnel. The intelligent cicerone walked before them with the air of one who had something to show. Seven stout peasants followed after. The cavern was as dark as possible, and extended apparently for an endless distance.

After walking a distance of about two miles, according to the Senator's calculation, they came to the centre of interest. It was a hole in the wall of the tunnel. The Americans were given to understand that they must enter here.

"But how?"

"How? Why, on the broad backs of the stout peasants, who all stood politely offering their humble services." The guide went first. Buttons, without more ado, got on the back of the nearest Italian and followed. Dick came next; then the Doctor. Mr. Figgs and the Senator followed in the same dignified manner.

They descended for some distance, and finally came to water about three feet deep. As the roof was low, and only rose three feet above the water, the party had some difficulty, not only in keeping their feet out of the water, but also in breathing. At length they came to a chamber about twelve feet square. From this they passed on to another of the same size. Thence to another. And so on.

Arriving at the last, Bearer No. 1 quietly deposited Buttons on a raised stone platform, which fortunately arose about half an inch above the water. Three other bearers did the same. Mr. Figgs looked forlornly about him, and, being a fat man, seemed to grow somewhat apoplectic. Dick beguiled the time by lighting his pipe.

"So this is the Grotto of the Cumæan Sibyl, is it?" said Buttons. Then all I can say is that—"

What he was going to say was lost by a loud cry which interrupted him and startled all. It came from the other chamber.

"The Senator!" said Dick.

It was indeed his well-known voice. There was a plash and a groan. Immediately afterward a man staggered into the room. He was deathly pale, and tottered feebly under the tremendous weight of the Senator. The latter looked as anxious as his trembling bearer.

"Darn it! I say," he cried. "Darn it! Don't! Don't!"

"Diavo-lo!" muttered the Italian.

And in the next instant plump went the Senator into the water. A scene then followed that baffles description. The Senator, rising from his unexpected bath, foaming and sputtering, the Italian praying for forgiveness, the loud voices of all the others shouting, calling, and laughing.

The end of it was that they all left as soon as possible, and the Senator indignantly waded back through the water himself. A furious row with the unfortunate bearer, whom the Senator refused to pay, formed a beautifully appropriate

DARN IT!—DON'T.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THUMP!

termination to their visit to this classic spot. The Senator was so disturbed by this misadventure that his wrath did not subside until his trowsers were thoroughly dried. This, however, was accomplished at last, under the warm sun, and then he looked around him with his usual complacency.

The next spot of interest which attracted them was the Hall of the Subterranean Lake. In this place there is a cavern in the centre of a hill, which is approached by a passage of some considerable length, and in the subterranean cavern a pool of water boils and bubbles. The usual crowd of obliging peasantry surrounded them as they entered the vestibule of this interesting place. It was a dingy-looking chamber, out of which two narrow subterranean passages ran. A grimy, sooty, blackened figure stood before them with torches.

"Follow!"

This was all that he condescended to say, after lighting his torches and distributing them to his visitors. He stalked off, and stooping down, darted into the low passage-way. The cicerone followed, then Buttons, then Dick, then the Senator, then the Doctor, then Mr. Figgs. The air was intensely hot, and the passage-way grew lower. Moreover, the smoke from the torches filled the air, blinding and choking them.

Mr. Figgs faltered. Fat, and not by any means nimble, he came to a pause about twenty feet from the entrance, and, making a sudden turn, darted out.

The Doctor was tall and unaccustomed to bend his perpendicular form. Half choked and panting heavily he too gave up, and turning about rushed out after Mr. Figgs.

The other three went on bravely. Buttons and Dick, because they had long since made up their minds to see every thing that presented itself, and the Senator, because when he started on an enterprise he was incapable of turning back.

After a time the passage went sloping steeply down. At the bottom of the declivity was a pond of water bubbling and steaming. Down this they ran. Now the slope was extremely slippery, and the subterranean chamber was but faintly illuminated by the torches. And so it came to pass that, as the Senator ran down after the others, they had barely reached the bottom when Thump!

At once all turned round with a start. Not too quickly; for there lay the Senator, on his back, sliding, in an oblique direction, straight toward the pool. His booted feet were already in the seething waves; his nails were dug into the slippery soil; he was shouting for help.

To grasp his hand, his collar, his leg —to jerk him away and place him upright, was the work of a shorter time than is taken to tell it.

The guide now wanted them to wait till he boiled an egg. The Senator remonstrated, stating that he had already nearly boiled a leg. The Senator's opposition overpowered the wishes of the others, and the party proceeded to return.

Pale, grimy with soot, panting, covered with huge drops of perspiration, they burst into the chamber where the others were waiting—first Buttons, then Dick, then the Senator covered with mud and slime.

The latter gentleman did not answer much to the eager inquiries of his friends, but maintained a solemn silence. The two former loudly and volubly descanted on the accumulated horrors of the subterranean way, the narrow passage, the sulphurous air, the lake of boiling floods.

In this outer chamber their attention was directed to a number of ancient relics. These are offered for sale in such abundance that they may be considered staple articles of commerce in this country.

So skillful are the manufacturers that they can produce unlimited supplies of the following articles, and many others too numerous to mention:

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Cumæan and Oscan coins;
Ditto and ditto statuettes;
Ditto and ditto rings;
Ditto and ditto bracelets;
Ditto and ditto images;
Ditto and ditto toilet articles;
Ditto and ditto vases;
Ditto and ditto flasks;
Relics of Parthenope;
Ditto of Baiæ;
Ditto of Misenum;
Ditto of Pæstum;
Ditto of Herculaneum;
Ditto of Pompeii;
Ditto of Capræa;
Ditto of Capua;
Ditto of Cumæ—

And other places too numerous to mention; all supplied to order; all of which are eaten by rust, and warranted to be covered by the canker and the mould of antiquity.

The good guide earnestly pressed some interesting relics upon their attention, but without marked success. And now, as the hour of dinner approached, they made the best of their way to a neighboring inn, which commanded a fine view of the bay. Emerging from the chamber the guide followed them, offering his wares.

"Tell me," he cried, in a sonorous voice, "oh most noble Americans! how much will you give for this most ancient vase?"

"Un' mezzo carlino," said Dick.

"Un' mezzo carlino!!!"

The man's hand, which had been uplifted to display the vase, fell downward as he said this. His tall figure grew less and less distinct as they went further away; but long after he was out of sight the phantom of his reproachful face haunted their minds.

After dinner they went out on the piazza in front of the hotel. Two Spanish ladies were there, whose dark eyes produced an instantaneous effect upon the impressible heart of Buttons.

They sat side by side, leaning against the stone balustrade. They were smoking cigarettes, and the effect produced by waving their pretty hands as they took the cigarettes from their mouths was, to say the least, bewildering.

Buttons awaited his opportunity, and did not have to wait long. Whether it was that they were willing to give the young American a chance, or whether it was really unavoidable, can not be said, but certainly one of the fair Spaniards found that her cigarette had gone out. A pretty look of despair, and an equally pretty gesture of vexation, showed at once the state of things. Upon which Buttons stepped up, and with a bow that would have done honor to Chesterfield, produced a box of scented allumettes, and lighting one, gravely held it forward. The fair Spaniard smiled bewitchingly, and bending forward without hesitation to light her cigarette, brought her rosy lips into bewildering proximity to Buttons's hand.

It was a trying moment.

The amiable expression of the ladies' faces, combined with the softly spoken thanks of the lady whom Buttons first addressed, encouraged him. The consequence was, that in about five minutes more he was occupying a seat opposite them, chatting as familiarly as though he were an old playmate. Dick looked on with admiration; the others with envy.

"How in the world does it happen," asked the Senator, "that Buttons knows the lingo of every body he meets?"

"He can't help it," said Dick. "These Continental languages are all alike; know one, and you've got the key to the others—that is with French, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese."

"And look at him now!" cried the Senator, his eye beaming with cordial admiration.

"You may well look at him!" sighed Dick. "Two such pretty girls as these won't turn up again in a hurry. Spaniards too; I always admired them." And he walked down to the shore humming to himself something about "the girls of Cadiz."

The ladies informed Buttons that they were traveling with their brother, and had been through Russia, Germany, England, France, and were now traversing Italy; did not like the three first-mentioned countries, but were charmed with Italy.

Their naïveté was delightful. Buttons found out that the name of one was Lucia, and the other Ida. For the life of him he did not know

A TRYING MOMENT.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SENATOR AND DONKEY.

which he admired most; but, on the whole, rather inclined to the one to whom he had offered the light—Ida.

He was equally frank, and let them know his name, his country, his creed. They were shocked at his creed, pleased with his country, and amused at his name, which they pronounced, "Señor Bo-to-nes."

After about an hour their brother came. He was a small man, very active, and full of vivacity. Instead of looking fiercely at the stranger, he shook hands with him very cordially. Before doing this, however, he took one short, quick survey of his entire person, from his felt hat down to his Congress boots. The consequence was that Buttons deserted his companions, and went off with the ladies.

Dick took the lead of the party on the return home. They viewed the conduct of Buttons with displeasure. The Senator did not show his usual serenity.

The party were all riding on donkeys. To do this on the minute animals which the Neapolitans furnish it is necessary to seat one's self on the stern of the animal, and draw the legs well up, so that they may not trail on the ground. The appearance of the rider from behind is that of a Satyr dressed in the fashion of the nineteenth century. Nothing can be more ridiculous than the sight of a figure dressed in a frock-coat and beaver hat, and terminated by the legs and tail of a donkey.

As it was getting late the party hurried. The donkeys were put on the full gallop. First rode the guide, then the others, last of whom was the Senator, whose great weight was a sore trial to the little donkey.

They neared Pozzuoli, when suddenly the Senator gave his little beast a smart whack to hasten his steps. The donkey lost all patience. With a jump he leaped forward. Away he went, far ahead of the others. The saddle, whose girth was rather old, slipped off. The Senator held on tightly. In vain! Just as he rounded a corner formed by a projecting sand-bank the donkey slipped. Down went the rider; down went the donkey also—rider and beast floundering in the dusty road.

A merry peal of ill-suppressed laughter came from the road-side as he rolled into view. It came from a carriage. In the carriage were the Spaniards—there, too, was Buttons.

IX.

A DRIVE INTO THE COUNTRY.—A FIGHT WITH A VETTURINO.—THE EFFECT OF EATING "HARD BOILED EGGS."—WHAT THEY SAW AT PÆSTUM.—FIVE TEMPLES AND ONE "MILL."

To hire a carriage in Naples for any length of time is by no means an easy thing. It is necessary to hold long commune with the proprietor, to exert all the wiles of masterly diplomacy, to circumvent cunning by cunning, to exert patience, skill, and eloquence. After a decision has been reached, there is but one way in which you can hold your vetturino to his bargain, and that is to bind him to it by securing his name to a contract. Every vetturino has a printed form all ready. If he can't write his name, he does something equally binding and far simpler. He dips his thumb in the ink-bottle and stamps it on the paper. If that is not his signature, what else is it?

"Thus," said one, "Signor Adam signed the marriage-contract with Signora Eva."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

After incredible difficulties a contract had been drawn up and signed by the horny thumb of a certain big vetturino, who went by the name of "Il Piccolo." It was to the effect that, for a certain specified sum, Il Piccolo should take the party to Pæstum and back, with a detour to Sorrento.

It was a most delightful morning. All were in the best of spirits. So they started. On for miles through interminable streets of houses that bordered the circular shore, through crowds of sheep, droves of cattle, dense masses of human beings, through which innumerable caleches darted like meteors amidst the stars of heaven. Here came the oxen of Southern Italy, stately, solemn, long-horned, cream-colored; there marched great droves of Sorrento hogs—the hog of hogs—a strange but not ill-favored animal, thick in hide, leaden in color, hairless as a hippopotamus. The flesh of the Sorrento hog bears the same relation to common pork that "Lubin's Extrait" bears to the coarse scent of a country grocery. A pork-chop from the Sorrento animal comes to the palate with the force of a new revelation; it is the highest possibility of pork—the apotheosis of the pig! Long lines of macaroni-cooks doing an enormous business; armies of dealers in anisette; crowds of water-carriers; throngs of fishermen, carrying nets and singing merry songs—"Ecco mi!" "Ecco la!"—possible Massaniellos every man of them, I assure you, Sir. And—enveloping all, mingling with all, jostling all, busy with the busiest, idle with the idlest, noisy with the noisiest, jolly with the jolliest, the fat, oily, swarthy, rosy—(etc., for further epithets see preceding pages)—Lazaroni!

Every moment produces new effects in the ever-shifting scenes of Naples. Here is the reverse of monotony; if any thing becomes wearisome, it is the variety. Here is the monotony of incessant change. The whole city, with all its vast suburbs, lives on the streets.

The Senator wiped his fevered brow. He thought that for crowds, noise, tumult, dash, hurry-skurry, gayety, life, laughter, joyance, and all that incites to mirth, and all that stirs the soul, even New York couldn't hold a candle to Naples.

Rabelais ought to have been a Neapolitan.

Then, as the city gradually faded into the country, the winding road opened up before them with avenues of majestic trees—overhanging, arching midway—forming long aisles of shade. Myrtles, that grew up into trees, scented the air. Interminable groves of figs and oranges spread away up the hill, intermingled with the darker foliage of the olive or cypress.

The mountains come lovingly down to bathe their feet in the sea. The road winds among them. There is a deep valley around which rise lofty hills topped with white villages or ancient towers, or dotted with villas which peep forth from amidst dense groves. As far as the eye can reach the vineyards spread away. Not as in France or Germany, miserable sandy fields with naked poles or stunted bushes; but vast extents of trees, among which the vines leap in wild luxuriance, hanging in long festoons from branch to branch, or intertwining with the foliage.

"I don't know how it is," said the Senator, "but I'm cussed if I feel as if this here country was ground into the dust. If it is, it is no bad thing to go through the mill. I don't much wonder that these Italians don't emigrate. If I owned a farm in this neighborhood I'd stand a good deal of squeezin' before I'd sell out and go any wheres else."

At evening they reached Salerno, a watering-place on the sea-coast, and Naples in miniature.

There is no town in Italy without its opera-house or theatre, and among the most vivid and most precious of scenic delights the pantomime commends itself to the Italian bosom. Of course there was a pantomime at Salerno. It was a mite of a house; on a rough calculation thirty feet by twenty; a double tier of boxes; a parquette about twelve feet square; and a stage of about two-thirds that size.

Yet behold what the ingenuity of man can accomplish! On that stage there were performed all the usual exhibitions of human passion, and they even went into the production of great scenic displays, among which a great storm in the forest was most prominent.

Polichinello was in his glory! On this occasion the joke of the evening was an English traveler. The ideal Englishman on the Continent is a never-failing source of merriment. The presence of five Americans gave additional piquancy to the show. The corpulent, double-chinned, red-nosed Englishman, with knee-breeches, shoe-buckles, and absurd coat, stamped, swore, frowned, doubled up his fists, knocked down waiters, scattered gold right and left, was arrested, was tried, was fined; but came forth unterrified from every persecution, to rave, to storm, to fight, to lavish money as before.

How vivid were the flashes of lightning produced by touching off some cotton-wool soaked in alcohol! How terrific the peals of thunder produced by the vibrations of a piece of sheet-iron! Whatever was deficient in mechanical apparatus was readily supplied by the powerful imagination of the Italians, who, though they had often seen all this before, were not at all weary of looking at it, but enjoyed the thousandth repetition as much as the first.

Those merry Italians!

There is an old, old game played by every vetturino.

When our travelers had returned to the hotel, and were enjoying themselves in general conversation, the vetturino bowed himself in. He was a good deal exercised in his mind. With a great preamble he came to the point: As they intended to start early in the morning, he supposed they would not object to settle their little bill now.

"What!" shouted Buttons, jumping up.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"What bill? Settle a bill? We settle a bill? Are you mad?"

"Your excellencies intend to settle the bill, of course," said the vetturino, with much phlegm.

"Our excellencies never dreamed of any such thing."

"Not pay? Ha! ha! You jest, Signor."

"Do you see this?" said Buttons, solemnly producing the contract.

"Well?" responded Il Piccolo.

"What is this?"

"Our contract."

"Do you know what it is that you have engaged to do?"

"To take you to Pæstum."

"Yes; to Pæstum and back, with a detour to Sorrento. Moreover, you engage to supply us with three meals a day and lodgings, for all of which we engage to pay a certain sum. What, then," cried Buttons, elevating his voice, "in the name of all the blessed saints and apostles, do you mean by coming to us about hotel bills?"

"Signor," said the vetturino, meekly, "when I made that contract I fear I was too sanguine."

"Too sanguine!"

"And I have changed my mind since."

"Indeed?"

"I find that I am a poor man."

"Did you just find that out?"

"And that if I carry out this it will ruin me."

"Well?"

"So you'll have to pay for the hotel expenses yourselves," said Il Piccolo, with desperation.

"I will forgive this insufferable insolence," said Buttons, majestically, "on condition that it never occurs again. Do you see that?" he cried, in louder tones.

"DO YOU SEE THAT?"

And he unfolded the contract, which he had been holding in his hand, and sternly pointed to the big blotch of ink that was supposed to be Il Piccolo's signature.

"Do you see that?" he cried, in a voice of thunder.

The Italian did not speak.

"And that?" he cried, pointing to the signature of the witness.

The Italian opened his mouth to speak, but was evidently nonplused.

"You are in my power!" said Buttons, in a fine melodramatic tone, and with a vivacity of gesture that was not without its effect on the Italian. He folded the contract, replaced it in his breast-pocket, and slapped it with fearful emphasis. Every slap seemed to go to the heart of Il Piccolo.

"If you dare to try to back out of this agreement I'll have you up before the police. I'll enforce the awful penalty that punishes the non-performance of a solemn engagement. I'll have you arrested by the Royal Guards in the name of His Majesty the King, and cause you to be incarcerated in the lowest dungeons of St. Elmo. Besides, I won't pay you for the ride thus far."

With this last remark Buttons walked to the door, and without another word opened it, and motioned to Il Piccolo to leave. The vetturino departed in silence.

On the following morning he made his appearance as pleasant as though nothing had happened.

The carriage rolled away from Salerno. Broad fields stretched away on every side. Troops of villagers marched forth to their labor. As they went on they saw women working in the fields, and men lolling on the fences.

"Do you call that the stuff for a free country?" cried the Senator, whose whole soul rose up in arms against such a sight. "Air these things men? or can such slaves as these women seem to be give birth to any thing but slaves?"

"Bravo!" cried Buttons.

The Senator was too indignant to say more, and so fell into a fit of musing.

"Dick," said Buttons, after a long pause, "you are as pale as a ghost. I believe you must be beginning to feel the miasma from these plains."

"Oh no," said Dick, dolefully; "something worse."

"What's the matter?"

"Do you remember the eggs we had for dinner last evening?"

"Yes."

"That's what's the matter," said Dick, with a groan. "I can't explain; but this, perhaps, will tell thee all I feel."

He took from his pocket a paper and handed it to Buttons. Around the margin were drawn

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google etchings of countless fantastic figures, illustrating the following lines:

A NIGHTMARE.

"Gorgons, and hydras, and chimeras dire."

BY A VICTIM.

Eggs! Eggs!! Eggs!!!
Hard boiled eggs for tea!
And oh! the horrible nightmare dream
They brought to luckless me!

The hippopotamus came;
He sat upon my chest:
The hippopotamus roared "I'll spot him!" as
He trampled upon my breast.

The big iguanodon hunched
And rooted in under me:
The big iguanodon raised by that pan o' done
Overdone eggs for tea.

The ichthyosaurus tried
To roll me up in a ball;
While all the three were grinning at me,
And pounding me, bed and all.

Hip! hip! hurrah!
It was a little black pig,
And a big bull-frog, and a bobtailed dog—
All of them dancing a jig.

And oh, the snakes! the snakes!
And the boa constrictor too!
And the cobra capello—a terrible fellow—
Came to my horrified view.

Snakes and horrible beasts,
Frog, pig, and dog
Hustled me, pushed me, tickled me, crushed me,
Rolled me about like a log.

The little blue devils came on;
They rode on a needle's point;
And the big giraffe, with asthmatic laugh,
And legs all out of joint.

Bats crawled into my ears,
Hopping about in my brain;
And grizzly bears rode up on mares,
And then rode down again.

An antediluvian roared,
In the form of a Brahmin bull;
And a Patagonian squeezed an onion,
Filling my aching eyes full.

The three blue bottles that sat
Upon the historical stones
Sang, "Hey diddle diddle"—two on a fiddle,
The other one on the bones.

"Whoo! whoo! whoo!
Get up, get up, you beauty!
Here come the shaved monkeys, a-riding on donkeys,
Fresh from Bobberty Shooty."

They raised me up in the air,
Bed, body, and all,
And carried me soon to the man in the moon,
At the siege of Sebastopol.

Down, down, down,
Round, round, round,
A whirlpool hurled me out of the world,
And oh, no bottom I found.

Down, down, down,
Whirl, whirl, whirl,
And the Florentine boar was pacing the shore,
His tail all out of curl.

He smoked my favorite pipe,
He blew a cloud of smoke,
He pulled me out with his porcine snout,
And hugging him, I awoke.

"Why, Dick," cried the Senator, "what precious nonsense!"

"It was intended to be so," said Dick.

"Well, but you might as well put on an idee. It must have some meaning."

"Not a bit of it. It has no meaning; that is, no more than a dream or a nightmare."

The Senator now began to discuss the nature of poetry, but was suddenly interrupted by a shout—

"The Temples!"

The country about Pæstum is one of the most beautiful in the world. Between the mountains and the sea lies a luxuriant plain, and in the middle of it is the ruined city. The outlines of walls and remnants of gates are there. Above all rise five ancient edifices. They strolled carelessly around. The marble floors of a good many private houses are yet visible, but the stupendous temples are the chief attraction here; above all, the majestic shrine of Neptune.

It was while standing with head thrown back, eyes and mouth opened wide, and thoughts all taken up with a deep calculation, that the Senator was startled by a sudden noise.

Turning hastily he saw something that made him run with the speed of the wind toward the place where the noise arose. Buttons and Dick were surrounded by a crowd of fierce-looking men, who were making very threatening demonstrations. There were at least fifteen. As the Senator ran up from one direction, so came up Mr. Figgs and the Doctor from another.

"What is this?" cried the Senator, bursting in upon the crowd.

A huge Italian was shaking his fist in Buttons's face, and stamping, and gesticulating violently.

"These men say we must pay five piastres each to them for strolling about their ground, and Buttons has told this big fellow that he will give them five kicks each. There'll be some kind of a fight. They belong to the Camorra." Dick said all this in a hurried undertone.

"Camorry, what's that—brigands?"

"All the same."

"They're not armed, any how."

Just at this moment Buttons said something which seemed to sting the Italians to the soul, for with a wild shout they rushed forward. The Doctor drew out his revolver. Instantly Dick snatched it from him, and rushing forward, drove back the foremost. None of them were armed.

"Stand off!" he cried, in Italian. "The fight is between this big fellow and my friend. If any one of you interferes I'll put a bullet through him."

The Italians fell back cursing. Buttons instantly divested himself of his coat, vest, and collar. The Italian waited with a grim smile.

At one end were the Senator, the Doctor, Mr. Figgs; at the other the Italian ruffians. In the middle Buttons and his big antagonist. Near them Dick with his pistol.

The scene that followed had better be de-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE MILL AT PÆSTUM.

scribed in Dick's own words, as he penciled them in his memorandum-book, from time to time, keeping a sharp look-out with his pistol also. Afterward the description was retouched:

Great mill at Pæstum, between E. BUTTONS, Esq., Gentleman, and Italian party called BEPPO.

1*st Round.*—Beppo defiant, no attitude at all. Buttons assumed an elegant pose. Beppo made a succession of wild strokes without any aim, which were parried without effort. After which Buttons landed four blows, one on each peeper, one on the smeller, and one on the mug.

First blood for Buttons. Beppo considerably surprised. Rushed furiously at Buttons, arms flying every where, struck over Buttons's head. Buttons lightly made obeisance, and then fired a hundred-pounder on Beppo's left auricular, which had the effect of bringing him to grass. First knock down for Buttons.

2*d Round.*—Foreign population quite dumbfounded. Americans amused but not excited. One hundred to one on Buttons eagerly offered, but no takers. Beppo jumped to his feet like a wild cat. Eyes encircled with ebon aurioles, olfactory quite demolished. Made a rush at Buttons, who, being a member of the Dodge Club, dodged him, and landed a rattler on the jugular, which again sent foreign party to grass.

3*d Round.*—Nimble to the scratch. Beppo badly mashed and raving. Buttons unscathed and laughing. Beppo more cautious made a faint attempt to get into Buttons. No go. Tried a little sparring, which was summarily ended by a cannonade from Buttons directly in his countenance.

4*th Round.*—Foreigners wild. Yelling to their man to go in. (Don't understand a single one of the rules of the P. R. Very benighted. Need missionaries.) Evinced strong determination to go in themselves, but were checked by attitude of referee, who threatened to blow out brains of first man that interfered. Beppo's face magnified considerably. Appearance not at all prepossessing. Much distressed but furious. Made a bound at Buttons, who calmly, and without any apparent effort, met him with a terrific upper cut, which made the Italian's gigantic frame tremble like a ship under the stroke of a big wave. He tottered, and swung his arms, trying to regain his balance, when another annihilator most cleanly administered by Buttons laid him low. A great tumult rose among the foreigners. Beppo lay panting with no determination to come to the scratch. At the expiration of usual time, opponent not appearing, Buttons was proclaimed victor. Beppo very much mashed. Foreigners very greatly cowed. After waiting a short time Buttons resumed his garments and walked off with his friends.

After the victory the travelers left Pæstum on their return.

The road that turns off to Sorrento is the most beautiful in the world. It winds along the shore with innumerable turnings, climbing hills, descending into valleys, twining around precipices. There are scores of the prettiest villages under the sun, ivy covered ruins, frowning fortresses, lofty towers, and elegant villas.

At last Sorrento smiles out from a valley which is proverbial for beauty, where, within its shelter of hills, neither the hot blast of midsummer nor the cold winds of winter can ever disturb its repose. This is the valley of perpetual spring, where fruits forever grow, and the seasons all blend together, so that the same orchard shows trees in blossom and bearing fruit.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HEROIC DEEDS OF HEROIC MEN.

BY JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.

BENJAMIN H. PORTER.

XVII.—TRUE CHIVALRY. BENJAMIN H. PORTER.

Birth.—Enters Naval School.—The Trip.—Commencement of the Rebellion.—Roanoke Expedition.—Blockading.—Admiral Foote.—Anecdote.—Exploring Charleston Harbor.—Torpedoes.—The Rescue.—Attack on Sumter.—The Capture.—Marched to Columbia.—Imprisonment.—In Irons.—Disappointment and Endurance.—The Release.—Attack upon Sumter.—Death.

ONE may search the records of ancient chivalry in vain for a career more brilliant in heroism than that of the young patriot sailor Benjamin H. Porter. He was the son of James G. Porter and Sarah Grosvener his wife, and was born at Skeneateles, Onondaga County, New York, on the 10th of July, 1844, the youngest of six sons. When he was four years of age his father moved to Lockport, and there he was educated until his fifteenth year. He was then only remarkable for his cheerful, amiable, and affectionate spirit, which rendered him a universal favorite.

Like all adventurous boys he yearned for a life at sea. A vacancy occurring, in the Congressional district in which he resided, for the United States Naval School at Annapolis, his friends applied to obtain the appointment for him. The Hon. Silas M. Burroughs, sitting member of Congress for that district, took the very proper course of inviting a competitive examination of the young men who were applicants for the position. After an exhaustive and thorough examination of a large class young Porter won the prize. Reaching Annapolis in November, 1859, he was there exposed to another examination; and though half the class, who were examined with him, were rejected, he was admitted as a cadet, and was immediately placed upon the school-ship Plymouth, which was anchored in the bay.

There were one hundred and twelve cadets in the class which he joined. He remained there until the following June, when his class sailed on their annual cruise to initiate them into the practical duties of seamanship.

On the 1st of July the ship put out to sea. On the 3d they encountered a tremendous gale. The ship sprang a-leak, and all hands were called to the pumps. They, however, reached Fayal, in the Azores, in safety, when the cadets were relieved from their toil and spent a day luxuriously on shore, climbing the mountains and clattering through the vine-clad valleys upon ponies and donkeys. Each of these lilliputian animals had an attendant who clung to his tail and urged him onward by blows and the most unintelligible jargon. Thence they sailed for Cadiz, in Spain. But the cruel quarantine cut them off from every joy. Their chagrin was aggravated by seeing the beautiful pleasure-grounds across the bay crowded with groups of Spanish maidens, graceful as fairies, beneath whose gossamer veils the boys longed to peep.

Making the best of their disappointment again they weighed anchor, and passing by the Rock of Gibraltar and the renowned Pillars of Hercules, they soon ran along the vine-clad hills of Madeira, and steering for the Peak of Teneriffe, enjoyed a few rapturous hours in the Canaries. Again they weighed anchor and reached Chesapeake Bay in September, where they resumed their theoretical studies for the winter on shore.

The storm of the great rebellion was now beginning to rise. Eastern Maryland was terribly agitated. Many of the people embraced the secession cause, and bitter dissensions arose among the officers and cadets of the school, many of whom were from the seceding States. It was feared that the traitors in the school combining with those on the shore might seize the ship, the guns, and the other property of the United States belonging to the Naval School. The officers and cadets who remained loyal gave up all their ordinary pursuits, and stood guard night and day at their battery and on the ship. At length troops arrived to their relief. Then by orders from Washington the pupils, with the effects of the institution, were taken on board

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the Constitution, and she sailed for New York. Upon her arrival there they were ordered to Newport, Rhode Island, where the school was re-established in a region safe from the assaults of treason. The great civil war was now fairly inaugurated, and the rebels were making their attacks upon the fortresses, arsenals, and important strategic points of the United States with such ferocity that the Government needed the services of every able and patriotic man.

It became necessary for the lads of the naval school to abandon their studies and gird on the sword. The two first classes, and a part of the third, to which young Porter belonged, were ordered to active service as midshipmen. Benjamin, then a boy of sixteen, was assigned to the Roanoke, under Captain Nicholson, and proceeded on blockade duty on the Atlantic coast. It soon became necessary to take the Lieutenants to command new vessels, and this boy performed a Lieutenant's task. He was so faithful, skillful, and successful in these duties as to win the highest approval of his superior officers. The captain, on leaving the ship, voluntarily gave him the following testimonial:

"I can not leave the ship without expressing to you the great satisfaction you have given while on board ship. Your duties have always been performed with alacrity and skill, and I have no hesitancy in recommending you to any one as a very efficient young officer."

Commodore Marston succeeded to the command of the Roanoke. Young Porter immediately won his accustomed place in the new officer's affection and esteem. The steamer unfortunately broke a shaft, and was for some weeks at Hampton Roads engaged in repairs. The Burnside expedition was then fitting out for the waters of the North Carolina Sounds, though no one but the commanding officers knew its destination. Young Porter, chafing under inaction, petitioned for the privilege of accompanying the expedition. The high recommendations he presented from Commodores Marston and Rowan secured his prompt acceptance. And young as he was he was directed to prepare and take command of six ships' launches, each with howitzers, and all carrying a crew of one hundred and fifty men, to accompany the expedition for service in shallow water.

The magnificent squadron entered Hatteras Inlet January 13, 1862. On the 7th of February they commenced their attack upon Roanoke Island. Young Porter gallantly landed his battery and the sailors to man his guns at Ashby's Cove. His pieces were dragged through a morass to a position where he could protect the other troops which had landed, and there he stood guard all of a cold, dark, freezing night, drenched by a northeast storm. At daylight the next morning he advanced with his battery on a line with the skirmishers. Manning the drag ropes, they pressed forward at the double quick until they came in sight of the rebel batteries, when they opened a brisk fire of round shot, grape, and shell, receiving a deadly fire in return.

Here was a lad of but seventeen years of age in the midst of one of the fiercest battles of the war, in charge of a battery of six 12-pound boat howitzers. He had led his men in advance of the lines. His zeal was so intense that he utterly disregarded all peril. When at one gun every man was killed or disabled by the fire from the rebel fort, he stood alone for an hour at that gun loading and firing. For two hours this conflict lasted; and he remained undaunted at his post until the foe surrendered. His imperial spirit gave him perfect command of his men; his youthful appearance and almost feminine beauty won their love; his utter fearlessness commanded their admiration and roused their enthusiasm. He possessed that rare electric power, so singularly developed by Napoleon, which bound his men to him with almost a supernatural affection. It was said that there was not one of his men who would not readily have died for him. The exaltation of his nature may be inferred from the following extract from one of his letters, showing the spirit with which he entered into the battle. It was not the love of fighting; it was not the love of adventure; it was not the desire to obtain renown for bravery. It was the highest and holiest impulse which can move a human heart, which thus ennobled him. This youth of seventeen years wrote:

"If I fall remember it is for my country and the noble cause of liberty. For that I came into the country's service; to fight, and, if necessary, to lay down my life. And I assure you that I am not only glad of the opportunity, but if any thing is to be gained for my country, I will gladly welcome any fate that awaits me."

Admiral Goldsborough, as he took the brave boy's hand after the battle, greeted him with the words: "Young man, you have fairly won your epaulets, and, as sure as there is a God in heaven, you shall have them."

General Burnside, in his report, said: "The skill with which the Dahlgren howitzers were handled by Midshipman Porter is deserving of the highest praise, and I take great pleasure in recommending him to the favorable notice of the Navy Department."

General Foster gave also his tribute of commendation, saying: "I would notice here the gallant conduct of Midshipman Benjamin H. Porter, who commanded the light guns from the ships' launches, and was constantly under fire. He deserves a commission for his admirable conduct on that occasion."

In Admiral Goldsborough's official report he again takes occasion to speak, as follows, of the heroism of this young patriot:

"I deem it but justice to this interesting youth to say, that both Generals Burnside and Foster assured me in conversation, immediately after the battle, that his gallantry was very conspicuous on the occasion. The battery under his command, of six naval howitzers, was placed in the advance, and it was there handled with a degree of skill and daring which not only con-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PORTER AT ROANOKE.

tributed largely to the success of the day but won the admiration of all who witnessed the display. No other field-pieces were employed by our army in the engagement. Mr. Porter was but seventeen years of age, and, in my belief, no father in the land can, with truth, boast of a nobler youth as a son. I sincerely trust that he may be regarded by the Department as highly worthy of its lasting consideration, and that he may have bestowed on him all that his merits deserve."

The affection which this young man unconsciously drew to himself by his eminently loving and lovable nature may be inferred from the following letter, which was written to him by Commodore Marston of the Roanoke, and signed by every officer of the ship:

"You have no idea how delighted we all are to hear of your gallant and meritorious conduct in the late action in North Carolina. We all agree that you have justly won your epaulets; and hope that they, the emblem of devotion, trust, patriotism, and fidelity, may be immediately awarded to you for that unflinching daring, reckless courage, and pure devotion to our noble cause which have distinguished you in the late action."

After the battle of Roanoke he made a short visit to New York. His fame had gone before him. Entirely unconscious that he had attained celebrity, the modest youth took a room at the Metropolitan Hotel. The lamented Admiral Foote, veteran hero of the Mississippi, chanced to be there with his family. When young Porter entered the dining-hall he was recognized by the Admiral, who sent a servant with his card to invite him to take a seat with himself and family at his table. He of course accepted the invitation. The marked atten-

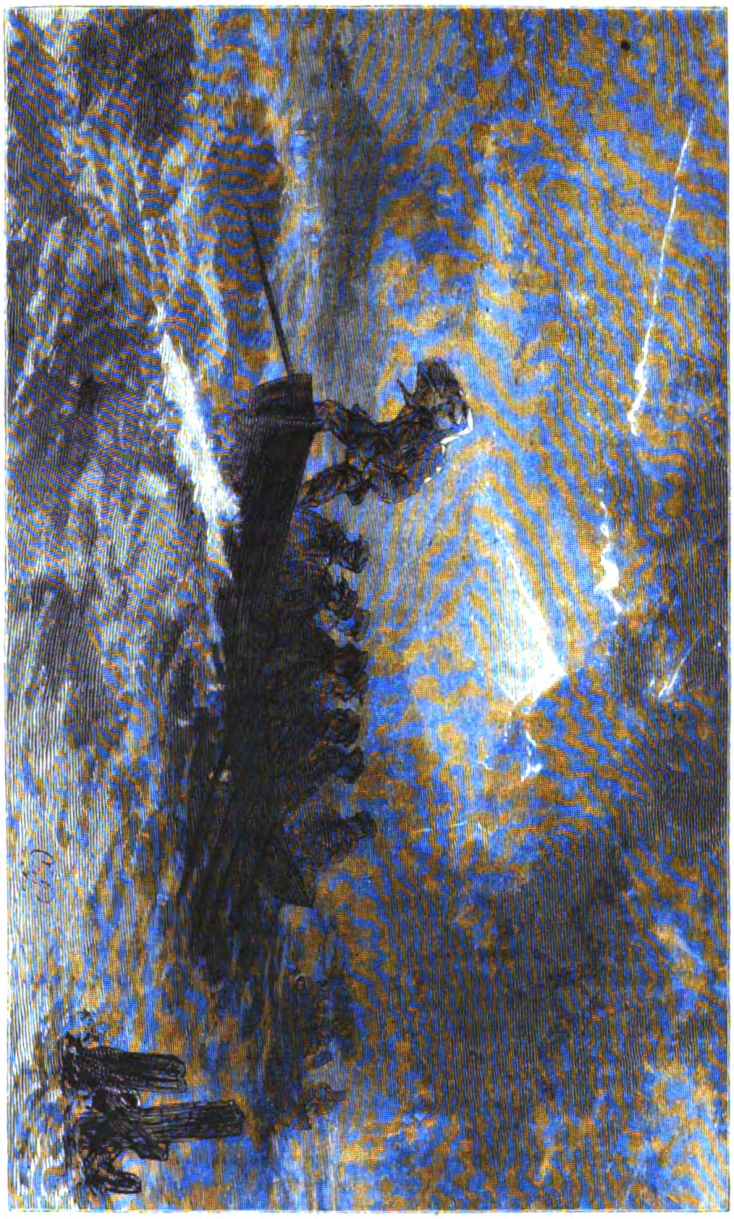
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tion of the Admiral drew all eyes upon him. The general inquiry throughout the crowded hotel was, "Who can he be?" It soon became known that he was the young hero of Roanoke, and he thus became the observed of all observers. This celebrity so much annoyed his modest nature that he quietly removed to the St. Nicholas.

Admiral Paulding, learning that he was in the city, expressed regret that the young man had not called upon him. When this was mentioned to young Porter he replied, "I have no claims upon Admiral Paulding's notice, and certainly did not feel at liberty to intrude myself upon his attention." The Admiral, however, sent a special message for him to call, which he of course obeyed. After an extremely pleasant interview he returned to his mother's apartment. "Why is it," said he, "that every one is so kind to me? I have done nothing to merit it." She playfully replied, "I do not know, unless it is because you are a good boy and try to do your duty."

His friends in Lockport sent him an elegant sword as a testimonial of their affection and their pride in his achievements. That sword, so nobly won, was his companion in his brief future career, and was placed upon his coffin when he was borne to his burial.

Returning to the navy after this brief respite, he was promoted to Acting Master, and was placed in command of the gun-boat Ellis. It would be difficult to find another instance of one so young intrusted with responsibilities so great—responsibilities which would task the energies of the most mature mind and the most manly frame. With vigilance which never slept he explored the numerous rivers, bays, and inlets of those vast inland seas which wash the coast of North Carolina. In the capture of Fort Macon he took an active part, commanding a floating battery. While engaged in blockade duty in the waters of Pamlico and Albemarle sounds, he one day caught sight of a rebel craft, and in the pursuit gained upon her so rapidly that the rebel captain ran his vessel ashore, and the crew endeavored to escape by the boats. They were, however, all cut off and captured. As they were brought on board the Ellis one of the prisoners was found mortally wounded. Young Porter, to his great surprise, recognized in the bleeding, dying young prisoner one of his classmates at the Naval School, who had embraced the cause of the rebellion. Deeply affected by the incident, he took the captive to his own room, and nursed him with the utmost tenderness until he died.



In November, 1862, he was ordered to report to Admiral Du Pont, at Port Royal. Here he was again for a few months employed in the blockade service, on the ship Canandaigua. He acquitted himself so acceptably, and displayed such energy and vigilance, that in July, 1863, he was selected by the Admiral to perform the exceedingly difficult and perilous duty of exploring Charleston harbor, under the guns of all its innumerable batteries and its fleet of patrol steamers, to search out its obstructions. This was a duty which could only be performed in dark and often stormy nights, when the adventurous party, in their open boats, were tossed by the waves and drenched by the rain. That one so young should have been selected for a duty so arduous, so full of peril, and requiring such combined energies both of daring and of prudence, is one of the highest possible compliments which could be paid to the reputation of this young man.

For twenty-four successive nights he was engaged in this enterprise. During every moment of this time he was exposed to the most imminent danger from the torpedoes, picket-boats, gun-boats, forts, and batteries of the enemy. So deeply did he feel his responsibility, and with such entireness of consecration did he devote himself to the work, that while the labor lasted he lost a pound of flesh each day.

Every night he found rebel picket-boats on the watch, and was frequently chased by them. On the occasion of a general night bombardment of Wagner, which attracted the attention of all in that direction, he slipped around in his boat between Sumter and Moultrie, and for three hours was uninterrupted in his explorations. He stood in the bow of the boat, in darkness which was only illumined by the flash of the guns, with his boat-hook feeling for and dodging torpedoes. At length he came across a buoy. Not knowing but that it was attached to a torpedo, he carefully approached and threw a rope over it, and then, backing some distance, he pulled upon it. As it proved to be harmless he again approached, and feeling with his boat-hook found it supported a large chain. Following the chain under water he soon came to other buoys and timbers, stretching across the channel. Following these up he found the opening for blockade-runners. Carefully making observations, to be sure of finding it again, he returned to the fleet and reported to the Admiral, offering to pilot the Monitors through.

One night twelve large yawl-boats were sent out from our fleet, each containing about twenty-five men and a heavy boat-howitzer, to cruise between Sumter and Cumming's Point, to prevent any rebel communications between them. It was a dark night, and the utmost vigilance was necessary, since the rebels had picket-boats, driven very fast by steam, constantly patroling the harbor. Two of our Monitors had approached the rebel forts as near as they could in safety, that they might assist the yawl-boats in case of need. Ensign Porter, in command of one or two small boats, which were less exposed to observation, and which could run in the shoal water near the shore, where the rebel gun-boats could not pursue them, and in the gloom of night could not see them, had crept up beneath the guns of Sumter and almost to the wharves of Charleston. With muffled oars and a strong pull he came rushing back to one of the Monitors with the tidings that a rebel steamer was under way and was coming down the harbor.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

EXPLORING CHARLESTON HARBOR.

A larger boat was at once pushed ahead on a scout. It was so dark that nothing could be seen at a distance of a hundred feet. It was a windy night, and the dashing of the surge and the breaking of the waves prevented any ordinary noise from being heard. Suddenly a rebel steamer emerged from the darkness, rushing down directly upon the scout-boat, which had been sent from the Wabash. The rebel steamer caught sight of the boat, fired a gun into her, and dashing on, struck the boat on the bow, breaking her to pieces. The men leaped into the water, and as the steamer swept by volleys of musketry were fired upon them while struggling in the waves. Ensign Porter, hearing the report of the howitzer, the firing of the musketry, and the cry of the drowning, utterly regardless of his own danger, ordered his men to bend to their oars to rescue the crew. There is something truly sublime in the vision of that fragile boy of eighteen, in that dark and stormy night, with no eye to see him but the eye of his God, with no impulse to urge him but his own noble soul, rushing into the very jaws of destruction and death to save his drowning comrades. In a moment he was in the midst of them. Eight he dragged from the water into his boat. The steamer had actually passed over them. It now turned to complete its work, and yet young Porter, with apparently as much coolness as if in his father's parlor, flashed the light of his dark lantern all around over the waves to ascertain if any more drowning men could be discovered; though he knew full well that those gleams would but guide the on-rushing rebel steamer down upon him.

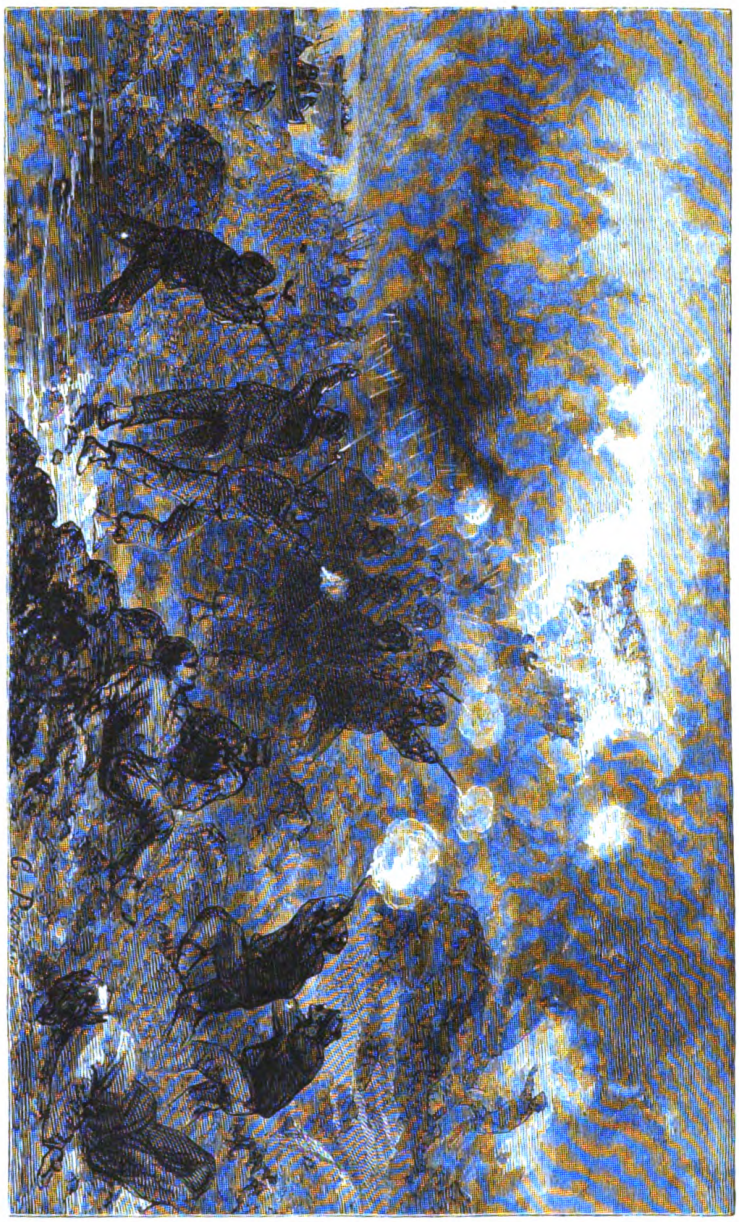
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The flash of his lantern revealed to him the steamer heading directly for his boat. By this time there was a general alarm in the Union fleet. The light of Porter's lamp had revealed the rebel gun-boat to the Catskill, and she opened upon her with her ponderous guns. The gun-boat could not for a moment cope with such an antagonist, and putting on all steam she fled back into the harbor, while at the same moment young Porter, with the rescued crew, plunged into the gloom of the storm and of the night, and returned to the fleet in safety.

This is but a specimen of the services our hero rendered in these twenty-four nights of unexampled toil. He would sometimes return to the fleet so exhausted that his crew would have to lift him from his boat and lay him like a child in his berth, administering stimulants to restore him.

This was a period of intense activity in the harbor. There were daily bombardments, and earth and ocean seemed to shake beneath the tempest of war.

Ensign Porter, after an hour or two of sleep, would be again found on the gun-deck, commanding his section of guns in action, stripped to shirt and trowsers, black with smoke and powder, sighting every gun. His spirits were always elastic and joyous; never a complaining word or a confession of fatigue or a downcast countenance. The bombardment from our fleet and land batteries had crumbled the walls of Sumter into ruins. Still those ruins afforded impregnable protection to the rebel garrison, who in casemates of rock manned its guns. Admiral Dahlgren deemed it advisable, before attempting to penetrate the harbor with his ships, to get full possession of the fort, which seemed to be only a mass of crumbling ruins. He organized an expedition of boats to storm the fortress in a night attack. It was a very perilous enterprise, for the garrison could open upon the assailants with grape and canister, and all the surrounding rebel forts could concentrate upon them the most deadly fire.



Though the result of the expedition could not but be doubtful, the importance of the enterprise was sufficient to warrant the hazard. Ensign Porter, ever eager to lead where the blows fell thickest and fastest, implored permission to join the undertaking. Commodore Rowan, aware of the priceless value of such a life, very reluctantly gave his consent. Thirty boats, carrying seven hundred men, were collected; and on the night of September 7, 1863, the attempt was made. The rebels, with their glasses, could see the boats collected from the fleet, and made every preparation to meet the assault. They sent down from Charleston a reinforcement of three hundred men, with every needful provision to repel the assault; they also brought some gun-boats into position, and had all the adjoining forts in readiness to overwhelm, by a concentrated fire, the assailing party with swift destruction.

In the darkness of the night stealthily the boats approached Fort Sumter. Suddenly there burst upon them such a storm of iron and of lead from the garrison, the gun-boats, and the batteries as no mortal valor could withstand. This tornado of war swept every boat back but three. One of these three was commanded by Benjamin H. Porter. These three boats reached the débris of the fort. A hundred men sprang from them upon the broken mound of brick and stone, with the deafening thunder of artillery filling the air, and with round shot, grape-shot, and hand-grenades flying in all directions around them. The wounded, the dead, and trails of blood marked their path as they ascended the rugged acclivity a distance of forty feet. Here they unexpectedly encountered a perpendicular wall 16 feet high, with its top crowded with rebel sharp-shooters. They threw down hand-grenades which, bursting in the boats, blew them to pieces. These grenades also fell with fearful destruction into the disordered ranks of the assailants. At the same time fire-balls were thrown down which lighted up the whole scene as bright as day, enabling the garrison to take unerring aim at the little handful of men struggling at such fearful odds. Our brave tars sheltered themselves as well as possible behind the débris of the battered walls, and, refusing to surrender, continued the fight for two hours, hoping the boats would return or the fleet come up to their assistance. But no help could be sent them, and after the loss of many men the remnant were forced to surrender and were marched into the fort as captives.

The commander could not but admire the gallantry they had displayed, and received them with much courtesy. "Gentlemen," said he, to the officers, "you are unexpected guests. But I will entertain you to the best of my ability."

The next day they were allowed to send to the fleet for clothing and money, and were then dispatched by steamer to Charleston. As they landed upon the wharf, and were marched through the streets to the jail, the whole population of the city crowded around them with exultation. They were soon after removed for safe keeping to Columbia, South Carolina, and there this heroic young man and his brave comrades were subjected by their barbarous foe not to the treatment of prisoners of war, but they were shut up in close confinement like felons in a jail. For fourteen months Benjamin Porter endured these woes, with a resolution of spirit which never for one moment flagged. At first he was sanguine in the hope that an exchange would soon be effected; but as the dreary months of imprisonment rolled on and all those hopes died away plans of escape began to be meditated. With long and perilous toil they contrived to dig a tunnel under the hearth to the outside wall, ingeniously concealing their operations from their jailer. They had so far succeeded in this enterprise that the work of one more day would have carried them so far that, in a dark night, they could have broken

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ASSAULT ON SUMTER.

through outside of their prison walls. Though they would then have been in the very heart of rebeldom, they doubted not that their sagacity and energy would enable them to elude their foes and escape to a land of freedom. When one of his companions suggested the apparent hopelessness, even if he escaped from the prison, of ever reaching from such a distance the Union lines, he replied:

"No matter; the enjoyment of a sense of freedom and of Heaven's pure air for one day, or one hour, is sufficient to warrant all the toil and all the exposure to recapture or death!"

Just at this time their plan was discovered—betrayed, as was believed, by a traitor in the building. Bitter indeed, almost heart and hope crushing, was their disappointment. It is said that sorrows go in troops. Porter had now been three months in captivity when a new and very terrible calamity befell him. The rebel Government, as an act of reprisal for the imprisonment as pirates of some rebel privateers, ordered two officers at Columbia—Lieutenant Williams and Ensign Porter—to be put into close confinement in irons, as hostages. By some misunderstanding the rebel privateersmen had been thus treated. The matter, however, was promptly brought to the notice of our Government, and the assumed pirates were released from irons. But it so happened that at this time, for several weeks, there was a rupture of all communication between the two hostile parties. Consequently these two officers (Lieutenant Williams and Ensign Porter) remained in irons,

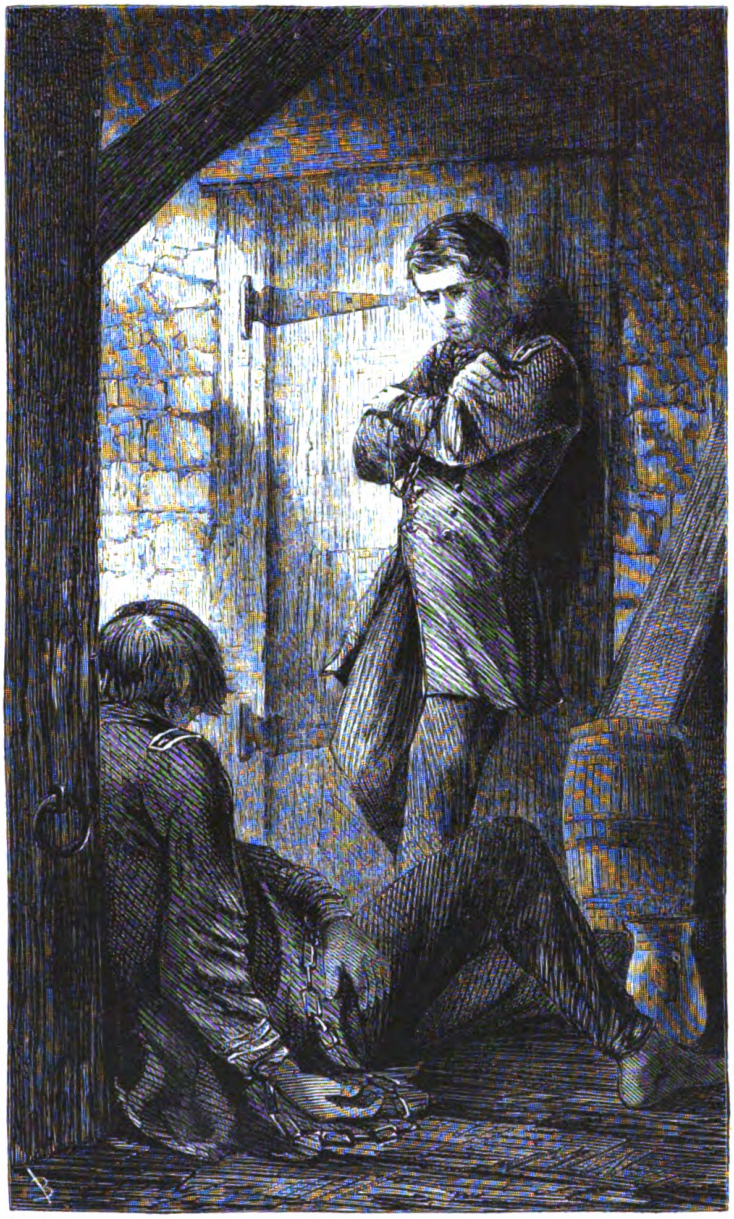
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in utter solitude and in close confinement, in a cold and gloomy cell, without fire, bed, or chair, from early in December to the 15th of March. The clanking of their chains at every move they made could be heard distinctly by their comrades in the adjoining room. In the following terms this brave-hearted, uncomplaining boy—cold, hungry, and fettered—wrote to his father:

"Lieutenant E. P. Williams and myself are in irons and close confinement, held as hostages for Acting-Masters Braile and M'Guire, of the Southern navy, now, as I am informed, confined at Fort M'Henry to be tried as pirates. I wish you would see what you can do for me; for although we are as comfortable as can be under the circumstances, still we are far from being comfortable."

He knew well what would be the throbbings of a father's anxious heart and of a mother's tender love did they know the sufferings which their child was enduring. He would therefore conceal his anguish, and only let them know just so much as was necessary to guide to efforts for his relief. It was not, however, until March, 1864, that the chains were stricken from his limbs, and he was cheered by the tidings that he was to be removed to Richmond, there to be exchanged. But a new disappointment fell upon him. The advance of General Butler up the James River, and the opening of Grant's magnificent and final campaign before Richmond, broke off communications. A long and tedious summer of continued imprisonment ensued, wearing much upon the health and fortitude of all the prisoners. But it is their united testimony that through all these lingering months of suffering not a complaining word escaped the lips of Ensign Porter. His generous sympathy, his happy, hopeful spirit so cheered the sinking hearts of his comrades that they regarded him almost as an angel of consolation.

It so happened that there was a young lady resident in Columbia who had known Ensign Porter in his favored home of competence and refinement in the North. Learning accidentally of his incarceration, she applied for permission to see him, but was peremptorily refused. She, however, contrived to open a correspondence with him, occasionally sent him some comforts, and at last, by her generous persistence, induced the friends in Columbia of a rebel officer who was confined on Johnson's Island, in Lake Erie, to pay Ensign Porter $300, upon his promise that his friends at the North should remit the equivalent to their relative. She was enabled to make such a representation of the ability and honor of the family, that the verbal promise of the young captive was deemed ample security. This money contributed much to the comfort not only of Ensign Porter but to that also of his companions. He was now able to write home; but the only complaint to be found in his letters was "that, at his age, he could not afford to lose so much time while there was so much active service to be done."



In the winter of 1863 General Burnside arrested a rebel officer found recruiting in our lines in Kentucky. He was tried by court-martial and executed. Soon after, the rebels found a Captain Harris, of East Tennessee, engaged in the same business within lines which they claimed as theirs. Pending reference to Richmond for confirmation of the sentence of death which a court-martial had pronounced upon him, he was confined in irons in a room opening from one in which the naval officers of the Sumter expedition were confined. He had been there several months when these officers arrived. Ensign Porter, on being relieved from irons and returned to his old room, succeeded with his jack-knife in removing or springing the lock of the door of Captain Harris's room. Then, after much effort, he taught him how to slip his irons off and on again. This was to him an immense relief, as he would slip them on only when the jailer was about to enter the room. When Ensign Porter and his associate officers came North they left Captain Harris still in his room, liable any day to be led out to be hung; and there he remained, with a brave and manly heart, this terrible doom ever impending over him, until the approach of General Sherman's army in the spring of 1865.

In the confusion of these tumultuous scenes, when the sweep of Sherman's columns was spreading dismay in all directions, the jail took fire in the night and was entirely consumed. In the morning Captain Harris's shackles were found among the glowing embers, and it was supposed that he had miserably perished in the flames. But the brave Captain, in the confusion of the fire, and aided by the dismay which then agitated all Southern hearts, had quietly dropped his shackles, walked forth into the streets, and made a straight path for his feet to our army lines at Wilmington. Here he met with warmest congratulations some of those friends who had so sadly left him at Columbia a prisoner in chains awaiting the scaffold.

In October, 1864, an arrangement was effected for the exchange of all the naval officers and men captured at Fort Sumter. Mr. Porter emptied his pockets of all his money, and gave all his spare clothes and other effects to his friend Colonel Payne, a distinguished officer of the One Hundredth New York Volunteers, who had shared his imprisonment, but who was not permitted to share his release.*

* I can not refrain here from paying a brief tribute of respect and affection to Colonel L. S. Payne, who had done so much and has suffered so much for his country. While Ensign Porter was reconnoitring the fortifications and positions of the enemy in Charleston harbor Colonel Payne was engaged in the same service in the labyrinth of creeks south of Sumter. These two officers were summoned to meet on board Admiral Dahlgren's ship for concerted action. Unfortunately the night before the appointed meeting Colonel Payne was shot through the neck and captured. They soon met as captives in a rebel prison, and for weary months suffered together, each cheering the other. For some time before Ensign Porter's release they were lodged in the same room, and a very strong affection sprung up between them. "After Mr. Porter's release from irons," writes Colonel Payne, "he managed to get some old naval works on navigation,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PORTER IN PRISON.

With a buoyant heart young Porter found his steps directed toward his home. On arriving at Richmond he was placed in Libby Prison, and after ten days of vexatious delay was finally sent to our lines. Taking passage for Washington he, with some others, arrived there the next day and reported to the Navy Department. Porter proceeded that night to New York, where he had a happy reunion with those dear friends who loved him so tenderly, who cherished him so proudly, and whose hearts had bled with such anguish in sympathy with his sufferings and his perils. His two years of toilsome service, of gloomy imprisonment, of hard fare, had left their traces on his once beaming and happy face. His frame was emaciate, his cheeks sunken, and his countenance bore a premature expression of care and sadness. A few months had done the work of years. He was no longer the light-hearted, joyous youth who had so buoyantly left his happy home but a few months before, but the mature man, war-worn and pressed down by as weighty responsibilities as can ever rest upon a human heart.

The reaction from the gloom of the prison to the glowing affections and comforts and endearments which now clustered around him and some mathematical books, and a work on geometry. To these he devoted most of his attention in study, often saying that he intended to be the first in his class, on examination, when exchanged."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google were so great that for many nights he was tortured with restlessness and the most hideous dreams. He was starving; he was escaping from prison; he was recaptured; he was dragged back to dungeons and chains; he toiled in vain to unclasp his irons and they ate into the bone. The suffering of these nights was positive and extreme. Gradually, however, as parental love so tenderly encircled him these impressions wore away, and his countenance resumed its former expression of beauty and of joyousness.

Just before his imprisonment he had been ordered to proceed to Newport to be examined for promotion. It was now necessary that this should be attended to. A special board of examiners was convened at Washington, with his early friend Admiral Goldsborough at its head. He passed an excellent examination, and his rank of Lieutenant was dated back to the preceding February, when he was but nineteen. This is probably the only instance of that rank being attained in our navy at so early an age.

Ensign Porter was not yet exchanged, but was liberated on his parole. He, however, reported to the Secretary of the Navy in his new rank as Lieutenant, stating that he was ready and anxious for active service as soon as his exchange could be effected. Since he was fifteen years of age, excepting the time of his imprisonment, and while at the Naval School, he had spent less than sixty days on shore. While waiting for this release from his parole he had leave of absence, and visited his childhood's home in Western New York. In the greetings with which he was received by his neighbors, friends, and old school-mates, he seemed entirely unconscious that he had done any thing worthy of remark, while he was loud in praise of the exploits of his brother officers.

He had been at home but two days when a telegram from the Department announced his exchange, and summoned him to report immediately to Admiral Porter at Hampton Roads. He had hoped to have spent Christmas with his friends, which would have been the first he had enjoyed at home for five years. But ere that day came he was with the fleet thundering at the walls of Fort Fisher. With all possible speed he hastened for Hampton Roads. There he found that the squadron had already sailed for Beaufort, North Carolina. Embarking on board a transport he reached the fleet and reported to the Admiral. He was warmly received, and immediately placed in command of the flag-ship, the Malvern. The following anecdote is related in reference to his arrival at the fleet: One of the most distinguished Captains, having heard that Lieutenant Porter had reached the squadron, ordered his boat, and, proceeding to the flag-ship, asked for an audience with the Admiral.

"I understand," he said, "that Lieutenant Porter has arrived."

"Yes, Sir," was the reply of the Admiral.

"Well, I want him."

"What do you want him for?"

"Why, I am short of officers, and I know him, and I have written to the Department for him."

"Do you want him very much?" the Admiral responded.

"Yes, Sir."

"Will it make you sick if you don't have him?"

"I don't know but that it will."

"Well, you can't have him. He commands this ship, Sir."

Lieutenant Porter passed through the first battle of Fort Fisher safely. In planning the second attack, as the fort had been largely reinforced and strengthened, the Admiral deemed it necessary, in addition to the land troops, to send on shore all the force which could be spared from the ships. About eighteen hundred sailors and marines were thus landed. Lieutenant Porter, carrying the Admiral's flag, claimed the right to lead the assaulting column. Just before the conflict he wrote to his mother:

"We are now off New Inlet once more, for the purpose of taking Fort Fisher; and this time, by God's blessing, we mean to do it. We have General Terry in command, and he is young and ambitious. I hope he will make his men fight. It is 4 o'clock in the morning, and we are moving in for the attack. We will strike a telling blow for Columbia to-day. America expects every man to do his duty, and our gallant tars never flinch."

Another letter which he wrote to a young friend and companion in arms reveals the inner man—the ardor of his affections, the nobleness and the purity of his aspirations, and that lofty faith which allies man to the angel. His young friend had recently become a Christian, and the letter from which we quote is in response to one which he had just received from that friend announcing this fact:

"I was made very happy to-day by the receipt of your letter of the 3d instant. And, my dear friend, although I can not say that I am a Christian, I was made happier than I ever was in my life before by knowing that you, the dearest friend on earth to me, had at last 'tacked ship' and become a Christian. Your letter has made me stop and review my past life, and I assure you that my past wickedness really frightens me. It seems as if I had gone too far to hope for forgiveness. It seems as though God would never receive one so wicked as myself. But as Christ died to save us all I shall hope that, by trying to be good the rest of my life, his blood will wash out my many sins, and that at last I may stand at your side, one of our Heavenly Father's chosen. It will be a hard road to travel for a while, but I am determined to give up all my old wicked habits and try to the utmost to be a true Christian.

"As I said before, I can not feel that I am a Christian, although I know that Christ died to save me. But if God will keep me I will try and be one; and I know that I can succeed if I try, for our Heavenly Father has promised to listen to all who ask him with their whole hearts. How could you imagine that I could love you the less because you are a Christian? No, no, Adams, I love you more, if such a thing be possible, than I ever did before. And now I beg you to pray for me, and ask God to give me a new heart and teach me to pray. I shall pray for you every night.

"I am going ashore to lead my men to the charge on Fort Fisher; and if God will keep me from harm

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and bring me out of the fight in safety I will try and obtain a ten days' furlough, and then, my friend, I will see you. I have been in command of the flag-ship several weeks, and am very pleasantly situated. I expect that we shall have a very hard fight, and as I am going to assault the fort I run a good chance of losing the number of my mess. But if I do, my ever dear friend, you must remember that I love you with my whole heart, and I know that you will think of me sometimes. I shall write you again from New Inlet, and give you an account of the fight. Until then I beg of you to think of me and pray for me, and I will do the same for you."

The following extract from a letter written, after the death of Lieutenant Porter, by the friend to whom the above letter was addressed will be read with interest. It was written to the father of the deceased, under date of April 3, 1865:

"I visited the Malvern a few days since and went into poor Ben's cabin—a cozy, comfortable little place—and I wished I could have been alone for a little time. It was a greater trial than I had anticipated, and every thing seemed to bear a reference to Ben.

"Since I sailed I have been through the places where we were together years ago, or in which he had been since we parted. I have been daily and hourly brought in contact with persons and objects which have brought him to my mind, and every time his memory is dearer and purer than before. It is now a part of my very self. Every thing I undertake I wonder if that would have been his way of doing it; and his example is the model I try to follow.

"I miss him in my duties and in my plans, and every day his absence seems more and more unbearable. And every day I feel a greater and prouder satisfaction in the knowledge that so noble and gallant a hero as Ben called himself my best-beloved friend; and I thank my Heavenly Father daily for it, and for the happy promise of Ben's eternal rest in His arms."

The terrible hour for the assault came. Young Porter, bearing the Admiral's flag, claimed the post of honor in leading the headmost column with the Malvern men. As he left the ship, with the flag in his hand, he said, "Admiral, this shall be the first flag on the fort." Admiral Porter's own son, but seventeen years of age, went by his side. But Lieutenant Porter's hour had come. Accompanied by two of his best friends, and two of the most heroic young men the war has developed—Lieutenants W. B. Cushing and S. W. Preston—he took his place at the head of the column. Under a heavy fire from the enemy's guns, which exposed them to instant death, they advanced, about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, to within four hundred yards of the immense works of the foe. They then threw themselves upon the sand, and remained there quietly talking while the battle raged with deafening roar, and thousands of shells were hurtled through the air over their heads, as the majestic fleet and equally majestic fort exchanged bombardments. At last the signal was given to charge. They sprang to their feet. The only survivor of the three young men, Lieutenant W. B. Cushing, the hero of the Albemarle capture, whose fame can never die, thus describes the scene which ensued:

"Ben looked grave and determined, and I remember being much impressed by his supremely noble bearing. In a moment we were under a terrific fire, and the men commenced to get confused. It needed all the pluck and daring that man can have to lead and give confidence to the sailors in charging up that bare and level beach. Ben threw himself to the front, flag in hand, and the charge went on. We were all three in uniform, perhaps rashly, but it has ever been the pride of naval officers to wear, amidst the smoke of battle, the same lace that denotes their rank when enjoying the pleasures of society.

"At the palisade, by the ditch that surrounds the fort, Ben fell, shot through the breast. His last words were, 'Carry me down to the beach.' Four of the Malvern's and Monticello's men raised him and tried to comply. Two were killed. He waved the others aside with a last motion, and died, with as sweet a smile as I could paint with words. I doubt not that some world met his dying eyes where spirits so pure, so noble, so brave as his meet with an eternal and great reward. The blood-stained fortress where he fell will stand forever a monument of tender and sorrowful recollections to us all. It would be idle to measure a brother officer's regards by a parent's love; but he carries the respect and affection of all to the grave, and has left a navy of mourners."

His friend and companion Lieutenant S. W. Preston fell almost at the same moment, and together the spirits of these two noble young men took their flight to their celestial home, where, we trust, clustering angels gathered to greet them. Fleet-Captain K. R. Breese, in his Report to the Admiral, pays the following beautiful tribute to the memory of these two young men, who so cheerfully sacrificed their lives for their country:

"Lieutenant S. W. Preston, after accomplishing most splendidly the work assigned to him by you, which was both dangerous and laborious, under constant fire, came to me, as my aid, for orders. Showing no flagging of spirit or of body, and returning from the rear, where he had been sent, he fell, among the foremost at the front, as he had lived, the embodiment of a United States naval officer.

"Lieutenant Porter, conspicuous by his figure and uniform, as well as by his great gallantly, claimed the right to lead the headmost column with the Malvern men he had taken with him, carrying your flag, and he fell at its very head. Two more noble spirits the world never saw; nor had the navy ever two more intrepid men. Young, talented, and handsome, the bravest of the brave, pure in their lives—surely their names deserve something more than a passing mention, and are worthy to be handed down to posterity with the greatest and best of naval heroes."

There is heart-touching pathos in the following letter of condolence from Admiral Porter to the bereaved mother:

"Your gallant son was my beau-ideal of an officer. His heart was filled with gallantry and love of country. It must be a dreadful blow to lose such a son. It was a dreadful blow to me to lose such an officer. My associations with my officers are not those of a commander. We are like comrades, and form fond attachments to each other. When they fall I feel as if I had lost one of my own family. Your son was captain of my flag-ship, and a favorite with me and all who knew him.

"He was brave to a fault. I shall never forget the day he left the ship, with my flag in his hand, saying, 'Admiral, this shall be the first flag on the fort.' My own son, a lad of seventeen, went by his side, and was with him when he fell, with my flag in his hand, trying to reach the enemy's ramparts, from whence the murderous wretches were firing thousands of muskets into our brave fellows.

"That was a wretched night for me. Your son was reported killed, and mine, last seen at his side, was missing till late in the night. I could imagine his father's anguish, and I could imagine yours. I have no

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

DEATH OF PORTER.

consolation to give you, unless to console you with the certainty of meeting in a better world than this. I have gone through a great deal in this war. For four years I have been but one month with my family. I have seen my official family cut down one after another, and my heart is so sad that I feel as if I could never smile again.

"Among all the young men who have been on my staff no one had my entire confidence more than your lost son—lost only for a time. You will find him again where all is peace and joy. I would like to drink of the waters of Lethe and forget the last four years."

It is a remarkable fact that the best of men feel their sins far more deeply than do the worst. Young Porter felt that he was a "great sinner" in the sight of God. And yet so unblemished were his morals, and there was such maidenly purity in his character, that, to his friends, he appeared without a stain. When we see such a one shedding tears of penitence, breathing prayers for pardon, hungering for a more holy life, pleading for renewal by the Spirit of God, and casting himself upon the merits of the great atonement, and when we remember that he cheerfully sacrificed his life for the most sacred cause in which men ever drew the sword, it is not without reason that we feel assured that angels bore him on their wings to his celestial home.

The morning after the battle Admiral Porter dispatched a steamer for Norfolk with the bodies of Lieutenants Porter and Preston escorted by Lieutenant Saunders, a friend of the deceased. Thence the body of Lieutenant Porter, in a metallic case, was forwarded to his friends in New York by express. Commodore Paulding was anxious to honor the memory of the departed by a public funeral, and General

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Burnside expressed a wish that the land troops might join in the procession. But the grief of his friends was so deep that they had no heart for the public display, and they chose to retire with the remains of their loved one to his birthplace that he might sleep by the side of his brother and sister.

And as the precious body sank into the grave the anguish of both father and mother found solace in gratitude that God had given them the remains to bury; for another son of this patriot family, the peer of Benjamin in all those traits which ennoble man, had previously fallen in the second battle of Bull Run. Two journeys the heart-stricken father made to that field, where treason had so cruelly robbed him of his boy, and twice he returned to his desolated home, having searched the graves in vain to find the body of his son. It would be a comfort to weeping friends could the remains of these noble brothers slumber side by side here below. But it is a greater comfort to feel assured that their spirits have met in heaven; that there they are now, brother angels, hand clasping hand and heart beating responsive to heart in joys which shall never fade away.

Near the banks of one of the most beautiful lakes which gem the Empire State the remains of Benjamin H. Porter now repose, awaiting the resurrection summons. He sleeps with many of his loved kindred around him. And whoever drops a tear over his grave may say: "Benjamin H. Porter merits these tears, for he was a cherished son, a noble brother, a brilliant officer, a warm-hearted friend, and a humble Christian."

THE CHILDREN IN THE MOON.

HEARKEN, child, unto a story!
For the moon is in the sky,
And across her shield of silver,
See! two tiny cloudlets fly.

Watch them closely, mark them sharply,
As across the light they pass—
Seem they not to have the figures
Of a little lad and lass?

See, my child, across their shoulders
Lies a little pole! and, lo!
Yonder speck is just the bucket,
Swinging softly to and fro.

It is said, these little children,
Many and many a summer night,
To a little well far northward
Wandered in the still moonlight.

To the way-side well they trotted,
Filled their little buckets there,
And the Moon-man, looking downward,
Saw how beautiful they were.

Quoth the man, "How vexed and sulky
Looks the little rosy boy!
But the little handsome maiden
Trips behind him full of joy.

"To the well behind the hedgerow
Trot the little lad and maiden;
From the well behind the hedgerow
Now the little pail is laden.

"How they please me! how they tempt me!
Shall I snatch them up to-night?
Snatch them, set them here forever
In the middle of my light?

"Children, ay, and children's children
Should behold my babes on high,
And my babes should smile forever,
Calling others to the sky;"

Thus the philosophic Moon-man
Muttered many years ago,
Set the babes with pole and bucket,
To delight the folks below.

Never is the bucket empty,
Never are the children old;
Ever when the moon is shining
We the children may behold.

Ever young and ever little,
Ever sweet and ever fair!
When thou art a man, my darling,
Still the children will be there!

Ever young and ever little,
They will smile when thou art old;
When thy locks are thin and silver,
Theirs will still be shining gold.

They will haunt you from their heaven,
Softly beckoning down the gloom—
Smiling in eternal sweetness
On thy cradle, on thy tomb!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE SHADED STREAM.

I KNOW a stream whose rippling current flows
By shady banks whereon the white-birch grows,
And beechen trees that darkly interlace
Their spreading branches in a close embrace,
Like loving friends who stand on either side
And stretch their arms across the murmuring tide.

There moss-grown rocks, half hid in tall green fern,
Whichever way the gazer's eye may turn,
Along the borders of the stream abound;
There, too, the iris by the brink is found;
And thirsty cattle come at noon to lave
Their heated fetlocks in its brimming wave.

With many a curve it takes its devious way,
While through the leaves the yellow sunbeams play,
And softly round the denser shadows fall
From the laced boughs where thrush and cat-bird call;
And broad-leaved water-weeds, of glossiest green,
In separate clusters by the shores are seen.

In Spring when balmy south winds softly blow,
And quickly fades the last long streak of snow,
On either bank the trembling violet blooms,
Preferring most the unfrequented glooms;
And from his safe and rocky-guarded lair
Comes forth the trout the angler's skill to dare.

When Summer's genial warmth the wide air fills,
And draws a veil about the purple hills,
So thickly gathers then the leafy screen
No ray of sunlight finds its way between,
Save here and there a truant golden beam
That struggles through to light the shaded stream.

But most I love to linger by the side
Of that sweet stream in mellow Autumn's tide,
When overhead the beach leaves gather brown,
And beechen nuts come gently pattering down;
And all the woodland's rich autumnal glow
Is seen reflected in the stream below.

But captive now, with neither stir nor sound,
In iron Winter's icy fetters bound,
No more by shadowy banks where broad ferns grow,
With devious course, its voiceless currents flow;
And leafless now the woodland monarchs grind
Their barren branches in the wintry wind.

Ah! many a time with friends my heart holds dear
I've lingered by that stream while yet the year
Was in its green and glowing Summer prime,
Or in the golden Autumn's fruitful time;
And eager longings, not unmixed with pain,
Stir in my breast to tread its shores again.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A HOME.

A CHRISTIAN NEIGHBORHOOD.

"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

How do we love ourselves? Not for qualities that please us, but, whether good or evil, handsome or homely, with good manners or without them, we all desire and choose to make self happy. This is the meaning of loving self in the above command. It is our duty to love self as much as it is to love our neighbor; and as the care of our own body and soul is committed to us more than to any other person, we are bound to give more time and attention to self than to any other.

But we are commanded by our Creator to regard and value the happiness of our neighbors as we do our own. This is required, not because they have agreeable qualities that please us, but because love is the fulfilling of that great law of virtue and happiness which rules in the kingdom of heaven, and which the Lord of heaven came to establish upon earth.

Of Him it is written: "Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich."—2 Cor. viii. 9.

"Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his."—Rom. viii. 9.

"How hardly shall they that have riches enter the kingdom of heaven."

"We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in the body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad. Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men."—2 Cor. v. 10, 11.

At this time, when wealth is coming like a flood, and thousands even of the professed followers of Christ are hasting to be rich, these words of Holy Writ should be anxiously pondered. The great question, to those who have an abundance, is, How are we to follow the example of Him who for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich? If the spirit of Christ is that of self-sacrificing benevolence, and if any man have not this spirit he is none of his, who among the rich and prosperous are to enter the kingdom of heaven? Perhaps this article may aid in answering this question.

In a previous Number (November, 1865) the writer gave drawings of a house designed to secure economy of time, labor, and expense, and also designed to enable a woman of refined tastes to train her children, in an agreeable manner, to the domestic exercise so indispensable to woman's health and to a perfect Christian home. In a succeeding Number (May, 1866) was presented plans for securing a healthful home, and, as indispensable to this, a properly warmed and ventilated house.

It is the aim of this article to make some suggestions as to the use of wealth and leisure to secure a Christian Neighborhood.

In noticing the dwellings of the prosperous class, even when occupied by professed followers

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of Christ, one is led to inquire—not of all, but in many cases—Are these exhibiting that self-denying benevolence which is the true spirit of Christ, and without which they are none of his?

Let us sketch such a neighborhood as may be observed in the vicinity of any of our large cities. We find six or eight large mansions and extensive grounds arranged with lavish expenditures. On an average each may contain five or six persons living in parlors, and nearly as many living in kitchens. Those in the parlor have books and pictures, fancy-work, horses, carriages, and leisure to visit, receive company, and travel. Excepting the father, they do nothing to earn their livelihood. They do but little of the work of the family, and have little to do with the servants except to see that they do their work satisfactorily.

The children of the family are educated to enjoy this life themselves, instead of working for the good of others. To have a good time in this world seems to be the chief aim. On Sunday they attend church, perhaps take a class in Sunday-school, give a few dollars, from their abundance, in charity, and perhaps a few hours each week to some charitable association. But the main business of their life is to have a good time in getting various enjoyments for self in this world. They practice little or no self-denial for others, and engage in no earnest, systematic, or laborious efforts to rescue their fellow-creatures from ignorance and sin. It seems to be taken for granted that it is those of small means who are to work and practice self-denial in training the neglected children of our Heavenly Father; but that as soon as riches increase then they are to cease laboring for others, and have a good time in gaining all manner of earthly enjoyments.

Now the great difficulty is this: The literal following of Christ in the direction, "Sell that thou hast and give to the poor, and come and follow me," literally obeyed by all the rich, would throw out of employment and reduce to beggary the thousands who are supported by the manufacture and sale of articles of comfort and luxury to the rich. And as the inventions to lessen labor increase, there is no way to supply remunerative labor to all classes except to increase the elegance and comforts of life—to patronize the fine arts and all the refinements of high civilization. It therefore can not be the duty of all Christians to follow Christ by literally becoming poor.

But the more talents are given, and the higher the culture attained, the greater the obligation to discover the true manner in which Christ's teachings are to be followed and his spirit exhibited. And because this is a difficult problem to solve, multitudes of those professing to follow Christ throw it aside as unintelligible and unpractical, and content themselves with living as all the rest of the world do who make no pretensions to be the disciples of Christ. For this reason it was that our Lord exclaimed, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter the kingdom of heaven!"

It will be the aim in what follows to suggest certain arrangements in a neighborhood of wealthy or prosperous families which would be more conformed to the spirit of Christ than those which usually prevail.

Look at any city where the residences of the wealthy abound. There will be found six or more mansions, each surrounded by several acres of highly cultivated and ornamented grounds, and near by small tenement-houses, abounding with children, each house having about as many square yards of land as the large houses have square acres. The first thing to be noticed is the manner in which labor is divided. In the small tenements the boys rise early and go forth with the father to work in the pure air and life-giving sun. They work from eight to ten hours, with little opportunity for amusement or for reading or study. In the large houses the boys sleep till a late breakfast, then study or play till school-time, then spend three hours in a crowded and ill-ventilated school, stimulating brain and nerves. Then home to a hearty dinner, and then again to school three hours.

Thus one class of boys work most of the day, with little exercise of the brain; the other class work the brain, with little exercise of the muscles and little sun and air.

So with the girls: in the tenement-houses the girls go to kitchens and shops to work most of the day, with little chance for mental culture or the refinements of taste. In the large mansions the daughters sleep late, do but little labor for the family, and spend their time in school, or in light reading. Some make and mend their own wardrobe, but hired labor is needed to complete it in most cases.

Thus one class are trained to feel that they are a privileged few for whom others are to work, while they do only a very little to promote the improvement or enjoyment of their poorer neighbors.

Then, again, labor being confined chiefly to the unrefined and uncultivated, is disgraced and rendered unattractive to the young. One class is overworked, and the body deteriorates from excess. The other class overwork the brain and nerves, and the neglected muscles grow thin, flabby, and weak. One class has round shoulders, projecting necks, and hard hands, from excess of toil. The other class have stooping shoulders, projecting necks, and flat chests, from want of muscular exercise. One class is all brain, nerves, refinement, and selfish indolence; the other class is all muscle, is vulgar, unrefined, and envious.

Now of this wealthy class, thus described, many are professed Christians, who really wish to obey Christ's teachings and cherish his true self-sacrificing spirit.

They feel that, somehow, this state of things is wrong, and yet they see no practicable way of remedy, and so they go on from year to year.

The next thing to be noticed is the style in

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google which the more wealthy classes accumulate the elegances of civilization without even an attempt to elevate their destitute neighbors to this culture and enjoyment. Their expensive pictures multiply on their frescoed walls, their elegant books increase in their closed book-cases, their fine pictures and prints remain shut in port-folios, to be only occasionally opened by a privileged few. Their handsome equipages are for the comfortable and prosperous—not for the feeble and poor who have none of their own. All their social amusements are exclusive, and their expensive entertainments are for those only who can return the same to them.

Our Divine Master thus teaches: "When thou makest a feast call not thy kinsmen or thy rich neighbors, lest they also bid thee again, and a recompense be made thee. But when thou makest a feast call the poor, for they can not recompense thee; for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." Again, our Lord, after performing the most servile office, taught thus: "If I, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye ought to wash one another's feet."

Now does the ordinary habits of Christ's professed followers in the prosperous classes correspond in any way with the spirit inculcated in these divine directions? Is it difficult for such to know when and how to exercise this spirit? Then is there the more need of effort to overcome the difficulty. And is it not for want of such effort that it is written, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter the kingdom of heaven?"

Now, without marking out any exact rule, or describing any definite course of action, we will suppose that in such a neighborhood certain changes here suggested should be attempted.

Take the vicinity of some city where there is still the native forest, and no streets laid out. Suppose, instead of straight streets, demanding the destruction of most of the forest trees and much unimproved space, this portion be laid out in broad, winding gravel-drives instead of streets, and so arranged as to preserve the trees. Then building-lots could be marked out and land-marks placed, but no fences erected to visibly divide the lots. Thus the unimproved land of streets would be made available to ornament, and while each person has a separate lot to beautify—all being under the direction of one artist, on a given plan—the labors of all would combine in one beautiful landscape enjoyed equally by all.

Here also might be placed a common laundry, a bake-house, and stables for all desiring economy of time, labor, and money in these directions.

We will suppose ten or twelve houses built, all designed to perform domestic labor in an economical, neat, and tasteful manner, and all supplied with pure air both by day and night. Before indicating what might be aimed at by the residents of these dwellings, instead of ideals the writer will describe what has been done, and therefore could be reproduced in such a neighborhood.

In a large country town is a gentleman and his wife, between thirty and forty years of age, who have had no children of their own. A few years ago they took two young girls, whom the lady trained in all the domestic duties of the family state, while in the evening the gentleman gave them lessons preparing them to be teachers in common schools, or good wives and mothers should they marry. The son of an absent soldier shared in the same privileges.

Then these Christian workers adopted two motherless little girls, one of them an invalid and a cripple. To aid in this increase of care and labor they added a respectable and affectionate woman as assistant cook and nurse. The sickly cripple child is now blooming with health, and the foster-mother has gained remarkable development and vigor by her increased domestic labor; and now they are planning to take another orphan child. Meantime their reputation for benevolence has brought many a homeless wanderer to their door to be clothed, fed, and comforted till a place was found for them to earn their own livelihood.

Being persons of taste and culture and some means, they had a moderate collection of books, pictures, and works of art. These were not confined to themselves and their circle of friends. Seeking the co-operation of their neighbors and friends, a suit of rooms were fitted up with carpets, sofas, piano, sewing-machines, and many of the elegances and comforts found in the parlors of the rich. And here this benevolent couple placed most of their library and their choicest works of art. Stimulated by this example others made similar contributions; and the aim of all thus contributing has been to draw to these rooms persons of all ages and conditions to be instructed and amused, and to enjoy social advantages together. Instead of the aristocratic principle, that brings together only persons of similar taste and culture, the Christian principle prevailed, by which the humbler classes in society are to be elevated and encouraged by the friendship and intercourse of those of higher culture.

All this could be accomplished only by a systematic and wise economy. Had these persons adopted a style of living similar to that of most who have equal means, the money spent to educate the young and elevate the tastes and habits of the neighborhood, would have been spent for the board and wages of servants and the other outlays connected with that style of living, while the health gained by healthful domestic labor would, very probably, have departed from the mistress to dwell only in the kitchen.

In this same neighborhood is a lady of very moderate means, who during the war gave up all her comforts to serve as nurse in a soldier's hospital at the South. On her return she built a small, tasteful cottage near these congenial friends, took a refined young friend as her associate, to aid in domestic labor and also to earn

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google a living as dress-maker. Thus these two find health and enjoyment one part of the day in domestic labor, while one earns her livelihood by the needle, and the other will ere long add some homeless or neglected one to her household to train up for the kingdom of heaven.

In the same neighborhood are a physician and his wife, working in the same Christian spirit and self-denying economy. A sick, homeless young girl comes to them for counsel and aid. They take her in, cure her, and give her healthful domestic labor. Then they train her to be an intelligent, agreeable, conscientious nurse for the sick. After practicing in this employment a while, and thus supporting herself, they lend her money to secure time for study and medical lectures, and at last they see her a valued physician to her own sex in a flourishing Health Establishment, with a liberal salary, from which she refunds to her benefactors all they have loaned, that they may again employ it for the destitute.

A second invalid comes to them, is cured, trained for a nurse, provided with funds, sent to a medical school, and in a few years becomes a successful physician, and returns the funds she received.

A third comes for similar aid, and in due time rises to be an accomplished and honored physician in one of the largest and wealthiest female institutions of the country. All this, and much more, has been accomplished by self-denying industry and economy wisely applied. Had they adopted the style of living of many of their associates, and which was at their command, all which they have thus employed for the destitute would have been spent in self-gratification.

In the same circle is seen a woman with delicate health and a small income. Had she economized and hoarded for herself she could have built a tasteful cottage near her family friends, and laid up bank-stock for support in old age.

Instead of this, while aiming to dress and to live in a style of neatness and good taste that would not offend even the fastidious, it was done with an ingenuity and economy that enabled her to live at one-fourth the personal expenditures of her associates. And by this strict economy she was constantly rescuing one after another from ignorance and sin. Had she laid up for herself she would, at the close of life, count perishable house and bank-stock as the result of life's labor. But, instead of this, she will be able to count many immortal minds by her ministries "turned to righteousness," among whom she will "shine as the firmament, and as the stars for ever and ever." When asked, "Who will provide for coming infirmities and old age?" the reply is, "The Lord will provide;" while she well understands that multitudes to whom she has ministered would rejoice in the privilege to minister to her in return.

In the same circle sometimes appears a young person who is an only daughter of parents of moderate means. When her school education was complete, at her earnest entreaties, and with promises of diligence and economy, she was allowed to take a little girl from the hands of parents both of them intemperate and miserably poor. This child was taught to read, to sew neatly, and to perform properly all domestic duties, and chiefly by her young benefactress, by whom also she was trained to a religious life, and brought to confirmation as the sponsor. And now, in married life, she is rewarded by the most devoted service and affection of her protégée in all the varied services of the family state.

In another case a young couple, just beginning married life, instead of an expensive boarding-house life take humble rooms, and a young girl who is trained by both in book knowledge and domestic arts, and thus becomes their life-long cultivated friend and helper.

The above are all examples taken from circles of such moderate resources that such benevolent ministries could be secured only by self-denying industry and strict, systematic economy.

To these examples among those of moderate means may be added some from among the wealthy:

A lady of great wealth, high position, and elegant culture, in one of our large cities, hired and furnished a house adjacent to her own, and securing the aid of another benevolent and cultivated woman, twelve orphan girls, of different ages, were taken and educated under their joint care. Not only time and money were given, but love and labor, just as if these were their own children, and as fast as one was provided for another was taken.

In another city a young lady, with property of her own, hired a house and made it a home for homeless and unprotected young women, who paid board when they could earn it, and found a refuge when out of employment.

In another city the wife of one of its richest merchants, and living in princely style, took two young girls from the certain road to ruin among the vicious poor. She boarded them with a respectable farmer, and sent them to school, and every week went out, not only to supervise but to aid in training them to habits of neatness, industry, and obedience, just as if they were her own children. Next she hired a large house near the most degraded part of the city, furnished it neatly and with all suitable conveniences to work, and then rented to those among the most degraded whom she could bring to conform to a few simple rules of decency, industry, and benevolence—one of these rules being that they should pay her the rent every Saturday night. To this motley gathering she became chief counselor and friend, quieted their brawls, taught them to aid each other in trouble or sickness, and strove to introduce among them that law of patient love and kindness illustrated by her own example. The young girls in this tenement she assembled every Saturday at her own house—taught them to sing, heard them recite their Sunday-school lessons, to be sure they were properly learned; taught them to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 make and mend their own clothing herself, trimmed their bonnets, and took charge of their Sunday dress, that it might always be in order. Of course such benevolence drew a stream of ignorance and misery to her door; and so successful was her labor that she hired a second house, and managed it on the same plan. One hot day in August a friend found her combing the head of a poor, ungainly foreign girl. She had persuaded a friend to take her from compassion, and she was returned because her head was in such a state. Finding no one else to do it, the lady herself bravely met the difficulty, and persevered in this daily ministry till the evil was remedied, and the poor girl thus secured a comfortable home and wages. In this same city a lady invested most of her property in a "Home for Incurables," where she daily ministers to these hopeless sufferers.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A young lady of wealth and position, with great musical culture and taste, found among the poor two young girls with fine voices and great musical talent. Gaining her parents' consent she took one of them home, trained her in music herself, saw that her school training was secured, and when expensive masters and instruments were needed she earned the money required as a governess in a family of wealthy friends. Then she aided the sister; and, as the result, one of them is married happily to a man of wealth, and the other is receiving a large income as a popular musical artist.

Another young girl, educated as a fine musician by her wealthy parents, at the age of sixteen was afflicted with weak eyes and a heart complaint. She strove to solace herself by benevolent ministries. By teaching music to the children of wealthy friends she earned the means to relieve and instruct the suffering ignorant and poor.

We will now suppose such a tract of land is purchased by a few benevolent individuals, and laid out on the plan indicated, houses erected for families of different sizes, in which domestic labor can be performed with economy and good taste; garden plots laid out, a common laundry, bakery, cook-shop, and stables provided (which all can use or not at choice), and finally, a superintendent of skill, taste, and energy to manage. Then the aim would be to collect a certain number of families on these grounds, or the immediate vicinity, of congenial habits and tastes, whose great aim would be to raise all within their reach to equal advantages with their own; or, in other words, to carry out the great command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

The mode to adopt would be to have each family perfectly independent, and yet a systematic division of labor be aimed at, by which each household should strive to carry out some one department of literary, or æsthetic, or domestic culture, which should be extended to all in the neighborhood wishing to secure it. The following indicates persons known to the writer prepared to unite in such an undertaking:

A lady with about $8000 at her command has great taste and experience in gardening and floriculture. She could rent one of the smallest houses, and hire from one of the adjacent tenement-houses a boy to live with her on trial. When a suitable one is thus found she could have him bound to her for a term of years, and then train him for the profession of a gardener, and educate him as if he were her son. When qualified to become her assistant, she could take another boy from the tenement-houses, or elsewhere, and make the family a self-supporting establishment, by supplying the market close at hand. Another lady, with a large family and frequent visitors, might, in one of the largest houses, take as her associate a woman of culture and refinement, with requisite domestic experience, and then receive three or four women of good character to train for the highest class of servants, and, when they are duly qualified, find places for them with wages proportioned to their superior character. When one completes her course another could be received in her place.

Another lady with both literary and domestic tastes and culture, and a small income, could take an associate to aid and receive a certain number of daughters from wealthy families, to be trained in the family till they are fully qualified to instruct others in all domestic duties. With the income from the wealthy thus earned, she might take orphan girls and train them in the same way as if they were her children.

Another lady, with a handsome property of her own and a husband in good business, has no children. Possessing a great love of children and an indulgent husband, she might take a governess as her assistant, and then adopt orphans to the extent of her means and benevolence.

Another lady of moderate means has been led to feel great sympathy for the homeless aged and sick. She could hire one of these dwellings, and take a few who could afford to pay well, and then seek those fitted by tastes and habits to be nurses of the sick, and train them for this office. Then, by finding places where they would receive liberal pay for their high qualifications, she might receive a portion as compensation for her labor, and thus her family be self-supporting.

Another lady, who has a taste and talent for this department, might seek a congenial associate and form a family to train as seamstresses and dress-makers, and at the same time instruct them in all domestic duties. Such a family might also be made self-supporting.

Another friend of the writer has three orphan nieces and their fortune left to her care. With a congenial associate she might rent another house, and add to her family some homeless orphans. Several other ladies of wealth, living almost in solitary grandeur, might follow in the same ministry to orphans.

Some fifty families might be thus located, and such a neighborhood might sustain both a

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google church and a school. A building might be erected for a school during six hours, and at other hours used by the neighborhood for recreations. Reading-rooms, gymnastics, croquet, music, and all the various out-and-in-door amusements, might draw together old and young at stated hours, under the regulations of the superintendent.

The largest room on Sunday could be used for a church, where laity and clergy might exercise their gifts. Here, too, gatherings for benevolent purposes might be held, to send the blessings of such a neighborhood to the ignorant and destitute in our own and foreign lands.

This neighborhood would be peculiar in these respects: Each family would be entirely independent, and yet would agree to act on the same general plan as far as it meets their own views, and no farther. But all to be so congenial in taste and culture, and so united in the grand object of carrying out practically the self-denying example of Christ, as to secure the main purpose designed—a truly "Christian neighborhood."

It is probable that most readers, by the time they reach this point, will have said or thought such an attempt visionary and impracticable, or one that could be realized only in Millennial days.

Of such the writer would inquire, Is there any thing here suggested which is above or beyond what our Lord and Master requires? Have any of the cases of benevolent self-denial narrated exceeded the examples or the requirements of our Lord? Is not something of this description an ideal which at least is to be aimed at by the followers of Christ who have wealth and culture and leisure? Are there not multitudes of women who have wealth and culture, professed followers of Christ, who do not even aim at any course of life that involves self-sacrificing labor? For such it is written: "He that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin?"

There have been various attempts made to form communities on various modifications of the Fourierite plan, which brings individuals of all ages, tastes, and habits into one family, with no parents or superior or bishop to control. Such are, and ever must be, failures.

So the boarding-school system, which takes children from paternal love and close watch of the family state, giving them to strangers amidst new and multiplied temptations, this—with here and there an exception—is, and ever must be, a failure.

The Catholic convents provide their inmates with a comfortable home and opportunities of benevolence toward neglected children, the sick, and the poor. But they are burdened with a round of observances and rules involving the sacrifice of reason and conscience, and of personal independence. For complete submission to the Superior is the first duty. Moreover, this is not the family state designed by God, with its simple and natural duties, where two, united in love, or one alone, has an independent home and a small flock, with none but God and conscience to rule.

The true Protestant system, yet to be developed and tried by women of wealth and benevolence, is the one here suggested; based not on the conventual, nor on the Fourierite, nor on the boarding-school systems, but on the Heaven-devised plan of the family state.

The full aim and end of the family state, as yet, has been imperfectly estimated, and the Bible is our only guide to its highest ministries. From this we learn that the end for which all things are made is, in theological terms, "the glory of God." This glory consists in the highest virtue and happiness of his creatures. The family, as designed by God in this world, is to be a miniature of his own vast family, and a preparatory training for its extended and eternal ministries, in securing the highest virtue and happiness to all his children.

It consists of a small number of persons, under the authority of one or two, who are to train those under their charge to obey all the laws of God, which are designed to secure the highest virtue and happiness.

The distinctive features of the family state, as designed by God, is not that there should be parents, for Abraham, the friend of God, was eighty-five before he had any child, and a hundred before Isaac was born. Nor is it a necessary feature that there should be husband and wife, for many families exist where there is neither.

The true aim of the family state is to place a small number of persons under the care and authority of one or two, that they may be trained to virtue and happiness chiefly by the influence of self-sacrificing love.

The marriage relation is designed to secure that love which is indispensable to the end designed by the family. In its most perfect state it supposes two who so love each other that it is more agreeable to gratify the wishes of the one beloved than to gratify self, and thus a perfect union is secured that makes them two in diverse ministries, and yet one in aim.

Then comes the helpless, useless infant; and here commences the first lesson in carrying out the chief aim of the family state. Under the influence of self-sacrificing love the parents toil by day and watch by night to rear and instruct this ignorant, troublesome little one, as gradually they require obedience to the laws of God that preserve its life and secure its health.

Then follows training to more self-denying duties, as, one after another, other children come, and the elder are united with the parents in the care and training of the younger, a process always involving more or less self-sacrifice of the strong and wise for the good of the ignorant and weak.

In this process of family training the grand principle of God's great family is the guiding rule—that is, each is to "sacrifice" personal gratification to secure the best good of the whole family.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

When several families form a neighborhood the same rule is binding. In certain respects the neighborhood is to be regarded as one family, in which the strong and the wise are to help train the ignorant and weak, and ever to "sacrifice" the lesser advantages of self for the greater good of the whole. Each family is to seek the comfort and elevation of the whole community as the first aim, and self and family as secondary and subordinate. The weaker members are to be cared for by the Divine law—"We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves." The strong, the rich, and the wise are to use their strength, wisdom, and riches especially for the ignorant, weak, and poor, and so to practice the same "self-sacrifice" for the larger community as is practiced by the parents in the family state.

The Jewish theocracy is the example of a civil government in which the Creator himself sought to enforce his laws in the family, the neighborhood, and the great commonwealth of the nation, while the rewards and penalties to secure obedience related mainly to this life. Temporal prosperity was promised to obedience, and temporal evil threatened for disobedience.

But "in the fullness of time" Christ came, and "brought life and immortality to light" as it never had appeared before. He came, as "God manifest in the flesh," to teach more clearly the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. By him we learn our obligations to regard all our fellow-creatures as a good parent or brother would regard a child of the same family. And these duties are enforced by the rewards and penalties not only of this life, but of an eternal existence beyond the grave. No religious teacher but Jesus Christ ever taught this doctrine. Neither Pagan nor Mussulman history shows a single line teaching men that the Creator is a loving father to all, and that each is bound to regard and treat all mankind as brothers of one family. No religion but that of Christ teaches eternal rewards and penalties as the sanctions of this law of love. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" is the law, and our neighbor is any man of any nation whose wants are brought to our knowledge. And whoso fails in obedience to this law must be cast out of God's family, and thus lose eternal life.

Christ, the Judge of earth's millions, has himself portrayed that awful day of the final separation of our whole race into only two classes. And it is not those alone who are guilty of great crimes who are to "depart" from Christ and his children. It is those who have not done for the sorrowful and suffering. It is those who have lived for self and not for others. It is those who have not practiced self-sacrifice to help their fellow-creatures.

This leading feature of Christ's religion is to be found in no system of religion, from Adam to this day, except in the Bible.

In this view it is seen that the family state is the basis of the religion and church of Christ. To every woman this offers a view rarely presented. For the family state can be instituted by any woman who has the means of earning a livelihood, as every woman should have. Every woman, as much as every man, should be provided with a profession by which she can earn the means to commence the family state, and adopt and train children, or minister to the sick, the aged, the poor, and the ignorant.

And when this is done under the influence of religious principle and the love of Christ, it is a higher model of the true family state than ordinarily exists in married life. For to take the children of others and practice all the self-sacrificing love and care of a parent, is a higher form of Christian benevolence than to follow out the instincts of parental love, which often end in more extended selfishness.

Many a mother becomes as intensely selfish for her children as ever she was before her life was thus spread out into a family. How few parents are really fulfilling the great end of the family state by training children to that self-sacrificing benevolence which Christ exhibited and enjoins on all his followers! How many parents are training their little ones to feel that they are to be worked for and waited on by subordinates, without any returns on their part of "self-sacrificing" labors for those of humbler means and advantages! How few children are trained to any system of economy which has for its end and aim to increase the advantages of those of lesser means! How few children among the rich are trained to work, that others of humbler station may have more time for study and improvement in social advantages! Many mothers are toiling to increase the advantages of their daughters; but how few such daughters, especially among the rich, are trained to reproduce these self-sacrificing labors for the good of others around who have less advantages! Instead of this the indulgent mothers train up daughters intent only on self-gratification as the great end of life.

Within the bounds of a truly Christian home will be found, as first in honor and attention, the aged, who have toiled for others till their strength is gone, and they in turn are to be the recipients of self-sacrificing love and care. To these will be added sometimes the sick and homeless members of the neighborhood. Thus, and thus only, can the children of a family be trained to honor and serve the aged and minister to the homeless and sick.

In a perfected Christian state, instead of the common practice of herding all the homeless sick in one great hospital, and all the aged poor in one great establishment, and all the orphan children in one great asylum, every family will take its share in rearing orphans, in nursing the sick, in providing for the homeless, and in due attentions to the aged. When this is done children can be trained to the "self-sacrificing" labors of a truly Christian home and life, with a high ideal now almost out of the thoughts and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

plans of many Christians, especially among the rich.

When this is accomplished the young will be trained to work themselves, instead of turning it all off on a class of humbler means. And when this is done, and the more refined and cultivated become workers instead of mere drones in the family state, a higher style of elegance and refinement will prevail, which is impossible so long as domestic labor is left to the ignorant and uncultivated.

When women are educated to honor and love their true profession—when the refinements of taste and the improvements of science are found in the work-rooms as much as in the parlor—then, and not till then, will the true ideal of a Christian home and a Christian neighborhood be realized.

Few Christian people are aware how extensively the roots of aristocratic theories and prejudices are entwined with our more democratic and Christian civilization. These antagonistic restraints are to be Christianized, and, to a great extent, by the influence of women who have the enlarged culture and firm principle that will enable them to set an example of truly Christian homes and a truly Christian neighborhood.

Our country has just passed through a terrible ordeal, in which the energies of benevolent women have been called forth in a most remarkable manner. Thousands have learned by experience the elevated pleasure of self-sacrifice and toils for a noble enterprise. It was to save their country that such heroic sacrifices and labors were endured. The same inspiring enterprise is still presented to the women of America. The saving of our country from the ignorance, vice, and all the ruin that follows unchristianized wealth, and the self-indulgence and sin in its train. For this women of culture and energy and influence are to plan and to labor and to pray.

And the truly Christian woman, if she consistently follows Christ, will be regulated in all her plans by faith in the awful realities of the future life—an eternal heaven, an endless hell!

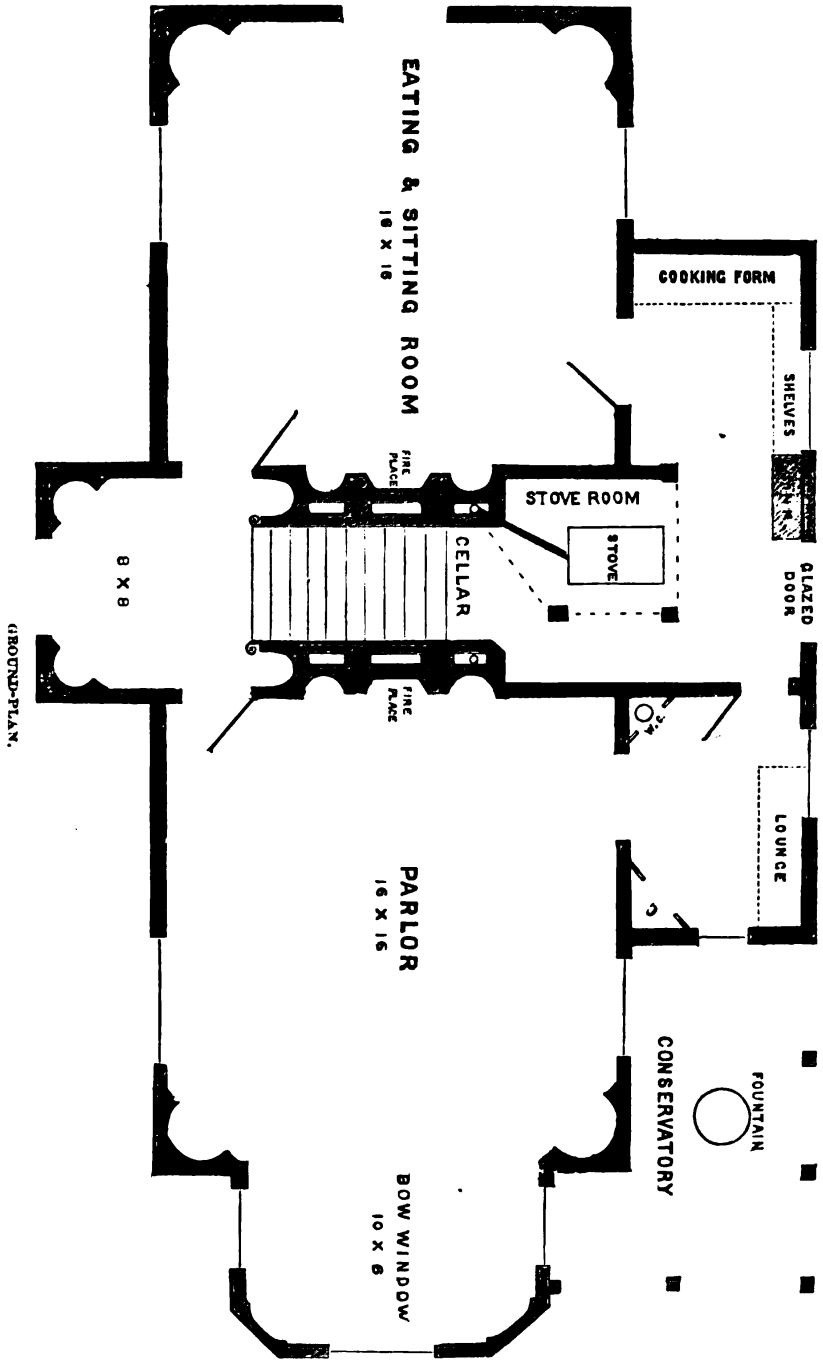
None can deny that Jesus Christ teaches that some of our fellow-men will become irreclaimably selfish, and live forever severed from the good, and thus reap the natural results of selfishness in a world by themselves. And he taught that men are to be saved from this doom by his followers, and that the number of those saved depends on their self-sacrificing labors.

There are those who not only profess to believe this fundamental truth, but who daily make it the regulating principle. Such believe that the way to lay up treasures for children, as well as for self, is not to invest in stocks and lands, but to spend all to serve men, and for self and family only as tends to this chief end. Their hearts (that is, their chief interests) are set on thus laying up treasures in heaven, and all questions of practical duty are so regulated. Thus, as to dress—Is this the style that will give most influence and means for the best good of my fellow-men? As to amusements—Will this add strength and ability to work to serve men? As to business and style of living—Is this the one that will afford most time and means to spend for the salvation of men from ignorance and sin?

The difference between such as these and the worldly Christian is as great as between men on a party of pleasure at sea and men who, in an awful storm, are struggling to save as many as possible from a sinking ship.

It is such as these who are described in Holy Writ as "a peculiar people." It is such as these who have learned by experience that the highest and noblest happiness is bought by "sacrifice." Such have often reported that the most satisfying hours of purest enjoyment have been in the ministries of war, amidst toil and suffering and cares never known before. And it was not alone the happiness of comforting the sorrowful and relieving the suffering. It was still more the high inspiration of a grand and noble cause. It is thus our minds are created to be made happy in toiling for a noble cause—in sacrificing self to save others.

The chief aim of the previous articles referred to has been to direct attention to the true field of labor for American women in multiplying healthful homes, where the young shall be trained to work for others, and by a well-devised economy of time, labor, and expense that shall secure all the real advantages of a high civilization.



The profusion and waste of American housekeepers, in contrast with the economy and thrift of the French and German, is a topic of frequent remark by sojourners abroad. This serious defect in American housekeeping is owing, in part, to our great abundance; next, to the fact that young women are not trained for their special duty as housekeepers; and, lastly, to the neglect of this matter as a sacred and religious duty.

That economy in expenses is a religious duty has rarely been urged on the conscience from the pulpit or the press. Nor can it be made to appear in this light except to those who assume the high obligations of the religion of Christ, based on the dangers and risks of a future life, and the duty of all to practice the extremest self-sacrifice, if need be to the loss of all things, in order to save their fellow-men.

With this solemn and sacred aim the truly Christian woman saves in small concerns, that she may add, not to self-indulgences, but to her means for aiding to elevate and save her fellow-creatures. It is this view alone that imparts dignity and duty to a wise Christian economy. It is this high ideal which may transform a home into the temple of the Lord, its work-room to the inner sanctuary, and its cooking apparatus to an altar of sacrifice, where the young shall be trained to offer their appetites and selfish indulgences a holy sacrifice to God for the good of their fellow-men.

In previous articles drawings were given for

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google persons of abundant means, who aim to train children to domestic labor, and yet retain most of the comforts and elegances found in large houses that require well-trained servants, such as but few hereafter will be able to secure. For as our country advances in wealth the demand for servants will increase, while the number of women who go out to hired service will decrease.

This article presents the plan of a house for persons of more limited means, designed to secure pure air and economy of time, labor, and expense. The chief features to be noticed are:

1. The close packing of conveniences, to save time, steps, and labor.

2. A system of ventilation securing pure air to every room by night and day, without care or attention.

3. A method of avoiding the smells and heat of cooking.

4. A tasteful and agreeable work-room, banishing many disagreeable associations of ordinary kitchens.

5. Most of the comforts and conveniences of expensive establishments demanding several

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google servants, and yet at a moderate expense, and so arranged that parents and children can easily accomplish all the domestic labor, except, perhaps, the work of the laundry.

The elevation for this plan is seen at the head of this article. The ornamental windows and doors add but little to the expense, if built of brick. Where close economy is required plain doors and windows can be substituted, and the bow window and conservatory omitted or deferred. The Gothic elevation given in the article in this Magazine for May, 1866, can, with slight changes, be used for this plan.

The plan for the cellar is drawn and described sufficiently in that article. The plan on page 581 gives the ground-floor and the chambers in the second story, which is under a French roof. If more rooms are wanted another story can be added.

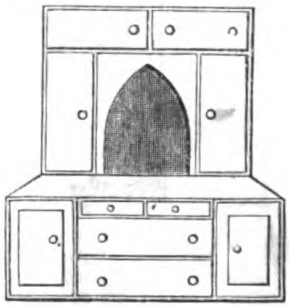
In this ground-plan will first be noticed the close packing of conveniences.

In the entrance-hall the corners behind the front-doors are fitted with arched recesses, supplied with hooks for outer garments, an umbrella-stand, and boxes or low shelves for over-shoes. On each side of the staircase are niches for busts or flowers or lamps. Niches also are placed at each side of the fire-places in the parlor and sitting-room, where books, work, and ornamental articles can be arranged. Arched recesses also are found in the corners of these rooms for similar uses.

Appended to the parlor is a small room, to be ventilated by a wood or tin conductor (12 by 9 inches) under the floor, leading to the ventilating flue. This room has a water-closet and small wardrobe or closet in two corners. It can be used for a retiring-room, for rest and quiet while at work; or for cases of sickness, to save steps and labor; or for a sewing-room close by the parlor; or for a servant's room, when one is needed.

The Work-Room should have the floors, shelves, and drawers all made of oiled pine or white wood, which can be kept clean with very little labor.

The Ventilating Stove-Closet, with its roof and sliding or rising doors, is described in page 769 of May Number for 1866. The cast-iron stove-pipe fastened into the brick flue is heated by the stove. Thus a current of warm air is created, and every room that has an opening into this flue is constantly having its impure air carried off. In this plan of a house every room and water-closet can have a ventilating conductor under the floor or at the top of the room, connecting either with this warm-air flue or with a flue uniting with it.



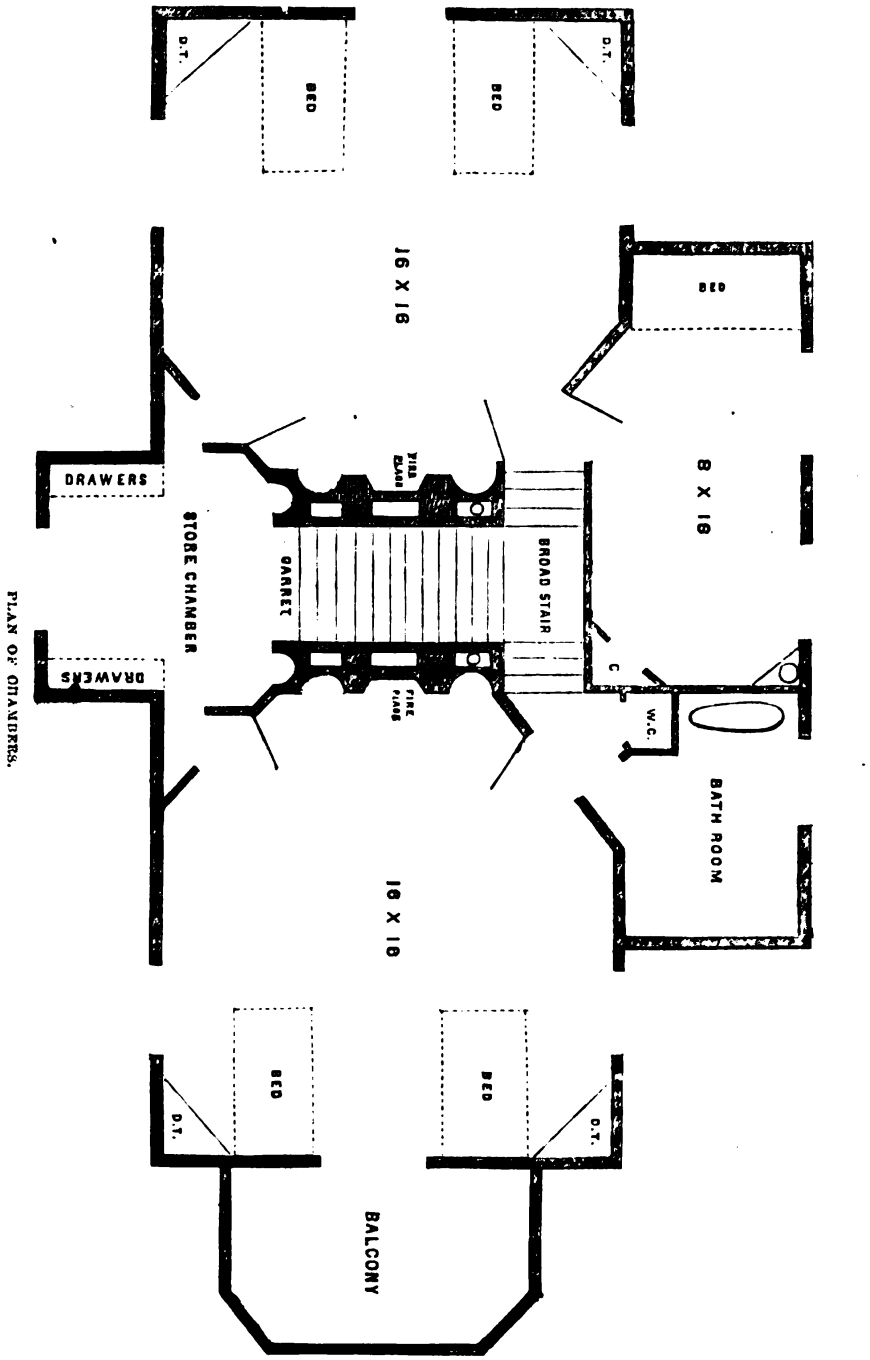
All the sides of the Work-Room should have shelves reaching to the wall, with sliding-doors running on shieves, so as to pass each other. So, also, the Stove-Closet should have similar shelves to the wall, with sliding doors, where the stove-furniture and most of the common articles used in cooking are to be placed. The upper shelves are to receive the articles least frequently used. The Cooking-Form described and drawn in the previous article, page 767, is to be placed in this Work-Room.

There is no one thing so important to a housekeeper, as it respects success, comfort, and economy, as to know how to select and to manage the best cooking apparatus and the best furnace. If all American housekeepers were trained to do this, and then would train their children and servants to use them properly, many millions now given to ignorant or careless waste would be saved. And there is no direction in which the scientific training of women to economy can be more wisely directed. The laws that regulate the creation, preservation, and diffusion of heat as yet are a sealed mystery to thousands of young women who are spending so many hours over French, music, Latin, and the "higher branches," in a course of study from which most that is to be practical in woman's after-life is wholly excluded.

If the Work-Room, the Stove-Closet, the passage to the cellar, and two forms each side of the cellar-stairs, are provided with shelves, as they may be, every article ever used for work in eating-room and kitchen can be stored in and around the work-room, and also all the stores for cooking. Thus every thing needed can be reached with the fewest possible steps, and much labor saved in the care of rooms and closets.

The use of corners in rooms and of sliding-doors in small rooms is an important item in the economy of space, expense, and labor. This will be seen in the plan of the chambers.

Instead of bureaus, wardrobes, and wash-stands which project into a room, will be seen dressing-tables and closets in the corners, thus giving space to the useful portions of a room.



DRESSING-TABLE.

This drawing gives a view of a corner dressing-table and bureau. The lower portion has drawers, and each side small closets, with shoe-cases fastened to the inside of the doors, and small shelves to hold stockings. The upper portion recedes a foot or more, and the arched recess is for a looking-glass on a standard. Each side are small closets for articles used in dressing. Over the arched recess are two deep closets to hold bandboxes, etc.

The two large chambers open to a store-room bountifully supplied with hooks for hanging dresses, and drawers to the wall for storing linen and other family articles. The passage to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the garret is divided so as to make a small closet in which to lock family stores.

One item of health and comfort is specially commended to notice, and that is the size and position of the beds in the larger chambers. In Germany and France double beds are seldom seen. Instead of this, single beds, exactly fitting to each other, are made to stand apart or close together, as may be desired. Thus the danger and evils of having the aged sleep with young children, the sick sleep with the well, the nervous and sleepless disturbing a nervous and weak companion, the infant disturbing both parents in one bed—these and many other evils are thus avoided. The advance of civilization in this country will hasten reform in this important particular.

The hanging of doors as marked in the drawing is important, so as to protect those by the fire from draughts.

Low window-sills add to the beauty of a room, as high ones give an imprisoned air.

Every room should have at least one window admitting light from the sky, or it will be

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google gloomy. For this reason piazzas and porticoes make lower rooms gloomy, unless one window admits light from the sky.

The Water-Closets should be ventilated by tin or wood conductors to the ventilating flue. Cautions as to their construction on p. 771 of the May article are important.

The staircase runs to a broad stair and then divides, so as to give more room to the adjacent chamber.

The Water-Closets can be supplied by a tank in the garret, with a forcing pump to a well or cistern in the cellar. Care must be taken to have this tank well supported by timbers or partitions underneath, and also to have the plumbing and waste-pipe properly done. The expense of water-closets but little exceeds that of outdoor accommodations, while they greatly add to health and comfort.

A FORCED MARCH.

IT was the last of May, 186–, when we were nearing the end of the time we had allotted for our short tour in Italy. We had not seen Venice, Bologna, nor Milan, but were yet lingering and dreaming on the banks of the Arno, possessed by the dolce far niente which that delicious climate induces; lounging whole days in palaces of art or in the historic villas which embellish the hills around Florence, or feasting our eyes from every commanding point with views of this fair city and its environs; while at night our dreams were fed by the gay sounds of music and of martial footsteps with which the graceful Florentines filled their moonlighted streets almost till morning. We could have yielded to the influence of these enchanting scenes forever, could have eaten the lotus leaf, and so forgot all the world beyond, our transatlantic home, the past, the imperious future, all in those luxurious hours. It was our first visit to Italy—to us, as to all the world, the abode of Poetry and Romance—and from the Alps to the orange groves of Sorrento we had enjoyed an unbroken festival among her luxuries of art and nature. But there were cares which tugged at the wings of our enjoyment.

My husband was dependent on the contingencies of a large business left at home, and it was but one of the untoward circumstances incident to all business connections that shocked us one lovely morning as we were preparing for our journey across the Apennines. A telegraphic item in one of the American journals announced that a terrific explosion of gunpowder had occurred at home by which severe losses had fallen on my husband, an immense amount of neighboring property had been destroyed, for which he would be responsible; and, what was most terrible, the chary telegram only hinted at the probable loss of life. The intelligence became more aggravating every moment as we recalled the large number of men, women, and children employed in the manufactory which had been destroyed, and pictured to ourselves all the possible horrors of the event. Of course the first thing to be done was to hasten to Paris to possess ourselves of letters which might await us there, containing full accounts of the disaster.

The almost immediate rebound from this depressing news was a hope, almost a belief, that the telegraph had told the worst, or it would have told more; and it was under the influence of this hope that we decided that I should remain behind, and in company with a small party should follow my husband more leisurely to Paris, resting a few days at some of the most interesting points of the journey, unless letters should demand his immediate return to America, in which case it was agreed that I should receive the intelligence by telegraph at Milan before proceeding farther than that city.

Much as I longed to improve this possibly last opportunity of securing a glimpse of Venice, it was not without pain and a tinge of self-reproach that I saw my husband start on his journey across the Alps. At Milan, whither I had accompanied him, I joined my traveling acquaintances; and during those days of waiting and uncertainty I endeavored by sight-seeing to distract my mind from the anxiety which weighed upon it. But the charm of picture-galleries and palaces seemed to have fled. Even the miraculous Duomo itself grew to be commonplace; only during the wonderful illumination on the evening of the national fête, when that architectural glory was baptized in the brilliant hues of the rainbow, did I forget every thing in the magnetic enthusiasm of the people. Italy was just awakening from her long sleep to a new national life, and when her "red, green, and white" alternately glorified that forest of sculptured statues, flowers, and spires—the almost worshiped cathedral—I found myself joining the excited shout—Viva la Duomo! Viva l'Italia! The marvelous beauty of this spectacle and the sublimity of the occasion might make one forget a more serious care than mine.

The telegram, which came duly, gave me small consolation in regard to the disaster; it said, "Go to Venice for a few days; our passage to America is secured for the 13th of June." It was now the third, only ten days before we must sail from Liverpool. Still in doubt in regard to the state of affairs at home, I felt that a hurried visit to Venice would scarcely leave me a pleasant recollection, so I determined to start immediately for Paris.

During my short stay in Milan I had experienced great discomfort in being without a male protector, a discomfort which I have never known in America; and it was an anticipation of the possible annoyances attending a journey to Paris entirely alone which led me to accept the companionship of the only two persons of the party who were prepared to hasten the journey as I desired, spite of certain recollections of them in Southern Italy not of the most agreeable character.

These were two ladies traveling together

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

alone, except as convenience or propriety sometimes led them to join company with others visiting the same points. One, an English woman of about forty-five years, was apparently a victim to some disorder of the affections, for her exceptional character was ludicrous in its unique perversity. She was angular, peevish, and contrary. What pleased her companions inevitably disgusted her; what they criticised she admired with emphasis; and whatever plans they submitted met her immediate disapproval. I recall, as I write, her sharp features; the hair of doubtful yellow; the toss of the head backward which inevitably followed another's suggestions; the faded blue eyes, speculative and defiant, peering from underneath the spectacles in a deliberate gaze, as though she were calculating the process by which she would demolish either plans or theories. Her companion, a native of Peru, and a sister by marriage, seemed to yield in all things an abject submission to the overbearing Madam B——, her identity asserting itself only in an imposing degree of embonpoint, and a voluble use of English and French badly pronounced, with heterogeneous embellishments from her native Spanish which rendered her utterances almost unintelligible, at least to me. With these unpromising companions I left Milan. We decided to cross the Alps by the Simplon, and by a short detour to take in our way lakes Como, Lugano, and Maggiore, meeting the diligence at Arona.

There is a dreamy delight in recalling at this distance the panorama of those lovely lakes. Range after range of abrupt mountains rose on either shore, peaked, rounded, or cleft, revealing through frequent vistas every variation of distance far as the faint blue line that scarcely separates sky and land; their snow-tipped summits glistening above the brilliant green of the lower hills and valleys, which were every where dressed in the luxuriant vine; all so perfectly repeated in the still waters of the lake over which we glided that we seemed almost suspended between two worlds of wondrous beauty.

Nestling in the nooks or clinging to the sides of the mountains were the picturesque Italian villages, irregular, brown, and old, each with its grand cathedral, its pictures and statuary, its castle perched upon some overlooking height, and its tranquil population apparently dreaming away life in a delicious idleness. Seen in the intervals of summer showers, now glancing in sunlight, now veiled in transparent mists or crowned with rainbows, the entire scenery lies in my memory like some enchanted vision.

After two hours of delightful sailing down Lake Maggiore, the largest and the last of the group in our course, we debarked at Arona to await the arrival of the diligence.

We had made but short stay at Como and Lugano, had contented ourselves with sailing past the Boromean islands, catching only a glimpse of Isola Bella, whose orangeries and garden terraces lay in tempting proximity to Baveno, where we touched, but had hurried on to reach that day's diligence for the Alps; so that I was wholly unprepared for the change of programme which awaited me. I had just learned from the inn-keeper the hour when the diligence would leave, when I discovered Madam B—— regarding me in her fashion from under the spectacles, with falling lower jaw and fixed attitude. I saw that for some reason she had assumed the offensive, and waited the announcement, which soon came in this shape:

"I for one am not going over the mountains by diligence. I shall go by vettura or not at all."

I was not willing to abide by this decree, so I ventured to suggest the disadvantages of depending upon vetturini. "It would be triple the expense of the diligence," I added, remembering that I could receive no farther remittance from my husband if I pushed my journey as I intended, and since no use could be made of the draft on Venice I might not have sufficient funds to take me to Paris. It was in vain to urge either choice or necessity; neither the exclusive coupé which we might secure at this point, nor the superior security and swiftness of the public vehicle, nor the material difference in the expense, could move her from the whim apparently conceived at the moment. So I yielded with as much grace as I could command, and joined in the search for a vetturino. The task proved difficult enough, and when at last we succeeded, the lateness of the hour and the scarcity of coaches, had raised the price of a conveyance far as Sion to three hundred francs! This exorbitant sum did not even start an objection in the minds of my companions, though I had heard Madam B—— on another occasion haggle and scold a landlord with terrible earnestness about the price of a couple of candles. Though fully aware of the annoyances and detentions to which one might be subjected in making the passage of the mountains by coach, the extreme repugnance which I felt on this occasion seemed afterward to have been prophetic. There was, however, but one alternative, and the fear of incurring greater evils compelled me to abide by my companions with a degree of patience.

The picturesque scenery along the drive of seven hours before we reached our first stopping-place, growing as it did in grandeur every moment, should have given a greater pleasure than I remember. It was impossible not to hear the impertinent and ceaseless chatter of my inharmonious companions, with whom, I believe, neither the sublimest scenery nor the most startling situations could ever develop a point of sympathy. Either disgust from disappointments, or a satiety of luxury, had unfitted Madam B—— for the enjoyment of any of her surroundings; to her "all things showed their dark sides," so there was neither beauty nor poetry in the scenes through which we passed; the musical chiming of vesper bells, the peasants and priests in procession winding through the defiles toward the chapel at sunset, the children

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

kneeling at way-side shrines under the shadow of the solemn mountains, only drew from her an offensive tirade against their religion; women sitting in the doorways or among the pomegranate blossoms, plying the venerable distaff, only compelled her sneers at their slow customs; no associated charm of antiquity could veil from her for a moment the barren fact which she despised. It was, however, pleasant to find that she believed in spinning-machines. I should have thought her altogether conservative. As we crossed a bridge over a terrific gorge, through which a stream from the distant mountain plunged at a fearful rate, "Look!" I exclaimed, "what a way this stream has made for itself!" "Pshaw!" cried she, "I am glad I'm not silly enough to believe in those infidel geologists who are trying to refute the Bible. Such nonsense! Of course, the gorge was made in the beginning for the stream."

As I was not allowed a quiet enjoyment of the mountain scenery, and as all attempt at conversation on my part was only an irritant, the despotic confines of the small coach which held me in contact with this negative creature grew intolerable. I believed a seat by the vetturino would be preferable; there at least I could have the silence of my own thoughts, so I climbed up to the box and rode there until the cold of the night drove me back inside.

At Domo d'Ossola, where I partly watched and partly slept, I heard during the night the noisy diligence go rolling away with smacking of whips and shouts of postillions; but I did not hear the marshaling of the clouds which were gathering their forces from every quarter of the Alps. All night the windy messengers flew from peak to peak, and at four o'clock on the following morning, when we started on our way, their work was consummated; the first warning drops were beginning to fall, and we drove out from the hotel in rain and darkness. Where were the rosy mists with which my imagination had draped the snowy peaks at the morning hour? Where the glowing east, whose yellow shafts I had seen in my dreams piercing the mountain ranges? An Alpine storm, after all, though attended with discomfort, must surely be sublime to witness; so I resolved to resume my seat by the vetturino, determined not to miss whatever views the breaking of the mists might occasionally reveal.

It was not the most comfortable seat imaginable, for it was too high for my feet to find a resting-place, and it was too narrow, and it was there that the cold wind and rain had full sweep; still, with warm shawls and water-proof, I kept the place, and saw, above and below, what solemn festival Nature sometimes holds in her high places.

No description has ever rendered the sublimity of Alpine scenery, either in shine or storm, and it is not for my impotent pen to essay that in which so many have failed; besides, it is but a personal incident that I began to narrate, and visions of the untoward circumstances under which I saw those sights can but stay somewhat of the enthusiasm of my recollection. Albeit I saw the elements at their carnival. The giant mountains now shrouded in mists, now suddenly cleaving the dusky veil, revealing their sublime forms, with the eternal smile upon their foreheads, seemed to me Nature's high-priests; their unattained fastnesses the resting-place of her Shekinah; the torrents pouring to the depths beneath their ceaseless libations to her mysteries.

As we approached the summit of our route we seemed to near the region of perpetual sunshine; for though the air was full of flying snow-flakes, and light drifts lay here and there over the fields, the blue sky broke cheerily through the clouds, giving promise of a bright afternoon for our descent. Earth in this sterile region gives back her smiles for the cold sunshine bestowed on her; brilliant ruby-colored blossoms lift themselves through the snow, and various hardy shrubs flaunt their gay flowers in the face of the storm with all the confidence of roses under the warm sky of the south.

After two hours of rest at the miserable village of Simplon we started on our now descending course; the mists had rolled away, breaking clouds and patches of serene sky were above us, and on every side "Alps on Alps" stood out to view in undraped grandeur. The sunshine, the bracing air, and the brisk rate at which we drove, put me in a more tranquil mood than I had known since leaving Florence. Before us lay apparently the easiest and swiftest part of our journey, and how soon I should be on a quick passage by rail to Paris; to reach which was the ever-haunting and oppressive desire.

At four o'clock in the afternoon we could see beneath us the village of Brieg, with its chateau and churches, lying in the green valley, through which coursed the "arrowy Rhone." From our high point this little nook of the Valais, in its frame-work of mountains and glaciers, formed a picture of exceeding beauty.

"Shall we reach Sion to-night?" I asked of the vetturino, as we neared the quaint little town. "Pas du tout, il faut rester à Brieg jusque à demain." I received this announcement with regret, and began to urge my desire to go on, assuring him that I must take the train from Sion on the following morning. He was inflexible in spite of my earnestness, saying it was impossible, his horses must have rest—a necessity which I had entirely overlooked. After a little silence I ventured to suggest that perhaps the horses would be able to continue the journey after a few hours' halt, which would still bring us to Sion in time for a night's rest; he hesitated, and, in a kinder tone, said, "C'est possible," when Madam B——, overhearing us, screamed from the inside, "We must stay here to-night!" "Would you not go on after a few hours here?" I asked, humbled by the conviction that the suggestion would be fruit-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google less, since she knew my desire, whatever might have been her previous wish; and the answer came as I suspected: "I am not demented—neither am I made of iron" (I half doubted both declarations). "No! I shall not leave Brieg until to-morrow noon." Which decree was carried out, and by the aid of a more potent fiat than even hers.

The small hotel at which we stopped was cold and dreary enough, the floors were bare and sprinkled with white sand, and the fireplaces filled with green boughs. The fare was coarse; but the appetite, induced by the long ride, made acceptable even the sour bread and miserable tea. Much fatigued I retired at an early hour and found a comfortable bed, in which I slept undisturbed by sounds or dreams until eight o'clock the next morning, when I was awakened by a great noise of shuffling feet in the bare halls, a mingling of excited voices with the roar of pouring rain upon the roofs and windows.

I hastened through my toilet and went down stairs, where I learned that at midnight the storm had recommenced with terrible fury, and had increased until the swollen river and mountain streams had destroyed miles of the road; had swept away all the bridges for a long distance; had, in fact, cut off the possibility of moving in either direction. Back up the mountains were impassable gorges, while on toward Sion were rushing torrents, or smooth lakes in place of the road over which we could have passed so glibly the evening before. The Rhone, which we might have crossed on foot and dry-shod on our way to Italy, was now a very cataract in its headlong fury, sweeping every thing in its course.

Within the hotel all was tumult, excitement, and vexation. "Hark!" said one, "do you hear the streams?" Until that moment I had not observed that the air was filled with a deep, monotonous sound, undefined and awful, upon the surface of which, as upon the pedal note of a vast organ, all other sounds seemed to play as to an accompaniment, full of majesty and terror.

The house was filled with guests; the parlor, which was at once reception-room, drawing-room, and salle à manger, was crowded with families who were making the tour in private carriages or by vettura, the fortunate travelers, by diligence, having passed on the evening before.

Anxious to proceed on their journey, and impatient under the veto of the storm, they paced the floor or huddled about the windows to watch the inexorable sky. The cheerless halls presented a scene of discomfort and confusion worse confounded, vetturini smoking and shouting to each other in Italian or French patois, gentlemen rehearsing the story of the night's disasters, and discussing the dismal probabilities, servants rushing back and forth with their burdens for the table, and in the midst the rosy landlord beset on all sides with a volley of questions, all of which he answered with incredible coolness and courtesy.

At breakfast I encountered Madam B——. Surely she was annoyed by this contre-temps; her face showed it. Perhaps she wished that we had gone on the day before. "What shall we do?" I asked, or rather exclaimed. "I see nothing to be done," she replied, with provoking nonchalance; and then, with dignified emphasis, "I am content to wait." Admirable resignation! Of one of the less resigned, an elderly gentleman sitting near, I inquired, "What, Sir, do you think is the real state of the road?"

"It is impossible to learn," he replied; "but the villagers say it will be impassable for a week to come." "But is there no way of escape?" I asked, remembering that in a week and one day from that time my husband expected me to sail with him from Liverpool. As the stranger replied I heard a titter in the direction of Madam B——. She was, indeed, rejoicing in my perplexity.

The day passed wearily away, the only occupation left us being to watch the clouds; and when night came down there was still no promise of fair weather. The next morning, the rain still pouring, a tattoo was beat in the streets, and the villagers came together to hold consultation in reference to the road, which resulted in an examination being made so far as possible; and at noon the tidings came that, even should the rain cease at once, it would require two or three weeks to make it passable for any vehicle.

There was no longer for me the poor satisfaction of looking for a break in the clouds—we were doomed to a three-weeks' imprisonment even should the sun burst forth that moment.

For others there might be sufficient entertainment in the scenery of the neighborhood; but not all the peaks and glaciers of the Valais could assuage my impatience. The mail communication was kept up by peasants, who carried the bags over the side of the mountains. So I wrote in a half-desperate state to my husband, telling him of the dismal prospect, begging him if possible to defer going to America; if not, I would follow him so soon as it was in my power. My letter had scarcely left the hotel when a thought struck me, which I speedily communicated to the old gentleman and lady with whom I had held previous conversations. "Why could I not cross the mountain side on foot with those who carry the mails?" The lady threw up her hands, and the gentleman first smiling, as if at the absurdity of the idea, and then looking serious, said: "Such an adventure might be accompanied by danger, and for a woman to attempt it in this storm would look like madness."

His reply did not, however, settle my mind; he was old and fearful, I young and hopeful, perhaps rash. At all events as I revolved the question in my mind I became more and more convinced that I was equal to the adventure.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I was strong, accustomed to walking, not afraid of a little exposure. I would make the effort; I would return if the way was impossible, if not I would accomplish it.

Thus determined I walked out to the office of the diligence, where I inquired if there was any way of transporting baggage across the mountain toward Sion.

"No, Madame," replied the man.

"Would you not undertake to send one trunk for an extra compensation?"

He hesitated a moment, and replied in the affirmative. So I bought my ticket for Sion. The distance from the village to the impassable part of the road was two miles and a half, and a diligence made this short passage each day with the mails; the hour for leaving Brieg was four o'clock, it was now three, and I returned to the hotel to prepare for the journey. I had not suggested my plan to my companions; but as I had overheard them talking of a purpose to go to Baden from Geneva instead of fulfilling the arrangement of going with me immediately to Paris, I felt no compunction in acting independently of them. My preparations completed, I announced to Madam B—— my determination, bidding her good-by at the same time.

Of course she declared me "demented," saying she "would not attempt such a thing for forty husbands!" She had never been married, and despised the relation.

With many kind wishes from the old people whose counsels I had disregarded, promising to write to them from Sion if I arrived there in safety, I left the hotel. At four o'clock I was seated in the coupé of the diligence, sole occupant of the enormous vehicle; beside me a warm shawl and my satchel, containing an extra pair of shoes and stockings, my trunk, the only baggage besides the mails.

I confess to strange emotions when my back was fairly turned upon the little village, not a human being within reach except the driver and conductor of the diligence—these my only protectors, the day beginning to wane, the rain still falling, an unknown and dangerous way before me. As we rolled out into the country the general devastation became more and more apparent; the river rushed furiously by, bearing with it the débris of bridges which it had destroyed in its course; the mountain torrents hastening to meet it intercepted our way, huge rocks and uprooted trees turning us aside, until at last the road became so piled up with masses of loose stones that the wheels of the diligence often became wedged in between them, and the group of men employed in removing some of the obstacles before us were compelled to extricate them by main force.

Sometimes it seemed impossible to escape an overturn, when these stout mountaineers uniting their strength upon the leaning side prevented it. The danger of such a catastrophe kept me in constant jeopardy, and I would gladly have tried the way on foot; but this was clearly impossible, the men themselves frequently walking through streams that reached to their armpits. The fear of disaster, the loneliness of my situation, the noise of the waters roaring around me, and the excited shouts of the men in their efforts to assist the progress of the heavy coach, filled me for a few moments with terror, and I would have returned to Brieg; but the thought of my dear H—— oppressed with anxiety awaiting me in Paris, and the penalty of the three weeks' dismal imprisonment, gave me nerve to continue.

I soon saw that these men of the mountains were no strangers to the situation, and I resolved to trust to their experience so long as they seemed equal to the emergency. Carefully feeling for foothold with long poles carried in one hand they steadied the vehicle with the opposite shoulder, plunging through the streams with apparent indifference, their sturdy strength sufficient for every crisis. The horses, evidently knowing the importance of a careful step, planted their feet among the loose stones with a caution and patience almost human, and for this gentle sagacity I felt a new thankfulness; the least refractoriness on their part would many times have resulted in sure catastrophe. Thus by the combined strength of man and beast a mile of this rough traveling was accomplished, occupying two hours and a half, when we rolled softly out into a smooth lake, the waters spread out on either side, and so deep that I could not determine whether the horses were walking or swimming. Fearing that we should be submerged, I threw open the window of the coupé and called to the driver. He quickly discovered my fears, and shouting in a gay voice "Tout est perdu, Madame," cracked his whip, and fell to singing, which, of course, assured me that I need have no fear.

A few moments after this I descried on the opposite shore a cabin, and some people watching our approach, when the comfortable thought was suggested that all the obstacles of the way were past, the villagers have been deceived in regard to the extent of the damage, and this is probably the first time the diligence has made the passage, so I shall reach Sion without further difficulty. While thus congratulating myself we emerged from the water, when, to my surprise and disappointment, the driver jumped from the box, threw open the door of the coupé, and cried: "Descendez, s'il vous plait; il faut marcher."

There was no alternative; it was impossible to return to Brieg from this point until the following morning, and to remain here would be horrible. Whatever the distance one fact was plain, "il faut marcher." The rain was drizzling, the light fast fading, and the group of rough-looking peasants standing about chattering in the strange patois of the canton only added to the sense of loneliness which crept over me. With a show of indifference I joined the procession, intrusting my satchel to one, the heavy shawl to another, while four of the party took my trunk on a litter, and four others, prob-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google ably a corps of relief, sauntered on after. A "fille," as the men called the unkempt, weather-blackened specimen (can it be?) of womanhood, bore upon her bent shoulders the heavy mail bags. A strange spectacle she was — her bare feet the color of the soil, her head covered only with its mass of tangled, sunburnt hair, and her unshapely figure half-draped in nondescript garments.

After a short ascent I looked about, and could see that the point where I left the diligence was but a point—a small peninsula, and beyond, far as one could see, the road, with a strip of the adjacent land, lay under the terrible Rhone.

Picking my way carefully behind the creature with the bags, I asked how far we must walk before reaching the road. It was two miles; and already the fires were kindled on the mountains to call home the cattle, warning us that there was not much daylight before us in which to accomplish the task. The way now became extremely difficult, and at times perilous; the path lying over an uncertain route, such only as the descending streams would allow, and much of the way no path or footprint was discernible. The excitement of the hour—the fear blended with determination—imparted an almost superhuman strength, so that the rough obstacles were one by one overcome without measuring them until they were long passed. Sometimes we crossed torrents plunging through deep ravines, our only foothold the insecure rocks which were the next moment swept away! Sometimes our course lay along the very edge of a precipice, at the foot of which the headlong river sent up its threatening monotone—a dreadful note of warning, which, mingling with the voices of my guides shouting through the darkness, "Prenez garde! prenez garde!" filled me with terror. Sometimes the tangled shrubs concealed pools of water into which I unwittingly plunged, soaking my garments half-way to my waist; until at last, in the rain and darkness, we landed on the solid road. How thankfully I dropped down on a rock to await the arrival of the diligence, which was to meet us at this point! It was not, however, in sight, so I busied myself a while with wringing the water from my clothes, and putting on the dry shoes and stockings which I had so providently brought in my satchel. My watch by the light of our lanterns showed me that it was a quarter before nine o'clock, and I asked at what hour the diligence ought to arrive. "At eight o'clock," was the answer. "Might it fail to come?" I asked, shuddering at such a possibility, when I was told that, since there were no passengers expected, the mails might be left over until the next day. There was neither hut nor fire within reach, and the heat from my fatiguing walk having passed off, I was already shivering with cold. "How far is it to the next village?" I asked. "Five miles," was the answer. I strained my eyes and listened.

An hour passed on waiting thus in the cold and darkness, and yet no diligence. The group of peasants sitting about on the rocks alternately listened and talked in their wretched patois, until suddenly one of the men started up impatiently, muttering, "Elle n'arrivera pas ce soir," and all the party moved as if determined to wait no longer. To return by the way we came, and in this darkness, and to stay alone with these strange people at the hut on the point! My heart sank within me at the prospect. I had not, however, time for repining. A shout from one of the men turned all eyes toward the road; a faint light glimmered in the distance, then grew nearer and nearer—yes, it was the longed-for diligence. I have never heard a more cheerful sound than the shouts of those postillions and the rumbling of those heavy wheels.

Once more the solitary occupant of the great coach, I drew myself up on the cushions of the coupé, as much as possible avoiding contact with my wet skirts, and with a sense of relief prepared my mind for the four hours' ride. The laws of a diligence are as rigorous as those of a railroad train, and there was no stopping-place until we should reach Sion. How I dragged through the almost endless hours, more and more benumbed with cold, half sleeping with weariness, I scarcely know. It was nearly two hours past midnight when I heard with joy the summons to descend at the hotel at Sion. The sleepy porter assisted me into the house (for I was scarcely able to help myself), and at my prompting led me to the cuisine, and kindled for me a fire in the great range, there being no other arrangements for fire in the house. How I luxuriated in the grateful warmth! And when, after a bowl of hot drink, I retired to sleep between two down beds, I felt a thankfulness and a sense of luxury which I had never before experienced, and which soon made me forget all the cold and perils of the previous hours. At seven o'clock on the following morning, after a refreshing sleep, I was awakened, as I had given orders, by a maid bringing my clothes, dried and cleansed from mud, and shortly after appeared the welcome rolls and coffee. The exhilarating sunshine was pouring in at my windows as I ate my breakfast, and I could almost have believed that the adventure of the night before had been but a dream. I, however, wrote a short note to the old people at Brieg, as I had promised, and at nine o'clock was seated in an elegant railway carriage, whirling along my way to Paris.

EASTER HOLIDAYS.

IN England, from which country we derive so many of our social habits and customs, Easter is considered a very important occasion, and the holiday season which is attached to it is held to be only second in interest to that of Christmas. At Easter all the universities and schools in the realm close, and every boy who has a home turns his look thitherward with a

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

bright face and a glad heart. At Easter all work that can stop pauses: the Courts adjourn, the Circumlocution Office reposes, and Parliament rises. Indeed Parliament never really goes to work until after Easter. At Easter there is a universal determination on the part of all England to have a second edition of the Christmas holidays.

As long as Anglo-Saxon has been spoken, or rather since that language began to be spoken, for the two streams of Norman and Anglo-Saxon after the Conquest combined to form the Engleis or English, the anniversary of the resurrection of our Saviour has been known as Easter. The appellation probably came from the Saxon oster—"to rise." Some archæologists, however, derive the name from the Saxon goddess Eastre, who was specially invoked by her worshipers in the spring, and who was thought to exercise a happy influence upon the forthcoming vegetation. The point is of but little consequence. Both Easter and Sunday are good Saxon, and, like many other words of the same sturdy tongue, have gained a lasting home at the hearths and in the hearts of a Christian people.

In early days Easter was counted the "Queen of Festivals," and was celebrated with great pomp and solemnity. Primitive Christians upon this day always, when they met first in the morning, instead of the usual form of salutation, exclaimed, "Christ is risen!" The person saluted invariably responded, "Christ is risen indeed," or, "And has appeared unto Peter." It was poetical and Oriental. The Russian and Greek Churches have both preserved this old custom; at every recurring Easter the salutation can be heard. Bishop Coxe mentions, in his "Travels," having met with an instance of this greeting in a rural parish in England.

In the first century a controversy arose in the Church with respect to the true time and mode of keeping Easter. The Christian world was then divided into two parts: the Eastern and the Western, or the Greek and the Latin Christians. The Eastern Christians, with naturally Judaizing tendencies, observed a Passover on the night following the fourteenth day of Nisan—the day upon which the Passover was instituted—without reference to the day of the week upon which the fourteenth might occur. They also at the same time celebrated the passion and resurrection of Christ. The Western Christians ignored the Passover; but they kept the Friday which followed the fourteenth of Nisan as a solemn fast in memory of the Crucifixion, and celebrated the Resurrection upon the succeeding Lord's day.

Variations also arose in regard to time. Errors had crept gradually into the calendar, and every day was awry from true time. This evil went on increasing until A.D. 1582, when the calendar was reformed and corrected by Pope Gregory XIII.

"The diversity of practice in regard to the time and manner of keeping Easter seems," says Dr. Robinson, "to have been first brought into friendly discussion when Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, the disciple of St. John, paid a visit to Anicetus, Bishop of Rome, in A.D. 162. Polycarp testified that he had once celebrated the regular Jewish Passover with the Apostle John; while Aniccetus appealed to the fact that his predecessors had introduced nothing of the kind. Later, about A.D. 170, the subject again came up in Asia Minor. Yet no interruption of fellowship took place between the churches of the East and the West. Under the Roman Bishop Victor, however, the controversy broke out afresh. The result at this time was that Victor attempted to break off communion with the Asiatic Churches. For this step he was strongly censured by Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons. Other bishops likewise raised their voices against this rash measure. Through their efforts peace was at length restored; and both parties remained undisturbed in their own modes of observance until the great Council of Nice in A.D. 325, when the question was finally decided in favor of the West."

It was ruled that Easter should be deemed a movable feast, and that the full moon next to the vernal equinox should be taken for the full moon in the month of Nisan, and the 21st of March be accounted the vernal equinox. Easter Sunday, therefore, is always the Sunday following the full moon which falls on, or next after, the 21st of March. The earliest possible day whereon Easter can happen in any year is the 22d of March; the latest the 25th of April. Friday preceding Easter is observed as a special fast in commemoration of the Crucifixion, and Easter as a special feast in honor of the Resurrection of the Lord. The latter day is indeed His re-birthday—"the day the Lord hath made."

Easter being a distinguished festival was preceded in primitive times by a vigil, which was peculiarly solemn, as it was associated with the lying of the body of Christ in the tomb. The usage coincided with the manners of those days, but finds no place among Protestant churches.

Many curious customs attach to the observance of Easter in different parts of the world. In Ireland, formerly, people rose at four A.M. to see the sun dance. Not only the ignorant but the wealthy and well-informed scrupulously observed this custom. In England they were wont to call the reflection of the sun in running water "lamb-playing." An old ballad quoted by Brand says:

> "But, Dick, she dances such a way!
> No sun upon an Easter-day
> Is half so fine a sight."

But sun-dancing and lamb-playing were but old wives' fables. They show, however, how easily a simple people are pleased.

In Paris it was an old custom to stone Jews upon Easter-day through the streets, and finally to catch some unfortunate son of Abraham and take him to church and there punish him for the deeds of his ancestors. There is an in-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google stance on record of one miserable wretch having been actually beaten to death by the pious Parisians in their zeal.

In some places where the Mohammedan religion prevails they slay rams and sheep upon Easter, and let the blood run through the streets. Men and women imbrue themselves in it, and there is a general orgie. A writer mentions having witnessed such a scene in Tangier.

At Rome the Easter season is celebrated with great magnificence. On this day the Pope is placed in a lofty seat and borne to St. Peter's amidst a great concourse of the faithful, who receive his liberal benedictions, which are dispensed with a flourish of three fingers, as the representative of St. Peter is carried along. At Easter the Pope wears the tiara or triple-crown —the emblem of pontifical, imperial, and royal authority united. The jubilate, too, is chanted at this season, and there is a universal exultation, which is the more striking as it is contrasted with the gloomy period of Lent just drawn to a close, especially with the sad solemnities of Holy Week. At Easter, too, takes place the illumination of St. Peter's. There are two. "The first," says Headley, "is called the silver one, and commences about eight o'clock in the evening. Four thousand four hundred lanterns or lamps are so arranged as to reveal the entire architecture of the building. Every column, cornice, frieze, and window—all the details of the building, and the entire structure, are revealed in a soft, clear light, producing an effect indescribably pleasing, yet utterly bewildering. It seems an immense alabaster building, lit from within. The long lines of light made by the columns, with the shadows between—the beautiful cornice glittering over the darkness under it—the magnificent semicircular colonnades all inherent with light, and every one of the hundred and ninety-two statues along its top surmounted with a lamp, and the immense dome rising over all like a mountain of molten silver in the deep darkness around, so completely delude the senses that one can think of nothing but a fairy fabric suddenly lighted and hung in mid-heavens. This effect, however, is given only when one stands at a distance. The Pincian Hill is the spot from whence to view it. All around is buried in deep darkness except that steadily shining glory. Not a sound is heard to break the stillness, and you gaze and gaze, expecting every moment to see the beautiful vision fade. But it shines calmly on. This illumination lasts from eight to nine, and just as the bell of the cathedral strikes nine, sending its loud and solemn peal over the city, a thousand four hundred and seventy-five torches are suddenly kindled beside the lanterns. The change is instantaneous and almost terrific. The air seems to waver to and fro in the sudden light—shape and form are lost for a moment, and the vision which charmed your senses is melting and flowing together. The next moment old St. Peter's again draws its burning outline against the black sky, and stands like a mountain of torches in the deep night with a fiery cross burning at the top. How the glorious structure burns, yet unconsumed! The flames wrap it in their fierce embrace, and yet not a single detail is lost in the conflagration. There is the noble façade in all its harmony, and yet on fire. There are the immense colonnades wavering in the light, changed only in that they are now each a red marble shaft. The statues stand unharmed, and all fiery figures. The dome is a vast fire-ball in the darkness, yet its distinct outline remains as clear as at the first. The whole mighty edifice is there, built all of flame—columns, frieze, cornice, windows, towers, dome, cross—a temple of fire, perfect in every part, flashing, swaying, burning in mid-heavens. The senses grow bewildered in gazing on its intense brilliancy, and the judgment pronounces it an optical illusion, unreal, fantastical. Yet the next moment it stands corrected—that is St. Peter's flaming unwasted in the murky heavens. Hour after hour it blazes on, and the last torch is yet unextinguished when the gray twilight of morning opens in the east."

In early days the Roman Church introduced theatrical representations to amuse the votaries. The scene of the Passion and Resurrection of Christ was exhibited in the cathedral at Durham with great detail, including the arising from the sepulchre, and the conversations related in the New Testament. Curious records have been preserved at the expenses incident to these shows, where churches were theatres and priests and monks were actors.

In England many old and curious customs were long connected with the annual return of the Easter festival. "Lifting" or "heaving" was so much in vogue that Mr. Lysons says that Edward I. was lifted upon Easter. Hone gives us an account of the ceremony as described by Mr. Loggan thus: "I was sitting at breakfast in the Talbot, in Shrewsbury, when I was surprised by the entrance of all the female servants of the house handing in an arm-chair, lined with white and decorated with ribbons and favors of different colors. I asked them what they wanted. Their answer was they came to heave me; it was the custom of the place on that morning, and they hoped I would take a seat in their chair. It was impossible not to comply with a request very modestly made, and to a set of nymphs in their best apparel, and several of them under twenty. I wished to see all the ceremony, and seated myself accordingly. The group then lifted me up from the ground, turned the chair about, and I had the felicity of a salute from each. I told them I supposed there was a fee due upon the occasion, and was answered in the affirmative; and having satisfied the damsels in this respect they withdrew to heave others. At this time I had never heard of such a custom; but on inquiry I found that on Easter Monday, between 9 and 12, the men heave the women, and on Tuesday, at the same hours, the women heave the men."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Pasch eggs are a feature upon Easter quite as much as hot cross-buns are upon Good-Friday. It is usual to boil the eggs very hard and dye the exterior in various styles. Many of our readers are familiar with the Paus, or Pasch eggs, for the children of New York have dyed and broken thousands of them, and they can be seen now at Easter in all parts of the State. Though not quite as general as New-Year's calls the custom of dying and cracking eggs upon Easter has been carried by New Yorkers wherever they have gone. Not a few can recall, when Gotham was below Canal Street, how the chimney-sweeps used to rollick and chatter away upon the stoops and sidewalks upon Easter cracking eggs. It was a pretty custom for children, and gave rise to much innocent amusement.

The observance of Easter, which has ever been so universal in Europe, from a small beginning has grown to be a pretty general custom in this country. Many of the colleges have Easter vacations, and legislative and judicial bodies often adjourn temporarily to enable those who are so disposed to keep Easter. The religious services are always of a marked character upon Easter. Especially worthy of notice is the music upon that day; the Easter carols will compare with the Christmas carols in beauty. These holiday observances and amusements should all be cultivated. Our people are a working people, and give too little time to recreation and relaxation. All recreation and amusement of a healthy kind serves to maintain the tone and vigor of mind and body. People of every degree are better for laying aside their cares and trials and troubles and labors, and, giving a loose rein to their feelings, enjoy themselves to the full as their circumstances and opportunities admit. What better period can there be for this than the season of Easter, when every thing betokens the new birth of vegetation — the re-birthday of Christ, the great Sunday of which every other is but the weekly continuance, the day which the Psalmist says "the Lord hath made?"

"In Roman Catholic countries," says Hone, "it is a very ancient custom for the preacher to divert his congregation in due season with what is called a Fabula Paschalis—an Eastern Tale—which was becomingly received by the auditors with peals of Easter laughter. A little fun from the pulpit was considered proper to give the first impulse toward the revival of mirth. This practice lasted in places even to the eighteenth century." We believe that it never has been in vogue in our country. Hone publishes one of these curious tales, which he says he took out of a "truly curious volume." It runs thus:

One day Christ came to a place where there was no inn, and entered the house of a blacksmith. This man had a wife who paid the utmost respect to strangers, and treated them with the best that her house would afford. When they were about to depart our Lord and St. Peter wished her all that was good, and heaven into the bargain. Said the woman: "Ah! if I do but go to heaven, I care for nothing else!" "Doubt not," said St. Peter, "for it would be contrary to Scripture if thou shouldst not go to heaven. Let what will happen thou must go thither. Open thy mouth. Did I not say so? Why, thou canst not be sent to hell where there is wailing and gnashing of teeth, for thou hast not a tooth left in thy head. Thou art safe enough; be of good cheer." Who was so overjoyed as the good woman? Without doubt she took another cup on the strength of this assurance. But our Lord was desirous to testify his thanks to the man also, and promised to grant him four wishes. "Well," said the smith, "I am heartily obliged to you, and wish that if any one climbs up the pear-tree behind my house he may not be able to get down again without my leave." This grieved St. Peter not a little, for he thought the smith ought rather to have wished for the kingdom of heaven. But our Lord with his wonted kindness granted the petition. The smith's next wish was, that if any one sat down upon his anvil he might not be able to rise without his permission; and the third, that if any one crept into his old flue, he might not have power to get out without his consent. St. Peter said, "Friend smith, beware what thou dost. These are all wishes that can bring thee no advantage; be wise and let the remaining one be for everlasting life with the blessed in heaven." The smith was not to be put out of his way, and thus proceeded: "My fourth wish is that my green cap may belong to me forever, and that whenever I sit down upon it no power or force may be able to drive me away." This also received the fiat. Thereupon our Lord went his way with Peter, and the smith lived some years longer with his old woman. At the end of this time grim Death appeared and summoned him to the other world. "Stop a moment," said the smith, "let me just put on a clean shirt, meanwhile you may pick some of the pears on yonder tree." Death climbed up the tree, but he could not get down again; he was forced to submit to the smith's terms, and promised him a respite of twenty years before he returned. When the twenty years were expired he again appeared, and in the name of the Lord and St. Peter commanded him to go along with him. "Sit down," said the smith, "upon my anvil, for thou must be tired; I will just drink a cup to cheer me, and take leave of my old woman, and be with thee presently." But Death could not rise again from his seat, and was obliged to promise the smith a delay of another twenty years. When these had elapsed the devil came and would fain have dragged away the smith by force. "Halloa, fellow!" said the latter, "that won't do! I have other letters, and whiter than thou, with thy black carta bianca. But if thou art such a conjuror as to imagine that thou hast any power over me, let us see if thou canst get into this rusty old flue." No

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google sooner said than the devil slipped into the flue. The smith and his men put the flue into the fire, then carried it unto the anvil, and then hammered away at the Old One most unmercifully. He howled and begged and prayed; and at last promised that he would have nothing to do with the smith to all eternity if he would but let him go. At length the smith's guardian angel made his appearance. The business was now serious. He was obliged to go; the angel conducted him to hell. The devil whom he had so terribly belabored was just then attending the gate; he looked out at the little window, but quickly shut it again, and would have nothing to do with the smith. The angel then conducted him to the gate of heaven. St. Peter refused to admit him. "Let me just peep in," said the smith, "that I may see how it looks there." No sooner was the wicket opened than the smith threw in his cap and said, "Thou knowest it is my property, I must go and fetch it." Then slipping past, he clapped himself down upon it, and said, "Now I am sitting on my own property; I should like to see who dares drive me away from it." And so the smith got into heaven at last.

IN THE SMOKE.

I sat on the shore beyond the city
And watched the smoke clouds rise
From a thousand fires, and blend and spread,
In a slumbrous bank low overhead,
Between the roofs and skies.

Dark jets with a writhing, serpent motion,
And ragged sheets of brown,
And threads of silver like mountain rills,
And crested billows like cloudland hills,
And scattered flakes of down.

And every separate sheet and column,
Thread-flake and billow, told
The history of its birth below,
By forge or furnace or hearth-fire's glow,
In hue and fringe and fold.

And more; to my thought they took the likeness
Of else unpictured things;
One held the shadows of grimy men,
Another a spectral hand and pen,
A third a spirit's wings.

There drifted in glittering convolutions
A sun-hued India shawl;
The rags of a beggar fluttered here;
A cradled infant rocked softly near
The shadow of a brawl.

A line of silver bore slowly upward
A wreath of orange blooms,
A hearse in a sable column slow
Rolled off and entered the cloud bank low
In deepening funeral glooms.

Life with its features ever changing,
And death with changeless face,
Joy, toil, and luxury, want and pain,
Pictured in motion, form, or stain,
Found in the smoke a place.

And the low bank drew them in and mingled
All in its shadowy pall,
Darkness by labor, thought, strife, trade,
Darkness by luxury, joy, love, made
With sunlight over all.

STRAYED AND STOLEN.

HOW hot it was—close, sultry, and oppressive! Five o'clock in the afternoon of a blazing August day, and not the shadow of a passing cloud to soften the fierce, white heat of the sun's slowly descending beams—not a breath of air to revive the dusty herbage or cool the face of the earth, upon which those scorching beams came slanting down, like sharp arrows of light, smiting where they fell!

Hotter, and still hotter, even as the day waned to its close, as if the burning Day-King actually drew nearer to the shrinking earth as he descended from his proud place in the heavens. Yet along the distant highway, treeless and bare, which led to the nearest town, and upon the unsheltered and elevated line of which the sun's rays fell with unmitigated fierceness, till dry and whitening in the heat, it looked like the trail left by the caravan through the bleached and sterile sands of the desert, three figures were slowly but steadily moving; half seen, half enveloped in the stifling clouds of dust which their own weary feet were upraising.

Of these three persons the first, who was some rods in advance of the other two, was a woman, if that term must of necessity be given to any thing so unfeminine and repulsive in person and manner. She was of middle age—tall, gaunt, and muscular, with "vagrancy" written all over her as plainly as if it had been branded upon her brow or printed in large letters upon her back. That she was of foreign origin was equally patent to every eye, for, through the mercy of Heaven, such as she are not indigenous to our American soil; still, though it was easy to say at a glance that she was not an American, it would have puzzled an expert to say to what soil she did belong. Possibly had she been asked the question, she would have said she was Scotch-Irish, which is a common answer among persons of her class; but this would have told but little of the story, for her antecedents had been so mixed and intermingled in a long line of poverty, sin, and shame that it was impossible to guess if Scotch or Irish, Dutch or German, Portuguese, Jew, Gipsy, Indian, or Negro predominated in the mongrel thing who seemed to have united in one all the least pleasing attributes of all her races.

Her dress, which was dirty, ragged, and scanty, consisted of a short, rusty, black skirt, which barely reached to the top of the man's boots which she wore, and this was surmounted by a thick but tattered plaid woolen shawl, which was wrapped about the upper part of her person as if the day had been a wintry storm instead of a burning dog-day. A dirty cap, with wide flaunting cotton border, was crowned by a man's straw-hat, less conspicuous now, to be sure, than it would have been a few years ago, when woman was less covetous of masculine apparel than at present. Her face was pitted, swarthy, and sunburnt, to which habits of gross intemperance had added an almost purplish hue; the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 features coarse, sensual, and revolting, with crisp, wiry, black hair, above the low-hung brows, which had a trick of shutting down over the narrow, red eyes, whose expression varied only from stupid imbecility to low cunning or ungoverned rage. She bore a huge pack upon her back, strapped across her breast and shoulders, as a man might have carried it; and the brawny arms which were folded behind her to help to support her burden were tanned, hairy, and muscular, as the arms of a laboring man. She held a short clay pipe between her discolored and broken teeth, and was smoking as she walked—which occupation did not, however, interfere with the occasional utterance of a choice oath in some one of the deep guttural languages which were all her mother tongues; while she plodded on with steady, dogged determination, throwing up the dust right and left, and only turning from time to time to encourage by oath or menace the lagging steps of her two followers.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Of these the nearest to her in the line of march was a stolid-looking boy, of about a dozen years or more; freckled, red-haired, and wide-mouthed; heated, weary, and travel-worn; with ungainly limbs and awkward gait; yet a Yankee, and with an expression so honest, kind, and truthful, it seemed as if time, circumstance, and education might yet strip him of his coarse exterior, and polish the rough gem which was now incrusted with dirt. He was limping painfully along, barefooted, over the burning dirt of the turnpike road; and he, too, bore a large pack, which was suspended over his shoulder upon a stout stick, and carried another and smaller one in his arms.

The third and last person in the procession was a little girl, a delicate child of possibly six years old, wholly and entirely unlike either of her companions, although her dress denoted her as belonging to them. She carried no bundle, and was enveloped from head to foot in an old, tattered, waterproof cloak, which, being originally intended for a much taller person, reached to the ground about her, and had to be held up as she walked. She wore upon her head a huge coal-scuttle thing of a bonnet, of the kind known as a "shaker," which had at least the merit of protecting her from the sun, for it was so deep and extended so far beyond her little face that she looked as if she stood under the roof of a porch. She was fair and delicate, with pure, finely-grained complexion, finely-cut features, and short, curling hair; with large, sweet, violet eyes, and long, thick-fringed lashes; but she was flushed and over-wearied, and there was a strange look about her eyes, as if their expression had been suddenly struck out of them. She rarely raised them, plodding on with her head bent down, and staggering along with weak, uncertain steps, like one who walks in sleep; but when she did lift them, their dreamy, lost, bewildered look was pitiful to see—it was almost like looking into the open eyes of the dead. Yet she made no complaint, nor uttered any sound save a low moaning, which she seemed alike unconscious of and unable to suppress.

They were toiling up a long sandy hill now, and as their weary feet slackened in speed, their leader stopped half-way up and shook her clenched hand at the loiterers: "Hurry up! hurry up! do ye hear me? both of ye! Do ye think I'll be waiting for sich brats as ye? Not I! Walk up, you Jim! Walk up, you little mischief! Hurry yourself, you bag of lazy bones! or I'll know the reason why." The boy quickened his pace, and came within speaking distance of the virago:

"Marm," he said, deprecatingly and humbly, "please! I don't think that Jess can hurry up; her little legs is all wore out, and it is awful hot! She can't but jest stand now; and I guess she can't go no faster, no how!"

"Don't tell me!" said the woman, savagely, administering a sharp blow upon his face as she spoke; "don't go to tell me she can't! I say she can! and I say she shall! Don't yer try to come it over me that way. I ain't that soft yer take me to be, I tell you! If she can't walk, let her go on her fours. Go back, you, and tell her I'll teach her to walk, and dance too; and mind you and make her hurry up, or I'll teach yer both to walk Spanish 'fore I'm done wid yer. Do ye hear?"

With a sad look of helpless and hopeless indignation upon his coarse but honest features the boy turned away from the termagant. "You be—jamed! you darned old chicken-hawk!" he said; which was the nearest approach to a deadly oath with which his Puritanical childhood had invested him, and he retraced his weary steps to rejoin his little companion.

"Jess!" he said, speaking with a forced cheerfulness he was far from feeling—"come, little Jess! you must hurry up, marm says; see now if yer can't kind 'er chipper up, and go a bit faster; do, now, that's a good gal!"

"I can't!" said the poor, weary child, lifting her strange eyes to his face. "I can't, Jim; I am all tired out."

"Poor little Jess! Yes, dear, I know yer be," said the boy, with a look and tone of compassionate tenderness scarcely in keeping with his rough exterior. "Poor little Jess!" he repeated, looking sadly down upon her; "and I'm loth to tell yer, I be; but—yer see, marm's as mad as fire, and as savage as a she-bear. I dun'no what's come over her, but I don't like her looks to-day. When she has that are red light in her eyes she means mischief, as sure as you're alive! Do try to hurry up a little bit, or I'm feared she'll kill yer; she's wicked enough!"

"Let her," said the child, speaking in a languid, monotone voice; "let her, Jim, if she wants to. I sometimes wish she would; wouldn't it be good to be dead and cool, and sleep in the fresh, cold earth? Oh! Jim, my feet are blistered, and my head aches, and I'm so tired, oh! so tired and hot; I can't go any faster; I can hardly go at all!"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"You poor little thing!" said Jim, kindly. "She is too hard on yer; an old skeer-crow! so she is. I'd kerry yer on my back if I could, Jess; yer know I would jest as soon as not if I could; but, yer see, I can't; and marm wouldn't let me if I could—least ways I don't guess she would."

"No!" said little Jess, "you can't carry me, Jim; thank you all the same, though. You've got my pack, and your own too, already, and you can't hardly carry both of them now; and you've lent me your shoes too. You can't help me any more, Jim."

"Yes, I can, too!" said the boy, cheerfully, a new idea dawning in his fertile Yankee mind. "You jest see, now; wait a bit; there now, I'll jest turn this old lether strap round behind, and you ketch a holt of it with both yer hands; keep a holt on it by both ends, and I'll tug yer along; that'll help yer some, see if it don't; you keep right behind me, and marm won't see. There, now, that's right; and here we go. I'm a tug-steamer, and you're the good ship Jess; and I'll get you safe into port. Cheerily now, cheerily now! and here we go; cheerily here, and cheerily there, and cheerily now, and here we go;" and poor Jim, tired and weary with his own burden, began to whistle a merry tune to enliven his little, helpless companion as he braced himself to toil up the hill.

They were nearly up now; and the woman who had preceded them, having reached the summit, had stopped to rest; and, lowering her pack to the ground, was sitting upon it, still smoking, and impatiently waiting for them to come up to her, with a sullen scowl upon her dark, sinister face.

"You keep right behind me, Jess," said the boy, speaking over his shoulder without turning round; "and when we get 'most up to her you jest quit holt of the strap, and cast off, will yer?" and he resumed his tune.

As the young pedestrians drew near the old woman a carriage, which had been toiling up the long, steep ascent behind them, reached the summit at the same time, and the driver stopped to breathe his panting horses, who, smoking and snorting, tossed up their heads, and shook themselves in their harness, as if in relief after the heavy strain in the intense heat; and one of the gentlemen who occupied the carriage leaning out addressed some trifling question to the children. Little Jess, who stood nearest to the carriage, stepped forward to answer him; and as she did so she instinctively pushed back the huge bonnet which concealed and almost blinded her.

As the sweet little innocent face, with its pretty baby features, and great mournful dreamy eyes, was thus revealed to him, the gentleman started as in surprise, and turned a quick, suspicious glance from the child to her two companions. "Does this little girl belong to you?" he said to the woman, with a look of cool displeasure. "And why do you let her walk in such a day as this—a day to try the strength of horses? She is too young and delicate for such a tramp as this; she has not the strength for it."

In a moment the woman had caught little Jess and drawn her down upon her lap, and folding her arms about her and clasping her to her bosom in such a way as effectually to hide the child's face, she commenced to rock her to and fro with assumed tenderness as she answered in her whining, beggar tones:

"True for ye, yer Honor! Sure, and yer Honor's right, she's not that fit for it, the poor babby! but what is poor folks to do? She's me grandchild, and I'm taking her to town to get advice for her; for she's sickening, yer Honor, the same way as her poor mother sickened, and she's not long dead. A few pennies, yer Honor, jest to help the lone woman to get food and medicine for the poor babby, and she the last one that's left to me; and good luck to you and yours; a few pennies, your Honor." And she held out the child's little hand, grasping it by the wrist, to receive the expected alms.

The gentleman looked at the repulsive object before him with disgust and suspicion; but the child's look of mournful endurance had touched him to the heart. He had no time for investigation; and as the driver gathered up his reins he dropped a liberal bounty into the little hand thus unwillingly extended to receive it, and the carriage moved on.

For a few moments the woman retained her seat and her attitude, still rocking the child slowly backward and forward, until the carriage, descending the hill, had turned round a corner which hid her from view; then, suddenly rising, she grasped the little girl by the shoulder and shook her with a ferocity which threatened to shake the breath of life entirely out of the little gasping blue lips.

"You try that trick agin, me beauty," she said, "and see what yer will get by it, yer young fox, you! Try it agin, I tell yer, when next any quality stops to speak to yer, and I'll strip yer pretty red and white skin from yer face wid me nails. You jest try it agin, do you hear, you young trollop, and you'll see what comes of it—that's all!" And with another violent shake she flung the child angrily from her, and lifting up her pack descended the hill.

"Oh, Jim, Jim! what did I do?" sobbed the panting and terrified child, when she was able to speak, to Jim, whose arm had caught and sustained her little breathless form as the old woman flung her aside. "Oh, Jim, Jim! tell me what did I do?"

"Nothin'—yer didn't do nothin' as I knows of," said Jim, soothingly. "But don't yer mind, Jess dear—it's over now, I guess; she's spit her spite for this time, I reckon. I seen it a-coming all day. She's been jest as cross as two sticks. I knew somebody had got to take it. I'm sorry it fell to you instead of me—that's all. But I'm glad she didn't kill you; I 'most wonder she did not. But come along

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

now, Jess; it's all down hill now, and growing cooler. It's all down hill to the bridge, and then I know the way marm 'll take; I've been here afore; she'll turn to the right and make for the tavern in the street jest over the bridge. Lor! it ain't no ways at all; and then we'll have supper, and you can rest nicely. Come, Jess dear; it's ony a little way furder, and all down hill—come now."

And the children renewed their walk, Jess crying silently and perhaps unconsciously, the big tears dropping unheeded and unchecked upon the dusty pathway, for she was too much exhausted for passionate weeping. As they entered the town, or rather city, the boy's predictions were verified. Mrs. O'Leary, after crossing the bridge, turned aside into a narrow street or lane, and entered a public house of the lowest pretensions. Here, having deposited her pack upon the floor, she went out to order her supper, while little Jess dragged herself into a corner of the room and sunk down, breathing heavily, panting and exhausted, like some overdriven animal, or some wild thing hunted to the death; and Jim, depositing his load also, crept out into the inn-yard.

In about half an hour the supper which the woman had called for was brought in and placed upon the table. It was incongruous in kind and coarse in quality, but abundant in quantity, consisting of cold meat and potatoes, fried bacon and eggs, cabbage, cheese, bread-and-butter, pickles, preserves, tea, beer, and something nameless in a black bottle; and Mrs. O'Leary, seating herself alone at the table, commenced her evening meal. After she had got fairly engaged in this enjoyment Jim peeped into the room, and, finding her attention thus fully occupied, he came silently into the apartment and approached little Jess. The child was lying just where she had thrown herself down upon her entrance, but the flush had passed from her fair and regular features, and she lay there apparently insensible and deathly pale, only an occasional gasping sob giving evidence that she was still living. Tenderly and noiselessly the boy lifted her slight little form in his arms, and bore her out into the yard. Here, having divested her of the heavy water-proof cloak, and propped her up against an angle of the little pump shed, he tore off a strip from his old neckhandkerchief, and proceeded to bathe her little pallid face and nerveless hands with cool fresh water from the pump; and gradually extending his lavations he put back the thick, clustering curls from her brow, and bathed her whole head, neck, and arms.

Presently the faint returning color in her lips encouraged him in his loving care, and at last she opened her dreamy eyes, and recognizing her friend she smiled and murmured, faintly, "That's good—oh, how good!"

"Yer feel better now, don't yer, Jess?" said the boy, kindly. "I'll bet yer do;" and, taking off her wide shoes, he tenderly washed the tired and way-worn little feet, and gathering some cool plantain leaves from the corner of the yard, he bound them up; and shaking the gravel from the coarse shoes which were his own, he replaced them upon her feet.

"Oh, thank you, Jim!" said the child, gratefully. "Aren't you kind to me?"

"Yes, I be," was Jim's simple answer. Possibly had he possessed more powers of language he would have said, modestly, "I wish to be," or "I try to be;" but poor Jim was no orator—he only knew that he felt kindly to the poor lonely child thus thrown upon his compassion; and feeling so, he did not hesitate to own it. The remark was not courtly, perhaps, but it was undoubtedly sincere, which is better.

"And now," he said, as, after washing her hair, he pulled a forlorn-looking bit of broken comb from his pocket and hastily smoothed the glossy, disordered curls which twined around his fingers—"now I'll kerry yer back, Jess; and don't yer make the leastest mite of noise, and maybe she hain't missed us."

This conjecture proved correct, for the woman, having satisfied the fiercest impulses of hunger and thirst, had reached the contemplative stage of her conviviality, and was sitting with both arms extended on the table, a knife and fork in either hand, grasped by the handle, and held upright in the red fists which rested on the board before her.

"I guess she's ena'most done now," whispered Jim, encouragingly, as he replaced little Jess in her corner; and sure enough, after two or three more consultations of the black bottle, the woman rose, reeling from the table. Lighting her pipe again, she turned and addressed the children:

"Yer may come now, yer brats, and get yer supper; and then off to bed wid ye. I'm going out—you Jim, do yer hear? Maybe I'll be late, ye need not wait for me; if I don't see you in the morning yer knows yer work—meet me here at noon, look yer, and mind yer have arnt yer living, both on yer; if not—" A shake of the fist and a threatening scowl filled up the meaning pause.

"Now then, Jess, for our supper," said Jim, as the termagant departed—"I'm most awful hungry, and so I guess be you: seemed to me I couldn't hardly wait till the old catamount cleared out. This cold meat looks mighty good, I tell yer, and here's cheese too: I'm powerful fond of cheese, ain't you? Come, Jess, we'll have a real good supper, won't we? Why! I declare to goodness I'm as hungry as a bear!"

Yet, in spite of his avowal of hunger, which was not assumed, Jim attended to the wants of his little companion before he began his own meal. He spread her a thick slice of bread and butter, helped her to cold meat, cheese, and tea, and then he gave his attention to his own wants.

"Jess!" said the boy, presently, "here is some beer, do you love it? I dun'no if it is good for little gals or not, I'm sure I don't.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Do you want some, Jess? if you do, you shall have some whether or no!"

"I don't know," said little Jess, "let me taste, will you?"

Jim poured out a glassful and handed it to her; she touched it with her sweet lips and passed it back to him with a shudder of repulsion.

"I don't like it, Jim—it tastes bitter, I do not want it."

"Well, so much the better," said the boy; "I guess milk and tea is better for little gals, any way; but I love it, and I guess it won't hurt me, so here goes;" and he drank off the glassful which she had rejected.

"What is in the bottle, Jim? is it molasses?" asked the child, innocently.

"Molasses! no," said the boy, solemnly; "I guess it ain't! it's pizon, Jess! pizon for sich as you and I—sich pizon as killed my poor father. Don't ever you go to touch it for your life, Jess—never as long as yer live!"

"No!" said little Jess, "I won't—I don't want to."

Little more was said by the children until their supper was over, and then Jim said, "This has been a hard day's work, Jess; but," he added, reverently, "that's a good supper—may the Lord make us thankful!"

"What do you say that for?" asked the little girl, slipping down from her chair and coming round to him, "did the Lord give it to us, Jim?"

"Well, yes, I s'pose so," said Jim, reflecting a moment; "He gives us our daily bread, yer know, and takes care on us, don't he?"

"I don't know," said the child. "Yes, maybe he does; but I think you take care of me more than he or any body else does, don't you?"

"Yes, I try to," said her companion; "I hev took some care on yer ever since you was borned."

"Have you?" said the child, wonderingly, "so long as that? Why, Jim! can you remember when I was born?"

"To be sure I can," said Jim, confidently; "'tain't so very long ago nuther as to be very hard to remember, Jess."

"And have I lived with you and marm ever since I was born?" asked little Jess, a shade of wistful inquiry stealing into her vague but strangely beautiful eyes.

"Oh yes," said Jim, "ever since—why not?"

"Ever since I was a little baby," repeated the child, sadly and musingly.

"No," said Jim, laughing; "I didn't say baby—I don' no nothing 'bout yer when yer was a baby. I said when yer was borned."

"Well," said Jess, "and wasn't I a baby then?"

"No; not by no means," said Jim; "yer warn't no baby at all; but jest a real, nice, putty little gal. Baby? no, not a bit of it."

"But, Jim," persisted little Jess, "if you remember when I was born, you must remember when I was a baby—people are always babies when they are born, Jim."

"They be?" said Jim, doubtfully. "Do tell? I didn't know that, I'm sure. Well, you warn't one, any way. Why, I remember jest as well when marm brought yer home under her cloak, and I know yer warn't no baby then, but a real putty little gal—not so very much littler than yer be now, but jest as putty as yer could be; and yer was drest to kill—with an el'gant white gownd, and red and gold things round yer neck and arms, and curls as long as my arm. I s'posed that was the way yer was drest up in Heaven before you come down here to be borned. But marm, she cut off all yer curls, close to yer head, and took off all yer putty things, and I guess she sold them; and she put old cloes on yer, and told me yer name was Jess, and yer was to be my little sister, and I never mistrusted but what yer was borned then. Yer was fast asleep when yer come, and every time yer waked up and cried marm she put a handkerchief to yer mouth to stop yer crying, and you'd go to sleep agin jest as quick as quick could be; and when at last yer did wake up without crying yer was real stupid, and didn't know hardly nothin'."

"Jim," said the little girl, "are you sure this is real true, or is it a make-up story?"

"True?" said Jim; "yes, to be sure it is. I ain't a making of it up, not a word of it. I remember it all jest as well as can be—why, 'twas ony about a year ago."

The poor little girl looked at him in her sadly puzzled way, putting up her hand to her head, as she often did.

"Jim," she said at last, "sometimes I have thought I remembered something, or as if I was just going to remember something"—she faltered, paused a moment, and then went on: "But whenever I try to think it all goes away from me, and I have thought it might be only a dream I'd had, and not a remember at all; but if you remember, too, it must be true. Oh!" she said, as the short-lived look of intelligence faded from her misty but sadly-beautiful eyes—"Oh, if I only could remember! but I can't, Jim! I can't—I can't; it has all gone again."

"Well, never you mind about it now, Jess," said Jim, as the little girl paused, her mind apparently drifting off again into the fogs of forgetfulness. "I dare say it will all come back to yer when yer ain't thinking of trying to remember. But don't yer let marm ketch sound or sense of all this; if yer do, I guess she'll give us both on us sumthin' to remember to our dying days. And now, Jess, I guess we'd better go to bed: I'm sure I'm as tired as a mill-horse, and I guess you be too; so come along—let's go and sleep."

Guided by Jim, who had occupied the same quarters before, the children made their way to a large attic with a number of pallet beds on the floor.

"Oh, botheration!" said Jim, "ain't it awful hot here—hot as Tanteribogus! But never

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google mind, there's a good wind outside, and I'll open the winders, and then I guess we'll sleep without rocking."

This was done, and then Jim drew one of the little beds near the open window, and Jess, kneeling reverently down, clasped her little hands, and bending her fair head, repeated her "Now I lay me," in low, sweet, musical tones; then, suiting the action to the word, she calmly "laid her down to sleep."

Presently from the other side of the room came the less musical murmur of Jim's simple orisons—

> "Four corners to my bed!
> Four angels overhead!
> Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John > Hold the horse that I ride on."

"Bless the bed that I sleep on," sleepily corrected the voice of little Jess.

"No, it ain't nuther," said Jim—"I said it right; that's the way my grandmarm taught me, 'way up to Connecticut; and, by George, I guess she knew. Didn't you know that was the right way to say it, Jess?"

"No," said Jess, "I always thought it was the other way."

"Well it ain't," said the boy—"my way is the right way."

"Maybe so," said little Jess, pleasantly; "I dare say you know best. Good-night."

But Jim was not quite satisfied that he was right after all. "Jess," he called out a few moments later, "I guess I know how it is—they teach the gals to say it one way, and the boys say it t'other way—don't yer think so?"

"Yes, Jim," said little Jess, who was already half-way to the Land of Dreams; but presently she half rose in her low bed, and peering across the dim attic in search of her friend and companion.

"Jim," she whispered, with trembling tones—"Jim—Jim—have you gone to bed yet?"

"Yes," said Jim, "just turned in, 'snug as a bug in a biscuit;' do you want any thing?"

"You are not asleep, are you, Jim?" was the next question.

"Did I ever? No, Jess, I should think not," laughed Jim, rather sleepily.

"Do you think there are any rats and mice here, Jim?" This was asked in such trembling tones. "Oh! Jim, I am almost sure I felt one!"

"Oh no! I guess not. Rats and mice? Oh no! I am sure and sartin there ain't."

"But, Jim, I am so afraid of them."

"Oh nonsense! they won't hurt yer. You go to sleep like a good gal, and I'll engage they won't hurt yer. Rats and mice don't hurt good little gals, you know."

"I know," sobbed the child; "but maybe I ain't good enough, Jim?"

"Oh yes, you be; bully for you, Jess! Why you're good enough for any thing."

"But stop awake a moment, Jim," said Jess, for whom the fear of rats had murdered sleep; "if you please, I want to ask you something."

"Well, ask away! What do you want—a drink of water?"

"No, oh no! I want to know is marm your mother?"

"My mother? what, marm!" cried Jim, springing up into a sitting posture in the zeal of his filial indignation. "No, not a bit of it! no, not by two chalks. My mother was a woman, a decent and respectable woman, not like this old squaw. My mother! I remember her well enough, though she died when I was a little feller; she was sick a good while, and father he got discouraged, he sot every thing by her; and when she died he went to the bad; and then he took marm, or she took him, and then he went to the bad double-quick. I held on 'till he died, I allers meant to, 'cause he was allers good to mother and me; and when he died I cal'clated to quit marm, cut and run. I know where my folks live, way up to Connecticut; and I know what their names is; and they're decent sort of folks too. I am sartin they would do for me if I could get to them; and I've got money enough saved up and hid to take me there; but—" He paused.

"Oh, but Jim! Jim! if you do go, what will become of me?" sobbed Jess.

"That's so—that's jest it," said the boy; "that's why I don't go. Yer'd better believe I won't leave yer with that old she-dragon, that's a fact; I staid by for father, and I'll hang on for you. I'll stay till I can lay up enough to take you too, or I'll never go—that yer may be sure on; and when I get as much as will kerry us there, won't we cut and run? Oh, Jess! where my folks live yer can have roast apples any time, and as much pumpkin and milk as yer can eat, and the woods is chock-full of nuts and berries. And now you be a good gal and go to sleep and dream about it."

"Oh, thank you! thank you, Jim! how good you are; but wait one moment: I want to ask you, how can you get the money? is it what we beg?"

"No indeed!" said Jim, scornfully, "I guess it isn't; not by no means; marm makes us beg, and we can't help it, and what I gets I gives to her. I don't want no charity; my folks ain't beggars, I guess. But sometimes, yer know, I gets a little job of work, to hold a horse, or run an errand, or kerry things home from the market, and then they pays me, that's honest money, and I keeps it. And one of these days, when I gets a little more, you and I will quit, and make tracks for my folkses place; and now good-night, you go to sleep, and let me, for I'm tired ena'most to death's door!"

There was a short silence, and then poor little Jess broke forth again with,

"Oh, Jim! Jim! you are not asleep yet, are you?"

"No," said Jim, good-naturedly. "And I ain't likely to be, as I see. How can a feller hope to go to sleep if you keep a hailing of him so? What is it now?"

"Jim, there are rats here; I felt one run over my feet."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Pooh! nonsense, Jess! I don't believe it."

"Look! look! Jim! there, just on the window, in the moonlight—see!"

"By the living gingerbread, so there is!" said Jim. "Well, I did not believe it. Hold on a bit; keep still. I saw a nice old mouser down stairs—a regular old muff of a cat—I'll go down and bring her up."

In a few moments the boy came back. "There," he said, laughing, as he shut the door and put down his prize—"I've rubbed her sides and all her old paws with all the butter we left on the table, and I guess it will take her all night to lick herself clean; so she'll have to keep awake any how she can fix it; and being awake she'll look after the rats and mice for us. And now do go to sleep, and let me, for I'm powerful sleepy—that's a fact."

Trusting to the care of this singular watcher the two neglected children dropped off into quiet and dreamless slumbers; and if the holy angels watched over them too they did not know it; and when morning roused them, their feline companion, who had, as Jim predicted, spent the whole night in restoring her glossy fur to its proper condition, was sitting on the window ledge, winking and blinking in the sun's early rays. The children's toilets were more quickly made; they had, like her, but one suit apiece for day and night, and no power like hers to clean and restore them; but going down to the pump they washed their faces and hands, and again Jim combed little Jess's shining curls, and gathering two full-blown roses from the inn door he twisted them in among the little girl's glossy hair.

"There, Jess!" he said, holding her off at arm's-length, and surveying her with much satisfaction—"I declare if you don't look jest like a picter, with them red roses in yer hair! Yer do so!—that's a fact, and no two ways about it!" And certainly no artist's hand, however skillful, could have improved the effect of the simple and hasty arrangement which the boy's clumsy fingers had produced.

As Mrs. O'Leary had not returned, or if so, was still invisible, possibly still sleeping off the effects of the last night's orgies, Jim did not dare to call for any breakfast, and the children went out upon their day's quest, upon the strength of the last night's supper; but that was little to them, they were used to such privations, and the mere fact that they were to be out of their tormentor's presence for a while made for them a sufficient holiday. They went through the lower and poorer parts of the city first, wandering on through many streets, round wharves, and market-places, and stores, where early clerks were busy opening doors and taking down shutters; sometimes successful, sometimes otherwise; oftenest receiving charity from persons whose poverty was only a little less grinding than their own than from the more favored classes; until Jim declared it was late enough to try a better quarter of the city, and thither they bent their steps.

"'Tain't no use in life, you see," he remarked sagely, to the acquiescent little Jess, "for to go to gentlefolk's houses so very airly; the gentlefolks they ain't up, and the help is apt to be disgruntled and fretty in the morning; but come toward noon, why they comes to and feels better, and I guess we might as well begin among them now." And followed by his meek little companion, who never thought of questioning the wisdom of any of his arrangements, he led the way to a more fashionable quarter; and, taking the houses in turn, they went in alternately to solicit charity.

At length they came to an elegant and costly mansion, with stone front and lofty steps, in the small court-yard of which, inclosed in a costly stone balustrade, a man was busily arranging some choice dahlias. Little Jess, with whom the love of flowers seemed to be almost a passion, stopped to admire them. As she stood thus, peering through the closed gate, her little face pressed against the quaintly wrought iron, the door before her opened and a little girl about her own age, but dressed in all the fullness of wealth and fashion, came airily out upon the piazza, and the quick eye of Jess took in her whole figure at a glance.

"Oh, Jim, Jim, look at her!" whispered the child. "Look—look at her little boots, and her sunshade! Oh, Jim!" she continued, a sudden flush passing over her face. "I had a sunshade once, and just such boots, Jim;" and she turned full upon him in wondering inquiry, "Where are they?"

Before Jim had time to reply to the eager whisper, however, the little lady had advanced to the head of the steps and addressed the servant:

"John, nurse says you may go for the carriage now; I am all dressed, and mamma will be ready in five minutes, she says."

As the man thus bidden dropped his tools and left the yard, little Jess, wild-eyed and breathless, sprung through the unfolding gate, and, bounding up the steps, caught the little girl by the hand:

"Is mamma here, and nurse?" she said, in a flush of eagerness which almost deprived her of the power of utterance—"Mamma and nurse? Oh, take me to them, take me to them! Oh, I do so want to see mamma!"

"Go away, you little dirty beggar!" said the young lady, rudely withdrawing her hand, and giving the intruder a sudden push which nearly sent her headlong down the stone steps; but Jess was agile as a young fawn, and springing up, she caught the girl's embroidered robes in her little soiled hands.

"Oh, take me to mamma!" she pleaded with passionate earnestness—"Oh, do take me to mamma; I know she wants to see me!"

"She don't!" said the other, scornfully; "you dirty little beggar! Let go my dress!" And extricating her flounces with difficulty from Jess's eager grasp, she sprang over the threshold and endeavored to close the door;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google but she was not quick enough to exclude Jess, who pressed closely after her; and when the heavy door swung to upon its polished hinges it shut, inclosing both the children within the narrow vestibule.

The little lady of the house, finding herself in such close proximity to the little tatterdemalion, was really frightened at the pertinacity of her tormentor; she screamed aloud, and rushed headlong up stairs, but a step as fleet as her own was behind her; and now ensued a perfect race between the two little girls. On they fled pell-mell, pursuer and pursued; one frantic with nervous terror, the other flushed, wild, and eager with a newly-awakened hope—"Mamma and nurse"—those talismanic words had struck through her long-clouded brain—those familiar words had been the key-note which had power to unlock the long dormant memory!

On they fled, up the richly carpeted stairs, where their flying feet awoke no echoes, through hall and corridor gleaming with stained glass, and rich with carving and statuary; on through gayly furnished apartments, with costly paintings and gorgeous draperies, fled the affrighted little hostess, breathless and panting with alarm, conscious only of the swift feet behind her, the eager hands clutching at her dress; and, quite as heedless of all the treasures of magnificence scattered around her, followed little Jess, a new intelligence in her eager face, a new meaning in her deep, violet eyes; alive only to the one thought, that before her were mamma and nurse! On and on, until the bursting open of a door revealed a splendid dressing-room, and with a wild cry from the lips of each of "Mamma, oh, mamma!" the two children dashed headlong into the room together.

The lady of the house, a handsomely-dressed but stern-looking woman, was standing before a mirror. She turned and received her terrified child, who, flinging herself upon her, hid her face in her mother's dress; while poor little Jess stopped abruptly at the door, and stood, pale as marble, with lifted hand and upraised foot, like some masterly statue of a woodland nymph suddenly arrested in full speed, but with wild eyes and beating heart, her new and beautiful hope crushed, and her very spirit faint with her terrible disappointment.

"Isabella," said the lady, raising the child's tearful face from its hiding-place, "what does all this mean? What is all this noise? Who is this little girl, and why did you bring her up here?"

"I did not, mamma, I did not!" sobbed Isabella. "I told her not to come, but she would. I did not want her; she frightened me. She is a dirty little beggar. Send her away, mamma; she wouldn't mind me!"

"And what did you want, you bold little thing?" inquired the lady.

But poor Jess, struggling with her grief, had no power to speak.

"Answer me at once," said the lady. "Why did you come up into my room?"

"Because—because—" sobbed the child, the quick tears now falling in showers—"because I did so want to see mamma; and she," pointing to Isabella—"she said mamma was here; and she is not—she is not."

"She is too," said Isabella; "this is mamma."

"No, she is not mamma," said Jess; "not my mamma. She is not half so pretty as mamma is."

At this moment a servant announced the carriage was in waiting.

"Put this little beggar out of the house, James," said the lady, not much conciliated by Jess's frank comparison. "I think she is a bold, bad child. Take care she does not get in again. She frightened Miss Isabella very much, and I shouldn't wonder if she had stolen something. Look at your plate-closet before she goes."

"Oh no, mamma; I know she has not stolen any thing," said Isabella, who was really a kind-hearted child; "and she did not hurt me any; she only frightened me a good deal because she would come in."

"Very well, my dear. But, James, you must be more careful of the hall door; and do you see this girl safe out of the house. Come, Isabella."

The man grasped the shoulder of little Jess and led her to a back staircase, as Isabella and her mother descended to their carriage. But as she was thus rudely and ignominiously conducted down stairs a new idea dawned upon her still confused mind, awakening a new hope. Isabella had spoken of nurse too. Might she not be there, if mamma was not?

"Is nurse at home?" she inquired, meekly, of the man, who still held her.

"Yes, I dare say she is," said the man, upon whom the unusual beauty of the child had not passed unnoticed. "Do you know any thing of her? Do you want to see her—hey, little one?"

"If you please—yes," said Jess, hesitatingly.

The man knocked at a side-door, and a pleasant-looking, middle-aged woman opened it.

"Here, Mrs. Nurse," he said, laughing—"here is a young lady asking for you. Are you acquainted with her? Not a very reputable acquaintance, I should say."

"What do you want of me, little one?" said the woman, kindly, but evidently surprised.

But the poor child had now sunk down upon the stairs, and was sobbing too violently to speak; for here was a new disappointment and another mystery. Here was nurse, and she too was changed into a perfect stranger. And the bewildered mind of the poor little girl was entirely upset. But in the mean time the practical eye of the experienced woman had taken in all the details of little Jess's appearance. She lifted the soft glossy curls, and saw the small shell-like ear. She marked the pure translucent skin, smooth as satin; the delicate moulding of the features, and the small dim-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

pled hands and feet. And she made a shrewd guess at the truth; at least she had reared too many children not to see at a glance that Jess was no beggar-born child.

"What is the matter, little dear?" she said, kindly, adding, as she laid her hand on the bright and burnished curls, and looked into the beautiful but tearful eyes, "I shouldn't wonder if you had got lost. Have you?"

"Yes, yes," sobbed the poor little thing—"I believe so; I have lost my dear, dear mamma and nurse. The little girl said they were here, and so I came in; for oh! I do so want to see mamma. Oh! can't you tell me where to find my dear mamma and nurse?" she said, clasping her hands together, and looking piteously in the face of the kind-hearted woman.

"I wish I could, you poor little thing!" said the woman. "Can't you tell me your name, my little dear?"

The child hesitated. "My name is Jess now; but when I lived with dear mamma they called me Juliet—little Juliet."

"And what else, my dear—Juliet what?"

"I don't remember."

"And what was your mamma's name. Can you tell me that?"

"I always called her mamma!"

"Poor child!" said the woman, "I do believe you're a lady's child any how. Come down into the kitchen with me, dear, and I'll give you something to eat, and maybe we'll find out something."

In the kitchen they found Jim inquiring for his little companion, and Jess was conscious of her own ingratitude, for she had entirely forgotten poor Jim, her best and only friend, since the moment she left him at the gate.

"Oh, Jim!" she said, going up to him as soon as she entered the kitchen, and putting her hand confidingly into his, while nurse rapidly told her story to the other servants, "since I came in this house I have remembered—oh, ever and ever so much! I used to live in a nice house like this; and I had mamma and nurse, and I had a great beauty of a doll, all my own; and I used to have bread and marmalade for my lunch, and my name was little Juliet."

"My gracious goodness!" said Jim, "why didn't yer ever tell me on't afore, Jess?"

"I did not remember it myself, Jim, 'till I came in here. Seeing the little girl made me think of it, I guess. Yes, yes," she continued, speaking with great rapidity and lifting up her sweet eyes, from whose violet depths the mournful clouds seemed breaking away, "I remember more yet—I remember I was out with mamma, and she went into a shop to buy something, and I stood at the door, and an old woman came by, and looked at me; that was marm (you know, Jim), and she asked me to go round the corner and see her white lamb, and I went; and we couldn't find the little lamb; and then I wanted to go to mamma, but she would not let me, and when I cried she held a handkerchief over my mouth to stop me—and then—I forget then—but after that I was Jess the little beggar girl, and not little Juliet any more; and I lived with marm and Jim, and I never, never saw dear mamma or nurse again; and oh dear, dear! I don't know where to find them."

"As sure as you live the child has been stolen," said the nurse to the cook, the chambermaid, and man-servant, who all stood gazing at the little girl in helpless pity and wonder. "I'd give the world if the Doctor was at home; he'd know what to do quick as thought."

"Why didn't you never do nothing about it?" said the cook, turning upon Jim. Then the boy made a hasty explanation of all he knew upon the subject, and of their bondage to marm, and her power over them, adding, mysteriously:

"She'd kill Jess jest as soon as not if she knowed what she has let out here. I don't doubt but she would; but Jess never told even me of it afore; did yer, Jess?"

"No," said the child, "I couldn't; I did not remember it myself—it all came to me when I saw the little girl and her mother."

"I'll bet they gave her chloroform or ether, or some of them dreadful stuffs," said the cook, solemnly; "and it kind of obfusificated her senses."

To this learnedly-expressed medical opinion, which was in point of fact very near the actual truth, all the other servants yielded admiring assent; and then it was proposed by the little committee of investigation that Jim should go somewhere, and see somebody, and do something. But the where, the who, and the what were not clearly defined; and as opinions seemed to vary between the President, the Governor, and the Mayor of the city, the suggestion, not being a practical one, fell to the ground.

"I wish to mercy the Doctor was at home!" said Nurse, for the second time; "but I suppose he won't be till three o'clock at least."

"I should think," said the pretty chambermaid, blushing and smiling, "that Mr. James would not object to show them the way to the Doctor's rooms. Should you, Mr. James? in a case of charity, you know—not to oblige any body."

"I'd do a great deal to oblige somebody, Bridget," said James, very tenderly; "though I don't say as 'twould be very pleasant company for me to keep. But the Doctor has gone out of town; he has an operation, and won't be home till five."

But now Jim reminded his new friends it was time for him and Jess to go, as it was getting late, and they had not yet taken money enough to satisfy the expectations of Mrs. O'Leary.

"Well," said the kindly nurse, "you can at least tell me where you are all putting up, and I'll see the Doctor as soon as he comes home; and it's my evening out, and my brother and me will do jest what he tells us is best, and see if we can't help you;" and with many good wishes, and a little collection taken up for Jim's own

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google private purse, which, however, he resolutely declined, the little wanderers were suffered to depart.

"Come, Jess!" said the boy, when they were in the street again, "we've spent a heap of time there; s'pose now we go try the great hotels and boarding-houses. I guess it's the day for the steamer; maybe some of the big boys will give us a lift, who knows? We can but try."

They turned their steps in that direction, but with little success.

"Botheration, Jess; how you do bump up against folks!" said Jim. "Do try to keep yer eyes open, and see where yer going, can't yer?"

But poor little Jess was worn out, faint, and bewildered: the heat and fatigue of the day before, her long fast — for she had been too much excited to partake of the food offered her —the rush of awakened memories, the sudden revulsion of feeling, the sweet hope, the terrible disappointment, the intense longing for her mother which had lain dormant so long only to rise with more vivid intensity—all were telling upon a naturally delicate organization. She was lost and bewildered and faint, and two or three times in the busy crossings Jim and a policeman had to drag her out almost from under the very feet of the horses; and even when he had got her, as he thought, in a place of safety on the sidewalk, she walked with such unseeing eyes as to run full against a porter laden with heavy trunks with such violence as to be knocked down, and striking the curb-stone with some force, she was taken up insensible.

In a moment the tongues that had railed against her, the hands that had just thrust her aside, were put in motion in her behalf. Tenderly she was lifted up, pale and apparently lifeless, and an old woman, who sat knitting and selling small-wares upon the sidewalk, held out her arms to receive her. The little girl, who was slightly wounded, had fainted more from exhaustion and terror than from the blow. But the first impression was that she was killed; and as she lay extended across the old woman's knees, with closed eyes, and rigid, upturned features, the soft curls all brushed back from the little pale face, whose natural fairness looked yet more pallid in contrast with the deep red roses which poor Jim had twined in her hair, it might well be supposed she was indeed dead.

Poor Jim, frantic with grief and terror, had rushed wildly into a store for water, and as he came back, an open carriage, containing a lady and gentleman, was stopped by the little crowd which a street accident so soon collects.

"What has happened?" inquired the lady, leaning out of the carriage.

"Child run over, mum," answered a man from the outside of the crowd. "A little gal, they say, knocked down and run over."

"Killed?" asked the lady, a white horror passing over her face as she spoke.

"Can't say, mum," replied the man. "Rather guess she is."

"No, not she," answered a tall, gruff policeman. "More skeered than hurt, I'll bet; such young ones aren't easy to kill, I guess; 'naught's never in danger:' them street-children are allers in the way."

The lady did not reply, but bending forward opened the door of the carriage, and stepped out.

"Julia!" cried her companion, starting, "where are you going?"

"Did you not hear, Charles?" said the lady, turning her pale, set face toward him, "a child —a little girl—has been run over, and—"

"But, my dear sister, you have no time; the steamer sails in two hours; we shall miss her, you will be too late."

The lady did not stay to reply; Jim had returned with the water, and the by-standers recognizing him opened a way for him to pass; the lady slowly followed him.

As he reached the child, who was already reviving, Jim suddenly dashed a handful of water full in her pale face. She opened her eyes, saw Jim, knew him, and smiled; but beyond and above Jim she saw and recognized another face. A look of ecstatic joy passed over her pale face—she flung up her waxen arms with a wild cry, "Oh, mamma! mamma! take me! take me!" and relapsed into insensibility, but not before the cry had found a joyful response, "Juliet! Juliet! my child, my darling!" And the motley crowd saw with surprise that richly-dressed and beautiful woman fling herself down upon her knees before the poor costermonger, and clasp the little ragged beggar-girl fondly to her bosom.

A few rapid and excited words from the brother of the lady, who had followed her from the carriage, informed the wondering little crowd that the lady had found her long-lost child in the little beggar-girl; and as the child was borne to the carriage, followed closely by the delighted Jim, hearty cheers told the warm sympathy of those who had witnessed the whole occurrence.

The mother of little Juliet, a wealthy widow, had sought for her lost darling with eager, passionate zeal and bitter lamentation; every means of inquiry had been resorted to which ingenuity could devise or her wealth enable her to execute; but all in vain. A year and a half had gone by, and hope deferred was lost in despair. Her health, and even her reason seemed yielding under the terrible and protracted suffering, and her physician had peremptorily ordered change of scene. Accompanied by her brother she had come from her home, in a distant city, to take passage in the steamer that very day, when this most unexpected encounter, in a most unexpected moment, gave back her lost child to her arms again.

It may gratify the curiosity of some of our readers to learn that, when in consequence of the advice of the Doctor and the exertions of Isabella's kindly nurse, the police were put upon the trail of Mrs. O'Leary, and visited the inn near the bridge, that discreet woman had al-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google ready taken the alarm and had decamped at once.

The delighted Jim, being thus suddenly converted into a freedman by his release from his hated step-mother, was fed, and clothed, and restored to his family "up to Connecticut" by the mother of little Jess; and as the same lady has declared her intention of charging herself with his education and his advancement in life, there is a fair chance that he may one day be heard of as President, Fourth of July orator, or even school-committee man; or filling any other lucrative and responsible office to which the virtuous hopes of a free-born American citizen may consistently aspire.

A CALIFORNIAN CARAVANSARY.

A STATE of homelessness is the normal condition of a large proportion of California's population. The early pioneers did not pack their hearth-stones with them when they sought the great gold fields—indeed it is questionable whether many of them had hearth-stones to pack, for the married seldom go forth as adventurers. The man with a cradle at home has enough to do without rocking any in foreign placers. A wife is a sort of sheet-anchor, so to speak, and it is not easy to slip a cable double-stranded with children and spliced around the knight-heads of the heart. The pioneers were Bedouins, and took their beds with them wherever they went. They took their board too—though, for the matter of that, their bed and board were often one, inasmuch as it was not infrequently necessary in the economy of those meagre households to dine and sleep on the same plank. There were few houses in San Francisco in 1849, and the natural result was a scarcity of homes. Fortunate was he who had a tent on the sand hills, or, failing that, a log under the lee of which to sleep o' nights. Hotels early asserted themselves as a necessity, but in those first days there were none to keep them. The mountains, rolling down their golden sands, and the valleys, into which the golden sands were rolled, attracted all men of strong hands and sanguine spirits—and what others can keep a hotel? Gold, gold, gold; the popular idea was that it was to be had like whortleberries, simply for the gathering; and so men went out, and scrambled over one another, and fought one another, and killed one another, for claims which very often proved in the end to be not worth the working. A comparatively slow process of taking in money when, according to report, it was to be scooped up by shovelfuls near Sacramento, was not to be thought of. So on pushed landlords, cooks, waiters, and scullions; swelling the great tide of peddlers, preachers, lawyers, and other professional gentlemen that flowed up the valley. In this day hotel profits are such that very many sturdy sons of the soil, both east and west, forsake potato and gold digging, and "open a tavern."

However, hotels came at last. Primitive affairs the first ones were. Shanties, sided and shingled with canvas; office, bar-room, dining-hall, bedrooms, parlor, and kitchen, all in one; furnished with tables improvised from empty packing-boxes, and chairs hastily fashioned by sawing flour-barrels in two; mattresses democratically spread upon the floor, and equably stuffed with corn-cobs and broken crockery—there you had the first hotels of San Francisco. The bill of fare was not very varied. Salt pork, salt beef, and "hard-tack," with an occasional bean or two by way of vegetables, were the staples. Eggs brought a dollar apiece; and to have sacrificed the producers to the morbid epicurean appetite would have literally been "killing the goose," etc. Hens that laid a dollar a day paid better in the long-run than cows or camels. Lucullus killed nightingales that he and his friends might feast upon their tongues, but the more frugal San Franciscan consented to forego chickens.

The processes of civilization are certain, and in due time brewed hotels. I do not purpose to follow out the slow workings of an inchoateness which at last fermented into the present completeness; for I am simply making a little magazine article—not history. But I may say that the first hotels were boarding-houses. These were mainly kept by Yankees. That "hash" was unknown upon the tables I will not assert; for so far as my investigations go boarding-houses are the same all the world over. But for the comfort of those early boarders—border ruffians though many of them were—let us hope that the foul smell of fried fish did not prevail in the halls, and that cabbages were cooked in close pots.

Visiting San Francisco now the traveler finds hotels second to none in these United States, of which California stands an isolated sister. The "Occidental," the "Cosmopolitan," and the "Lick House," in elegance of exterior, completeness of internal appointments, furniture, and food—all, in short, that goes to constitute first-class houses—have few rivals, and still fewer superiors, if the word of travelers may be relied on. But it is not of these, nor of any one of them, that I intend to write. They all have their counterparts in other cities. It is an idiosyncratic institution, a hotel which stands like Horace Greeley among men, full of peculiarities and excellences, but so totally different in all characteristics that it can not be compared with its fellows—it is such a hotel that claims the attention of my pen.

The "What Cheer House" is known throughout the whole length and breadth of the Pacific coast. It is as much an institution of San Francisco as are the summer winds, the sand hills, and the Steam Navigation Company. Never a traveler has visited San Francisco without mentioning it in his book; and here let me remark, parenthetically, that I do not know of any traveler who has visited San Francisco without writing a book. Even Bowles, who bowled across the Continent like a cricket-ba"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 launched by the hand of one of the famous Eleven, seeing more and writing more in less time than any other writer that I know of, gave it a place in his book. Colfax ate a chop in its salle à manger; and Richardson took a rib-steak in its refectory. The boys who attend in the coat-room are familiar with the white outer garment and decidedly queer hat of a philosopher whom I will not name; but some years ago the Tribune, in its editorial correspondence, pronounced the "What Cheer" "the best hotel west of the Rocky Mountains." (In justice to others, however, let me state that the Occidental, Cosmopolitan, Lick, and Russ were not then opened.) Ludlow, too, wrote about it; and Bierstadt sketched it. Under all these circumstances some account of the caravansary may not be uninteresting to the general reader.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The "What Cheer" is the great resort of miners and mechanics; of all who, coming to the city, consult economy as well as comfort. Its peculiarities are as follows: Conducted upon the European plan, there is a restaurant connected with the house where meals are served of great excellence and at prices which, contrasted with those of other establishments, may almost be termed nominal. For instance, from the bill of fare lying before me, I condense a sort of schedule: Beef-steaks, chops, cutlets, sausages, fishes, and all that list commonly headed as "cooked to order," 10 cents. Soups, boiled and roast joints, entrées, 10 cents. Of course chicken, turkey, porter-house steaks, and other things which the pampered palate of some bloated aristocrat from the up-country diggings may crave and call for, are higher—25 cents is the damage in such cases. But, again, we have baked pork and beans and brown bread, only 10 cents. Eggs are the extravagant dish, for old traditions are held to regarding the sedentary labors of the hen; and 25 cents is the charge for three, whether boiled, fried, scrambled, poached, omeletted, or combined with ham or bacon. (In place of hearing eggs called for you will very often remark that, by a polite periphrasis of the delicate miner, "hen-fruit" is bespoken.) Bread or hot cakes, cold meats, stewed meats, and Irish stews, are only 5 cents. And so with extra vegetables, puddings, pies, cakes, peaches and cream, etc., 5 cents is the charge. The bill of fare, however, distinctly states, that "All 5-cent dishes, unless accompanied with other dishes, will be charged 10 cents." This is simply an application of the "don't-give-bread-with-one-fishball" idea. But, in furtherance of the great law of compensation, it is stated at the very head and front of the carte, "Boston, brown, or white bread and potatoes, with meat or fish, FREE OF CHARGE." Also, "San Francisco sirup, with cakes, FREE OF CHARGE." In fact, no point involved is left in uncertainty for subsequent arbitration. For it is also stated, that "For using extra sugar, sirup, butter, etc., charges will be made accordingly." And a "caution!" is plainly printed on the outside, that he who eats may read, "$5 will be charged any person who intentionally attempts to pay less than the within prices." So we have a Court of Equity within this remarkable house. How the penalty would be collected after being charged I do not know, for it seems to me that the ways of the law, though wonderful indeed and past finding out, could scarcely be made to reach a case like this. However, it might be some satisfaction to simply "charge it." But, again, this could not very well be done, as no charges are made—at least no accounts are kept about the establishment. Dinners are paid for as soon as swallowed, and lodgings in advance. Though the Tycoon of Japan came hither with a note of introduction from the Mikado, bringing with him enough trunks and fans, toiski and hari-kari implements to fill the cellar, the key of a room would not be given him until he paid over his little 50 cents at the office. No man ever got a bed in this house without paying for it. How it may be in the matter of meals I do not know; and I wonder that the proprietor did not print upon his bills of fare the further "caution" that any one eating a dinner and not paying for it would be "charged $10 extra." It may be that a stomach-pump is kept perdu in an adjoining room, and that a couple of stout garçons from near Tipperary are stationed within quick summoning distance, ready to make application of it.

To return to our mutton for a moment: Surprise that good dishes—every thing is the best of its kind, including butter—can be furnished at such infinitesimal prices is lessened when the quantity consumed is taken into consideration. The Commissary Department is conducted on a gigantic scale; all provisions being bought at wholesale, cash paid for them, and nothing wasted. 4000 meals are furnished daily. The average price of each is about 15 cents. In times of financial crises the average is brought down to 13 cents. Some idea of the business done and the things eaten may be gathered from the following roll of daily consumption: Eggs, 100 dozen; sugar, 1 barrel; butter, 100 pounds; flour, 3 barrels; potatoes, 500 pounds; beef, pork, mutton, lamb, and fish, 700 pounds; raisins, 2 boxes; pies, 150; turkeys and chickens, 400 pounds; milk, 400 quarts. For a verity those miners and mechanics have excellent appetites.

About the hotel proper the first thing which attracts the stranger's attention is the lodging arrangements. This is natural enough, for on registering name for a room it is first necessary to pay down the price—50 cents. This preliminary accomplished he is shown to an apartment about ten feet square, furnished nicely, mahogany bedsteads, curled hair mattresses, a box of matches, a pin-cushion filled with pins, table, chairs—and a brush and comb. (Occasionally travelers forget to bring their private toilet apparatus with them, and again it is sometimes the first introduction of the miner to these little modern conveniences.) Tooth-brushes

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

are not yet provided, I believe, but probably they will be on this suggestion being made to the proprietor. There are no bells in the house —and no chamber-maids. Not a woman is allowed about the premises. If the Emperor Napoleon happened along with Eugénie, she would be obliged to put up at some other house—i. e., provided that Napoleon was bent upon stopping at the "What Cheer." The discordance which woman is apt to breed in the best-regulated households has been seriously considered by the sagacious proprietor, and hence the promulgation of an edict which passes and eclipses any Salic law in its fundamental severity. Bells are dispensed with by having every thing in the room that the necessities of man can be imagined to require. If one chooses to have the cholera, or trichina, or delirium tremens, the fault is his own—such eccentricities are not provided for.

And apropos of delirium tremens—there is no bar in the house, nor has there ever been one about any establishment with which the proprietor has ever been connected. I am not aware that he himself is a member of any teetotal society; but one thing is certain—if ever he desires a drink of that which inebriates he has to go away from his own hotel for it.

Another peculiarity is the Laundry Department. Most all hotels have laundries, which serve the purpose of ordinary washer-women—viz., washing off all the buttons, but never, by any chance, sewing them on again. In the What Cheer a great improvement has been inaugurated in this respect. Connected with the laundry is a mending department, and all clothes are carefully examined and repaired before being returned to the owner. Nay, more; if the honest miner has a hole about his knee-pans, caused by overmuch genuflection; if the chisel of the mechanic has slipped and taken a piece out from his waistcoat instead of the wood; if a pot of paint has been overturned upon his best trowsers—here is the friendly haven into which he can haul for repairs and cleansing. And again, that all who go out from the establishment may be presentable, there is a boot-blacking room, where every man may be his own boot-black if he do not choose to be his own Boswell. About fifty boxes of blacking, and as many brushes, with convenient stands, are ranged round the room for the edification of those who desire to shine in society.

Another peculiarity is the Museum—the most extensive, and, in most respects, the best museum in California. This was established in the summer of 1860. The apartment devoted to it is forty-five feet long by fourteen wide. It contains large cases of stuffed birds, preserved animals, pickled snakes, etc., affording an excellent idea of what the Pacific coast is capable of producing in that way. Moreover, there are specimens of most things from nearly all parts of the world. The toucan and the pelican rub bills with eagles, and woodpeckers, and crows, and birds of paradise, and guinea-hens; cormorants, bitterns, hawks, vultures, owls, magpies, albatrosses, bluejays, orioles, starlings, sparrows, turkey-buzzards, coots, snipes, plovers, petrels, pheasants, puffins: but space fails to enumerate all the birds that stretch out their necks from well simulated foliage. Then there are rats of all species; squirrels, weasels, gophers, hedgehogs, armadillos, wolves, and lame ducks. The collection of eggs comprises 1200 specimens, from the largest ostrich's to the smallest hummingbird's. There are Indian curiosities from the north of the continent and from the South Seas —spears, bows, arrows, fig-leaves, pipes, fishhooks, war-clubs, and red paint. The collection of old coins weds the past and the present; Roman coins jingling by the side of cowry shells, beads, and Indian wampum. Shells of ocean, and shells collected on the highest peaks of mountains, slumber side by side upon peaceful shelves. The cabinet of minerals includes the finest specimens from those great mines, at stories of whose wealth the Eastern eye glitters and the unaccustomed ear expands.

The Library, however, is the great feature—the unique one of the institution. Let me, however, retrograde a little, and tell how the Library came, and, to tell that, it is necessary to tell how the house grew. It was started by its present proprietor, R. B. Woodward, in 1852, as a boarding-house, with about seventy-five lodgers; of that seventy-five, as of the present five hundred, pay was always required in advance. In 1861 the boarding-house element was discontinued, and the restaurant feature introduced. The name, like the proprietor, came from Rhode Island. When Roger Williams landed on the shores of Little Rhody the Indians who met him upon the beach hailed with something which sounded like "What cheer?" and to this day the phrase is incorporated with the arms of the State. And the largest and most valuable block in Providence is known as the "What Cheer Buildings." In 1856 the "What Cheer" of San Francisco had become an institution, and a novel idea entered its proprietor's head. All hotels fed the body, but there were none which supplied pabulum for the mind. He determined to found a library. In furtherance of this object he came East, and consulted the Harper Brothers. As a natural result they encouraged him in the project, and the result was the purchase of fifteen hundred books. This was the nucleus of a library which now numbers between three thousand and four thousand volumes, selected with a view to suit the various tastes of travelers—all the books, be it remarked, being of "a good moral tendency." There are works on gardening, bee-raising, vine-growing, stock-raising, ranching, etc.; biographical and historical tomes; works of fiction, among which those of Dickens, Irving, Scott, Thackeray, Hawthorne, Cooper, Miss Bremer, and others of the same noble roll-call, are represented. Nor are the classics forgotten; but as few min-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ers read them in the original tongues only translations are given. In addition, the room is supplied with most of the current journals of the coast and many published abroad, the newspaper bill amounting yearly to about $1200 in gold. From early morning until shutting-off time comes at night this reading-room is filled with guests, and it is really interesting to see their absorption. The seats are ranged closely, side by side, and there sit the book-worm miners delving into these rich diggings, still and quiet as the regulations demand, bound up in a biography which fills them with emulation, or reading of adventures which recall their own wild experiences. Were it not for this escape-pipe for their spare time a bar-room would have to be introduced; and though there may be a question about which might be the best filled, there can be none as to which would contribute most to the best interests of society.

The hotel from the first has proven immensely profitable, yielding the proprietor between $30,000 and $40,000 in gold a year. From the income thus afforded he has built one of the finest places in the environs of San Francisco, connecting with it a gallery of art, consisting mainly of pictures imported from Rome at a cost of about $20,000. It has been his custom to transfer many of the pictures from his gallery to the walls of the hotel, that his guests might have an opportunity of seeing what wonders pencil, brush, and chisel can work. It may be worthy of mention that a bust of California, executed by Powers, for a long time graced the hotel library. I have been told that this work was originally executed at full length as a nude female figure; but Mr. Woodward, ever alive to the interests of morality, and opposed to the growing encroachments of a licentious age, caused it to be cut down at the waist to its present proportions. While in Rome Mr. Woodward engaged the services of Virgil Williams, an artist of rising reputation, to superintend purchases, and after returning to California employed him for nearly two years in the arrangement and adornment of his gallery. On determining to go again abroad this present year Mr. Woodward threw open his gallery and grounds to the public, pledging himself to spend two dollars in adding to the attractions of the place for every one received from admission fees for the next ten years. The receipts for a single month were $2000, which shows that art has attractions even in a new civilization. The grounds alone have cost over $100,000, their natural picturesqueness having been added to by the resources of the best landscape gardeners whose services could be secured. Hot-houses filled with fragrant exotics woo the visitor to their artificial atmospheres, while serpentine walks, artificial lakes, Turkish mosques, and zoological places and parks filled with camels, deer, monkeys, etc., beguile him into an insensibility to the flight of time.

A sad flight, by-the-way, to an appreciation of which I am just waking; though the reader perhaps has several times with a yawn consulted his watch. To a certain extent I have wandered away from the "What Cheer;" but the private grounds of the proprietor are in no small degree a part and parcel of it, since had it not been for the one it is not probable that the other would be. Mr. Woodward, with his family, is now in Paris; and it is not improbable that a "What Cheer" there will greet visitors to the Great Exposition. The inflexible rule of pay in advance being insisted on to the discomfiture of many who take no thought of a morrow. And here in New York, with the great influx of a rural population, there is need for such a house as the one whose salient features I have attempted to present—combining comfort and cheapness with respectability and first-class accommodations. And the idea of a library should be seized upon by all large hotels. At present it is a lamentable fact that there are few hotels which have even a decent reading-room.

DAVY CROCKETT'S ELECTIONEERING TOUR.

THERE was a time when there were few names more familiarly known to the people of this country than that of Davy Crockett. Many stories were told characteristic of his courage, his wit, his humor, his honesty, and his benevolence. I am about to relate one of somewhat different character, but not less honorable to him than any that have appeared.

While he was in Congress I had business which required me to spend several weeks in Washington City. Waiting upon one of the Departments, or rather one of the chief clerks, for my turn, I had much leisure upon my hands; for though my business might have been dispatched as well in two hours as in two months, yet I had to wait. I had made up my mind that I would not leave until my business was settled. My only regular employment was to go every day to the office to learn that it could not be attended to that day.

Crockett was then the lion of Washington. I was a great admirer of his character, and having several friends who were intimate with him, I found no difficulty in making his acquaintance. I was fascinated with him, and he seemed to take a fancy to me.

I was one day in the lobby of the House of Representatives, when a bill was taken up appropriating money for the benefit of the widow of a distinguished naval officer. Several beautiful speeches had been made in its support, rather, as I thought, because it afforded the speakers a fine opportunity for display than from the necessity of convincing any body; for it seemed to me that every body favored it. The Speaker was just about to put the question, when Crockett arose. Every body expected, of course, that he was going to make one of his characteristic speeches in support of the bill. He commenced:

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"MR. SPEAKER,—I have as much respect for the memory of the deceased, and as much sympathy for the sufferings of the living, if suffering there be, as any man in this House; but we must not permit our respect for the dead or our sympathy for a part of the living to lead us into an act of injustice to the balance of the living. I will not go into an argument to prove that Congress has no power to appropriate this money as an act of charity. Every Member upon this floor knows it. We have the right, as individuals, to give away as much of our own money as we please in charity; but as Members of Congress we have no right so to appropriate a dollar of the public money. Some eloquent appeals have been made to us upon the ground that it is a debt due the deceased. Mr. Speaker, the deceased lived long after the close of the war; he was in office to the day of his death; and I have never heard that the Government was in arrears to him. This Government can owe no debts but for services rendered, and at a stipulated price. If it is a debt, how much is it? Has it been audited, and the amount due ascertained? If it has, the Treasurer will pay it without legislation. If it is a debt, this is not the place to present it for payment, or to have its merits examined. If it is a debt, we owe more than we can ever hope to pay; for we owe the widow of every soldier who fought in the War of 1812 precisely the same amount. There is a woman in my neighborhood, the widow of as gallant a man as ever shouldered a musket. He fell in battle. She is as good in every respect as this lady, and is as poor. She is earning her daily bread by her daily labor; and if I were to introduce a bill to appropriate five or ten thousand dollars for her benefit I should be laughed at, and my bill would not get five votes in this House. There are thousands of widows in the country just such as the one I have spoken of, but we never hear of any of these large debts to them. Sir, this is no debt. The Government did not owe it to the deceased when he was alive; it could not contract it after he died. I do not wish to be rude, but I must be plain. Every man in this House knows it is not a debt. We can not, without the grossest corruption, appropriate this money as the payment of a debt. We have not the semblance of authority to appropriate it as a charity. Mr. Speaker, I have said we have the right to give as much money of our own as we please. I am the poorest man on this floor. I can not vote for this bill. But I will give one week's pay to the object; and if every Member of Congress will do the same it will amount to more than the bill asks."

He took his seat. Nobody replied. The bill was put upon its passage, and instead of passing unanimously, as was generally supposed, and as no doubt it would but for that speech, it received but few votes, and, of course, was lost.

Like many other young men, and old ones too for that matter, who had not thought upon the subject, I desired the passage of the bill, and felt outraged at its defeat. I determined that I would persuade my friend Crockett to move a reconsideration the next day.

Previous engagements preventing me from seeing Crockett that night, I went early to his room the next morning, and found him engaged in addressing and franking letters, a large pile of which lay upon his table.

I broke in upon him rather abruptly by asking him what devil had possessed him to make that speech and defeat that bill yesterday. Without turning his head, or looking up from his work, he replied: "You see that I am very busy now; take a seat and cool yourself. I will be through in a few minutes, and then I will tell you all about it."

He continued his employment for about ten minutes, and when he had finished it, turned to me and said: "Now, Sir, I will answer your question. But thereby hangs a tale, and one of considerable length, to which you will have to listen."

I listened, and this is the tale which I heard:

Several years ago I was one evening standing on the steps of the Capitol with some other members of Congress, when our attention was attracted by a great light over in Georgetown. It was evidently a large fire. We jumped into a hack and drove over as fast as we could. When we got there I went to work, and I never worked as hard in my life as I did there for several hours. But in spite of all that could be done many houses were burned and many families made houseless; and, besides, some of them had lost all but the clothes they had on. The weather was very cold, and when I saw so many women and children suffering I felt that something ought to be done for them; and every body else seemed to feel the same way.

The next morning a bill was introduced appropriating twenty thousand dollars for their relief. We put aside all other business and rushed it through as soon as it could be done. I said every body felt as I did. That was not quite so; for though they perhaps sympathized as deeply with the sufferers as I did, there were a few of the members who did not think we had the right to indulge our sympathy, or exercise our charity, at the expense of any body but ourselves. They opposed the bill, and, upon its passage, demanded the yeas and nays. There were not enough of them to sustain the call; but many of us wanted our names to appear in favor of what we considered a praiseworthy measure, and we voted with them to sustain it. So the yeas and nays were recorded, and my name appeared on the journals in favor of the bill.

The next summer, when it began to be time to think about the election, I concluded I would take a scout around among the boys of my district. I had no opposition there; but as the election was some time off I did not know what might turn up, and I thought it was best to let the boys know that I had not forgot them, and that going to Congress had not made me too proud to go to see them.

So I put a couple of shirts and a few twists of tobacco into my saddle-bags, and put out. I had been out about a week, and had found things going very smoothly, when, riding one day in a part of my district in which I was more of a stranger than any other, I saw a man in a field plowing, and coming toward the road. I gauged my gait so that we should meet as he came to the fence. As he came up I spoke to the man. He replied politely, but, as I thought, rather coldly, and was about turning his horse for another furrow, when I asked him if he could give me a chew of tobacco.

"Yes," said he; "such as we make and use in this part of the country; but it may not suit

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google your taste, as you are probably in the habit of using better."

With that he pulled out of his pocket part of a twist in its natural state, and handed me. I took a chew, and handed it back to him. He turned to his plow, and was about to start off. I said to him: "Don't be in such a hurry, my friend—I want to have a little talk with you, and get better acquainted." He replied: "I am very busy, and have but little time to talk; but if it does not take too long, I will listen to what you have to say."

I began: "Well, my friend, I am one of those unfortunate beings called candidates, and—"

"Yes, I know you; you are Colonel Crockett. I have seen you once before, and voted for you the last time you were elected. I suppose you are out electioneering now; but you had better not waste your time or mine. I shall not vote for you again."

This was a sockdologer. I had been making up my mind that he was one of those churlish fellows who care for nobody but themselves, and take bluntness for independence. I had seen enough of them to know there is a way to reach them, and was satisfied that if I could get him to talk to me I would soon have him straight. But this was entirely a different bundle of sticks. He knew me, had voted for me before, and did not intend to do it again. Something must be the matter. I could not imagine what it was. I had heard of no complaints against me, except that some of the dandies about the villages ridiculed some of the wild and foolish things that I too often say and do, and said that I was not enough of a gentleman to go to Congress. I begged him to tell me what was the matter.

"Well, Colonel, it is hardly worth while to waste time or words upon it. I do not see how it can be mended; but you gave a vote last winter which shows that either you have not capacity to understand the Constitution, or that you are wanting in the honesty and firmness to be governed by it. In either case you are not the man to represent me. But I beg your pardon for expressing it in that way. I did not intend to avail myself of the privilege of the constituent to speak plainly to a candidate for the purpose of insulting or wounding you. I intend by it only to say that your understanding of the Constitution is very different from mine; and I will say to you what, but for my rudeness, I should not have said, that I believe you to be honest."

"Thank you for that; but you find fault with only one vote. You know the story of Henry Clay, the old huntsman, and the rifle:—you wouldn't break your gun for one snap?"

"No, nor for a dozen. As the story goes, that tack served Mr. Clay's purpose admirably, though it really had nothing to do with the case. I would not break the gun, nor would I discard an honest representative for a mistake in judgment, as to a mere matter of policy; but an understanding of the Constitution different from mine I can not overlook, because the Constitution, to be worth any thing, must be held sacred, and rigidly observed in all its provisions. The man who wields power and misinterprets it is the more dangerous the more honest he is!"

"I admit the truth of all you say; but there must be some mistake about it, for I do not remember that I gave any vote last winter upon any constitutional question."

"No, Colonel, there's no mistake. Though I live here in the backwoods, and seldom go from home, I take the papers from Washington, and read very carefully all the proceedings of Congress. My papers say that last winter you voted for a bill to appropriate twenty thousand dollars to some sufferers by a fire in Georgetown. Is that true?"

"Certainly it is, and I thought that was the last vote for which any body in the world would have found fault with."

"Well, Colonel, where do you find in the Constitution any authority to give away the public money in charity?"

Here was another sockdologer; for when I began to think about it, I could not remember a thing in the Constitution that authorized it. I found I must take another tack, so I said:

"Well, my friend, I may as well own up. You have got me there. But certainly nobody will complain that a great and rich country like ours should give the insignificant sum of twenty thousand dollars to relieve its suffering women and children; particularly with a full and overflowing treasury; and, I am sure, if you had been there you would have done just as I did."

"It is not the amount, Colonel, that I complain of; it is the principle. In the first place, the Government ought to have in the treasury no more than enough for its legitimate purposes. But that has nothing to do with the question. The power of collecting and disbursing money at pleasure is the most dangerous power that can be intrusted to man, particularly under our system of collecting revenue by a tariff, which reaches every man in the country, no matter how poor he may be—and the poorer he is the more he pays in proportion to his means. What is worse, it presses upon him without his knowing where the weight comes; for there is not a man in the United States who can ever guess how much he pays to the Government. So you see that while you are contributing to relieve one you are drawing it from thousands who are even worse off than he. If you had the right to give any thing, the amount was simply a matter of discretion with you, and you had as much right to give twenty millions as twenty thousand. If you have the right to give to one you have the right to give to all; and as the Constitution neither defines charity nor stipulates the amount, you are at liberty to give to any and every thing which you may believe, or profess to believe, is a charity, and to any amount you may think proper. You will very easily per-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ceive what a wide door this would open for fraud and corruption and favoritism, on the one hand, and for robbing the people on the other. No, Colonel, Congress has no right to give charity. Individual members may give as much of their own money as they please, but they have no right to touch a dollar of the public money for that purpose. If twice as many houses had been burned in this county as in Georgetown, neither you nor any other member of Congress would have thought of appropriating a dollar for our relief. There are about two hundred and forty members of Congress; if they had shown their sympathy for the sufferers by contributing each one week's pay, it would have made over thirteen thousand dollars. There are plenty of wealthy men in and around Washington who could have given twenty or a hundred thousand dollars without depriving themselves of even a luxury of life. The Congressmen chose to keep their own money—which, if reports be true, some of them spend not very creditably—and the people about Washington, no doubt, applauded you for relieving them from the necessity of giving by giving what was not yours to give. The people have delegated to Congress, by the Constitution, the power to do certain things. To do these it is authorized to collect and pay moneys, and for nothing else. Every thing beyond this is usurpation and a violation of the Constitution."

I have given you, continued Crockett, an imperfect account of what he said. Long before he was through I was convinced that I had done wrong. He wound up by saying:

"So you see, Colonel, you have violated the Constitution in what I consider a vital point. It is a precedent fraught with danger to the country; for when Congress once begins to stretch its power beyond the limits of the Constitution there is no limit to it, and no security for the people. I have no doubt you acted honestly; but that does not make it any better, except so far as you are personally concerned; and you see that I can not vote for you."

I tell you I felt streaked. I saw if I should have opposition and this man should go to talking he would set others to talking, and in that district I was a gone fawn-skin. I could not answer him, and the fact is, I was so fully convinced that he was right I did not want to. But I must satisfy him, and I said to him:

"Well, my friend, you hit the nail upon the head when you said I had not sense enough to understand the Constitution. I intended to be guided by it, and thought I had studied it fully. I have heard many fine speeches in Congress about the powers of Congress; but what you have said here at your plow has got more hard sound sense in it than all the fine speeches I ever heard. If I had ever taken the view of it that you have, I would have put my head into the fire before I would have given that vote; and if you will forgive me and vote for me again, if I ever vote for another unconstitutional law I wish I may be shot."

He laughingly replied: "Yes, Colonel, you have sworn to that once before, but I will trust you again upon one condition. You say you are convinced that your vote was wrong. Your acknowledgment of it will do more good than beating you for it. If, as you go round the district, you will tell the people about this vote and that you are satisfied it was wrong, I will not only vote for you, but will do what I can to keep down opposition, and perhaps I may exert some little influence in that way."

"If I don't," said I, "I wish I may be shot; and to convince you that I am in earnest in what I say, I will come back this way in a week or ten days; and if you will get up a gathering of the people I will make a speech to them. Get up a barbecue, and I will pay for it."

"No, Colonel, we are not a rich people in this section; but we have plenty of provisions to contribute for a barbecue, and some to spare for those who have none. The push of the crops will be over in a few days, and we can then afford a day for a barbecue. This is Thursday; I will see to getting it up on Saturday week. Come to my house on Friday and we will go together, and I promise you a very respectable crowd to see and hear you."

"Well, I will be here. But one thing more before I say good-by. I must know your name."

"My name is Bunce."

"Not Horatio Bunce?"

"Yes."

"Well, Mr. Bunce, I never saw you before, though you say you have seen me; but I know you very well. I am glad that I have met you, and very proud that I may hope to have you for my friend. You must let me shake your hand before I go."

We shook hands and parted.

It was one of the luckiest hits of my life that I met him. He mingled but little with the public, but was widely known for his remarkable intelligence and incorruptible integrity, and for a heart brimful and running over with kindness and benevolence, which showed themselves not only in words but in acts. He was the oracle of the whole country around him, and his fame had extended far beyond the circle of his immediate acquaintance. Though I had never met him before I had heard much of him, and but for this meeting it is very likely I should have had opposition and been beaten. One thing is very certain, no man could now stand up in that district under such a vote.

At the appointed time I was at his house, having told over our conversation to every crowd I had met and to every man I staid all night with, and I found that it gave the people an interest and a confidence in me stronger than I had ever seen manifested before.

Though I was considerably fatigued when I reached his house, and under ordinary circumstances should have gone early to bed, I kept him up until midnight, talking about the principles and affairs of government, and got more real

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google true knowledge of them than I had got all my life before.

It is not exactly pertinent to my story, but I must tell you more about him. When I saw him with his family around him, I was not surprised that he loved to stay at home. I have never in any other family seen a manifestation of so much confidence, familiarity, and freedom of manner of children toward their parents, mingled with such unbounded love and respect.

He was not at the house when I arrived; but his wife received and welcomed me with all the ease and cordiality of an old friend. She told me that her husband was engaged in some outdoor business, but would be in shortly. She is a woman of fine person; her face is not what the world would at first sight esteem beautiful. In a state of rest there was too much strength and character in it for that; but when she engaged in conversation, and especially when she smiled, it softened into an expression of mingled kindness, goodness, and strength that was beautiful beyond any thing I have ever seen.

Pretty soon her husband came in, and she left us and went about her household affairs. Toward night the children—he had seven of them—began to drop in; some from work, some from school, and the little ones from play. They were all introduced to me, and met me with the same ease and grace that marked the manner of their mother. Supper came on, and then was exhibited the loveliness of the family circle in all its glow. The father turned the conversation to the matters in which the children had been interested during the day, and all, from the oldest to the youngest, took part in it. They spoke to their parents with as much familiarity and confidence as if they had been friends of their own age; yet every word and every look manifested as much respect as the humblest courtier could manifest for a king; ay, more, for it was all sincere and strengthened by love. Verily it was the Happy Family.

I have told you that Mr. Bunce converted me politically. He came nearer converting me religiously than I had ever been before. When supper was over one of the children brought him a Bible and hymn-book. He turned to me and said:

"Colonel, I have for many years been in the habit of family worship night and morning. I adopt this time for it that all may be present. If I postpone it some of us get engaged in one thing and some in another, and the little ones drop off to sleep, so that it is often difficult to get all together."

He then opened the Bible and read the Twenty-third Psalm, commencing, "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want." It is a beautiful composition, and his manner of reading it gave it new beauties. We then sung a hymn, and we all knelt down. He commenced his prayer —"Our Father who art in heaven." No one who has not heard him pronounce those words can conceive how they thrilled through me, for I do not believe they were ever pronounced by human lips as by his. I had heard them a thousand times from the lips of preachers of every grade and denomination, and by all sorts of professing Christians, until they had become words of course with me; but his enunciation of them gave them an import and a power of which I had never conceived. There was a grandeur of reverence, a depth of humility, a fullness of confidence, and an overflowing of love which told that his spirit was communing face to face with its God. An overwhelming feeling of awe came over me, for I felt that I was in the visible presence of Jehovah. The whole prayer was grand—grand in its simplicity, in the purity of the spirit it breathed, in its faith, its trust, and its love. I have told you he came nearer converting me religiously than I had ever been before. He did not make a very good Christian of me, as you know; but he has wrought upon my mind a conviction of the truth of Christianity, and upon my feelings a reverence for its purifying and elevating power such as I had never felt before.

I have known and seen much of him since, for I respect—no, that is not the word—I reverence and love him more than any living man, and I go to see him two or three times every year; and I tell you, Sir, if every one who professes to be a Christian lived and acted and enjoyed it as he does, the religion of Christ would take the world by storm.

But to return to my story. The next morning we went to the barbecue, and to my surprise found about a thousand men there. I met a good many whom I had known before, and they and my friend introduced me around until I had got pretty well acquainted, at least they all knew me.

In due time notice was given that I would speak to them. They gathered up around a stand that had been erected. I opened my speech by saying:

"Fellow-citizens! I present myself before you to-day feeling like a new man; my eyes have lately been opened to truths which ignorance or prejudice, or both, had heretofore hidden from my view. I feel that I can to-day offer you the ability to render you more valuable service than I have ever been able to render before. I am here to-day more for the purpose of acknowledging my error than to seek your votes. That I should make this acknowledgment is due to myself as well as to you. Whether you will vote for me is a matter for your consideration only."

I went on then to tell them about the fire, and my vote for the appropriation, as I have told it to you; and then told them why I was satisfied it was wrong. I closed by saying:

"And now, fellow-citizens, it remains only for me to tell you that the most of the speech you have listened to with so much attention and so much interest was simply a repetition of the arguments by which your neighbor, Mr. Bunce,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google convinced me of my error. It is the best speech I ever made in my life; but he is entitled to the credit of it. And now I hope he is satisfied with his convert, and that he will get up here and tell you so."

He came upon the stand, and said:

"Fellow-citizens!—it affords me great pleasure to comply with the request of Colonel Crockett. I have always considered him a thoroughly honest man, and I am satisfied that he will faithfully perform all that he has promised you to-day." He went down, and there went up from that crowd such a shout for Davy Crockett as his name never called forth before.

I am not much given to tears; but I was taken with a choking then, and felt some big drops rolling down my cheeks. And I tell you now that the remembrance of those few words spoken by such a man, and the honest, hearty shout they produced, is worth more to me than all the other honors I have received, and all the reputation I have ever made, or ever shall make, as a member of Congress.

Now, Sir, concluded Crockett, you know why I made that speech yesterday. I have had several thousand copies of it printed, and was directing them to my constituents when you came in.

There is one thing now to which I will call your attention. You remember that I proposed to give a week's pay. There are in that House many very wealthy men—men who think nothing of spending a week's pay, or a dozen of them, for a dinner or a wine party, when they have something to accomplish by it. Some of these same men made beautiful speeches upon the great debt of gratitude which the country owed the deceased—a debt which could not be paid by money, and the insignificance and worthlessness of money, particularly so insignificant a sum as ten thousand dollars, when weighed against the honor of the nation. Yet not one of them responded to my proposition. Money with them is nothing but trash, when it is to come out of the people; but it is the one great thing for which most of them are striving, and many of them sacrifice honor, integrity, and justice to obtain it.

The hour for the meeting of the House had by this time arrived. We walked up to the Capitol together, but I said not a word to him about moving a reconsideration. I would as soon have asked a sincere Christian to abjure his religion.

I had listened to his story with an interest which was greatly increased by his manner of telling it; for no matter what we may say of the merits of a story, a speech, or a sermon, it is a very rare production which does not derive its interest more from the manner than the matter, as some of my readers have doubtless, like the writer, proved to their cost.

By Crockett's aid I succeeded in having my business settled in three or four days afterward and left Washington. I never saw him again.

CHAUCER'S GRISILDIS.

IN the gallery of English poesy stands many a fair and noble statue, fashioned with that extremest care men use when they would speak their gentlest thought of womanhood. Crowned with the highest grace of all, touching the heart to tears forever, behold Grisildis, wrought in most reverent mood by England's father-poet—Geoffrey Chaucer.

There is a cant of conventionalism that decries the present and sickens the soul with a vague and childish clamor for the return of mediæval art and feeling. Now the mind that thinks and the heart that acts upon the thought will declare always the present to be the grandest time of any. It holds ourselves, our destiny, and itself contains the pith and marrow of the past.

Believing this—and it is the creed of the best schools every where—the literature that holds us fast to-day must be the reflex of the lives we are all living, must dissect the questions that beset us, must strive with those problems which clamor for solution—mighty angels all, with which the Jacobs among us contend, and verily will not let them go without the blessing!

It were well enough—since that was the best they either knew—for Greece and Rome to find physical perfection, and rest content; but the To-day—eager, inquisitive, penetrating, demanding the pith of the emotion, the core of the idea—laughs to scorn such puny complacency.

It is not, I suppose, that the mystery of living has become more intricate with the centuries, but it is ourselves that, by the grace of God, have won the advance in comprehending it; the voices are not more manifold than in the ages past, but it is we who listen more thoughtfully; the ear has grown finer to catch the rhythm, the heart more eager to demand the explanation.

It is therefore that we scan with keenest scrutiny the picture, the statue, the book, the poem that comes before us and asks for our decision. If the intention is true—if there is a soul calling out to us, deep unto deep, beneath all phases of expression, the picture, the statue, the book, the poem—the whatever in Art it may be—is for us; but if, on the contrary, it bears the stamp, cold and external, of the dead antique, we reject it with disdain, or offer it at best the chilly commendation—for like begets like—of "classical correctness."

Those who are wise in their professions—writers, artists, men of science—all feel that their work must be impregnated with this sympathy, profound and heart-reaching, every where touching and corresponding to the incessant demands of the To-day for soul and earnestness above aught else; but the poet comprehends the need the best of any, for to him belongs the extreme expression of emotion and of passion.

Tennyson writes the "Princess"—with its half-jest on the surface, its deep meaning un-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google derneath—and the whole is a response to the modern upheaving of the womanly nature demanding its ultimatum. Its preludes, its tender songs, its delicate and shell-like involutions of descriptive verse, all melt at last into the millennial sweetness wherein the woman

"—sets herself to man,
Like perfect music unto noble words.....
Then comes the stateller Eden back to men:
Then reign the world's great bridals, chaste and calm:
Then springs the crowning race of humankind.
May these things be!"

If there is a cheat any where, if the conclusion begs the question, we are more than ready to forgive—more than willing to acknowledge the great heart-yearning to soothe the wrong it may not at all redress.

This struggle with modern giants—more potent, more invincible than ever found in fairy figment—is yet more vehement in the intricate poems of the Brownings. Those who raised any cry of "obscure" here misunderstood the difficulty. The mystery and the doubt lay hidden in the awful truths these poet-souls agonized to utter. Is it easy to make plain those subtle undercurrents that underlie our outside social fictions, and that thrill in every fibre with the fiery ichor that is our real life? Those were souls fearfully in earnest that found grace to declare beneath the glitter of externals the ghastly substrata of being which, with miserable dilettanteism, we are all glad enough to ignore, save when the volcanic eruption threatens our hearth-stones with the seething tide of destructive lava.

In American poetry we have had less of this feeling. The hour has not yet come, or perchance the need has been less pressing. Besides, this is the New World to us still. The landscape is so large, the sky so blue and clear, the air so inspiring, that we can only wonder and enjoy like children.

It is therefore that Bryant and Longfellow and the rest of the goodly company find such a charm in landscape painting that the human element recedes from view, overlaid by the consummate perfection of that which the noblest art must yet proclaim an accessory. This, however, is a fair beginning. Childhood is as absolute a need in poetry as it is in the stages of our mortal progress. First the tender grace, the guileless simplicity, the attentiveness to the world external, that is the heritage of children; thereafter the strength and power and incisive comprehension that belongs to perfected manhood.

By-and-by, when we have become accustomed to this world of wonders, we shall have unity—single figures, such as Dante's Beatrice, Petrarch's Laura, where the treasures of all time were heaped at the feet of one. We, too, shall show a wondrous vista of men and women struck into being by the divine spark kindled in these mortal souls from on high, and thus match the glory of that wondrous Art shining across the sea, at which we all have lighted our torches. So far we have "Evangeline;" and some remember Judd's "Margaret;"* but the single figures are few. Condensation is the work of centuries. The master-genius that fuses into one burning gem the long experience of many souls belongs not to the blooming of the early year. When many days of vernal showers and penetrating sunlight have tempered the earth and wrought all influences into harmony the rose unfurls her manifold corolla. With patience we possess our souls until then. Sure are we that there will be no halting in our national literature any more than in our national destiny. Already, gazing with intent faith toward the horizon, one beholds the dim, sweet outlines of that beautiful procession which shall be the heritage of our children.

You will understand, then, that it is not because our faith in the Future is small, or our perception of the Present feeble, that we would crave your company in a pilgrimage to those simple woodlands swayed by Geoffrey Chaucer. It is thence our modern poets fetch their daisies; it is there, beside the "well of English undefiled," that the delicatest mosses hold a heyday of perpetual greenness.

Hush! it is early spring-time in these woodlands. Listen! overhead the lark is singing from out the dappled clouds of early morning. You will not refuse this violet overbrimming with the first dew of dawn? This, then, is

THE STORY OF GRISILDIS.

A certain lord of Italy, Walter by name, a "Markis" by degree, rules his people to their liking save in respect of too great a fondness for the chase—

"And eke he wo'ld (and that was worst of all) Wedden no wif for ought that might befall."

His people, laying this last infirmity seriously to heart, at length wait upon him and entreat him to marry, advancing all those moving arguments in favor of wedlock which present themselves in invincible array upon these occasions. With that officious assurance which asserts itself at such crises the people even offer to choose a wife for the Marquis, that there may be no plea of escape for him. Lord Walter gives favorable audience to the marriage proposition, but dissents from the excess of zeal that would deny him the privilege of selecting a wife for himself. He will marry, with the proviso that in no case his people are to reject the lady of his choice.

The Prologue, which contains the business portion of the poem, being disposed of, we arrive at "Pars Secunda." And now pictures, framed at random, it would seem, from their artless sweetness, begin to illuminate the onward progress of the ballad. Yet, as you read you feel that here there are no strokes at random. The mood of the poet is too thoughtful,

* With the exception of these I can not recall any other single figures that are stamped upon our literature. Can the reader?

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google too religious for careless superfluity. So you look closer, and find that every picture frames a thought, as in mediæval art the most simple etching, if regarded attentively, displays some saint or angel or apostle enshrining the heart of the painting that grows and grows upon you until the quivering lip confesses the sacred meaning of the perfect whole.

In phrases strung as simply as daisies "Pars Secunda" tells us how, not far from the "palais honourable" of my Lord Marquis, stands a "thorpe of sighte delitable," inhabited by the "poure folk of that village." Among them, pourest of all, dwelt Janicola, his only riches a daughter hight Grisildis, "yong" and "faire ynough to sight."

"But though this mayden tendre were of age,
Yet in the brest of hire virginitee
Ther was enclosed sad and ripe corage:
And in gret reverence and charitee
Hire old poure fader fostred she:
A few sheep spinning on the feld she kept;
She wolde not ben idel til she slept."

Here slides in a gentle picture of Grisildis coming home from her sheep-tending. Even as she walked she idled not: in the tender twilight she comes gathering herbs with which to strew her bed. And yet above this daily round of duties she prizes best that of keeping her father's "lif on loft."

It was upon this "poure creature," Grisildis, that the Marquis, "as he on hunting rode," had "sette his eye;" for it would seem that, notwithstanding his high lineage, my lord was a sincere republican, since he declares that

"Bountee cometh al of God, not of the stren."*

So he chooses Grisildis for her womanhood; and feeling sure of her assent—as it was proper a Marquis should—prepares array of "gemmes sette in gold and in asure," "brooches and rings for Grisildis's sake," with all other "ornamentes" which to such a wedding "shulde fall."

And so the wedding-day arrives—the bride unknown; and Grisildis, coming home from the well, sets down her "water pot anon"

"Beside the threshold in an oxes stall," finds herself called by the Marquis, and falling on her knees, is asked the question that, in those days, preceded the more important one,

"Wher is your fader, Grisildis?"

With that native courtesy no confusion could put to flight she expresses her father's readiness to come by saying, "Lord, he is al redy here," and straightway fetches him. My Lord then makes known his purpose of becoming "son in lawe" to the herdsman.

It would seem that a collation then, as now, assisted the ratification of a treaty, and retiring within, Grisildis listening with "ful pale face," receives the marriage offer, closing thus:

"And eke whan I say ya, ye say not nay,
Neither by word, ne frouning countenance?
Swere this, and here I swere our alliance."

"Quaking for drede," she swears.

The master then slides in another picture, in apposition to that of Grisildis coming home through the twilight from her sheep-tending. It is that of Grisildis being attired by the court-ladies. Full dainty are they of touching her rude peasant-clothes. Having replaced these with the rich garments of her bridal array, with their "fingres smal," they comb her hair, "that lay untressed ful rudely," put on her crown, and bring her forth to the people. Chaucer—manlike, glad to be rid of toilet-details—disposes of them all by saying,

"Of hire array what shuld I make a tale?"

And proceeds with his elimination of character. True poet, he strikes for the gold of art at all hazards; he spends none of his precious moments in tampering with dross, allured with that perishable glitter that lasts a day. Why should he, when the centuries were to frame his handiwork?

Chaucer, with a quiet scorn of that judgment whose base is externals, represents the populace—now that the jewel is fitly set—as inclined to doubt the identity of Janicola's daughter, and imagine her to be "another creature." Somewhat as our modern dilettanteism, having no faith in natural endowments and God-given prescience, would discard Shakspeare and adopt a changeling. Grisildis, however, whether herself or "another creature," commends herself to her husband's people in such wise,

"That eche hire loveth that loketh on hire face."

Not only does she excel in all feats of "wifly homlinesse," but

"So wise and ripe wordes hadde she,
And jugement of so gret equitee,
That she from Heven sent was, as men wend
Peple to save, and every wrong to amend."

Grisildis still further commends herself by bearing a daughter to the "Markis," and we arrive at "Pars Tertia."

Lord Walter, at this point, seems to chafe beneath his republican theory, and determines to put it to the test. He tempts his wife, one imagines, to determine whether it be really true that the lowly-born may yet hold in fee as noble graces as any. Though some men might praise this assay of character for a "subtil wit," Chaucer, not to be misunderstood, shakes his head over it for a moment, in token of disapprobation, and then proceeds with the temptation:

The "Markis," reminding his wife of her origin, and what he has done for her—(one wonders, in passing, if the husbands of our modern Grisildis twit them also with trousseaus bestowed in the ecstasy of courtship)—then tells her that, to quiet his people, she must yield her little daughter. The woman's reply is—implicit obedience. The man who is to deprive her of her child comes to perform her husband's behest. This is the mother's farewell; it proves that tears belong to superficial emotion:

* Strain.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Farewel, my child, I shal thee never see,
But sin I have thee marked with the crois,
Of thilke fader yblessed mote thou be,
That for us died upon a crois of tree:
Thy soule, litle child, I him betake,
For this night shal thou dien for my sake."

Do you not see? The mother-heart would break beneath the heaviness of such a parting, so she slips the weight upon His shoulder who bears the burdens of the universe—smiling the Christ-smile above it all!

She begs then of the sergeant, knowing the little child's soul to be safe, that the "litle body" be buried in "som place" where the beasts may not disturb it. But making no promise to this effect, the minion of the "Markis" goes on his way.

With jealous eye the husband watches for some change in Grisildis's mien toward him; but her constant mood remains; obedience and servitude are both the same. Nor does she ever speak her daughter's name "for ernest ne for game."

"Pars Quarta" opens with the birth of a "knave child," "ful gracious and fair for to behold." The "Markis" waits two years—(is it that the trial may be sterner?)—and then applies his second test, upon which the poet asserts:

"O! nedeless was she tempted in assay,
But wedded men ne connen ne measure
Whan that they finde a patient creature."

At the end of the two years he comes to his wife with the old story of disaffection, the renewed demand for the sacrifice of the second child, that none of the blood of Janicola, the herdsman, may succeed him. The mother yields as before;

"For wist I that my deth might do you ese, Right gladly wold I dien you to plese."

Then comes the "ugly sergeant." Again the pathos, deeper than tears, of the mother's kiss and blessing and parting prayer:

"If that he might,
Hire litle sonne he wolde in erthe grave."

The "Markis" wonders at this patience, and had he not known the love of his wife for her children, would have committed that vile crime the world commits every day, and have mistaken patience—the noblest flower of the soul!—for that weed, accursed of men and angels, called indifference.

The "Markis," in his cruel test of character, loses the regard of his people, who believe him to be the murderer of both his children. At length he sends for these last to the Erl of Pavia, to whose guardianship they had been intrusted, with word to send them home, and we come to "Pars Quinta." The husband now demands the utterest proof of all. To quiet the people his wife must leave him:

"In honorable estat al openely:"

"My new wif is coming by the way,"

says Lord Walter.

She makes her answer a little longer than heretofore; he is taking the last from her now, the extremest last, and hearts that have suffered know—hush! it is God only who knows!—what this may be. The soul finds itself searched through and through by an awful wind, so keen, so biting, that it sends up the appalling cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" before it is given grace to respond, in utter submission, "It is finished."

"Naked out of my fadre's hous (quod she)
I came, and naked I mote turne again."

But he "could not do so dishonest a thing," she says, as to leave her altogether bare, so she craves the defense of a smock. That granted, there follows a most piteous picture of Grisildis, clothed on with the sanctity of perfected womanhood, wending her way through the folk weeping, she with "eyen dry," back to her poor old father, and he too "sorwefully weeping," with the "olde cote" of the peasant-girl, seeming ruder than ever now with age, "covereth hire."

So this "flour of wifly patience" abides with her father, and "Pars Quinta" closes with the confession,

"There can no man in humblesse him acquitt
As women can, ne can be half so trewe."

"Pars Sexta" finds the "Markis" summoning the discarded wife to prepare the palace for the coming bride who is to take her place. In her peasant clothing she obeys. The "Erl" arrives with the noble children, and the people, beholding their rich array and the tender beauty of the girl, declare "That Walter was no fool though that him lest

To change his wif, for it was for the best."

And Chaucer, with the same poetic wrath at this puerile judgment that forever bases itself on externals that moved him before, denounces,

"O! stormy peple, unsad and ever untrewe!"

Grisildis makes all ready, and receives the guests with such discreetness that they wonder at the lofty courtesy which denies the lowly peasant garb.

Last of all, that the most piercing pang may not be wanting, the "Markis" calls the discarded Grisildis to inquire

"How liketh thou my wif, and her beautee?"

She answers him with praises, and ends with an admonition that reaches back touching all aspects of her own pitiful experience. It is that he is to leave his tests alone for the new wife, since

"She might not adversitee endure,
As coulde a poure festred creature."

The "Markis" declares this is "ynough," reinstates Grisildis, restores to her her children, and crowns anew the brow already graced with the most beautiful crown of any.

It is not until this ballad-poem is finished almost to the latest page that the meaning reveals itself; scarcely then does the full force of the motive and conception become our own.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The figure of Grisildis stands too deeply embayed in shadow; the cross-lights are cruel, and awaken the resentment.

Wait and watch a moment, as if you prayed. Away with veils and screens, and let in the perfect day of the Beyond. Lo! it is the image of "clear-eyed Faith" that stands before us, the face uplifted, the lips forever smiling. Grisildis submits utterly because she trusts implicitly, and by "submission wins at last."

The same deep-hearted devoutness which is the tone of Dante's poem pervades the later one of Chaucer. The fire and majesty of the Florentine are greater, but the feeling is the same.

The English poet ushered in the dawn of a larger era, but he failed not to retain that impassioned fervor which, consecrating its highest to God, was the touchstone of mediæval Art, transmuting it—whatever its fault besides—into works forever precious to the sons of men.

So the great child-heart of Dan Chaucer, wisely-simple, reaching one hand back into the past for what was noblest therein, stretches the other down to us moderns, holding aloft this fairest star of womanhood, Grisildis, to shine along the years to his Master's glory.

A MONEY ARTICLE.

NOT BY A BROKER.

WHO write the Money Articles in our newspapers the readers are not told, but the general understanding is that they do not come from the principal editor or editors, but from some financial expert whose life is very much in the market-place, and whose interest in the subject partakes as much of the speculation which is practical as that which is intellectual—sometimes, indeed, combining both kinds of fancies in one, and lifting solid dollars up into the dream-land of ideas. These articles are pretty widely read, and, at times, by perhaps most men with intense anxiety—for the facts, at least, which are supposed to be reliable, if not for the predictions and reasonings, which may be regarded as doubtful. I am told that they are seldom dictated by a purely scientific and impartial purpose, but are in the interest of certain parties in the stock-market, and often are made to tell upon some capital point in the tactics or strategy of the trade, and are very apt to represent some leading operator's policy.

Even if they were perfectly fair in their statements and views, so far as our city business affairs are concerned, they would not meet the wants of the people at large; for the people do not depend wholly upon the exclusive interests of our mercantile class, and need financial advisers who can take the whole nation into their glance, and look as carefully to the welfare of the great middling-class of men and women, who are not in the high places of trade, as to the aggrandizement of our few thousands of merchants and capitalists.

I wish these gentlemen well, and know very well that the interests of the mass is closely connected with their prosperity, yet it is not always nor wholly identical; and great wrong has been done of late years to the people at large by enlisting our press and our Legislatures too much on the side of the few monopolists. This Magazine is always fond of presenting the cause of the million, who are its readers, and will not refuse space for a little plain talk on money matters as they have been going on now for some six years, and are likely to go on for some time to come. I am no expert in finance, and bring only common-sense and observation, with the first principles of political economy, to the subject, and claim attention more from the point of view from which this paper is written than from any boasted depth or originality of thought.

Certain it is that there has been a vast amount of suffering among our people during the whole term of our financial expansion; and it still exists, and in some quarters increases. They that suffered first and most were not loud to complain, and they that now suffer most do not lift up their voices in the streets or the newspapers. Persons of small and fixed incomes, from funds invested or from salaries from such occupations as can not command the market by the great demand and small supply, these are the classes that have suffered most sadly. Here, for example, is a widow with two or three children with a thousand or fifteen hundred dollars' income, living in a small tenement in a decent quarter of the city. Suppose no harm to befall the principal or the income, disaster enough comes without that harm. The thousand dollars come as usual, in name, but how changed in value and use! The rent, that was perhaps three hundred dollars, becomes four, five, and at last six or seven hundred, and food and clothing rise in about the same proportion. The family are virtually wrecked, and practically they have lost half or more of their little property. Hundreds and thousands of such cases have happened, and are happening all around us. In some instances, and not a few, those reputed wealthy have become suddenly embarrassed without any apparent misfortune; and every family in our cities that six years ago had means of living handsomely from a fixed income, has found itself greatly reduced by the inflation of prices that has brought down their before generous maintenance to a pinching limitation. Here, in New York, four or five thousand dollars was a sufficient income for a family of refinement and of modest gentility, and would pay rent and the demands of comfortable housekeeping. Now the same things cost twice the money or more. The rent has risen from one thousand to two or three thousand dollars; food and clothing have become almost as dear; and fuel, until the winter just past, has been doubled or tripled in price.

The working-classes who are in the lines of business where the demand is great and the supply is limited have not suffered much, for

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

their wages have been doubled, and in some cases tripled. Carpenters, that could be had for a dollar and seventy-five cents a day, now command from three to four dollars; and masons, who had two dollars a day, have been the last season complaining of their four dollars and a half, and asking, some times not in vain, for five dollars. Yet it must be remembered that even these favored trades suffer at certain seasons from the slackness of work and the inflation of prices; and this winter has brought great distress upon our working-people. Our ship-carpenters have been terribly stricken, and it has been stated that as many as fifteen thousand mechanics have been out of employment. How must it be with the large class of people whose calling is not in great demand, and whose work can be for a time dispensed with, because appealing to no positive necessity or equally positive vanity or passion?

It would be a curious and instructive treatise on human nature, as well as political economy, that might be written from a careful observation and report of the prices of labor and products of various kinds during the last six years, and of the causes which led to the depression or rise. It would clearly be seen that not the best service, nor that most truly needed, but that most wished-for and most difficult to obtain, has had command of the purse-strings. People must have food and clothing, and will pay for them, but they do not feel the same need of books and instruction; and the persons who minister to the less imperative demands of society—such as teachers, authors, college professors, clergymen, and others—have been great sufferers by the times. They that live upon the vanities of society have not been permitted to starve, for the vanities are always hungry and athirst, and the class that have made money largely in the war have been quick to spend it, often in the vainest prodigality; so that we never saw half the prodigality in this country that was shown by the new lords and ladies of the shoddy order of nobility. But this is the exception, and not the rule. Most people have been a good deal pinched in some way, and the speculative kinds of business are not the sphere of the many. Bitter poverty has shown itself under the eaves of new affluence, and great numbers of families have been driven from our great cities into obscure villages to hide their mortification from the great world.

The farming classes have commanded high prices, and have had little direct taxation; but their gains have greatly melted away under the enormous cost of all goods not of their own producing, and of the wages of labor, which in the harvesting season have risen to fabulous figures. Not a little hay and grain has been spoiled because there were no hands ready for the harvest, and sometimes the delay that has not been the loss has been the damage of the abundant crop. Among some small farmers there has been, within my knowledge, a degree of deprivation that most persons would call poverty, and families who own their house and land have gone through the winter without butter and meat, trusting mainly to the pork barrel to give to their bread the suspicion of butter and the presentment of meat.

Some of my friends tell stories of their observation that it may be wholesome for some of our pampered city readers to know of. A conspicuous clergyman in a suburban town declared that the health of many people, especially of women, was suffering from want of meat, and that rather than give two or three prices for it they would live on very poor fare, and make up for solid nutriment by some kind of slops that give warmth, when there are scruples as to resorting to more stimulating substitutes. I am assured that in a prominent university town, even in Massachusetts, families of refinement are to be found in what society calls penury, and delicate ladies do the coarse work of the kitchen and laundry, on account of the cost and the scarcity of servants. It is not so easy to believe the statement made to me, that people of dainty antecedents have been obliged to give up the daily use of flour, and to live mainly upon Indian meal, such as our Irish servants refuse to touch. Good cooking may do wonders with corn-bread, when milk and eggs abound, but where the meal and water are the principal ingredients the compound is not an Apician dainty. Undoubtedly such instances of hardship are to be found, and there is a vast amount of suffering, even in the loyal States, in consequence of the financial influence of the war. That so little complaint has been made is proof of the loyalty of our people to the national idea; and so long as the stringency is regarded as the necessary result of the great struggle it will be borne with patience and a certain cheerfulness. The time will come, and probably has already come, for asking whether part of the difficulty is not to be traced to injudicious legislation, and whether our people are not oppressed by needless and even unjust burdens.

We can not expect much, if any, mercy from moneyed men in general, as such; and business is likely to follow the usual law of demand and supply, and get the most for its houses and goods that the state of the market will allow. The prices of groceries and provisions are enormous, but we must submit to them so long as our neighbors do, and the dealers are permitted by the market to keep up their extortions. Probably a combined movement of a considerable number of families could secure a few good stores where moderate rates are charged; yet no great success has ever attended such operations, and a certain necessity seems to fix the market-price, unjust as it often is. In our cities the cost of goods depends largely upon the cost of rent and the other expenses of business, so that many articles are sold from the shops at double the rates charged for them at first hand. We are little aware of the enormous cost of mere transportation and storage in fixing

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google prices. If you have a barrel of potatoes sent you from your country place, the freight by rail 50 miles is only 25 cents, but you are charged 75 cents or a dollar for having it brought to your door, and are lucky if you do not have to hire a man besides to put it into your cellar. All commodities are taxed in this way, and city families thus submit to a heavy burden that does not enter into the usual estimate of taxes. Yet with due allowance for this expense, we do not easily account for the prices of the leading articles of living. Thus, at the Washington and Fulton markets, down town, the charges are from one-half to two-thirds of up-town prices, and there seems no such difference in the quality of the meats as to account for the great difference in the charges. On some articles, again, there is little difference between the price at the shops and the great markets. A barrel of sugar can be bought at a retail store for about the wholesale price with the freight added, while on articles not so prominent and well known the retail price may be nearly double the wholesale. I can not resist the impression that our families have been, on the whole, extortionately dealt with by grocers and marketmen of late years; yet the remedy is not by any means so clear as the fact. The price follows the ratio of the demand to the supply, at any given quarter, and no permanent help can come until the demand is more careful and intelligent, and the supply is more wise and abundant.

In some departments of business—as renting of houses, for instance—we may naturally look for a certain degree of consideration on the part of the great property-holders, who, to a large extent, command the market. In common trade, where the million are scrambling for a living, we may expect the multitude to play at the game of grab, and try to snatch at all they can get. But when gentlemen of great fortune, commanding position, and high principle are concerned we may look for a different course. We may certainly expect them to look beyond immediate gain, and consult their ultimate good, free as they are from all that pressure of want that bears down the masses. It would not, moreover, be wholly extravagant or unreasonable to look for a certain public spirit, if not a large humanity, from our princely property-owners, such as would lead them to deal somewhat gently with their tenants, and not put upon them sudden and heavy burdens. Very likely there is a great deal of true heart among landlords, yet we confess to not seeing so much of it as we might expect. In February, 1866, a decree went forth from our chief lord of lands and houses that put up our rents some 50 per cent. It was for some time an open question what the rate would be, and there was silence on the subject until our Augustus spoke, and the hard decree went forth. I confess to not enjoying very much the bland announcement that our rent, which was at first 800 dollars, then 1000, then 1200, then 1400, was now to be 2000. The landlord was very much of a gentleman, and expressed his regret at the rise, which, he said, was a necessity, as at head-quarters the advance had been decided upon, and it would not do to show any respect to persons. Very likely this is the law of trade, and the principle of finance, but I could not but think that a far-seeing policy, as well as a generous humanity, would have taken a different course. But the thing was done, and throughout the city the edict was carried out. Hosts of worthy families were driven from their homes, and their places were taken by more thrifty competitors, who had, perhaps, grown fat upon the public spoils from the calamities that had impoverished others. The blocks of buildings looked very much as before, and perhaps showed smarter furniture and more frequent equipages; yet I did not envy much the feelings which our lords of land and houses carried with them to church the first Sunday in May, 1866, after the great raid on the tenants of New York —a raid probably without example in the annals of our America. I am not an admirer of the Trades Unions that are constantly crowding up the price of labor, and sometimes oppressing the workman and the employer. Nor had I any great admiration for this strike on the part of our landlords, that came very near turning us out of the house that we had occupied so many years, with as much care for the preservation of the property as if it were our own. Others were greater sufferers, and the poor soldier's widow whose lot I have looked after, and whose rent was raised from four to six dollars a month, stands for a class who have had the least cheering view of the tender mercies of our capitalists.

Of course there are two sides to the story, and our landlords have suffered much from the depression of rents and increase of taxes during recent years. They have been plundered by the Ring of Thieves in our city government, and they naturally seek redress from their tenants. But the burden has been exorbitant, and has been unwisely imposed. All that can be said is that the sufferers could not help themselves, and they must submit to pay the extortionate rent or to be turned out of doors. It is a great mistake that so many families were caught in such a position, and the painful dependence will not be removed until the great middling-class take the remedy into their own hands, and erect an abundance of modest and comfortable dwellings, which can be owned or rented at moderate rates, and so save them from subservience to the caprices or exactions of capitalists.

Exactly what view to take of the present financial status I do not know. Indeed money is always a mystery; and although it seems to be the most matter-of-fact thing in the world, it most puzzles scrutiny and baffles prediction. Our business men have great sagacity, yet how little most of them know of the science of finance, and what prodigious and ruinous mistakes they are constantly making! It is to be

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google hoped that there are some men in our banks and our National Government who are masters of the situation, but I am not wholly sure of it. The shrewdest men that I have known—men who have made fortunes by watching the markets—have wholly failed to foresee the turns of finance of late; and just at present the main thing upon which men agree is, that they know that they do not know much of any thing as to what is coming. That would be an odd yet instructive book that would collect, arrange, and classify the sayings and doings of Wall Street since New York became the centre of American trade—say for forty years. All the host of facts and figures illustrate certain laws, and behind all the smoke of agitation there has been some real fire. All things tend to a certain average, and all average evolves a certain law. The laws of money are as real as the laws of the weather, though very much as latent and perplexed. All fancies have a root in facts, and the record of financial fancies is an important department of history, and would illustrate the nature of human hopes and prospects as well as the aspects of markets and fortunes. Perhaps it would appear that the imaginative element of our nature is quite as conspicuous in business as in literature, and that the Exchange as well as the garret is the haunt of the dreamer.

I have been much among financial men, alike the solid masters of capital and the flighty votaries of chance, and have been struck with a certain excitability and fancy in their composition. The oldest capitalist's eye lights up at the prospect of a good speculation as the war-horse scents the battle from afar, and there is an habitual unrest about the Stock Board. No visitor would suppose for a moment that any serious business was going on during the shoutings and gesticulations of the session of the Brokers' Board; and the impression given by the Gold Room would be that a rampant mob of rival factions had come together in wrath, either to pick each other's pockets or to make a combined onslaught upon the specie in the banks. Yet there is method in the madness; and after the noise and smoke are done away, it is seen that a great amount of business has been transacted. The craft seems to have a good share of character and stability, and those brokers who do a commission business are to be ranked as regular merchants of a most important order.

Of those that live in the madness of stock speculation not so good an account can be given, and they are not to be ranked among the true business men of the city. A prominent physician tells me that the worst class of patients are young brokers who carry the fast ways of the day's business into the festivities and revels of the evening and the night, and who are using themselves up as fast as they can by burning the candle of life at both ends at the same time. Some old stagers seem to stand the trial comparatively well, yet the record of our stock-gamblers in its best pages is not a very honorable or enviable one, and the Napoleons of the Board have found their Waterloos and St. Helenas.

There is something in the nature of money that tends to agitate and fever shrewd men. The representative of stable value, it is itself the most unstable of things; and it is as hard to say how it will move as to tell the course of the winds. Money feels not only all the disturbances of equilibrium in the general circulation of the commerce of the world, but it is susceptible to all the lights and shades, heats and colds of public opinion and sentiment. Fear locks it up in sheets of ice, and over-confidence dissipates it as sunshine evaporates the lake. There is law to the winds, and one of these days we may be able to appoint a Clerk of the Weather, who will tell us when and how long the rain is to fall, and what will be the practical result of the various movements of the winds and temperature. We are not yet able to appoint such a Clerk of the Currency, or to learn with any assurance what a month or even a week will bring forth in our Banks and Exchange. There is, indeed, a certain region of stability, upon which we rest in peace as upon the solid ground above the tide-mark; but sometimes the tide threatens to rise above that mark and inundate our houses, and below that mark we expect all variations and apparent caprices. My readers may perhaps be willing to listen to a few practical suggestions from an outsider, who has little or no interest in money, except the simple desire to live in plain competence as of old, and to have financial affairs so settled that the mass of plain people may live without having the foundations of welfare constantly threatened or unsettled.

It is very clear that we are to expect a good deal of loss and discomfort as results of our long and destructive war. In order to prove our loyalty and steer clear of the Copperheads, we are not bound to believe or declare that war is in itself a money-making business to a nation, and that either of two sections are likely to grow fat by the process of eating each other up. Our war has been a great financial evil, and nothing could warrant our entering into it but determination to defend the life of the nation, and resist the wicked attempt to make the country over into the hands of the Slave power. We have lost immensely in material and in men, in the commodities that are the products of our industry, and in those who are the producers. It is hard to fix any estimate in figures of our loss. The national debt is only a fraction of the amount, for it does not include the loss of property in the rebel States—whose wealth belonged to the nation—nor the vast amount of productive industry taken from the country by the withdrawal or death of so many of our best men. The debt itself is a great burden, and it is not done away by saying that we owe it wholly among ourselves. It is not so, for much of it is held abroad, and we are as much bound to pay interest to our home bond-holders as to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the foreign holders. Moreover, all the people, directly or indirectly, pay a share of the tax or interest, while only a portion hold the bonds. The debt is large, and we are not bound to join with those who call it a great blessing, from its effect on the public credit, or a mere trifle in comparison with the public wealth. It is a sad and heavy weight, and the people of the country would hold a jubilee if it could be paid at once or reduced one-half.

The method of taxation to reduce the debt and pay the interest is oppressive and injudicious, however well meant. Whatever is necessary to save the national credit our people will cheerfully do and suffer, but they are not desirous of being the victims of financial theories or Quixotic experiments. They feel that they ought to be treated tenderly after the wounds of the war, and that industry should be left as free as possible to make up for the losses and derangements of the rebellion. They wish for taxation enough to fix a solid habit of financial loyalty and to guard the public honor, but they do not wish nor mean to be ruined by unfair and oppressive imposts. The true principle that should regulate our policy is very obvious. The nation should pay its debt out of the new wealth of the country, the yield of skill, labor, and capital, and not by taking away the old capital, or anticipating the earnings of industry. In other words, the nation should not pay its debt by plunging its people into debt, but should encourage their enterprise, and take a fair portion of their actual gains to meet the national necessity. As things now are the taxation to a great extent is eating into the life of the people, and running vast numbers into debt to meet the exaction. Thus far men of limited salaries, for example, have been sadly oppressed by the income tax. The salaries have not been advanced more than twenty-five per cent. on the average, and not more than fifty per cent. in favorable instances; yet the costs of living have nearly doubled, and on the top of this burden comes an impost of five per cent. on all income over 600 dollars. As far as my observation goes this tax, among persons of moderate salaries or fixed investments of moderate amounts, has been paid out of the principal, or by borrowing money on mortgages or pledges, and the nation takes the property of the industrious and frugal, not to meet the necessary interest on its debt, but to boast of its speedy liquidation. This is wrong, and the sentiment of the people and the press is declaring it to be so. It is time for our members of Congress to see to it, and lighten the intolerable burden. They will do better to look to this subject than spend their time in quarreling with the poor President, or listening to the drummers who are forever beating into their ears the wants of the merchants and manufacturers, who ask that the legislation of the country shall turn upon their class interests, and protection of home industry shall become prohibition of foreign trade.

Of course our financial troubles are all exaggerated by one fatal error of American business, if they do not originate in it. I mean our impatience of slow reality, and our eagerness to set it aside for swift fancy. We are always playing the game of make-believe in trade, and telling the lie to others so often that we come at last to believe it ourselves. We insist upon calling things money which are not money, and we were never so deeply committed to that delusion as of late. We have taken it for granted that what is called a dollar by respectable parties, and duly printed and signed as such, must be a dollar, and have not been wholly cured of the delusion by seeing its gold value dwindle down to 50 cents, and even less. Nor is it merely the recent issue of national legal tenders, our greenbacks, that have led us into our mistake. A large portion of our American currency has always been irredeemable, and our periodical panics, that have shrunk inflated nominal values, have constantly led to bank failures or suspensions. We do not say that specie is the only money, for money is the circulating medium, and there is not specie enough to represent and circulate all the exchangeable property in the markets; and specie itself is too cumbrous to be carried about from hand to hand. But it is sure that specie is the only safe basis of the circulating medium; and our money is alike convenient and safe only as it represents specie value without requiring a wheel-barrow or a dray to cart it about for us when we wish to spend a few thousands of dollars.

Most of the business of the country is done by commercial paper, and these notes, within the sphere of those who give them, perform much of the office of money. It is an interesting fact that the loans and discounts of our associated banks in this city, October 13, 1866, amounted to $276,443,219, while the specie and legal tenders amounted to but $88,756,424, and the capital to $81,770,000, and the liabilities and net deposits to $257,035,895. These loans and discounts call for close personal knowledge of the parties receiving them, and close scrutiny of the securities given. Evidently there should be a wide difference between the form of credit given thus carefully and privately and that given to notes of general circulation, such as are usually called money, and passed from hand to hand without question. Sometimes, indeed, the loans to private parties are unwise, and the names are unreliable, or the securities are overestimated or unsound; but in such cases the special parties to the transaction are concerned, and the public may not be at all involved. Whatever, on the contrary, is issued to the public as money, with promise to pay on demand, should be covered by security that can protect the public, and should be under the most rigid supervision. The conclusion is, that our common currency should be on the specie basis, and whatever takes us away from this sets us adrift on an uncertain sea. We may be, and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google have been, driven to sea by a terrible storm not of our own choosing, and the point now is to get back to our anchorage as speedily as we can with safety to the fleet. Further inflation will be utter folly and wickedness; and all that cautious men can ask of the Government is such wariness in the method and rate of contraction as to protect us from sudden and needless panics. Yet let the contraction be sure, however slow, and the public pulse will begin to calm, and the fever abate into the serene tide of healthy circulation.

The health of our currency will bring health to all our business interests. Houses and ships will be built, and prices will come down, so that the majority who are buyers will no longer be at the mercy of the minority who are sellers. We can then abate our extravagant tax upon foreign materials, and check the error that is driving some branches of business to pursue their manufactures abroad, or buy their material, on account of the enormous exactions of home establishments, that have been pampered into their presumption by monstrous imposts on foreign industry, as has been the case, for instance, with the paper-makers. There is reason for a considerable tariff of protection now in the fact of the high price of home labor, which of itself gives us great disadvantage in competition with Europe; but when labor is paid here upon the gold basis the tariff can be reduced, and some approach be made to the free trade, which is the ultimate destiny of all civilized countries, as it is the true theory of political science.

Our people are now thoughtful of the financial condition of the country, and many are looking for a speedy and terrible convulsion. The fear is not justified by the facts; for the Government is interested in keeping up the credit of its own issues, and is so far pledged to the business prosperity of the nation. It will not risk speedy contraction, or any hazardous experiments. Individuals and districts may suffer, but the nation will go on a while as usual, and may, with due wisdom, prepare for the great change that a few years must bring. If the year 1870 restores specie payments, and if the year 1876—the centennial of our independence—sees the whole debt of the nation reduced to $2,000,000,000, and sagaciously funded at a low interest on long time, to be easily paid by taxation, and a sinking fund from the sale of lands, or a good banking law, is established to pay half the principal by the year 1901, and the other half by 1925, we shall be the most favored nation that ever spent money before getting it, and passed off its paper as if it were gold.

Many questions of a great moral and social interest turn upon the subject of money. As moralists we can not be unmindful of the great perversion of the mind of many, if not most, of our people by the monstrous inflation of the currency, and the ease with which money has seemed to flow in trade and luxury. At times almost every body has seemed to have plenty of money; and persons who have been themselves pinched have formed extravagant desires from looking over into the gardens and halls of abundance into which they have not been admitted. We have pretty much all of us put our figures up very high, and we ask and expect more than ever before from Heaven and the world. The rate of social expenditure has enormously increased, not only by the cost of goods, but by the quality and quantity of the goods demanded. Dress is more extravagant than ever, and entertainments are more numerous and lavish. We are all still under the stimulus of the war-fever and the war-prices, and it will take some time to bring our pulse to the healthy beat. It is a good time to think of what we are to go through, and prepare to meet the moderate lot which is in store for most of us.

Probably the season of sudden and overgrown fortunes is over, and many of the lucky votaries who drew the great prizes have already learned sobriety in the terrible school of revulsion and loss. Men have not made much money of late, and many have met with great losses. The question is, What should we Americans, on the whole, regard as the reasonable view of property; and what should we regard as the fair, practical relation of ourselves and our families to money? What shall we ask or expect as respectable success, moderate prosperity? Shall we think that we are ruined if we can not command fifteen or twenty thousand a year; or shall we think life tolerable if we can have only the earnings of an average business or profession?

I will not go into any minute arithmetical calculation, but will be content with laying down what seems to me the sound American principle. The first duty, as well as interest, is to moderate our expectations of gain, and look for certain competence rather than chance affluence. We need to secure to ourselves and children a certain base of respectability, and keep this wholly out of the region of contingency. Then we may extend our lines as opportunity offers, and be sure of a safe retreat. Too many launch out rashly into the realm of adventure, and despise the base from which they started, and can not find it when most sorely pushed. To speak more specifically, it is wise for us to be content with frugality and simplicity in the essential plan of our living, and beware of the fatal mistake of starting with great expense and luxury as necessary to our dignity or happiness. We may and should have generous and even magnificent tastes, but we should nurture them rather within the high and universal sphere of Literature and Art, than by insisting on making a palace or museum of our own home. We should leave an open margin for the indulgence of all charming fancies and ideal aspirations, without burdening our daily thought with royal costs and shows. We may have a snug little house with neatness, refinement, and culture, and a welcome for a friend at our table, without sighing for stately apartments where a single

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 dinner may cost a year's frugal savings, or a ball may swallow up an old-fashioned competence. We need houses so constructed that families may live properly at moderate expense, as in the French system of separate floors, and such as will allow the occasional use of large rooms for especial receptions. The plan should be such as to reconcile the true essentials of our American character — independence and universality. It is essential to us to be left to ourselves, each family wholly free to its own privacy, apart from all intrusion; and socialism, such as destroys the liberty of the individual person or family, is utterly opposed to our American instincts. At the same time we are very social, and are constantly seeking to enlarge and enrich our fellowship with our neighbors and mankind.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The question is, How shall we secure the large fellowship to our mind without too much sacrifice of our economy or comfort? The question is being answered in various ways. It may be that our young men are, in some respects, in advance of their elders in this matter; and the young man who gives ten or fifteen dollars a week for a neat room and breakfast, and who dines with his friends at his club, and spends his leisure time there with company congenial to his tastes, so far as getting most for his money is concerned, solves a pressing financial problem by the union of private thrift and generous fellowship, true economy and social elegance. These clubs may be doubtful or dangerous institutions, and we are not speaking of their personal influence, but their financial policy. Their policy will win new respect when associated with a more sacred sociality, such as shall secure to families frugal and handsome resorts without taking away the privacy of their habitual life. A beginning is already made in this combination of private independence with general fellowship. In some cases families even of affluence use hired halls or music-rooms to entertain their guests who are too many to crowd into their own houses; and gradually our social habits are taking the path of the beautiful arts, and giving hints of the time when sociality shall be less a costly private luxury than a generous public fellowship that feeds upon music and the drama, pictures, statuary, and all their gentle ministries. In some way our more universal affinities must be met in America by the ministry of the beautiful arts, and our réunions must be less private and clannish, and more in the sphere of large affinities and ideas.

If any of our readers who has watched the current of society for the last twenty years will interpret his own experience he will see at once what we mean. He will see that our best sociality is coming, not from costly private entertainments, but from beautiful tastes and large affinities, and that the great want of our people is a method of living that shall secure private independence and generous fellowship, give us a good home that we can each of us pay for, and such society and arts as not we alone but God and humanity are furnishing us with as the heirs of the ages and the children of God. Then we shall need money to pay our bills; but our best enjoyments will not be measured by their cost, and our highest aspirations will not depend, like our present vanities, on the accidents of fortune.

THE VIRGINIANS IN TEXAS.

CHAPTER XIII.

AT THE RANCH.

ONE entire year in Texas had rolled round, and oh, how swiftly! More had been thought and felt and accomplished and enjoyed in that one year, reaching from May to May, than during any ten years before. A spice of danger now and then, it is true; but these were only as the rocking winds to the oak—they but rooted the members of the family that much the more firmly to Texas soil. Emigration, they knew, was pouring into the State from Europe and from all the old States; railways were being constructed; the whole area of the State was being explored and settled; an empire was rising rapidly around them. Virginia was well enough in its way, but it belonged to fifty years ago. Texas to-day, and hurrah for Texas forever!

"It is all the same old story," Venable read aloud from a letter just received from his cousin Charles. "Every thing drifts along on the Plantation in the same way this year exactly like last year. You write to me about your rich soil, and we have to butter ours with guano an inch thick to make it yield. You tell me about your game, and a squirrel is the largest I ever have a shot at here. I am so tired of nothing to do and so much to eat. Gus was at the University, but he did something or other, and was expelled. He is at home now, the idlest of us all. I go to school, but it is school, school, all the time. Not divided up by work and hunting as with you, Venable. I wish my father would let me visit you in Texas. But people don't respect Texas here at all. It seems to them only a sort of refuge-place at the ends of the earth for scoundrels and poor folks. But I would rather be hard at work there than lying on a sofa in the parlor all the time here, by a long shot. I feel tied up, nothing to do. The girls are always fixing themselves up, and seeing about their dresses, and visiting and being visited—busy enough; but we boys, what under the sun is there for us to do here? Watkins, your father's old overseer, is cutting and slashing the negroes like every thing, we hear. He wants to squeeze double crops out of the ground and double work of the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

hands. He seems almost mad after money. I met him on the road once thumping his horse along by keeping up a beating on his sides with both heels at once, his head leaned forward between his horse's ears, his face as sharp as a hatchet, white and cold like frost. He's too keen for us Virginians, cuts every way, and as smooth, too, as an oiled razor. It is astonishing how the people hate him. Tell a hand you'll sell him to old Watkins if he don't walk straight, and it does more good than a rawhide any day. But what am I talking about Watkins for? I was only saying how tired I am of this slow, dull, do-nothing life, and how glad I would be to visit Texas. I don't blame Uncle Frank for running away from here so long ago at all. I've half a notion to do the same myself, only I know your father would send me right back."

"Never mind about the rest, Venable," said Will, who had waxed very impatient, and had stood now some time with his hat on. "They are all over at the ranch ready to rope calves this morning. Let's go. Hurrah! Make haste."

Sure enough, it was Saturday morning, and work enough there was to do before night. As speedily as Will himself could desire they were on their way to their uncle.

"I can't imagine what's come over Francisco," said the younger brother as they walked along.

"Oh, I've noticed it," said Venable. "It's ever since Mr. Roland came to live at the ranch. I suppose it's because he is a Catholic, and don't like a Protestant preacher to live in the same house. And Miss Agnes, too, he seems to be afraid of her. I don't see why, I'm sure; there is not a nicer girl in all Virginia. She's so gentle and quiet and smiling. I'm always glad when Mr. Roland is off to preach, and she comes over to stay with us till he comes back. I heard ma say that she loved her dearly."

"Beautiful people always love each other," replied the younger philosopher of the two. "But I must tell you about Francisco," he continued. "We were in uncle's boat fishing together last week. I hadn't caught any thing, got tired of trying. I was lying down in the front of the boat, and I got to thinking about the queer name uncle gave it. 'Dolores, Dolores, Dolores,' I said half aloud to myself. You ought to have seen how Francisco jumped. I thought he would have pitched overboard. Then his brown face turned almost white. He took his big knife out, and told me to hold his line at the other end of the boat a while. Then he went to the bow of the boat, leaned over, and began to scrape the name out. He wouldn't stop for all I could say, but worked at it till he had scratched it out on both sides. Then he took his line again, and fished just as before. For a long time he wouldn't talk to me at all. At last I said, 'Don't be so cross, Francisco. What does Dolores mean?' 'It means sorrows, troubles,' he said, at last. Queer, wasn't it?"

By this time they had reached the corral or pen belonging to the ranch. This was made by inserting in the earth the ends of ten-feet rails placed upright, and as close together as possible. For whole weeks all hands had been ransacking the country for many miles around, driving up all the cattle bearing the McRobert brand. Almost every cow of them all had a little sleek calf trotting beside it. These calves, several hundred in number, were now bleating uproariously inclosed in this pen, rushing hither and thither, pressing their noses through the cracks in the rails, doing their best to get out—just like fish in a huge net after a successful haul. Inside of the pen were Uncle Frank, Hark, and Francisco hard at work.

"No better fun in the world!" said Venable, and he soon had off his coat and was with them as busy as any. They went at it in this manner: First Francisco would catch a calf with his lariat. It seemed astonishing how skillfully he did this. Without stirring from his place he would throw his coiled lariat at a calf, catch it in the noose around its neck or any hoof he pleased. As soon as he drew the rope tight Hark would throw the struggling and protesting victim on its side and sit down upon it, taking care not to hurt it, however. Then Venable would hurry up with a small furnace full of coals glowing hot—the branding-iron among the coals, having a long handle with a corn-cob on it, to protect the hand from being burned in using it. This brand was simply the letters "McR," about three inches long. Taking this in his hand by its cob handle, Uncle Frank would hold it half a minute upon the hide of the calf. Then the noose would be slipped off, and Francisco would have another calf down in a moment. If a calf belonged to him, Uncle Frank branded it on the right fore-shoulder; if to Venable, on the left fore-shoulder; if to Will, on the right hind-quarter; if to Mr. Morton McRobert, on the left hind-quarter—so that any one could tell ever after, whenever they saw the calf, after it had grown and as long as it lived, whose it was at a glance. It was exciting but hard work.

For an hour or two Mr. Roland leaned against the gate of the inclosure, looking in upon the active scene. His daughter Agnes stood beside him. For many weeks now she had been with her father, and her presence had lighted up the whole place. She was still quite young—barely entering on womanhood—but it was evident, as with her father, that sorrow had cast its shadow upon her path. Not that she looked gloomy—far from it; a more fresh and cheerful smile never beamed from the eyes or rippled the cheek of a maiden into dimples. She was very beautiful—only very quiet and still, with a low, sweet voice, and a laugh clear and silvery, but never ringing out loud and long. There was that inexpressible home-like sweetness about her, so different from the flashing beauty of the ball-room belle. Not a flower in all the prairie, dewy with morning, more like a thing of nature than she! Firm and decided enough she could

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

be, too, when necessary—as the boys could testify any day. Uncle Frank had given up one of the rooms of his house, with a shed-room adjoining it, to Mr. Roland and his daughter, and every day Venable and Will came over to school to Mr. Roland—reciting, in his absences at preaching-stations around, to his daughter. No queen could command more respect than she, and Victoria herself had not more loving and loyal subjects. It is astonishing how rapidly the boys learned, and especially when it was to her that they had to recite their lessons. In fact, the whole neighborhood regarded Mr. Roland and his daughter as among their most valuable acquisitions for many years. Save during her father's absences she kept house at the Ranch; and Uncle Frank hardly knew his own home or his own table for the happy reformation effected therein—every thing was now so neat and clean and orderly. As to himself, up to the arrival of his brother and family he had paid no attention whatever to his appearance, taking things as they came. Ever since their arrival he had been much more particular in his dress and manner, but ten times more so since Mr. Roland took up his abode with him. As Will said, however, it was only too plain that Francisco regarded Mr. Roland's arrival as the unhappiest possible event. He would never speak even to him or his daughter, under pretense of not understanding English. He understood well enough all that Uncle Frank had to say, however, and his swarthy face would brighten up with life and joy whenever he was near. And it is astonishing how close he would keep to him. No dog could follow up his master's steps more closely, watching his every word and movement with quick and constant affection. The happiest time of all the day to the Mexican boy was after dinner in summer. Then the Texan would sit swinging in a hammock slung under the trees near the house, smoking cigarritos almost as fast as Francisco, sitting on the ground near by, could make them—and no cigar-maker could be more expert. With a pile of shucks beside him, a paper of tobacco, and his sharp hunting-knife, his expert fingers would have the shuck cut into right lengths, the tobacco put in, and the cigarritos twisted into shape in a twinkling. Young as the Mexican was, never, except when eating, was a cigarrito out of his own mouth. As to the Texan, he treated Francisco almost exactly as one would an affectionate Newfoundland dog. Since Mr. Roland came, however, he had become apparently ashamed of the Mexican, spoke to him less frequently, even avoided him, and had almost given up the smoking altogether. It seemed cruel toward a creature that seemed to live only for its master; and after every such neglect the pitiful look of the swarthy boy was touching to see. It was a distress to Mr. Roland, and especially to his daughter, that Francisco remained so shy toward them. Miss Agnes especially did every thing in her power to gain his affection—offered him articles of wearing—books with pictures—endeavored to get him to permit her to arrange his room more neatly—but all in vain! Once or twice the boy seemed moved by her gentleness and beauty and singular sweetness of manner, but it was only to sink back into a deeper reserve.

It was late in the afternoon when the last calf was branded. Mr. Roland and his daughter were standing again at the gate of the corral. Leaning against the fence beside them, their host was gayly laughing and talking with them; and never before had Agnes seemed so beautiful and happy. The Texan was endeavoring to induce her to mount his favorite horse, that was staked near by, and take a lesson in riding. At last she consented, provided the horse was led. There happened to be no side-saddle at the Ranch, and his master told the Mexican to go over to the San Hieronymo and borrow one from Mrs. McRobert. In a few moments Francisco had his own mustang—a spirited, vicious, little black animal—saddled, was off, and back again with the saddle before they could have supposed him half-way there. Had they noticed more closely they would have observed that the boy seemed under the influence of a fever—almost delirious. He dismounted and stood looking on while the Texan carefully placed the side-saddle upon his horse, buckled the surcingle very carefully, then led the horse to a stump near by, and helped her to mount. Strange to say, but it so happened, that Agnes had never been on a horse before in all her life. She was determined, however, to learn, and sat as composedly as she could while the Texan showed her how to hold the reins, leading the animal slowly and carefully along. If they had not been so much occupied they could not but have noticed the conduct of the Mexican. He had never before seen a side-saddle in his life, nor even a female so unused to riding. As he glanced from under the broad brim of his hat he murmured his contempt in strong Spanish to himself. Once, when the horse started a little, and its rider gave a half shriek of alarm, the Mexican actually laughed out so rudely that the Texan glanced angrily around upon him. Eight or ten times did her host lead the horse slowly along, up and down the open space before the house, and then led the animal again to the stump for its fair burden to dismount.

"Ah, you'll never be a real Texan, Miss Agnes," said he, as he assisted her to dismount, "until you've learned to ride."

"I'm sure I will be glad to learn," she replied. "I can think of nothing more delightful than a gallop over the prairie in the morning before the sun gets high, only I'm afraid I will never dare to do it. I will do my best to learn."

"I'll take care of that if you'll permit me," said the Texan, his handsome face on a glow. "Only ride a short distance every day, as you have done now, and in a few weeks you will ride with the best of us."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Wouldn't it be grand to see Miss Agnes on a mustang, as hard as she could tear after a long-eared rabbit!" said Will.

"Just wait till I learn, Will, and see if I can not leave you far behind in such a chase," answered she, laughing.

By this time they had reached the front porch.

"Only look at Francisco!" exclaimed Venable.

And it was worth looking at. The boy had again mounted his mustang. His lariat hung at the pommel of his saddle, and a huge spur armed each heel. With his hat well down over his eyes, his long black hair streaming behind, his cheek glowing with excitement, he rode his horse at a swift gallop as far as the space before the house permitted, then whirled him around at the end, and was back again in a moment, seated as much at home and at ease on his horse as if he were seated in a chair. Turning his mustang again he rode back again at full speed, gathering his lariat in his hand as he rode, and as he passed amidst a group of cows, scattering them to every side, he, in a turn of his hand, had the noose of his lariat around the horns of one of the wildest of them. As the rope tightened about the animal's head he turned the head of his mustang toward it, and backed the mustang from the struggling victim, thereby holding its head to the ground, bellowing and frantic. Suddenly the cow made a bolt at him; but in an instant he was off on the other side; the rope tightened upon it in that direction; and so he continued till, with one sudden jerk of the lariat to one side, he threw the struggling animal on her back, its hoofs in the air. Springing off his mustang he jumped upon the animal, had the noose from around its horns, and was off again, with his lariat again coiled in his hand. Galloping swiftly back, the noose flew from his hand right and left, like the fang of some fabulous monster—like something itself endowed with life. Now it held a struggling calf by the hoof; then it was loosened with a shake, and around the neck of Duke, looking on with astonishment. Hark held out his hand toward him as he passed, with a "You see dar!" to Scip, and the next moment Hark was running to keep up with the wild Mexican, the noose fastened like a manacle around his wrist. In vain did the geese attempt to escape by rushing into the brush. One throw of the lariat and the leader of the hissing flock was being dragged through the air after the flying rider like the white tag to the tail of a kite. The boy seemed possessed with a fury. Before Venable had done wondering to see the branding furnace dragged along the ground after the hoofs of the mustang, encircled in the noose, he felt his own hat taken from his head in the same manner, and a moment after replaced evenly on his head again by the rider, as he whirled and rode past him again. Suddenly the Mexican rode full toward the portico, his black eye glittering as with fever, and the Texan sprang forward just in time to receive on his breast the noose thrown into the group. Shouting at him loud and fiercely in Spanish, the Texan held the noose an instant and cut it in two with the knife from his belt. The Mexican only laughed, and dropping the remainder of the lariat, turned his foaming mustang, and dashing along up the corral, seized Scip as he passed by the waistband, and held him, dumb with astonishment, over his head, riding at full gallop, dropping him into a chaparral-bush at the end of the course.

"I thought he crazy 'fore," said Hark, at this juncture, "but now I knowse he is. Time to send for doctor, I think!"

Leaving Scip squalling among the thorns, the Mexican dashed back again, clearing a wagon at a leap as he came. Arrived opposite the portico, he threw from his pocket a handful of dimes on the ground, and continued on. Returning at full speed, he kicked the stirrups from his feet as he came near, and, winding his legs around the horse, he dropped toward the ground as he passed, picking up a dime as he did so without drawing rein, and so back and forth till all the pieces of silver were again in his purse. By this time it was quite dark, and the group on the portico entered the house, while the Mexican rode on and out into the prairie.

The Texan seemed gloomy and absent-minded during the conversation that followed around the upper table.

"The Mexicans are singular people," he said, at last; "the laziest living beings in the world. Eating, sleeping, smoking, riding, and herding cattle is about all they are good for. But let them get excited, and they become crazy. It's very rare for them to become excited about any thing singly—they go in masses like sheep."

"I am sorry Francisco has taken such a dislike to me," said Agnes. "He is so handsome and spirited, with his black eyes and raven hair and bronzed cheek, he looks like what we read of a young Spanish cavalier. He will have nothing to say to me whatever. What can be the reason, Mr. McRobert?"

The Texan hesitated to reply, coloring violently up to the very hair of his head under the calm inquiry of her clear blue eyes.

"Be guided by me, Miss Agnes," he said, at length, "and have nothing whatever to say or do to him. He is a singular creature; let him have his own way. He will not be with us long. I intend sending him away soon."

"Where to, Mr. McRobert?" asked Agnes, quietly.

"Oh, to San Antonio, to the Port, to Chihuahua. The arrangement is not all made yet."

"Shall I show you those drawings of mine you asked about this morning?" said she, as they arose from the table.

"Thank you, thank you, but not to-night. There is something I must attend to," and he left the room.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CHAPTER XIV.

OFF FOR THE LAMPASAS.

MAY and June flew by on swiftest wings. Every lovely morning the delicious jargoning of mocking-birds, swarming like bees in the trees around the house, made sleep nonsense and an absurdity. Then family worship, which even restless little Bessie had learned to love, with its few Scripture verses so read by the father as to interest every child, its sweet familiar hymn in which all joined, even the bird-like discord of Bessie assisting therein, the short but heart-felt prayer acknowledging the mercy of a Father in Heaven during the night, and an entreaty for his guidance and blessing during the new day He had given them. Then a cheerful and hearty breakfast: eggs in abundance, from the hen-house of Venable's own building; tender chickens from the same prolific structure; radishes, raised exclusively by Will in his own particular garden; venison, supplied by Uncle Frank or Venable from their last Saturday's hunt; sometimes birds, brown and delicate, or even squirrels, the result each of near twenty shots by Will in his hunting—aspiring to a buck Will was by this time; honey, too, from the forest or from the long stand of garden hives. Very often Mrs. McRobert herself, tempted out and down the banks of the spring by the Eden loveliness of the early dawn, would make her contribution to breakfast in the shape of a gaspergion—a delicious trout, not half an hour before very much alive indeed in the cool and transparent water, but now lying brown and juicy on the dish, its mouth open in unutterable astonishment at the swift change in its situation in life. As to the light rolls, clustered in one, like bubbles, on the plate, and the coffee, and the cooking—these were from the hand of the dark Ceres of the kitchen; the snowy hominy being from the steel mill, driven by daylight every morning by Hark-power, its noise loudly objected to by the protesting mocking-birds. And Bessie—breakfast would not have been breakfast without the many wise remarks made by her in the intervals of her busy spoon. There was real meaning now in the blessing invoked by the father upon his happy table. It may be Texas is a dreadful country to live in. People with their noses in the air, and their feet barely touching its soil with disdain, have said so, with the intimation that, to them at least, the descent from some previous condition in the old States to Texas was very, very far down hill. What did you slide down to us for, and why don't you hasten to return? is the question which dwells just within the lips of Texans toward such persons, often impolitely breaks through the lips even in some trying cases. It may be that the McRobert family did not attach that value to mere paved streets, and fine houses, and refined society, and all the rest of it, that they should have done. The fact is, somehow or other all the members of this household had learned to look for, and be entirely satisfied with, so much of happiness as was to be found within their own circle. They might have made themselves profoundly miserable, forced to live by misfortune there out of all the world on the San Hieronymo. As it was, they made themselves, in spite of their exile, as happy as people ever get to be in this world—a calm, deep, everyday happiness. None had ever said so, yet they all felt that their coming to just that spot, and all that caused it, was, upon the whole, the happiest event in all their lives. And they no more had any peculiar natural disposition to cheerfulness under trouble than any body else. Their religion was to them the deep central fount of all their happiness. It was the sought and acknowledged smile of their Father, to whom they felt themselves reconciled in Christ, that diffused perpetual summer upon their roof—the same smile as that which makes heaven itself sunny forever. I would like to add that, knowing, loving, acknowledging the perpetual presence of this Friend in their family, they were ever careful to avoid those ten thousand wrong-doings of hand and tongue, great and little, which so certainly produce unhappiness great and little, as certainly as thistle-seed produces thistles. But I dare not say more, lest you should skip: and what is skipped in a book had better have been left out, or at least might as well.

"Crop laid by, Mass Morton," said Hark one June evening, as he reached the end of the last row of corn with his hoe, and his master too, at the same moment.

"And a splendid crop it will be too, Hark," said Mr. McRobert, as he climbed the fence and balanced himself on the top rail, holding by one of the stakes. I am afraid to say how many acres of green corn he could see, head-high nearly, green and glorious. "Hard work we all have had, too, at it, Hark," he continued.

"Yes, massa," replied the negro, leaning on his hoe with a sigh of satisfaction. "Ef since we come fust on dis San Hieronymo any body's been idle, I don't know who 'tis. 'Tain't you, Mass Morton, certain; hain't been Mass Venable, sure. I nebber see white boy hoe corn like Mass Will. Little Missy drop seed in dozen rows. Rohamma, she growl and grumble at Texas, an' work her hands off. I done little—what I could; 'casionally, at least. Scip, I give him a treshing once or twice ebry day, and he work. An' if dar's been any time—quarter hour—idle, I don't know when dat time o' day from dat hour, las' May year ago, we fust saw dis place till dis moment."

"Never saw such soil as this in Virginia, either," said his master.

"Guano foot thick not equal to it. You can jest see de corn growing. An' look at dem punkin vines. In my patch we worked by light ob de moon. Water-million vines hide all de ground; plenty of millions long 'fore Fourth ob July. An' what takes me, massa," continued the boy, wiping his streaming brow, "is de ease ob de work. It may be de air, or de soil, or de

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

starting a new place, or de habing ebry thing to do from de start—but de work come like a corn-shucking. It all a frolic from de start. Rohamma say she pine for Ole Virginny. Virginny 'spectable place for ole folks; but Texas for me eny day. High time I begin to make de rails into cribs for de corn."

"There's the supper bell, Hark. I'll see you about the cribs early in the morning."

At an early hour next morning Hark was at work at the cribs with the zeal of a Sir Christopher Wren. Not earlier, however, than Uncle Frank, Venable, and Francisco had started on a trip to the sulphur springs with the zest of so many Mungo Parks. Ever since the arrival of the family in Texas they had heard of the sulphur springs of the Lampasas, not a hundred miles to the east of them. Since the opening of summer there had been perpetual discussion of a family trip there. A great deal was to be said for and against. It was not so easy a thing, the queen-bee argued, to leave one's home, even for a week or two: the hawks would get among the chickens, the hogs into the garden, the turkeys were about hatching, a hive might swarm, nobody was sick and in need of sulphur water, Indians might be about the springs, Bessie might get bitten by snakes or something there, water-melons were getting ripe at home, there was so much sewing to do, what were they doing but picnicking already where they were? Sulphur springs! Could any spring by any possibility be superior, or even equal to, the San Hieronymo, which gurgled full of coolness and fish there before the very door. Every voice had been heard fully on the subject. Mr. Roland and Agnes had been several times over to tea for the express purpose of assisting in the discussion. At last one final tea was drunk over the matter.

"It would be well enough for Venable to go," said Mr. Roland. "The boys have both studied hard for months; now they deserve such a trip—"

"Oh, ma!" interrupted Bessie, who always thought aloud, "Rohamma says she see enough of Texas where she is, right here; don't want to see any more."

"As to myself," continued Mr. Roland, "I can not go, as I have appointments to preach around. Never in all my life did I have so much pleasure in preaching. People crowd the cabins wherever I go. Latterly we have had to worship out of doors under the trees for the crowd. I never saw people so attentive, so hungry for preaching, in my life. Some of the wildest and roughest characters I ever met in my life have made a profession of religion, and others"—and here his eye lingered seriously and pleasantly upon Uncle Frank sitting opposite at table—"are, I have every reason to trust, thinking of soon taking the same step. I never enjoyed myself so much in my work before, as I said. I never wanted to live so much before, that I may carry on my work;" and his pale cheek glowed with earnestness. He had thus only hinted at the hard, incessant, devoted work in which he had been intensely engaged since his first sermon at the Ranch. Not only at every neighborhood around where he could get an opportunity to preach, but not a cabin in reach that he had not visited with the personal and pressing message of the Gospel. In all the region no man was so looked up to and revered and loved. Suffering seemed to have separated him from all else to his work. Even his daughter, dearly as he loved her, whom none could but love, was second in his thoughts to this. There was an intensity, a fervency of devotion in the man which none had ever witnessed before in any one.

"Pardon me; I only meant"—he continued to say—"why I can not go; but don't let that prevent others."

"As to myself," said his daughter, when called on for her vote, "I will be glad to go, but not without Mrs. McRobert; since she remains I will prefer to remain."

"Oh, I don't care so much about going myself," said Uncle Frank, who happened, by the merest accident in the world, to be seated next to Agnes, and whose turn was therefore next to speak. "Upon the whole," he added, "I believe I won't go."

Now up to a moment before the Texan had been loud in his resolves to go. At his frank and sudden change of vote the cheeks of his nearest neighbor at the table became even rosier than before, while a gathering of the dimples upon the cheeks of Mrs. McRobert, and a merry light in her eyes, proved the remarkable powers of female intuition possessed by her also.

"My decision," said Mr. Morton McRobert, suddenly, and with a half-frown, checking a disposition to titter on the part of the children, "is this: Compromise. Let Frank and Venable and Francisco, say, go up on an advance trip to the springs. Then come back and report—then we can decide."

And this was the way that these three started that clear June morning for the springs. Venable had slept at the Ranch to get an early start with his uncle. They had left after a hasty breakfast with Francisco. They missed him before they had gone far. He had ridden back with a sudden turn. Arrived at the house, and seeing that his companions were out of sight, he had walked his restive mustang once, twice, thrice slowly around the whole place, looking slowly, devouringly-like at every thing. Then drawing his broad-brimmed hat farther down on his eyes, the struggling mustang had soon rejoined the other party on the prairie.

"I declare I don't like what Hoogenboom came down to tell us last night about the Indians," the Texan was saying.

"But how could they attack so large a crowd as will be at the springs?" asked Venable.

"They come down to take off the horses staked out near by. The Rangers are out, that's one good thing."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"How many Indians are there in Texas, uncle?"

"Nobody can even guess. There are the Apaches, Lipans, and Comanches—continually coming and going like the wind down through New Mexico into Texas and back again—perhaps ten thousand warriors in each tribe. When game gets scarce on the northern prairies they come down for stock—take any thing they can lay their hands on. They are afraid to go near a house on account of the rifle-balls from between the logs. If they catch anybody out alone on the prairies they always spear and scalp him."

"Why don't the Government make treaties with them?"

"It has made a thousand; but they pay no attention to them. Sometimes Government tries to settle and civilize them—that may do with some tribes like Cherokees and Chickasaws, but not Comanches and the like; it only makes them more cunning. Instead of being in the fields at work they are at the old game, out murdering and stealing cattle. Government sometimes pays them annuities to keep quiet—that has failed too—only makes them insolent. From all I know of Indians in Texas, the only way is to exterminate them at once. It seems cruel; but it is only what will have to be done at last, and that after they have killed any quantity more of whites."

"Hoogenboom told me one day, uncle, that he was once with a ranging party. They surprised and killed a party of Indians that were running off cattle. One of the bodies happened to fall into an eddy of the river near the camp, and in a few hours they noticed that the water had washed some sort of dye off its skin; and, sure enough, it was a white man fixed up to look like an Indian."

"Yes, there are gangs of horse-thieves and murderers who make a regular trade of that in Texas. Scoundrels! they deserve being killed over and over again fifty times. But their inroads are not a hundredth part of what is done, and by real Indians."

"It seems hard though, uncle, our driving the native owners of the soil off of it before us."

"Yes. I remember seeing the exact process of doing this, and seeing how they liked it too. I was out with a surveying party. As we drew near one of their villages on the frontier with our theodolites and chains and flags and stakes, they swarmed out to see what we were up to. As soon as they understood that we were actually dividing out and marking off their prairies you ought to have seen them. They would have speared and scalped us to a man if they could. We were too strong for them, armed each of us to the teeth with rifles, bowie-knives, and revolvers. So they could only scowl upon us in sad and sullen hate. Their children at first came running about us for beads and buttons and crackers—little naked, brown monkeys; but as soon as their parents found what we were doing, they beat them terribly to make them keep away. We ran our lines through their very village. In fact, I had to carry a chain right through one of their very tents, going in on one side, coming out on the other. Did I ever tell you about it?"

"No, Sir. How did they like it?"

"Needn't ride so fast, Francisco. Hold in your mustang, Venable. Plenty of time before us. Well, when I got in the tent there lay on a buffalo robe on the ground an old, old Indian. He was a chief, his hair white as snow. He must have been a magnificent warrior, broad chest, splendid eyes—looked as he lay like a king, say King Lear. I stopped a moment, hated to do it; but I had either to run my chain over his body as he lay, or to move him aside. So I took the edge of his robe, and pulled it with him on it to one side of the tent, out of the way, you know. How he looked! But it was more anguish than I ever saw even in a white face before. I was sorry, couldn't help it, and drove ahead. That was morning. Late that afternoon we all came into camp from the prairie. Camp was near the village. Near sunset we saw quite a crowd of Indians gathered on a sort of mound on the river bank, and some of us strolled up to see. There, in the centre of them, on the highest part of the mound, was the old chief seated on his robe—not lying down—sitting as erect as a king on his throne, dressed out in his full war-dress. He was making a sort of set speech, all the rest listening with solemn, bowed faces. I knew enough of their language to make out what he was saying. Pointing to the river sweeping by, he seemed to make it an emblem of the passing away of his people from before the whites. Then he chanted a long account of all he had done in glorious days ago, keeping his eagle eyes fastened proudly on the setting sun. All around listened as if for their lives. With his left hand he pointed to the sinking sun, and, just as it disappeared below the prairie, with his right, which all this time held a long knife under the blanket, he plunged the sharp blade into his bosom, right through his heart, and fell forward dead, grim and kingly to the last. Not a man of us but had a tear in his eye, but a revolver, too, in his hand. We expected them all upon us certain, and I declare they would have been right."

"I never knew that Indians ever committed suicide."

"Oh yes. Not long before that we had captured an Indian with his squaw and children—five, six, I don't remember how many. He was a tiger of a fellow, and we put him and his family in a tent, sentinels all around. There was plenty of food and water left in reach for them, but they were all chained. It was near night when we put them in. There was not the least noise inside all night. Next morning when the sentinels went in with their breakfast they hadn't touched their supper, but there they all lay hugged up together dead. The father had killed them all with his knife, himself last.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I think it must have been the chaining that broke his heart."

"I can't think such Indians can be cannibals, as some people say they are."

"Why, yes, but not from love of such fare. The Tonkoways always cut off the right hand of an enemy slain in fight, and make their women roast and eat it, that they may have brave children. The same tribe, I believe it is, always cut open the bosom of a slain foe, tear out the heart, cut the tip end of it off, and eat that raw—why, I can't say."

And thus they beguiled their road over the rolling prairie. At noon there was a short halt to graze their horses and take a snack and a nap. At night they stopped on the bank of a crystal creek—the San Gabriel—rather a river than a creek; staked out their horses; boiled a cup or two of the invariable coffee; ate a very hearty supper broiled on the coals; then, with their heads on their saddles and their broad-brimmed hats over their faces, slept without stirring, sweetly, profoundly, till break of day. To breakfast, saddle up, and be away again took but a few minutes.

It was but little past noon on the day after leaving home that, entering a belt of timber, they halted to water their thirsty animals at the Lampasas—a broad, beautiful stream. The three animals thrust in their noses eagerly into the tempting water, and together drew them out again, snorting and coughing with indignation and disgust, the water streaming from their mouths. No wonder. Long before their riders had reached the water they had perceived the strong smell of sulphur on the air. The entire bed of the stream, too, shone coated with a silvery sediment of brimstone. A few shanties stood around for the use of visitors to the embryo Saratoga. Staking their horses to graze as well as their thirst would permit upon the rich grass under the magnificent live-oaks near by, the travelers proceeded to examine the springs. The first they came to gushed up out of the soil near the bank, more like milk, creamy, almost thick with sulphur. Gourd after gourd did the Texan drink, smacking his lips with relish after each, proving then and during the rest of his stay the assertions as to the enormous quantities which can be swallowed, the thirst for the water increasing with its use. Francisco drank, too, because his master did—sullen, silent, dejected in doing so, as he had been, and to an increasing degree, for months past. As to Venable, though thirsty, the very smell of the water was more than enough. Doubtless nature causes those to thirst for such waters who need and are benefited by them. Sauntering farther along, they come next upon a chalybeate spring, which all agreed in rejecting. Crossing the stream upon a narrow and tottering bridge, they hastened in search of the famous gravel spring. And there it was, sure enough; a pool of water ten feet across, in the centre of which rose a natural fountain boiling and foaming furiously with gravel and water. The day was hot, the spot secluded, and in a few moments both of the travelers had laid aside their dusty garb and were luxuriating in the stormy bath. Plunging into the centre of the crater, the boy was thrown out again by the turbulent surges of pebbles and water like a cork. It was like bathing in the surf. The struggling water, the grating gravel, the foam and fury of the water rushing up from unfathomable depths, made it by far the most exhilarating bath ever taken. It was almost dark before they could tear themselves away. Soon the coffee-pot was bubbling and the slices of venison and bacon hissing upon the coals under the live-oaks. Another visit to the horses to see that they were strongly staked, and, with their heads upon their saddles, they were soon asleep—sound enough.

CHAPTER XV.

ALONG THE SAN GABRIEL.

"I SAY, men, any o' you know a man name o' Roland?" The speaker was seated smoking his pipe upon a log near the main sulphur spring. Low in stature, red in hair and beard, full and sensual in lips and cheek, narrow and retreating in forehead, dirty beyond description in garb—out of all the motley crowd there you could have picked him out in three minutes as a desperado and a bully. Whoever his companions might be, there was no doubt of who and what he was.

"There's a ugly-mouth Rollin—lives on Goose Creek down Trinity," replied an old farmer, nursing the lame leg which had drawn him to the springs for its cure.

"Been long thar?" asked the first speaker.

"No—some twenty years or so."

"Not the man I'm after."

"There's a Jim Rolling cheats at peddling; drives around in a green wagon," ventured an old lady in green spectacles and fly-away cap. "He sold me some wonderful ointment for my eyes—made them smart like fire, almost ruined them. You see, gentlemen, my eyes has been ailing now nearly fifteen years. Cold, one doctor said; gnats, another doctor said. Rheumatics, I believe. You can't tell what trouble I've had with them. Somebody said these here springs—"

"Black hair, black eyes, solemn-like face, marm?" interrupted the man.

"No, sandy hair, whitish-like eyes; solemn enough, though, he was at a bargain. I bought a pattern of calico of him once, paid forty cents a yard, came to unroll it—"

"I know a man answers to your description," said another of the crowd, coughing in the last stages of consumption. "He's my brother—my name's Rawling—but he died of consumption ten years ago. In fact, I'm the only one of the family that escaped the disease."

"I tell you what it is, men," said the first speaker, rising to his feet, and putting his pipe in his pocket; "my legs ain't hurt, my eyes are

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

sound as a bell; you don't ketch me coughing. I didn't come here to drink this water for my health. I'm after a man. People come here from all parts of Texas, and I know that this is the very spot to hear about him. I'm from South Alabamy. Dyson's my name—Buck Dyson. People know me about home. Now, there's somebody in this crowd must know my man. I'll tell you what I'll do—as they do when they pass around a hat at meetin'. I'll go around to every man in this here crowd, and ask him separate; and I'll do the same thing to every stranger that comes while I stay here. If that don't bring what I want I'm mistaken. I can try it, any how."

There was one person in the fifty or sixty grouped about on the benches and logs and grass around the spring who heard with painful interest these words. It was Venable. For four days now his uncle, Francisco, and himself had been at the springs. They had fished, had shot deer, turkeys, and even a bear or two, in the wild region around, until they were tired. They had become restless for home—Uncle Frank himself, even, and for the first time in his life. He had all the time seemed despondent, uneasy, unlike himself. In fact, for months now—why, Venable could not guess—a sort of gloom had rested with increasing darkness upon the open and sunny face of his uncle. He had been the first to propose leaving for home, and this they had determined to do early next morning. It was now near sunset. While his uncle and Francisco had gone to look after the horses, Venable had strolled down to the spring for a last look. Clustered about it were people of all sorts of ailments, and it reminded him of the Pool of Bethesda. The boy knew, almost from the instant the stranger spoke, that it was his Mr. Roland for whom the inquiry was made. But a few months before he would have spoken out impulsively—but he had learned a lesson on the evil of impulse that night under the hide, with the billows of the prairie fire surging over him. He was older and manlier too. Besides, he had so strong an aversion to the bully, partially intoxicated as he was, and to the profanity of his language—which seemed more shocking to him than he had ever heard from human lips before—that, restraining himself, he resolved to have nothing whatever to do with the man. Besides, and above all, there was that in the manner of the man that urged him to conceal from him the home of Mr. Roland—he scarce knew why. But when the man announced his intention of putting the question in turn to every one on the spot he felt his heart throb, not with fear but anxiety. If he had hesitated before whether or not to tell, he now slowly and fully decided the matter. But could he deny any knowledge of Mr. Roland? A lie? no—never! Suddenly it occurred to him that his easiest plan was to withdraw quietly from the spot. Accordingly he arose slowly, and began strolling away, hoping to escape the notice of the man, who was still at the other end of the crowd. Now, had he been a large man and a determined-looking one, the desperado might have made it convenient not to observe his leaving; but being merely a slightly-built youth, the case was different. The man had, in fact, laid his command upon all there to sit still until questioned; to leave was contempt of his authority.

"Hallo! you there—stop!" rang in loud and insolent tones upon his ears.

What should he do? Run for it? For an instant he thought of doing so. But no; he felt his heart sicken even painfully in him, and knew that his cheek was ashy, but all the George Washington he had so often read and dreamed of rose to his lips. Slowly and quietly he turned to face his foe—for he felt him to be such in every nerve.

"Look here! I say, Sir, you stop in your tracks!" said the man, hastening toward him with a volley of oaths interspersed. "Didn't you hear what I said? What are you leaving for? This is meetin'; 'fore you go you've got your Catechism to say!"

By this time he had reached and stood face to face with Venable on the bank of the Lampasas.

"Look here, buddy," he continued, "do you know of a man named Roland down your way?" The man already saw that the boy did know such a man, and the very man he was after, in his pale, set face.

"I refuse to answer," he replied, with lips so dry he could hardly articulate.

"You re-fuse to answer!" shouted the bully, his brandy-reddened face growing redder than before, his very red whiskers and hair bristling with rage. "You re-fuse to answer! Game, you are, ain't you? Now, I'll just tell you what, my chicken—you've got to answer. See this," he continued, unbuttoning his vest and displaying a revolver in the belt next to his greasy flannel; "and do you see this?" he added, drawing a long, broad bowie-knife from his collar back of his head. "Now," he continued, "if you don't tell me all you know about the man I'm after in less than no time, I'll kill you—certain, sure. Buck Dyson is my name. You won't be the first I've killed."

Venable glanced at the breathless crowd. It is astonishing how apathetic even the bravest men are when spectators of such a scene. "It's dreadful; somebody ought to stop it; but it's none of my business," is the brief and satisfactory reasoning of each under such circumstances. With dryer lips than before, but as mechanical as steel, the boy replied as before, his cheek pale as death, his eye resting steadily in the inflamed orbits not ten inches from his—"I refuse to answer."

With a savage curse the desperado drew his knife back.

There was a shudder in the crowd. "Dear me, why don't somebody stop it?" was the thought of each. They were sure the knife was in the bosom of the brave boy. He thought so him-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google self, and shut his eyes for an instant with a swift, silent prayer; then opened them calmly in the glaring eyes of the man again.

"You came in an ace of it then," said the man, with hideous oaths. "I only didn't kill you because then I couldn't get out of you what I want. Now," he continued, with fearful meaning in his eyes and tones, "next time I will kill you as sure as you live. Once more, where's my man?"

Venable knew that his hour had come. But there was no flinching. He was a thousand times more determined than ever not to tell, even had it been the most harmless question in the world. He seemed to have turned to cold steel.

Again he replied—as his enemy drew back his knife with his right, while he grasped the boy, to make a sure stab, by the shoulder, and turned him a little to expose his bosom more to the sweep of his blow—in a low, slow tone—"I refuse to answer."

At that instant there was a rush of feet behind the desperado, the descending knife was wrested from his grasp, and its owner hurled, head-foremost, down the bluff into the Lampases. Venable could only see that it was his uncle, and sank weak as water upon the ground, the high-strung excitement suddenly ceasing.

At the first beginning of the strife between the two some had hurried off, and found and told the Texan all that was occurring. His most intimate friends would have hardly recognized him, so deadly pale, so dangerous he looked standing on the bank, his rifle in full aim on the floundering bully.

"Hold on!" he said, in a strange, savage voice as the man swam toward the shore. "If you swim another stroke I'll shoot you." And Venable was appalled at the awful oaths and curses which streamed from the lips of his uncle, from whom he had never before heard an oath in his life, did not dream he could swear. "You let your feet strike ground; tread water if you can't; but come an inch nearer shore, and I'll kill you."

To the astonishment of Venable the man obeyed, being a coward, as all bullies are. He would certainly have been shot if he had not, and he knew it. As it was, the water reached to his chin as he stood in the creek, to the inexpressible gratification of the crowd that lined the bank, the bead of the Texan's rifle drawn full on the centre of his forehead.

"To get his revolvers too wet to use. I see it. Ah, yes, very right," said a gentleman in a raccoon cap, shaking his head approvingly, and fixing himself more comfortably to see while he cut up some tobacco in the palm of his hand for his pipe held between his teeth. And now that each one felt relieved of all personal duty in the matter, it is astonishing how unanimous they were in their sentiments—derision for the bully, admiration for the boy. The backwoodsman contemplated Venable as he sat by his uncle through the smoke of his cob pipe with solemn approval, his skin cap well back on his head for a more unobstructed view, and he continued:

"Whenever he runs for Congress he's got my vote sure. Game, pluck, spunk, clear grit. Curious, too, the game ones always turn white, bullies red, when in a tight place. Singular." And he resumed his pipe in meditation upon this circumstance.

"I wonder, wonder whether I'd not better kill him at once and have done with it; it'll save a world of sorrow and trouble hereafter," said the Texan to himself, half aloud.

"Oh no, uncle—no, no!" exclaimed Venable. "Thou shalt not kill. Don't you remember the command? Don't, don't—please don't." And he laid his hand on the rifle, and pressed its muzzle down to the ground.

"You may come out, man," said the Texan, shouldering his rifle, to the desperado. The man obeyed, and passing dripping through the facetious crowd, disappeared without a word behind the shanties. Tearing themselves from the flattering attentions of those around, the Texan and his nephew proceeded to the live-oak under which they camped. It was now dark, and Francisco was waiting supper for them. Wearied out with excitement, Venable was asleep on his blanket in a few moments after. It seemed to him about midnight when he felt a hand upon his bosom, and he sprang to his feet with a leap and a cry.

It was only his uncle, and Francisco stood by in the darkness with the three horses all saddled.

"All right, Venable; mount as quietly as you can. Heap more wood on the fire, Francisco. So now vamos! Quietly, quietly," said the Texan.

Venable rode after his uncle mechanically, and as in a dream, a mile or more through the darkness. Becoming at last wide-awake, he asked, in a low voice,

"Afraid he would shoot us as we slept, uncle?"

"Pshaw, no. Dyson's spirit's broken as far as we are concerned. He don't even care to hurt us. I am afraid he would follow us to find Roland if we waited till day. Don't ask any questions now, and don't say any thing at all about this at home. I gave you as much nap as I could before we started. Ride faster."

The night was very dark; it seemed to Venable as if day would never dawn. At last broad day found them beside a bayou, prairie all around.

"We've come far off to the north of our road home," said the Texan. "We'll rest a while, and breakfast. Stake out your horses—needn't unsaddle. That's it. Catch a grasshopper, Francisco. Venable, you make a fire down the bank there; no leaves; not a puff of smoke if you can possibly help it. Indians are only too plentiful about here." While he was speaking the Texan had tied the end of a line to his ramrod, baited the hook with the grasshopper, lowered it to the water, and almost immediate-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ly drew up a large cat-fish, then another, and another.

"One apiece," he said; "that'll do. Clean them as fast as you can, Francisco. Here's a paper of salt."

In a very short time each sat over the fire cooking his own fish by a ramrod thrust through it lengthways.

"No bread; but never mind," said the Texan, as he finished the last morsel. "Now unstake and off."

A ride of a few hundred yards brought them to a rise in the prairie. There, in the valley beyond, nearer to him than he had ever seen them before, was a herd of antelopes. To the pleading of Venable that he might try to get a shot at them his uncle gave a decided refusal.

"But, uncle, we have nothing to eat," his nephew argued. "I couldn't eat any supper hardly last night, and that cat this morning, I couldn't eat it at all. I'm so hungry."

"Well, that's a fact, Venable," replied the Texan. "They are not so shy out here. Crawl up on them through that clump of timber yonder. Tie this red handkerchief around your head, hat on top of that, and keep as flat upon the ground as you can. Don't be flurried; shoot slow and sure."

Without a word the boy slipped off his horse, and leaving him with them, darted down to one side and disappeared in the hollow. Half an hour elapsed, and Francisco and his master, peeping over the top of the grass, could see that the antelopes were still grazing quietly. Another half hour, and they had all raised their heads, and were gazing at a red something several hundred yards from them in the grass. They would run toward it, then run back, and seemed much excited.

This continued for nearly an hour, the timid creatures drawing nearer and nearer to the object all the time, but very slowly.

"That boy's getting to be a cool hand," said his uncle to himself; "he couldn't do it better if he had been hunting antelope all his life. If he ain't genuine Virginian stock I'm a Greaser! Now's your chance, Venable!" he exclaimed aloud as the drove rushed nearer than before; and at the instant he spoke a puff of white smoke rose from the red spot, and soon after the faint crack of the rifle came on the wind to their ears. They saw Venable running toward the drove, while it fled from him and disappeared like the wind. Riding on toward him they saw him standing with his face to them upon something —probably a dead antelope—waving his red handkerchief and shouting at the top of his voice.

In the same instant, however, the crest of the prairie behind the young hunter seemed suddenly alive with men and horses, dashing down upon the boy.

The very soul of the Texan sickened within him. Indians! Indians! There was but one thing to do. Running his hand over the buts of the revolvers around his waist, glancing to see that the cap was on his rifle, he rode down to meet the foe.

"Unloaded and with his back to them," groaned the uncle. "On foot too. God help us! we are in for it, sure!"

Long before he could get in rifle range the Indians had swarmed upon the boy like angry bees. He could merely catch sight of Venable clubbing his rifle and raising it to strike, when he seemed trampled down and swallowed up in the mêlée.

"Cool, cool, Dolores," he said in Spanish to the Mexican. "You take red blanket; I'll take white;" and as he spoke, at the simultaneous crack of their rifles, two Indians fell headlong from their horses rushing upon them.

"Draw your knife and hold it in your teeth, Dolores. Cool, cool. Revolvers is the word now. Drop your rifle!"

By this time the Indians were almost upon them, staggered for a moment by the fall of the slain. They were appalling foes to fight with. Almost black, naked to the waist, the long hair hanging down their neck behind, full of coins of gold and silver, their cheeks barred with various colors, armed with bows and arrows, riding as if they grew upon their shaggy ponies—a herd of ferocious wolves would have been far less dreadful to meet. The instant before closing with them a thought flashed upon the Texan. Lifting his hat from his head and half-turning in his saddle he waved it with a shout toward the ridge from which he had just descended. "Hurrah, boys!" he cried, as if exultingly. "Here they are! here they are!" Then, dashing his hat with reckless confidence in the faces of the enemy, and dodging the arrows that whizzed upon him like hail, he discharged his revolver right and left, but with deliberate aim, hitting at every shot. Even in the heat of the fight he could see that his strategem had its effect.

The Indians were flying with Rangers on their trail, as they well knew, at that instant. The cry of the Texan, and his riding upon them instead of attempting to fly, and in the direction from which they were expecting the Rangers, together with his dashing confidence, impressed them with the belief that their dreaded foes were at hand. And they were right. As if in response to the cry of the Texan there rang a wild hurrah from behind him, and helter-skelter, down the slope, rode the Rangers, their Captain at their head; no line of battle at all; each racing as hard as spurs would drive, to come upon the foe; teeth set; faces glowing; rifles ready. But it was a fatal instant when the Texan looked around to see. The hindmost of the flying Indians had drawn his arrow to its head upon his bow at the bosom of the Texan. But, although his eyes were averted, other eyes saw the aim, and the Mexican, rushing between, received the arrow in his own side, and fell from his horse as the Indian disappeared over the hill after his comrades.

For a moment the Rangers—bearded, sun-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google burnt, wool-hatted, most of them in their shirt-sleeves, their coats strapped behind them—drew rein round the Texan supporting the Mexican boy in his arms upon the ground. In a few rapid words they learned every thing—examining with contemptuous curiosity the bodies of the Indians lying on the ground.

"Not much hurt, I hope," said a Ranger in a red shirt, drawing near with sympathy in his face and voice. "Oh pshaw! tut!" he continued, with a sudden change in voice and manner—indifference, not to say disgust, taking the place of sympathy. "Why, it's only a Mexican! and I thought it was somebody! I say, old fellow," he continued, to the Texan, sharpening his knife upon his hard palm as he spoke, and in wheedling tones, "come, now, let me scalp these red-skins—come, do. They killed my father last month—some of them;" and, without waiting for a reply, the Ranger whipped off the scalps and had them tied to his saddle by the buckskin strings in a few moments.

"Come, you hush up!" he said to one whose low groan gave evidence of life; and, pausing as he mounted his horse, he shot him through the head with his revolver, exactly as he would have done had it been a rattlesnake instead. "Clever of you!" he said, nodding to the Texan as he rode off. "I'll do the same for you some day. Can't be with you always. Take care of yourself. Good-by!"

"Iron-Jacket, was it?" said the Captain, as he parted with the Texan. "All right. I thought so. Our mustangs are badly used up, but we'll fix them before night. Come on as soon as you can. Hurrah, boys!" And in a minute after the Texan was alone upon the field of battle, the dead Indians lying grim in death beside him. But he seemed to have forgotten even his nephew in his anxiety for the Mexican. A look of the deepest anguish sat upon his brow as he supported the drooping head upon his bosom.

"Water! water!" groaned the Mexican in Spanish. The Texan glanced around: it was his only way; and bearing the wounded Mexican in his arms, as if it were a child instead, he hastened up the slope toward the bayou beyond, where they had breakfasted. Often would he have to stop and rest, changing the position of his bleeding burden. It was much farther than he had supposed, but it was his only chance; and the afternoon was far advanced when he laid his servant gently upon the grass on the edge of the bayou beneath a mesquit. Hastening to the water, he filled his hat and returned, and having satisfied the burning thirst of the Mexican, he proceeded to bathe the pale face with water, smoothing out the long raven hair across his knees from the head supported in his lap. Their broken conversation was now altogether in Spanish, and no longer the language of master and servant. Married to her during a trip into Mexico, upon a sudden whim, long before had the Texan repented it; his affection had never been love; he had never even professed that it was. But her affection for him was all that is usual in her warm-hearted race. It had been for a short, a very short, time that he had even endeavored to reciprocate the love she lavished upon him. She was Mexican, too far his inferior, and he had required her now for years to be rather Francisco than Dolores to him. He could not love her; she was but a grief, a burden, a perpetual repentance to him. But she had given her life for him; and with the softest and sweetest of the endearing words of the melting Spanish he now endeavored to assuage her dying hours. And she seemed perfectly happy. Her dark eyes fastened with eager fondness upon his face, murmuring softly, in reply to his soothing words: "I crept to her bed one night to stab her," she murmured to him, "but she looked so like the Virgin Mary as she slept I couldn't!" And as the shades of evening fell around the Texan sat with the dying girl in his arms. And he knew not when she died. One moment the moon shone on her face, and she was alive and gazing fondly up into his eyes. A cloud swept over the moon; when the light rested again upon her face it was cold in death—all light gone from the glassy eyes, still fixed upon him. For hours the Texan sat in the darkness, almost motionless, all his life passing in review before him in the solemn stillness, the awful burden resting upon his lap, as the sweeping clouds hid or revealed the ghastly face. His own early training, the influence of his brother and of Mr. Roland, his own experience, observation, and conscience—and, above all, the Spirit of God, had long been carrying on a revolution in his bosom, and this night accomplished it. Who could detail the whole process? With the earliest gray of morning he wrapped the body—it was all he could do—in his blanket, weighted heavily with rocks. He had stooped to kiss the pale brow, but he drew back; he had cut a long tress of the raven hair, but he took it again from his bosom and placed it back beside the face of the dead. Then, bearing his burden to the brink of a dark, secluded pool in the bayou, so deep that he could not see its bottom, he let the shrouded form glide from his embrace, down and down, into the quiet depths. Then kneeling there beside the brink, as at the feet of a Father indeed, he made solemn confession of a lifetime wild and reckless of sinning; made humble acknowledgment of present weakness and folly, made fervent supplication for help in the new life before him, and rose from his knees another man—humble, but determined. Then a rapid walk to the battle-field, where he found his horse staked as he had got a Ranger to do it for him, the wolves flying from around the dead bodies, and the buzzards rising reluctantly. With his eyes fastened on the trail of the Rangers, and putting spurs to his horse, he rode rapidly on—the foul banqueters returning greedily to their prey before he was over the hill—hunger, watching, fatigue, Dolores, all forgotten for the time—Venable, Venable the one ruling thought!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MY FATHERS-IN-LAW.

I HAD been married just two hours by the clock, and my wife, Sophia Slipperton (formerly White) was arraying herself in her traveling-dress up stairs for the bridal tour. The carriage was at the door, with the trunks strapped on behind, and I, the hero of the occasion, rather flurried and very hungry, was trying to get a bite of the delectable luncheon that my wife's friends had provided, when my elder brother Tom saw me behind the door, and came to disturb my last free moments. Tom, however, had a right to a few parting words; it was to him that I owed my present prosperity, and I thanked him then and there for his handsome conduct in having stood my friend with Sophia from first to last.

"You will never regret it, my dear Tom," said I, almost hugging him, and forgetting in my excitement that my speech was not altogether to the point.

"No, nor you, my dear Charley. Sophia is a splendid girl, and I, having been her legal adviser so long, can tell you every thing is right and tight, and no incumbrances!"

"No, of course not, what could there be?" said I, innocently.

"Look there," said Tom, and he led me to an angle of the dining-room from whence I saw a sight which, though a mortification to him, made me laugh in spite of myself.

On a comfortable sofa sat a fat old lady with a large napkin spread on her lap; her cap-ribbons were carefully pinned over her forehead to be out of the way of stains, and on chairs near her, a variety of plates were poised which evidently bore the relics of a mighty feast not yet concluded. The old lady was now making her attack on the preserves and ices, and the determination with which she pursued her employment was wonderful to behold.

"Just look at my mother-in-law!" said Tom, in a state of rage and disgust. "Did you ever see such a glutton in your life? I am glad the people are nearly all gone; but I see some of them laughing at her there in the corner. I declare, Charley, when I think what you've got, such a nice girl as Sophia, and so well off, without a relation in the world living nearer than Cincinnati, and above all, no mother-in-law, I am almost jealous of your good luck!"

"Your Maria is prettier than Sophy," said I, with an easy magnanimity; "and besides, Tom, mothers-in-law don't live forever; perhaps that mess she has been eating may be the death of her yet. I know you've had a pretty hard time of it altogether, but she doesn't mean any harm."

"She's killing me," said Tom, with a dismal groan. "I found two white hairs in my mustache last night. Oh, I could tell you tales, Charley! but you won't heed them; you are not to be one of the tormented. My dear fellow, I think you are the happiest man in the world at this moment!"

I almost thought the same myself as I saw Sophia come down the stairs ready for the journey, and looking bright and smiling. I forgot how plain she was, what big feet she had, and how much lovelier a certain young lady I once knew would have looked in the very elegant traveling-suit in which my present charmer was arrayed.

I kissed my own family, bid a kind farewell to the friend of Sophia from whose house she had been "wooed and wedded and a'," and closed the carriage-door with a snap that seemed to shut out the old life as totally as it initiated the new. Our wedding-tour did not extend very far; Sophia was not a strong woman, and we concluded as the weather was cold to return to town, after a short jaunt to the South. We came back accordingly in November, and took immediate possession of a beautiful little house that my wife had purchased, and which we had the pleasure of furnishing to suit our own taste.

My wife was quite independent of her family, as she had a comfortable private fortune left her by some departed relative; and her winters had been passed for years in the city where Tom had lately become her lawyer, and I, still more lately, her husband.

I think, upon looking back on a somewhat checkered existence, that the first year of my married life was the happiest I have ever experienced; I have since known, indeed, more intense excitement and more brilliant society than my home furnished, but I have nowhere met a more admirable woman than Sophia Slipperton. She was not handsome, she was not very young, nor would she compare with my early love, whom I occasionally thought of when Sophia came down to breakfast in an unbecoming wrapper; but she had an amiable temper; never did she seem out of humor when I brought a friend home to dinner, or even if I staid out to dinner myself without notice; never did she scold the servants in my presence, or object to my smoking under the best parlor curtains! She was quiet, gentle, and affectionate, and I was, as I deserved to be, the envy of all my young married friends. There is such a thing, however, as being too amiable, and to this weakness Sophia finally and fatally yielded.

A little more than a year had passed away when Sophia received a letter from her sister in Cincinnati, informing her that she and her family were going to move to California, and consequently that old Mr. White, her father and Sophia's, was left without a home.

"Why does he not go with them?" said I to Sophia, who seldom spoke of her relatives, from whom she had been much separated, and about whom, therefore, I knew but little.

"My father is too infirm," said Sophia, mildly, "to travel that distance; he is very blind besides, and rather deaf. No, he must be taken care of by some of his own kindred. I think," she added, "that he had better come on with them and stay a while with us before they sail,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and we will arrange some plan for his accommodation near us."

"Has he no relatives in the West?" said I, "who could safely be intrusted with the care of him?"

"None whatever," said Sophia, and added with an asperity as new as it was decisive, "while I have a house of my own I shall not allow my father to be in the care of strangers."

Thus was my domestic peace invaded by an enemy who was blind, deaf, and infirm, but conqueror in the first encounter. In vain did I seek consolation from my brother Tom; his own grievance bore such immense proportions in his eyes that all other was dwarfed by comparison.

"Thank your stars he's not a woman, Charley!" said he, "just look at my mother-in-law, she's enough to turn a man crazy! I wish she was a man; I could manage her then well enough!"

"Well, she couldn't be a man any way, and it wouldn't be any better if she were. A man like old Mr. White is just as bad as a woman to take care of."

"You don't take care of him, do you?" said my astute brother.

"Not a bit of it," said I; "but Sophy does, and that is nearly as bad."

"Do you have to take him to church on lecture and prayer-meeting nights; and does he want to know how much every thing costs that comes into the house?"

"No he doesn't," said I; "but he's an old bore all the same."

"Well," said Tom, "if I were you I wouldn't have him there. It is not like a woman; you can't turn them out of doors very well!"

"The house happens to be Sophy's," said I: "if you remember, Tom, you drew up the deed of purchase yourself."

Tom sighed and said no more, and I returned to my troubled household. For it was troubled; Sophia was always a delicate woman, and her attentions to her father, which were unremitting, and unfailingly demanded, made fearful inroads upon her health. In the middle of the night Mr. White's cane would sound over our heads, and Sophia, no matter what the state of the thermometer, would have to fly to his assistance. Any other help than hers was rejected with scorn, and my dislike of the old gentleman and his selfishness became so extreme that I soon refrained from offering him any attention whatever. Then his weaknesses of temper made constant soothing necessary; he was always angry at somebody or something, and Sophia was the only person who could exercise any control over him. What she went through to keep even ostensible peace between him and me I can not bear to think of, but she did it, and so we went on, wretched and dissatisfied, for two more miserable years. I became as cross as a bear, and was as little at home as possible; Mr. White lived on, and improved greatly in health, though not in temper or agility. Sophia, poor Sophia, between cares and annoyances, wore away before my eyes, and became the victim of her own filial affection.

Mr. White would not listen to my appeals to him on Sophy's behalf, holding the old-fashioned notion that children were the "born thralls" of their parents, and must ever be held to their duty. He held her with a grip of authority that never loosened.

He called her up one cold night to rub his rheumatic foot, which kept him often awake. In vain I implored her to resist his demands. She dragged herself up to his room, and sank in the effort to make him a little more comfortable. A violent hemorrhage of the lungs seized her suddenly, and in a few hours the unlucky victim of a father's tyranny was out of his power forever.

Sophia was one of those excellent women whose sense of duty is absolutely morbid. Mine, however, was not. I could hardly refrain, while Sophia was lying dead in the house, from reproaching the old gentleman and turning him out of the home he had made so wretched. But I waited, and it was well for me I did; for by Sophia's will, which was opened just after her death, it happened to be his prerogative to perform that office to me, which he did with the greatest good-will and celerity. The whole of Sophia's property was left to him for his life, for fear, as she stated in a private letter, that my affection for him was not sufficient to render his dependence on me agreeable to either party. So Mr. White took possession of our pleasant little home, and I was turned out to a bachelor life again, with the illusions of youth shattered, at the age of thirty-one.

Anger has a wonderful effect in mitigating grief. I should have been quite inconsolable for Sophia's loss had she left her property in an equitable manner; but to see my father-in-law step into our familiar places, and make himself comfortable on what should have been mine, destroyed much of the sorrow that I would naturally feel for such a woman.

Not content with this, Mr. White married his housekeeper a short time after, and as his health improved greatly under the new régime, I frequently met him walking in the street with his wife, and going in and out of his house. He had evidently made up his mind to live as long as Methuselah, and the enjoyment of my reversionary interest was put off to the far future.

Tom did not console me much under my wrongs; indeed, he insisted that I was fortunate in having the property left to me at all.

"Really, Charley," he said, "I think, on the whole, Sophia has behaved very well, and her father can't live forever, and then you will have it all. If Mr. White had been your mother-in-law (Tom would always insist upon stating it so), she would have managed to have you cut out of it! You know you never were very fond of him, Charley, and Sophia knew that perfectly; if you had played your cards better things might have turned out differently."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Not much consolation here." However, I said no more, but plunged deeper and deeper into business, which fortunately was more successful in its results than my ventures in the matrimonial line. After some months I began to lift up my head and look round the world again with something the same interest as of old. I made up my mind, however, not to marry again in years, if ever, and above all to avoid a woman whose relatives were old or troublesome.

Alas for one's wisest intentions! A few weeks at a gay watering-place overcame my good resolutions, and led me by flowery chains into new and mortifying experiences!

Florry Needham was as pretty a girl as I ever beheld in my life when I met her in all her glory at Saratoga Springs. She was not, however, a stately or commanding beauty; rosy, petite, and with the most winning, coquettish little arts in the world, she walked into my affections with a celerity wonderful even to myself. Night after night would I stay up to contest the honor of her hand in the German, and when I had carried my point against numerous competitors, would feel as satisfied as if I had achieved some wonderful distinction. It was in vain that Tom, hearing of my enslavement, wrote me letters imploring me to find out all about the young lady before I entangled myself. Two months at Saratoga did my business effectually, and I returned to town shackled with new fetters which I neither desired nor had courage to break.

When an oldish man marries a very young girl it is quite useless to expect her to settle down to his standard immediately, and Florry did not attempt to conform to mine. Fond of society and attention she was never happy except in the midst of an admiring crowd, and the first year of our married life was spent in a perfect whirl of gayety.

In the mean time Florry's relatives, though many in number, gave me no annoyance; we lived at a fashionable hotel, and I was not sorry that she clung to her own connections, who were good sort of people, and could afford her protection when I was not present to do so. Yet her conduct was fearfully imprudent, and many a tear flowed from those pretty brown eyes at the lectures on propriety which I was compelled to administer. Still we loved each other, and, on the whole, got along pretty well till my old torment made its appearance in a new form. Florry's father and mother had been living abroad for years — she had been the charge of a married sister, and felt no more interest in her parents than I did who had never seen them. Now, however, Mrs. Needham died suddenly in Paris, and back to this country, in "red-hot haste," came my new father-in-law to give me a further insight into the possibilities of that trying relationship.

Mr. Needham did not look much older than his daughter; indeed, he seemed altogether younger than myself, on whom hard work and much anxiety had left their mark. Withal he was as much like her in temperament as two peas out of the same pod. Handsome, empty-headed, and passionately fond of excitement, they ran a race together which set all remark and reproach at defiance. Now it was indifferent whether I was ready to attend my wife or not; an escort was always on duty, and I found at last that I was but a supernumerary on the stage, wanted only for the dull purposes of paying bills and ordering the servants, while these two stars of fashion soared to more congenial spheres than home had ever furnished.

Yet somehow I never got the better of my situation; Mr. Needham was one of those men who never took a hint, and never got angry. He was not, indeed, actually in my path at any time; but he took my wife away from me, and from her duties, which she was always too ready to desert. When I tried to remonstrate she would ask, in the prettiest coaxing way in the world, what an old fellow like me would want a pretty young girl to shut herself up for? Was that why I married her, to make her a nun? etc., and her pretty red lips would pucker up for a cry; and I would give in for a time, though sorely against my better judgment in every case. At last I concluded to try house-keeping, hoping that if I caged my bird she might sing me some sweeter strains than I had yet heard. I therefore hired a furnished house up town, moved my wife and babies, and prepared for a different order of things.

I remember well one night in December that I returned to my home after a few days' absence from town on business. It was a rainy, cold, and blowy evening, and the thought of a hot supper, and genial warmth of the fire before bed, was eminently delightful to my benumbed and wearied frame. As I came toward my house I was struck by the brilliancy of the lighted windows; a little nearer and the squeak of a violin reached my tired ears, with the familiar voices of hackmen, screaming to each other as they set down their loads. The house was small, and the crush was great; not a place remained for me on the steps to poise my traveling-bag, while I crept over on the balcony to take a look through the open windows. There I saw a sight that caused both rage and scorn —my father-in-law standing at the head of a quadrille with a young lady of sweet sixteen; my wife flirting in a corner with a youth whose appearance was as strange to me as my appearance would have been to him.

As I was "chewing the cud of bitter meditation," and wondering how I should get my tired and muddy self up stairs unseen, a hired waiter came out, and ordered me off the balcony.

"Be off with you, my good man," he said, in a patronizing tone; "don't be a staring at the people inside; it's not polite; here's ten cents for you, and go away quietly." I put down my bag, and was just about collaring the man, when I heard Tom's familiar voice as he was coming

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google up the steps; so I dropped my hold of the waiter's arm, and seizing Tom by the coat-tails, compelled his attention. Many explanations followed. Tom informed me that this was Florry's house-warming, to which every one of her acquaintances far and near had been invited, and in consequence not even half of them could get in the house.

"Maria said she couldn't leave the children," said Tom; "but I thought I'd step round and see how things looked. Florry said she hoped you'd be back in time to open the ball yourself; but if not, her father would be on hand to assist her."

"I believe that old fool has put it all into her head," said I, in wrath; "she never said a word about it before I went away. And what has she done with the children, pray?"

"Oh, they are safe at her sister's. Don't fret, Charley; it isn't your affair at any rate, and it will all turn out nicely, I have no doubt; particularly if your father-in-law pays the bills."

"That he will never do," said I, in the last depth of despair; "and as for that, Tom, I would rather have had a dozen mother-in-laws, such as yours, than one Needham in my family."

Here Tom opened his mouth to pour out his own peculiar griefs, never very far from his lips, but a sudden dash of rain from the conductor deluged us both, and we concluded to beat a retreat from the scene of festivity.

This reception at my home was certainly not such as my imagination had portrayed; but all my adventures were not over for the evening. I declined Tom's invitation to return with him, and, after some hesitation, concluded to ask permission of my next-door neighbor to pass up through his house and over his extension-roof upon mine, on which my bedroom window conveniently opened. I found, however, that the room was in use as a dressing-room for ladies, and the halls were so crowded that to escape detection I had to hide in the bath-room till the guests should have departed.

I was so tired that, after a few moments, I had no power left to sustain myself even in a sitting position; so, placing my bag under my head, I fell into a slumber that would probably have lasted all night but for a sudden interruption. My father-in-law, it seems, was waiting to escort a young lady to her carriage, and had taken his station at the head of the stairs while she put on her wraps. In the fatigue consequent upon the various capers he had cut that evening he naturally leaned against the bath-room door; naturally the door hit my recumbent legs, which were stretched out just within the threshold; naturally my injured limbs resented the insult, and with one awful bang sent my father-in-law from the top of the stairs to the bottom.

Fortunately the party was just breaking up; nearly all the people had gone, and the disturbance this accident created did not last very long. Florry, who came up to discover the true cause of the disaster, found me on the bath-room floor vainly endeavoring to stifle the laughter I could not suppress; and when she saw that I was neither afflicted nor apologetic for the mischief I had done she was offended beyond forgiveness; indeed I think she never really felt the same to me afterward.

After all it was nothing very serious. Mr. Needham was only a little bruised, and in a few days was quite himself again; but not so with his pride, which was hurt irrecoverably. My father-in-law and I from that time became entirely antagonistic, and, as Florry backed up her father, our domestic hearth was not warmed solely by the fires of affection. I took, however, much pleasure in my two little daughters, and with them and the kind sympathy of Tom I managed to live out a few more uncomfortable years.

Just about this time there was a grand Inauguration Ball in Washington, to which my unlucky wife and her absurd father were bent on going together. By this time Florry and I did not interfere much with each other; we had given it up long before; but I exerted my authority to try and prevent this ridiculous journey, but it was of no use whatever. Florry and her father went on to Washington, and staid some weeks after the ball, indulging in all sorts of dissipation. In coming home they met with one of those detentions so common on our railroads. Florry, always imprudent, had not provided for an emergency of cold or hunger. The result on her worn-out frame was such as might easily have been foreseen. She took a violent cold, had a fever on her when brought home, and, after a few weeks of suffering and struggle, left her two little children motherless, and me, for the second time, a widower.

Florry was hardly twenty-five when she died, and, having a good constitution, would, with moderate care, have lived to see a comfortable old age; but the incessant wear and tear her health underwent in such a mad career of gayety undermined her naturally fine physique, and left her without strength for a trying moment. American women are not constructed with the iron nerves and fibres that the Europeans seem endowed with, and any life but a moderate one destroys them in appearance and health at an early age.

So it was that I talked with Tom when he came to condole with me on my new loss. I did not, however, feel any the more amiable toward my father-in-law.

"This is the second time, Tom," said I, "that my domestic peace has suffered from the same social torment. If Maria should die," I continued, solemnly, "take warning by my fate, and turn your back upon any woman who is not an orphan; and, above all, never permit a father-in-law on any pretense whatever."

"Charley," said he, nodding his head impressively, "I have had my own troubles, as you know. No man can have had a harder time than I have had with my wife's mother;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

but the poor soul is very old now, so I will say no more at present."

It is hardly necessary to say that, after what had happened, the idea of feeling even a passing interest in another woman was abhorrent to me. I shunned society completely, put my two little daughters to school, and for several years devoted myself to my business with all the energy of my nature. At the end of that time Sophia's father, Mr. White, finally thought proper to depart this life; and as I then came into quite a nice little estate I found myself disposed to travel and see the world. Accordingly I made the usual tour of travelers through Europe, coming home by way of New Orleans, so as to get a look at the Southern country after the war.

Here it was that, in the most unexpected manner, I met again my first love, the idol of my imagination and heart in those early days when neither prudence nor the world's opinion had much influence on me. She had refused me then, for we were both poor, and her relatives as well as mine had prevented even the bliss of a short engagement. But now things were different. She was a widow, and in her loneliness was as interesting as she had been in her younger and brighter days.

Just at this time I met with an accident which confined me almost entirely to the house, and, in consequence, to the hotel parlor. Many an hour did my old flame and I spend in talking over our strange and eventful past. She showed a great interest in my young daughters, now fast growing up, and gave me so much good advice as to their future welfare, that I came to the conclusion that she was, of all persons, the one to whom the care of their education could best be committed. Accordingly, after having carefully convinced myself that she had no near relations living, I said the decisive words, and in a few short weeks appeared among my friends at home in the not unfamiliar character of a happy bridegroom. My wife was an admirable manager. As far as the proper use of time and money was concerned, I never had cause to regret that I had installed her at the head of my household; but her first husband, the departed Sprinkler, must have been a man of decidedly weak character if he needed the advice and assistance that were so lavishly bestowed upon me. However, it might have gone on very nicely if it had not been for Sprinkler's father, or rather, he being dead, Mrs. Slipperton's father-in-law, a connection whom she seemed to cherish with the devotion of a real daughter. I confess I felt this very trying, as this time I had certainly bargained for no wife's relations; but Matilda was a woman who would not permit interference.

Last spring she told me, with a sweet smile, that she was going to pass the summer in Paris with her father-in-law, and she hoped I would be able to leave my business and come out for her, even if I could not make it convenient to take the whole journey with them. It was in vain that I coaxed and argued, and at last commanded. Matilda had not gone through all sorts of experiences with men and things for nothing. The dream of her life was to spend a summer in Paris; her father-in-law had invited her to go, and had offered to pay her expenses. I was a person who in this state of things must either give way or be pushed aside, and give way I did, of course, though not with the best grace in the world.

"It is all the work of that detestable father-in-law!" said I to Tom, as I sat by his parlor fire the evening the steamer sailed. "Just think of Matilda sacrificing every thing to go to Paris with old Sprinkler, and leaving me at home alone! It is too much to bear!"

"Well," said Tom, who is still sympathetic, though his mother-in-law is dead, and his own troubles are all over, "it is very natural that Matilda should want to go to Paris, particularly as all her expenses will be paid; but you should have gone along, I think, as she wanted you to."

"Why, I have seen Paris thoroughly; and besides, I will have nothing to do with my wife's relations. I did not know that I was to be saddled with Sprinkler's family, or I should have looked before I leaped."

Then it was that Maria, Tom's wife, who happened to be present, spoke her mind in a few words which, coming from a sensible woman, did not fail of their effect.

"Charley," said she, in a tone that aroused my attention, "allow me to say that I think you, and most men, take a most unwarranted view of women, and their rights and duties. A woman who has no relations, or who cares nothing for them, is either an exceptional person or a very disagreeable one; she would not love her husband or children, if she did not begin by loving her father and mother, when they are kind and lovable. Don't you see she must be heartless or wicked to have no natural affection? What man could want such a wife as that?"

"Maria," said I, dextrously changing the point of the argument, "do you mean to say that you approve of the manner in which I have been treated by my several fathers-in-law?"

"No; neither do I approve of the manner in which you have treated them. Mr. White was trying, I admit; but he was old, and your impatience with him exasperated his temper and made him all the harder to deal with. Sophia did not want to keep you out of her property so long; but she said she could not trust her father to you, and right enough she was!"

"Well," said I, rather severely, "since you are so critical, may I ask what my error was in regard to Mr. Needham?"

"Well, Charley," said Maria, smiling archly, "I know you are angry, but for once I will speak my mind; it may do you good, after all; and my mind is, that when a man of your years goes and marries a little butterfly like Florry Needham he simply makes a fool of himself,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and must take all the rest just as it comes. No one in his senses could expect a girl like that to make a domestic woman; and her father made no real difference, one way or the other."

"Now you have only one more criticism to make," said I, trying to laugh as I stood up and buttoned my coat, preparatory to departure; "what have you to blame me for in my present dilemma?"

"This is a case that does not admit of criticism," said Maria, "only a little friendly advice; and my advice is," she added, "to make it up with Matilda as soon as possible, and go out after her in the autumn. She is a woman who won't bear to be trifled with; and if you expect domestic happiness in the future you must renounce any attempt to interfere with her plans."

And I took Maria's counsel to heart, and went out after my wife in the autumn, and things have ever since gone pretty smoothly. It is rather trying, to be sure, when Mr. Needham (who comes to see his grand-daughters) meets Mr. Sprinkler (who often visits Matilda) and insists upon discussing his political opinions, which are in violent opposition to those of the last-named gentleman, thus making our quiet parlor the scene of turmoil and contention. But as I grow in age my philosophy becomes greater, and I have vowed to keep my domestic happiness in spite of fate and fathers-in-law.

THE ROMANCE OF SLEEP.

SLEEP, generally speaking, is the most prosy of all the phenomena of human existence. Regarding it as an animal blessing, that most sensual of natural philosophers, Sancho Panza, has announced the praise of sleep in terms so hearty that no one ever wearies of reading them. It is one of the finest touches in the peerless romance of Cervantes to contrast the Knight's voluntary vigils with the gross slumber of his Squire, and put into the latter's mouth this panegyric:

"While I am asleep I feel neither hope nor despair. I am free from pain, and insensible of glory. How blessings light on him that first invented this same sleep! It covers a man all over—thoughts and all, like a cloak; it is meat for the hungry, drink for the thirsty, heat for the cold, cold for the hot. It is the current coin that purchases all the pleasures of the world cheap; and the balance that sets the king and the shepherd, the fool and the wise man, equal. There is only one thing, which somebody put into my head, that I dislike in sleep—it is that it resembles death; there is very little difference between a man in his first sleep and a man in his last sleep."

Sleep has been defined as a temporary physical death, though not an organic one. But it should rather be regarded as the regenerative phenomenon of life. It is needed to recuperate the expended vigor of the day, and it might be easily shown that there is no creeping, flying, swimming living thing but needs and enjoys its influence. Therefore has Young styled the sleep of the human race as

"Man's rich restorative; his balmy bath,
That supples, lubricates, and keeps in play
The various movements of this nice machine,
Which asks such frequent periods of repair,
When tired with vain rotations of the day,
Sleep winds us up for the succeeding dawn."

Cabanis asserts that the senses fall asleep in a regular series of periods. And Dr. Macnish, agreeing, says that the brain does not all at once glide into repose: its different organs being successively thrown into this state; one dropping asleep, then another, then a third, till the whole are locked up in the fetters of slumber. This gradual process of intellectual obliteration is a sort of confused dream—a mild delirium which always precedes sound sleep. The ideas have no resting-place, but float about in the confused tabernacle of the mind giving rise to images of the most perplexed description. In this state they continue for some time until, as the sleep becomes more profound, the brain is left to thorough repose and they disappear altogether.

The design and title of this paper, however, preclude the necessity of discussing the philosophy of sleep. We direct our attention, rather, to a recital of curious facts concerning this phenomenon, and illustrative of some of its varied conditions. And we turn, first of all, to a remarkable instance of SLEEP BY DAY.

In the "Memoirs of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin," published in 1777, the extraordinary case of the Lady of Nismes is recorded. Her attacks of sleep took place periodically, at sunrise and about noon. The first continued within a short time of the accession of the second, and the second until between seven and eight o'clock in the evening when she awoke, and so continued until the next sunrise. A singular fact concerning this case was, that the first attack always commenced at daybreak, whatever might be the season of the year, and the other always immediately after twelve o'clock noon. During the brief interval of wakefulness she took a little broth, which she had only time to do when the second attack came upon her and kept her asleep until the evening. Her sleep was remarkably profound, and had all the characteristics of complete insensibility, with the exception of a feeble respiration, and a weak but regular movement of the pulse. The most singular fact of her case remains to be mentioned. When the disorder had lasted six months the subsequent interval was of equal duration. When it lasted one year, and then again ceased, she had an interval of perfect health for the same length of time. The affection at last wore gradually away; and she lived, entirely free of it, for many years after, dying at the age of 81 years.

PROTRACTED SLEEP.

The unnatural faculty of remaining asleep for a great length of time is possessed by some individuals to a remarkable degree. Such was the case with Quin, the celebrated actor, who

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

could slumber for twenty-four hours without awaking. And in Bowyer's "Life of Beattie" a curious anecdote is related of Dr. Reid, viz., that he could take as much food and immediately afterward as much sleep as were sufficient for forty-eight hours.

The case of Mary Lyall, related in vol. viii. of the "Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh," is one of the most remarkable instances of protracted somnolency on record. This woman fell asleep on the morning of the 27th of June, and continued in that state until the evening of the 30th of the same month, when she awoke and remained in her usual way until the 1st of July, when she again fell asleep and so continued until the 8th of August. She was bled, blistered, immersed in hot and cold baths, and stimulated in almost every possible way without having any consciousness of what was transpiring. For the first seven days she continued motionless, and exhibited no inclination to eat. At the end of this time she began to move her left hand; and, by pointing to her mouth, signified a wish for food. She took readily what was given to her; still she discovered no symptoms of hearing, and made no other kind of bodily movement than with her left hand. Her right hand and arm, particularly, appeared completely dead and bereft of feeling; and even when pricked with a pin, so as to draw blood, never shrank in the least degree. At the same time she instantly drew back her left arm whenever it was touched with the point of a pin. She continued to take food whenever it was offered to her. For the first two weeks her pulse generally stood at 50, during the third and fourth week about 60; and on the day before her recovery at 70 or 72. Her breathing was soft and almost imperceptible, but during the night time she occasionally drew it more strongly, like a person who has first fallen asleep. She evinced no symptom of hearing till about four days previous to her recovery. On being interrogated after this event upon her extraordinary state she mentioned that she had no knowledge of any thing that had happened, that she had never been conscious of either having needed or received food, or of having been blistered, and expressed much surprise on finding her head shaved. She had merely the idea of having passed a long night in sleep.

A very remarkable case (well authenticated) of nearly continuous sleep for five years was mentioned in the New York papers and the medical journals a few years since. The name of the subject was Cornelius Vroman. He was born in Schoharie County, New York, and had lived since he was 17 years of age in Clarkson, Monroe County, not far from Rochester. He was a hard-working man, temperate and trusty; and at the time when his strange sleep came on was working on the farm of Mr. Moses Jennings. On the 19th of June, 1848, feeling unwell, he called in Dr. John S. Cole, who found him complaining of some pain in the stomach and in the head, for which he prescribed. After this, without becoming any sicker, his sleep each night grew longer, until at last it was found impossible to wake him. Out of that sleep he he did not come to remain wakeful for more than sixteen hours at a time; and the aggregate of all his waking hours during the five years was not over three days. His waking intervals recurred about every six weeks. When awake he seemed to be totally unconscious of his peculiarity, and said many things which indicated that he remembered matters as they were before his change. It is said that he was then accustomed to straighten himself up, and to walk as limberly as others. His diet consisted principally of milk, with a little bread, which was poured in through the teeth, the jaws being forced open as in tetanus. Once he went without food for five days; but his friends objected to any further conduct of the experiment, although there was no change in his symptoms during that time. When the seizure occurred his weight was 160 pounds; at the expiration of nearly five years it was about 90 pounds. His personal appearance is said to have been far from prepossessing. His beard and the hair of his head stood erect.

Once he was left standing for three days, during which time there was no change in his condition; and once he was thrown into the water without producing change. An eye-witness gives the following account of a visit to this remarkable prodigy:

"We found him in what seemed like a sound sleep. He was lying in bed, his eyes nearly closed, his respiration rather slower than is usual, his breathing a little stertorous, pulse some 75 strokes in a minute, soft and weak. On our attempting to open his eyes he firmly closed them, and when, by force, the lids were opened, the eyes were rolling upward, making it impossible for us to see the pupils. The mouth was slightly opened; on attempting to open it wider the jaws were immediately locked. There was a constant tremor of the eyelids, and from his mouth there was some driveling. His body was extremely emaciated; his arms were folded upon his breast; and any attempt to remove them was strongly resisted. The muscles seemed rigid and tense when the effort was made, and indeed it was impossible, without violence, to change at all the position of his limbs. Once during our stay he drew a long breath, like a man who is about to turn in his sleep. At another time he hitched himself up a little in bed. He was lifted up bodily and seated on the side of the bed; his head was still bent forward on his chest, his legs crooked under him at the same angle, and his arms folded as when he was lying down. There was nothing to indicate that he would not retain the same position for several weeks. We lifted one foot, and the other came up with it. There was but little bending at the knee or at the hip; the feet were raised only as the upper part of the body was carried backward. He was placed standing upon the floor. It required a few moments to balance him exactly; after that he stood in the same position so long as we remained; there was nothing to indicate that he would not maintain the same posture for a month."

It was stated at the time that there was not the least chance for collusion or deception in the matter, many of the best class of physicians having examined him and declared that deception was impossible.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SLEEPLESSNESS.

A phenomenon of opposite character is also sometimes observed, there being individuals who can subsist upon a surprisingly small amount of sleep. The celebrated General Eliot afforded an instance of this kind; he never slept more than four hours out of the twenty-four. In all other respects he was also strictly abstinent; his food consisting wholly of bread, water, and vegetables. In a letter communicated to Sir John Sinclair by John Gordon, Esq., of Lurney, Caithness, mention is made of a person named James Mackay, of Skerray, who died in Strathnaver, in the year 1797, aged 91; he only slept, on an average, four hours in the twenty-four, and was a remarkably robust and healthy man. Frederick the Great, of Prussia, and the illustrious surgeon John Hunter, only slept five hours in the same period. The celebrated French General Pichegru informed Sir Gilbert Blane that during a whole year's campaign he had not above one hour's sleep in the twenty-four. Dr. Macnish mentions the case of a lady who never slept more than half an hour at a time, and the whole period of whose sleep did not exceed three or four hours in the twenty-four, and yet was in the enjoyment of excellent health. Gooch gives an instance of a man who slept only for fifteen minutes out of twenty-four hours, and even this was only a kind of dozing, and not a perfect sleep; notwithstanding which he enjoyed good health and reached his seventy-third year in age. This statement must, however, be regarded as doubtful, for it is scarcely conceivable that the human system could subsist upon such a limited portion of repose. Instances have been related of persons who never slept, but these must be regarded as purely fabulous.

SOMNAMBULISM.

is but dreaming in action. While only some of the cerebral organs are awake and others are dormant the bodily functions are affected. "If we dream that we are walking, and the vision possesses such a degree of vividness and exciting energy as to arouse the muscles of locomotion, we naturally get up and walk. In the higher kinds of somnambulism so many of the organs of the brain are in activity, and there is such perfect wakefulness of the external senses and locomotive powers that the person may almost be said to be awake. Somnambulists generally walk with their eyes open; but these organs are, nevertheless, frequently asleep, and do not exercise their functions." This fact was well known to Shakspeare, as is apparent in the fearful instance of Lady Macbeth:

> "Doctor. You see her eyes are open.
> Gentlewoman. Ay, but their sense is shut."

Some instances of the different phases of somnambulism will at least be interesting. A very curious circumstance is related by Dr. Benjamin Franklin, in the memoirs published by his grandson. "I went out," said the Doctor, "to bathe in Martin's salt-water hot-baths, in Southampton, when, floating on my back, I fell asleep, and slept nearly an hour, by my watch, without sinking or turning—a thing I never did before, and should hardly have thought possible."

A case still more extraordinary occurred several years ago in one of the towns of the coast of Ireland. About two o'clock in the morning the watchmen of the Revenue quay were much surprised at descrying a man disporting himself in the water, about a hundred yards from the shore. Intimation having been given to the Revenue-boat's crew, they pushed off and succeeded in picking him up; but, strange to say, he had no idea whatever of his perilous situation; and it was with the utmost difficulty they could persuade him that he was not still in bed. But the most singular part of this novel adventure, and which was afterward ascertained, was, that the man had left his house at 12 o'clock that night and walked through a difficult and, to him, a dangerous road a distance of nearly two miles, and had actually swam one mile and a half, when he was fortunately discovered and picked up.

A fact is related by Dr. Macnish of an English clergyman who used to get up in the night, light his candle, write sermons, correct them with interlineations, and retire to bed again, being all the time asleep. The Archbishop of Bordeaux mentions a similar case of a student who got up to compose a sermon while asleep, wrote it correctly, read it over from one end to the other, or at least appeared to read it, made corrections on it, scratched out lines and substituted others, put in its place a word which had been omitted, composed music, wrote it accurately down, and performed other things equally surprising. It is also narrated of Castelli that he was found one night in the act of translating from Italian into French, and looked for words in a dictionary, while asleep. His candle being extinguished he found himself in the dark, groped for a candle, and went to light it again at the kitchen fire. Dr. Gall takes notice of a miller who was in the habit of getting up every night and attending to his usual avocation at the mill, then returning to bed; on awaking in the morning he recollected nothing of what had passed during the night.

The following anecdote has been preserved in a family of rank in Scotland, the descendants of a distinguished lawyer of the last age. This eminent person had been consulted respecting a case of great importance and much difficulty, and he had been studying it with intense anxiety and attention. After several days had been occupied in this manner, he was observed by his wife to rise from his bed in the night and go to a writing-desk which stood in the room. He then sat down and wrote a long paper, which he put carefully by in the desk, and returned to bed. The following morning he told his wife that he had had a most interesting dream; that he had dreamed of delivering a clear and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google luminous opinion respecting a case which had exceedingly perplexed him, and that he would give any thing to recover the train of thought which had passed before him in his dream. She then directed him to his writing-desk, where he found the opinion clearly and fully written out, and which was afterward found to be perfectly correct.

SLEEP-TALKING

is sometimes connected with sleep-walking; and it is frequently the case that the former is manifested alone, probably when the organ of language is active in combination with other parts of the brain. Dr. Binns illustrates this by reference to the history of a young man of culture, of robust constitution, and aged eighteen years, who went to Syra from a town on the Black Sea, to follow his studies at the Gymnasium. It frequently happened that almost immediately after falling asleep he arose and made remarkable declamations. Sometimes he recited very long speeches from Xenophon with perfect accuracy, although when awake he could not remember but a few lines. One night he wrote the theme he had to deliver the next day. In the morning, having overslept himself, he was vexed at not having time to prepare himself for his tutor, and great, therefore, was his astonishment at finding on his table his stipulated composition, written with his own hand, folded, and ready to be delivered.

The Archbishop of Bordeaux relates the case of a subject who asked for a glass of brandy to warm him. As there was none at hand, they gave him water; but he detected the imposition, and again demanded brandy. He then drank a glass of strong liquor, and seemed refreshed; but, without awaking, lay down, and continued to sleep soundly.

One of the most remarkable cases of sleep-talking on record is given in Fraser's Magazine. It was that of a young American lady who preached during her sleep, performing regularly every part of the Presbyterian service, from the Psalm to the benediction:

"This lady was the daughter of respectable, even wealthy parents. She fell into bad health, and under its influence disturbed and annoyed her family by her nocturnal eloquence. Her unhappy parents, though at first surprised, and perhaps flattered, by the exhibition in their family of so extraordinary a gift, were at last convinced that it was the result of disease; and in the expectation that their daughter might derive benefit from a change of scene, as well as from medical skill, they made a tour with her of some length, and visited New York and some of the other great cities of the Union. We know individuals who have heard her preach during the night in steamboats; and it was customary at the tea-parties in New York to put the lady to bed in a room adjoining the tea-room, in order that the dilettanti might witness so extraordinary a phenomenon. We have been told by ear-witnesses that her sermons, although they had the appearance of connected discourses, consisted chiefly of texts of Scripture strung together."

In Darwin's "Zoönomia" we read of a very singular case of somnambulism and sleep-talking combined. A very ingenious and elegant young lady, about seventeen years of age, in other respects well, was suddenly seized with this very wonderful malady. The disease began with violent convulsions of almost every muscle of the body, with great but vain efforts to vomit, and the most violent hiccoughs that can be imagined; these were succeeded in about one hour with a fixed spasm, in which one hand was applied to her head, and the other to support it. In about half an hour these ceased, and the sleep began suddenly, and was at first manifest by the look of her eyes and countenance, which seemed to express attention. Then she conversed aloud with imaginary persons, with her eyes open, and could not for about an hour be brought to attend to the stimulus of external objects by any kind of violence which it was possible to use. These symptoms returned in this order every day for five or six weeks. The conversations were quite consistent, and her hearers could understand what she supposed her imaginary companions to answer by the continuation of her part of the discourse. Sometimes she was angry, at other times showed much wit and vivacity, but was most frequently inclined to melancholy. She sometimes sang over some music with accuracy, and repeated whole passages from the English poets. In repeating some lines from Pope's works she had forgotten one word, and began again, endeavoring to recollect it; when she came to the word it was shouted aloud in her ears, and this repeatedly, to no purpose; but by many trials she at length regained it herself. Those paroxysms were terminated with the appearance of inexpressible surprise, from which she was some minutes in recovering herself, calling on her sister with great agitation, and very frequently undergoing a repetition of convulsions, apparently from the pain of fear. After having thus returned for about an hour each day for two or three weeks, the reveries seemed to become less complete, and some of the circumstances varied, so that she could walk about the room in her sleep without falling against any of the furniture, though these motions were at first very unsteady and tottering. And afterward she drank a dish of tea, when the whole apparatus of the tea-table was set before her, and expressed some suspicion that a medicine was put into it; and once seemed to smell at a tuberose which was in flower in her chamber, and deliberated aloud about breaking it from the stem, saying it would make her sister so charmingly angry. At another time, in her melancholy moments, she heard the bell ring, and then taking off one of her shoes as she sat upon the bed, she said, "I love the color black; a little wider, and a little longer, and even this might make me a coffin!" Yet it was evident that she was not sensible at that time, any more than formerly, of seeing or hearing any person about her. When great light was thrown upon her by opening the shutters of the window, she appeared to be less melancholy. When her hands were forcibly held, or when her eyes were

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google covered, she appeared to grow impatient, and would say that she could not tell what to do, for she could neither see nor move. In all these conditions her pulse continued unaffected as in health. And when the paroxysm was over, she could never recollect a single idea of what had passed.

DREAMS.

"How strange is sleep! When his dark spell lies
On the drowsy lids of human eyes,
The years of a life will float along
In the compass of a page's song;
And the mountain's peak and the ocean's dye
Will scarce give food to his passing eye."

Of the natural history and philosophy of dreams many different theories have been held, which, placed side by side, would form a good study for the curious. "In dreams," says a German philosopher, "a species of genial vegetation arrests the wearing strife between mind and body, and by associating them more closely together, restores and regenerates our existence."

Tertullian thought that dreams came from God as one species of prophecy, though many dreams may be attributed to the agency of demons. St. Augustine relates a dream by which Germadius, a Carthaginian physician, was convinced of the immortality of the soul by the apparition to him in his sleep of a young man, who reasoned with him on the subject, and argued that as he could see when his bodily eyes were closed in sleep, so he would find that, when his bodily senses were extinct in death, he would see and hear and feel with the senses of the spirit.

Baxter also, in his treatise on the "Immortality of the Soul," endeavors to show that dreams are produced by the agency of some spiritual beings, who either amuse or employ themselves seriously in engaging mankind in all those imaginary transactions with which they are employed in dreaming. The theory of Democritus and Lucretius is equally whimsical. They accounted for dreams by supposing that spectres and simulacra of corporeal things, emitted from them and floating up and down in the air, come and assault the soul in sleep. The most prevailing doctrine is that of the Cartesians, who supposed that the mind was continually active in sleep; in other words, that during this state we were always dreaming. Hazlitt, in his "Round Table," has taken the same view of the subject, and alleges that if a person is awakened at any given time, and asked what he has been dreaming about, he will at once be recalled to a train of associations with which his mind had been busied previously.

All philosophers seem to agree at least in one point—that dreams occur only during an imperfect sleep. Some philosophers, however, go so far as to maintain that there is a close analogy between dreaming and insanity. Dr. Abercrombie, in his work on "The Intellectual Powers," defines the difference between the two states to be, that in the latter the erroneous impression, being permanent, affects the conduct; whereas in dreaming no influence on the conduct is produced, because the vision is dissipated on awaking. And Dr. Rush has remarked that a dream may be considered as a transient paroxysm of delirium, and delirium as a permanent dream.

The complex character of dreams illustrates how fearfully and wonderfully constructed is the human mind. Dr. Macnish, who has written learnedly on the "Philosophy of Sleep," maintains that "during the actual process of any particular dream we are never conscious that we are really dreaming." The writer of this article places over against this position his own experience, which we can not suppose to be isolated. When dreaming he has frequently thought, "I must try and remember this." But all such instances, it must be allowed, have most frequently occurred almost immediately before awaking, which shows that the reasoning powers at such times had almost thrown off the shackles of the "drowsy god."

Dr. Fosgate says that "when the mind has been particularly excited upon a particular subject preceding sleep, it seems as though the same subject, modified and oftentimes richly embellished, in harmony with the mental constitution of the individual, is prolonged during sleep." A beautiful illustration is to be found in the recital of his toils and privations in the deserts of Africa by the English missionary Mr. Moffat. "We continue," he said, "our slow and silent march. The tongue, cleaving to the roof of the mouth from thirst, made conversation most difficult. At last we reached the long wished-for waterfall; but it was too late to ascend the hill. We laid our heads on our saddles. The last sound we heard was the distant roar of the lion; but we were too much exhausted to feel any thing like fear. Sleep came to our relief, and it seemed made up of scenes the most lovely. I felt as if engaged in roving among ambrosial bowers, hearing sounds of music as if from angels' harps. I seemed to pass from stream to stream, in which I bathed, and slaked my thirst at many a crystal fount flowing from mountains enriched with living green. These pleasures continued till morning, when we awoke, speechless with thirst, our eyes inflamed, and our whole frames burning like a coal."

DREAMS OF AUTHORS.

Persons of bad digestion, especially hypochondriacs, are harassed with visions of the most frightful nature. This fact was well known to the celebrated Mrs. Radcliffe, who, for the purpose of filling her sleep with those phantoms of horror which she has so forcibly embodied in the "Mysteries of Udolpho" and "Romance of the Forest," is said to have supped upon the most indigestible substances; while Dryden and Fuseli, with the opposite view of having splendid dreams, are reported to have eaten raw flesh.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

It was in a dream that Coleridge composed his splendid fragment of "Kubla Khan," of which he himself gives the following account:

"In the summer of the year 1797 the author, then in ill health, had retired to a lonely farm-house between Porlock and Linton, on the Exmoor confines of Somerset and Devonshire. In consequence of a slight indisposition an anodyne had been prescribed, from the effects of which he fell asleep in his chair at the moment he was reading the following sentence, or words of the same substance, in 'Purchas's Pilgrimage:' 'Here the Khan Kubla commanded a palace to be built, and a stately garden thereunto. And thus ten miles of fertile ground were inclosed with a wall.' The author continued for about three hours in a profound sleep, at least of the external senses, during which time he had the most vivid confidence that he could not have composed less than from two to three hundred lines; if that, indeed, can be called composition in which all the images rose up before him as things, with a parallel production of the correspondent expressions, without any sensation or consciousness of effort. On awaking he appeared to himself to have a distinct recollection of the whole; and taking his pen, ink, and paper, instantly wrote down the lines that are here preserved."

Thus it is often the case that the compositions, the reasonings, and the poems which we concoct in sleep are occasionally superior to those produced in waking hours, arising probably from an obliviousness to every thing else, and therefore a more intense concentration of thought upon the one subject. Such was the case with Cabanis, who often, during dreams, saw clearly into the bearings of political events which had baffled him when awake; and with Condorcet, who, when engaged in some deep and complicated calculations, was frequently obliged to leave them in an unfinished state, and retire to rest, when the results to which they led were at once unfolded in dreams. They are, however, generally incongruous and absurd; and however connected and complete they may appear in the dream hour, on awaking they are seen to be ridiculous and absurd. "In dreams," says Dr. Parr, when alluding to this point, "we seem to reason, to argue, to compose; and in all these circumstances during sleep we are highly gratified, and think that we excel. If, however, we remember our dreams, ur reasonings we find to be weak, our arguments we find to be inconclusive, and our compositions trifling and absurd."

INCONGRUITY OF DREAMS.

Of the inconsistency and want of congruity in dreams, generally speaking, Hood, in his "Whims and Oddities," gives a curious illustration:

"It occurred when I was on the eve of marriage, a season when, if lovers sleep sparingly, they dream profusely. A very brief slumber sufficed to carry me, in the night coach, to Bognor. It had been concerted between Honoria and myself that we should pass the honey-moon at some such place upon the coast. The purpose of my solitary journey was to procure an appropriate dwelling, and which, we had agreed upon, should be a pleasant little house with an indispensable look-out on the sea. I chose one accordingly—a pretty villa with bow-windows, and a prospect delightfully marine. The ocean murmur sounded incessantly from the beach. A decent elderly body, in decayed sables, undertook on her part to promote the comfort of the occupants by every suitable attention, and, as she assured me, at a very reasonable rate. So far the nocturnal faculty had served me truly; a day-dream could not have proceeded more orderly; but, alas! just here, when the dwelling was selected, the sea-view was secured, the rent agreed upon—when every thing was plausible, consistent, and rational, the incoherent fancy crept in, and confounded all by marrying me to the old woman of the house."

DREAM-SPECTRES.

Charles Dickens, in one of his ephemeral publications, illustrates the fact that the brain makes ghosts both sleeping and waking. Two of these are worth recording, as they will help to explain a multitude of others of a similar character. A man was lying in troubled sleep, when a phantom with the cold hand of a corpse seized his right arm. Awaking in horror, he found upon his arm the impression of the cold hand of the corpse, and it was only after reflecting that he found the terrible apparition to be due to the deadening of his own left hand on a frosty night, which had subsequently grasped his right arm. This was a real ghost of the brain, which the awakening of the senses and the understanding explained.

M. Gratiolet narrates a dream of his own, which is singularly illustrative of how the brain makes ghosts in sleep. Many years ago, when occupied in studying the organization of the brain, he prepared a great number both of human and animal brains. He carefully stripped off the membranes, and placed the brains in alcohol. Such were his daily occupations, when one night he thought that he had taken out his own brains from his own skull. He stripped it of its membranes; he put it into alcohol; and then he fancied he took his brain out of the alcohol and replaced it in the skull. But, contracted by the action of the spirit, it was much reduced in size, and did not at all fill up the skull. He felt it shuffling about in his head. This feeling threw him into such a great perplexity that he awoke with a start, as if from nightmare. M. Gratiolet, every time that he prepared the brain of a man, must have felt that his own resembled it. This impression awakening in a brain imperfectly asleep, while neither the senses nor the judgment were active, the physiologist carried on an operation in his sleep which probably had often occurred to his fancy when at his work, and which had then been summarily dismissed. A pursuit that had at last become one of routine, and the association of himself with his study, explain the bizarre and ghastly dream of M. Gratiolet.

DREAMS OF INTOXICATION.

Such dreams, whether occasioned by the use of alcohol, opium, hasheesh, or any stimulant or narcotic, while they may vary somewhat in their character, according to the drug taken, are still of the same nature. De Quincey, in his "Confessions," has given a great variety of eloquent and appalling descriptions of the effects produced by opium upon the imagination during sleep. Here is one of them:

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Southern Asia is, and has been for thousands of years, the part of the earth most swarming with human life, the great officina gentium. Man is a weed in those regions. The vast empires, also, into which the enormous population of Asia has always been cast, give a further sublimity to the feelings associated with all Oriental names and images. In China, over and above what it has in common with the rest of Southern Asia, I am terrified by the modes of life, by the manners, and the barrier of utter abhorrence and want of sympathy placed between us by feelings deeper than I can analyze. I could sooner live with lunatics or brute animals. All this, and much more than I can say, or have time to say, the reader must enter into before he can comprehend the unimaginable horror which these dreams of Oriental imagery and mythological tortures impressed upon me. Under the connecting feeling of tropical heat and vertical sunlights, I brought together all creatures, birds, beasts, reptiles, all trees and plants, usages and appearances, that are found in all tropical regions, and assembled them together in China or Indostan. From kindred feelings, I soon brought Egypt and all her gods under the same law. I was stared at, hooted at, grinned at, chattered at, by monkeys, by parokeets, by cockatoos. I ran into pagodas, and was fixed for centuries at the summit or in the secret rooms; I was the idol; I was the priest; I was worshiped; I was sacrificed. I fled from the wrath of Brama through all the forests of Asia; Vishnu hated me; Seeva laid in wait for me. I came suddenly upon Isis and Osiris; I had done a deed, they said, which the ibis and the crocodile trembled at. I was buried for a thousand years, with mummies and sphinxes, in narrow chambers, at the heart of eternal pyramids. I was kissed, with cancerous kisses, by crocodiles, and laid confounded with all unutterable slimy things, among reeds and Nilotic mud."

Again the same author says:

"Hitherto the human face had mixed often in my dreams, but not so despotically, nor with any special power of tormenting. But now that which I have called the tyranny of the human face began to appear; the sea appeared paved with innumerable faces; faces imploring, wrathful, despairing, surged upward by thousands, by myriads, by generations, by centuries; my imagination was infinite, my mind tossed and surged with the ocean."

In the ninth volume of the "Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society of London" a curious case is given by Archdeacon Squire, of a person who, after having been dumb for years, recovered his speech by means of a dream during a similar condition of sleep, but produced by another cause. One day, in the year 1741, he got very much in liquor, so much so, that on his return home at night to Devizes, he fell from his horse three or four times, and was at last taken up by a neighbor, and put to bed in a house on the road. He soon fell asleep; when, dreaming that he was falling into a furnace of burning wort, it put him into so great an agony of fright, that, struggling with all his might to call out for help, he actually did call aloud, and recovered the use of his tongue that moment, as effectually as he ever had it in his life, without the least hoarseness or alteration in the old sound of his voice.

DREAMS OF THE GUILTY.

Imagination, perhaps, never works so powerfully as in those dreams which haunt the guilty mind. It is then that "horrors on horror's head accumulate." While the criminal may sleep, Conscience, that silent monitor, may be wakeful and active. The guilty man can not away with his remembrance. The blood he shed is still liquid before him, each drop appearing as a terrible accuser. Imagination frequently re-enacts the deed of guilt. In the silence of the night, withdrawn from the busy pursuits of day life, his crimes hover round about him like the furies that followed the footsteps of Orestes. They are his last waking thoughts, to be reproduced in all their naked deformity in his dreams:

"Though thy slumber may be deep,
Yet thy spirit shall not sleep;
There are shades which will not vanish,
There are thoughts thou canst not banish;
By a power to thee unknown,
Thou canst never be alone;
Thou art wrapt as with a shroud
Thou art gathered in a cloud;
And forever shalt thou dwell
In the spirit of this spell."

No fiction of romance presents so awful a picture of the ideal tyrant-criminal so disturbed as that of Caligula, by Suetonius. His palace, radiant with purple and gold, but murder every where, lurking beneath flowers; his smiles and echoing laughter masking (yet hardly meant to mask) his foul treachery of heart; his hideous and tumultuous dreams; his baffled sleep and his sleepless nights compose the picture of an Æschylus. What a master's sketch lies in those few lines!

"But, above all, he was tormented with nervous irritation, with sleeplessness; for he enjoyed not more than three hours of nocturnal repose; nor even these, in pure, untroubled rest; but agitated with phantasmata of portentous augury; as, for example, on one occasion he fancied that he saw the sea, under some definite impersonation, conversing with himself. Hence it was, from this incapacity of sleeping, and from weariness of lying awake, that he had fallen into habits of ranging all the night long through the palace, sometimes throwing himself on a couch, and sometimes wandering among the vast corridors, watching from the earliest dawn and anxiously invoking its approach."

PROPHETIC DREAMS.

The occasional premonitions or prophecies communicated in dreams, "in visions of the night; when deep sleep falleth upon man," are a mystery which philosophy has so far failed to explain.

Even sacred history affords some illustrations. The most notable, perhaps, is contained in the history of our Saviour during his last trial. "When he [Pilate] was set down on the judgment seat, his wife sent unto him, saying: Have thou nothing to do with that just man; for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him."

The night before the assassination of Julius Cæsar his wife Calphurnia dreamed that her husband fell bleeding across her knees.

The following case, quoted from the "Memoirs of Lady Fanshawe," shows a remarkable coincidence between the dream and the succeeding calamity:

"My mother being sick to death of a fever three months after I was born, her friends and servants

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

thought to all outward appearance that she was dead, and so lay almost two days and a night; but Dr. Winslow, coming to comfort my father, went into my mother's room, and looking earnestly in her face, said: 'She was so handsome, and now looks so lovely, I can not think that she is dead;' and suddenly took a lancet out of his pocket, and with it cut the sole of her foot, which bled. Upon this he immediately caused her to be laid upon the bed again, and to be rubbed, and such means used; when she came to life, and, opening her eyes, saw two of her kinswomen stand by her, my Lady Knollys and my Lady Russell, both with great wide sleeves, as the fashion then was, and said: 'Did you not promise me fifteen years, and are you come again?' which they, not understanding, persuaded her to keep her spirits quiet in that great weakness wherein she was. But some hours after she desired that my father and Dr. Howlsworth might be left alone with her, to whom she said: 'I will acquaint you that during my trance I was in great quiet, but in a place I could neither distinguish nor describe: but the sense of leaving my girl, who is dearer to me than all my children, remained a trouble upon my spirits. Suddenly I saw two by me clothed in long white garments, and methought I fell down upon my face upon the dust; and they asked why I was so troubled in so great happiness? I replied: "Oh let me have the same great grant given to Hezekiah, that I may live fifteen years, to see my daughter a woman:" to which they answered: "It is done;" and then at that instant I awoke out of my trance.' And Dr. Howlsworth did there affirm that that day she died made just fifteen years from that time."

Lord Stanley relates a singular instance of a premonition communicated in a dream:

"A Lord of the Admiralty, who was on a visit to Mount Edgecombe, and who was much distressed by dreaming, dreamed that, walking on the sea-shore, he picked up a book, which appeared to be the log-book of a ship of war of which his brother was the captain. He opened it, and read an entry of the latitude, longitude, as well as of the day and hour, to which was added: 'Our captain died.' The company endeavored to comfort him by laying a wager that the dream would be falsified by the event; and a memorandum was made in writing of what he had stated, which was afterward confirmed in every particular."

An instance of a similar character is given by Dr. Binns:

"A young man, named John Gray, residing at Cinderford, told his mother, before he went to the Crump Meadow coal-pits, at which he worked, that he dreamed the preceding night (January 14, 1844) that while at work a large stone fell upon and killed him. The mother made light of the dream. Not so the dreamer, who went reluctantly to work, and not until he had returned twice to bid her good-by. The dream was fulfilled. An immense block of stone fell upon and crushed him to death."

The following singular dream of this class is contained in the appendix to a book by the same medical author, and is now quoted as presenting rather a different phase. The statement is said to have been communicated to the author by the Hon. Mr. Talbot, father of the late Countess of Shrewsbury, and is given in his own words and over his own signature:

"In the year 1768 my father, Matthew Talbot, of Castle Talbot, County Wexford, was much surprised at the recurrence of a dream three several times during the same night, which caused him to repeat the whole circumstance to his lady the next morning. He dreamed that he had risen as usual, and descended to his library, the morning being hazy. He then seated himself at his secretaire to write, when happening to look out upon a long avenue of trees, opposite the window, he perceived a man in a blue jacket, mounted on a white horse, coming toward the house. My father arose and opened the window; the man, advancing, presented him with a roll of papers, and told him they were the invoices of a vessel that had been wrecked, and had drifted in during the night on his son-in-law's (Lord Mount Morris) estate, hard by, and signed 'Bell and Stephenson.' My father's attention was called to the dream only from its frequent recurrence; but when he found himself seated at his desk on the misty morning, and beheld the identical person whom he had seen in his dream, in the blue coat, riding on a gray horse, he felt surprised, and, opening the window, awaited the man's approach. He immediately rode up, and drawing from his pocket a packet of papers, gave them to my father, stating that they were invoices belonging to an American vessel which had been wrecked and drifted upon his lordship's estate; that there was no person on board to lay claim to the wreck, but that the invoices were signed 'Stephenson and Bell.' I assure you, my dear Sir, that the above actually occurred, and is most faithfully given."

The last citation is really wonderful, and is attested by many living witnesses; by which it may be seen that a farmer prevented a terrible railroad disaster, near Mansfield, Ohio, at the time of the great freshet in October, 1866. The farmer (a Pennsylvanian) went to bed during the heavy and protracted storm, and dreaming that the filling across a chasm, some hundred feet deep, had given way under a passenger train, and let it down into the abyss, he sprang up to render assistance to the passengers, ran to the door, and was hastening from the house, when his wife awakened him. He related his dream, and again retired, but slept little more during that night. The dream made such a deep impression on his mind that he hastened to the chasm early on the next morning to ascertain its condition. The road was apparently all right, although the water was pouring through the large culvert, as though it would wash the earth away. On the following night the farmer could not rest for thinking of his dream of the preceding night, and again arising, procured his lamp, and proceeded to the chasm. When he arrived there he found, to his terror, that the filling had been washed out, leaving nothing but the unsupported ties and track over the chasm! Hearing the train thundering toward destruction, the farmer clambered across the dreadful break, and running down the road some distance, signaled the approaching train to stop. And so short was the time that when the engineer was able to "hold up" the engine was but a few feet from the chasm. But for this remarkable dream the train would have plunged down the frightful precipice, car upon car, crushing all to death in its ruins.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MRS. PULLET'S PERVERSION.

I.

"I DO wish Mr. Pullet would be reasonable about it," observed Mrs. Pullet.

"But can't you bring him over by—by persuasion—mild persuasion?" inquired the other party to the dialogue, Mrs. Lamson.

Mrs. Pullet did not like to admit that she had not tried the moral leading-string spoken of; and so, with a woman's native faculty for dodging, she slipped around the point of the question.

"Mercy! I never expect to bring him over! The most I hope for is to get liberty to come myself."

"But the children?" said Mrs. Lamson, putting her head on one side and elevating her faintly-defined eyebrows in token of sorrowful anxiety. "Are the poor little darlings to be left to go with their—with Mr. Pullet?"

"I'm afraid so," returned Mrs. Pullet, perking her head also in an almost involuntary imitation of her admired companion. "I've talked to him again and again about it; but it's of no use. He says they shall be brought up to go to the church where he was brought up to go, and where I was brought up to go, and where our parents went before us. Now it's true that pa and ma were professors in the Bethelite church; but that isn't my fault, and I ought not to suffer for it. How could I help it? I didn't bring them up."

"Certainly not," answered Mrs. Lamson, sighing over Mrs. Pullet's helplessness in the matter of educating her parents.

"Certainly not," echoed Mrs. Pullet, repeating with curious exactness that feeble and stammering drawl which to her seemed so aristocratic and fascinating. Her own natural style of utterance was a vigorous and rapid twitter, not unlike that of a canary. The difference between the two women was pretty much this: Mrs. Pullet had nothing to say, and said it energetically as though it was something; Mrs. Lamson had also nothing to say, and did not say it, at least not often. This latter person might truly be called a woman out of ten thousand; for that is about as often as you find one of her sex who is slow of thought and of speech. There was a feeble connection or an imperfect insulation in the apparatus of her intellectual batteries, so that with her the transmission of ideas and even of words was a performance which demanded considerable time and effort. In homespun phrase, very significant when understood, her conceptions overran their time. For instance, you addressed an observation to her; you received no answer, and supposed that she had not heard you; you passed to other topics, and forgot the late utterance of your wisdom; and then, much puzzling you, came the belated response of Mrs. Lamson. It had taken all this time for the damp powder of her trains of thought to get afire and reach the poorly stored magazine. Of course her remarks were perpetually breaking into the conversation with a jarring, confusing effect, like the echoes of a hall constructed on bad acoustic principles. Her vocal utterance was equally sluggish with her mental action, and reminded you of the slow striking of a clock exposed to frosty weather. But Mrs. Pullet, poetic little soul that she was, saw all these imperfections as beauties. Mrs. Lamson was a woman of genteel fortune and pedigree; she was at least a hundred thousand dollars and one generation higher in the social scale than her companion; and hence the latter's unquestioning admiration and subservience.

"What does he think of the—book?" inquired Mrs. Lamson, after a strong intellectual struggle to come at the question.

"What—the one you sent him? That geological book? Oh, delighted with it. He read it straight through, and said he was ever so much obliged to you."

"No, not that. I mean the one I sent you. The Ninety-nine Reasons why a Bethelite Sexton became a Pontifical Warden."

"Oh—that? I'm afraid it didn't touch him," sighed Mrs. Pullet. "He finished with it pretty quick. I guess he skipped a good deal of it."

"Mercy! skipped!" exclaimed Mrs. Lamson, lifting two thin hands of astonishment, and thinking with unaccustomed vigor under the excitement caused by this information. "And yet Mr. Pullet is called intelligent! He must have missed the force of the argument. Couldn't you explain it to him, dear?"

Now as Mrs. Pullet did not care to admit that she had not read the book herself, and was therefore quite incapable of expounding it, she had again to show her dodging capacity and skip off to some other subject.

"Ye—s. But you don't know how obstinate he is in arguing. I say the same thing over to him a dozen times, and still he won't see the force of it. I tell him, and have told him over and over again, that my uncle Jackson's second wife is a born Pontificalian; but he makes no more account of it than if she was a born fool. I ask him if he can't see with his own eyes how much more tasty a Pontifical church always is than a Bethelite church—"

"A Bethelite meeting-house," interposed Mrs. Lamson, with an unnatural quickness, a rushing inspiration of satire, which nearly took her breath away. It seemed to her as if her intellection had suddenly become a cataract and she were plunging wildly down it, blinded by its spray and stunned by its uproar.

"Ye—s, a Bethelite meeting-house," assented Mrs. Pullet, again parroting unconsciously the slow utterance and ineffective simper of her lady-patroness. "That's just the name for it. And so—well, what was I saying? I declare I've forgotten."

Mrs. Lamson was too laboriously engaged in catching and harnessing into language one of her own unruly thoughts to give aid in recovering Mrs. Pullet's runaway ideas.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"My dear," she said at last, leaning feebly forward in the travail of her spirit—"my dear, have you tried—appeal?"

"Appeal?" murmured Mrs. Pullet, puzzled by the somewhat obscure conciseness of the expression.

"Yes—appeal," mildly insisted Mrs. Lamson, hoping that the word would convey an idea to her listener which as yet it had but vaguely impressed upon herself. She knew that it was a good sort of word, much used in speaking of serious things, and she had a qualified confidence that some beneficent result might come of pronouncing it.

"Well—do you mean appeal to his conscience?" inquired Mrs. Pullet, making a desperate plunge into the enigma in order not to balk her friend's expectations.

"Yes, to his conscience," replied Mrs. Lamson, greatly relieved to find that she had meant something. If Mrs. Pullet had suggested affection, or reason, or even perhaps stomach, as the thing to be appealed to, she would have assented with equal helplessness.

"Well—no—I can't say that I have," stammered Mrs. Pullet, feeling somewhat abased in the confession, and also not a little perplexed by the unaccustomed path of duty thus opened to her footsteps. Without having ever thought at all of the matter, she had arrived, by some process as mysterious to herself as to others, at the conclusion that, appealing to conscience, is purely a clergyman's business, most appropriately done in the pulpit, and best managed when made as little personal as possible. She wondered how she was to go to work at so solemn an office, and she dreaded the ridicule which in her mind attached itself to any unusual show of religious earnestness.

"But do you think it would do any good?" she asked, timidly.

"Oh, a great deal! Always appeal to the conscience," replied Mrs. Lamson, who, like many other ineffective people, was greatest in generalities.

Mrs. Pullet saw that she was commanded, and that it would be good policy to obey. As the business weighed upon her mind, and made her feel the need of solitary meditation, she ended her call, shook out her skirt, sleeked her hair with her forefinger, kissed Mrs. Lamson with effusion, and sailed pensively homeward.

In order to make you understand why this energetic little lady was so anxious to become a recognized Pontificalian, I must explain how social matters stand in our community. A New England town of moderate population, it has been so far favored of Nature as to be environed by many eligible sites for country houses, and to be situated within a brief railroad trip of New York. The result of these circumstances has been the settlement among us, at least during summers, of a score or two of wealthy metropolitan families, who have introduced Gothic architecture, frescoes, stained windows, statuary, private billiard-tables, gold salt-cellars, liveries, coats of arms, and various other elegances. They have not overthrown our native aristocracy; but they have placed themselves on a level with it in the public estimation, and they do certainly surpass it in fashionable trappings. Either through accident or Providential design (our old ladies differ on this point) every one of these families has happened to be an adherent of Pontificacy; and consequently this denomination has taken a fresh start, and grown to be, not perhaps the most numerous, but certainly the wealthiest and the most stylish in the city. Its leaders, whether lay or clerical, male or female, have used their means of influence with admirable intelligence, tact, and courtesy. They have hospitably welcomed converts from other churches; they have received them, not only into their middle aisles, but into their parlors. Wealthy grocers and tanners who had long desired to ascend into the heaven of our genteel society, and had had their aspiring noses snubbed by our hereditary cherubim, discovered that by turning Pontificalians they could place themselves on a seeming of equality with their old contemners. Both history and philosophy teach us that it is not in the nature of some wealthy grocers and tanners to resist such a temptation. Many of ours did not: they quitted the unsocial fields of Bethelism; they were gathered into the hospitable folds of Pontificacy.

As Mrs. Pullet watched her neighbors and former gossips, the Jobsons and the Robsons, fluttering into palatial cottages which opened not to her, she was tormented by that envy which ought to, and perhaps does, plague the crawling caterpillar when he sees his brilliant relatives the butterflies circling around the sumptuous hospitality of the rose and lily. As Correggio cried, "I too am a painter," so Mrs. Pullet cried, "I too am a Pontificalian!"

Unfortunately for the social prospects and domestic peace of the family, its male head was determined not to leave the old church which he had attended ever since he was too young to conceive how the minister could get out of the pulpit. The truth is, that he was a long way from a fool, notwithstanding that he had married Mrs. P. out of pure love and admiration. He had solid notions of social propriety, a born capacity for talking sense consecutively, and, in his dull set, was considered pretty strong as a joker. You who have heard Mrs. Pullet talk will easily believe that such a man was an overmatch for her in an argument. She herself did not easily believe it; for she was one of those respectably numerous individuals who put more faith in their powers than the facts will justify; but there came times, nevertheless, when she felt the need of an ally and comforter. Such at least was her opinion; and such, moreover, was the opinion of Mrs. Lamson; while, as for Mr. Pullet, his judgment was not solicited.

Mrs. Lamson was a born Pontificalian, and a born propagandist. Human nature has a proselyting streak in it, and Pontifical nature is no-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google thing more than human, at least not in persons of Mrs. L.'s calibre. Although a devout and kind-hearted woman, who meant as well as she knew how, she was, I fear, less anxious that her fellow-creatures' souls should go to heaven than that their bodies should go to Pontifical churches. No sooner did she hear that her lively little neighbor was well-disposed toward the correct thing in worship than she quickened a mere bowing acquaintance into an intimacy, and made the Pullets welcome in her aristocratic mansion. I will not go into the particulars of this portion of the story. They were unnaturally wonderful and incessantly delightful to Mrs. Pullet, but they would seem stupidly commonplace to the intelligent public.

Let us hear now what sort of an appeal the lady made to her husband's dead carcass of a conscience. The admitted insensibility of the subject, and a feeling that she lacked the moral galvanism necessary to shock it into life, led her to prorogue her experiment until bedtime, when it might be hoped that darkness and solitude would assist with their irrational yet potent influences. As usual the couple went off at half past ten; and as usual also Mr. Pullet prepared his wife's night-cap; not an article of apparel, please to observe, but something hot. Mrs. Pullet being weakly, or claiming to be so, Mrs. Lamson had recommended Bourbon whisky as being "the best thing, my dear, to take," which in a short time became the opinion of the patient. Mr. Pullet fabricated the dose in person, heating the water over a spirit-lamp, sweetening according to his own cultivated taste, adding a fragrant shaving of lemon-peel, and serving the mixture to his better-half after she was under the coverlet. Students of human nature will not be surprised to learn that he always rewarded himself for this labor of love by mixing a second tumblerful for his own (not pulmonary) consumption. She drank it because she was weak and needed it; he drank it because he was strong and could bear it. Mrs. Pullet, sitting up in bed, used to lecture her husband between sips on the danger he ran of becoming a drunkard. Mr. Pullet, lounging in his dressing-gown on a sofa, took the lecture and the whisky together with a smile of enjoyment. It was usually a peaceful scene and the harbinger of a sound night's slumber. This evening, however, there was a conscience to be awakened, and a specially somniferous one, too, the punch being stronger than common.

"My dear," Mrs. Pullet commenced, "I have been reflecting on your duty."

"I'm much obliged to you, pussy. You see I am working at it," rejoined Mr. Pullet, holding up his half-emptied tumbler.

"I'm convinced," continued the lady, "that you ought to unite with me in attending Doctor Surplus's church."

"Dear me! have you just got around to that again?" laughed Mr. Pullet. "Why, you told me that a month ago."

"Don't let us trifle, Joseph," said Mrs. P., trying to look solemn, but only succeeding in looking cross. "I want you to feel the same spirit this evening that I feel."

"So I do, my dear. Same bottle—same quantity. Goes to your head a little the soonest, perhaps."

"I wish you wouldn't keep making fun of me," returned Mrs. Pullet, descending hastily from her solemnity and beginning to whimper. "I can't say any thing but what you try to make me ridiculous. I'm not a bit tipsy, and you know it, and if I am it's your fault, for you mixed the horrid stuff, and so there!"

Mr. Pullet left his sofa, walked slowly to the bedside and smoothed his wife's wavy black hair with a smile which was partly playful and partly beseeching. Mrs. Pullet sobbed a little, and pretended to jerk her head away from the caresses, but could not prevent her eyes from taking a softer brightness.

"You don't care any thing about me," she whispered. "It's all a pretense."

"Mr. Pullet put his arm around the curly head, lifted it, held it against his lips for a moment, and then walked back smiling to his whisky-and-water. It is evident, is it not? that the man had a very seared conscience and a very stony heart? Mrs. Pullet now remained silent a few seconds, either because this little episode had confused her train of argument, or because she was thinking of the old times when as yet sectarian polemics had not broken the family peace. A pull at the punch and a thought of Mrs. Lamson enabled her to raise her drooping banner and charge anew upon the enemy.

"I wish you'd read those Ninety-nine Reasons of a Bethelite Sexton again," she said. "I'm sure they are enough to convince you, if you'd only try not to be prejudiced."

"My dear child, I would do almost any thing to oblige you," replied Pullet. "But really it is a very stupid book, and rather than read it again I would apostatize without a reason. But suppose," he continued, with a mischievous twinkle, "suppose you should read it to me."

Now Mrs. Pullet not only had not perused the Ninety-nine Reasons, but did not wish to. Why should she? She was convinced without it. Besides, she was not addicted to reading, and rarely went beyond the depth of a newspaper story. But she perceived the satire of her husband's proposition, and resented it as the easiest way of evading it.

"Ain't you ashamed, Joseph? You know I can't read loud a minute. You know how weak my chest is. You're just as thoughtless of my health as you can be."

"I beg your pardon, my dear; I quite forgot," replied Mr. Pullet, assuming a properly grave expression. "No, no, I wouldn't have you read it to me for the world," he added, looking mischievous again.

"I never saw such a prejudiced person," snapped the lady. "You fairly hate the Pontifical church. You hate Pontificalians. You

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google are as bitter against your fellow-Christians as if they were Turks or cannibals."

When Mrs. Pullet brought a charge against any one who had excited her wrath—her husband, for instance—she did it much after the fashion of a legal indictment, combining in one enormous mass of accusation all the infamies of which he could possibly be guilty.

"Come, pussy, you do me injustice," remonstrated Pullet. "I deny that I am bitter against Turks and cannibals, or even against Pontificalians. I don't hate Pontificacy. I admit the right and reason of every Pontificalian to be what he is. If I had been brought up a Pontificalian I should remain one. As I was brought up a Bethelite I remain a Bethelite. I think I have no prejudices either way. I stay where I am, partly because of old associations—partly for the thought of my father and mother, and all the by-gone Pullets that I ever heard of—Bethelites, every one; partly for the sake of my living relations, some of whom love our church dearly, and would be pained to see me leave it."

"I should be ashamed," sneered Mrs. Pullet, "to be domineered over by my aunts, and uncles, and cousins."

Mr. Pullet laughed with a slightly vexed air at his wife's insinuation. He, too, was growing argumentative and sectarian under the combined influence of nutmeg, lemon-peel, hot water, whisky, and contradiction.

"The Pontificalians are a great deal more stylish than the Bethelites," continued Mrs. Pullet, not forgetful as she spoke that her husband's kin were mostly plain people. "Their churches are always more tasty than ours. They don't have any horrid extemporaneous prayers and stupid doctrinal sermons. The chants are perfectly charming, and the responses are lovely. And then the funeral service, oh! I never hear it but I feel as though I wanted to die."

"I would as lieve die as hear it myself," retorted Pullet, who in his heart admired the funeral service as much as any one, but who just now was irritated at hearing his own church abused.

"Ain't you ashamed, Joseph?" exclaimed the lady. "It is perfectly sublime. Nobody but Pontificalians could have written it. Well, I should like to know what you are grinning at now."

"I've always understood that it is composed chiefly of extracts from the Bible, and that the old Catholic Church had something to do with putting it together," observed the man of seared conscience.

"I suppose you'll smirk just the same when it's read over me," pursued Mrs. Pullet, evading the historical question. "I mean it shall be. And perhaps it'll be very soon too. Oh, Joseph! you will, won't you?—you will let that beautiful service be read over me when I'm carried to my last resting-place!" concluded the pathetic little woman.

"My dear, with the greatest pleasure," smiled that cold-blooded Pullet.

Ladies, are you at all surprised that this persecuted wife burst into tears, and continued to gurgle hysterically until her Bluebeard of a husband was brought to repentance? When they quarreled it was invariably the worser half (as of course it should be) who made the first move for a reconciliation; for the conscious rectitude of Mrs. Pullet, and a sense of the dignity of her sex's feebleness, would not allow her to ask pardon. Having obtained verbal forgiveness, the marital monster turned off the gas and went to bed, resolving to pursue the controversy no further. But now came Mrs. Pullet's hour and the power of darkness. Who supposes that this domestic tyrant is going to be allowed to sleep? The debate ceased, indeed, for fifteen or twenty minutes, but it was because the champion of Bethelism made no defense, and not because the champion of Pontificacy suspended her attack. In proportion as the—lemon-peel mounted higher in her head, in proportion as her adversary seemed to sink submissively before her, the lady argued more zealously in favor of a seat in the broad aisle at the feet of Doctor Surplus. For twenty minutes, I say, Mr. Pullet remained dumb; yet it was not, alas! because his conscience had been touched—it was only because the hardened wretch hated to quarrel with his wife.

"And so you will take a seat there, won't you?" inquired the breathless lady at last.

"No," said Mr. Pullet, who could not control his spirit of opposition now that he was forced to speak.

"No? Why, Joseph, I thought you said you would."

"No, I didn't say I would," insisted Joseph in a dogged monotone.

"But you didn't say you wouldn't, and I thought, of course, you would; and why didn't you speak if you wasn't going to?" whined Mrs. Pullet.

"I didn't say it because I didn't mean it; and I tell you I won't do it," persisted Joseph, as disobliging as his celebrated namesake in the discussion with Mrs. Potiphar.

Now this was a style of talk which naturally inflamed Mrs. Pullet to indignation.

"Well, if you choose to stay where you are, stay!" she snapped; "and I'll go to Doctor Surplus's alone."

"I object," responded Mr. Pullet.

"What for?" asked Mrs. P., a little startled by the firm tone in which this new position was stated.

"Because I don't want to see the family separated. It never has been, and there is no reason why it should be. You have got through thirty years where you are, and it won't hurt you to try it for another thirty."

"Oh, you are quarreling with me," whimpered the lady. "I don't see why you need quarrel."

"It is your own work," retorted Pullet.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"You bring in this new element of dispute. Remain what you always have been, and there will be no trouble. You know that I married you for a Bethelite."

"You didn't!"

"I did!"

"Well, have it your own way," gurgled Mrs. Pullet. She began to cry, but, nevertheless, she did not give up the debate; for the punch, as I have remarked, was stronger than usual. "I don't care," she went on. "I admire Doctor Surplus. I love the Pontifical Church. I want to go to it. I will."

"Confound the Pontifical Church! Hang Doctor Surplus!" exclaimed the irritated Pullet. "It is too bad that such trumpery should come between me and my wife. It is the only thing that has ever made us fight. I say, confound the whole rubbish!"

The poor man was talking loudly now, determined to hear himself express his own feelings.

"I'm disgusted at you. You are perfectly horrible. Ain't you ashamed of yourself?" was the soothing reply.

"No!" thundered Pullet, resolved to put down that supposition without loss of time.

"Oh! I'm afraid of you. I don't want you to stay with me!" sobbed the lady.

"Very well," retorted Pullet, desperately, and landed on his legs in the middle of the chamber. He lighted a candle, stuck his feet into slippers, grasped his daily apparel and started for the spare bedroom. Now there was unquestionably a rat about the house, and very possibly a robber; and Mrs. Pullet would have been scared out of her meagre wits at the appearance of either of those desperate characters; so that when she saw herself about to be left solus she concluded that even a Bethelite husband would be better company than nobody.

"Oh, I don't want to stay alone!" she cried, sitting up in bed, and staring piteously after Mr. Pullet. "Oh, please don't go away! Oh, I'm afraid! Oh, Joseph, you'll kill me!"

Joseph stopped in the hall and reflected. "Pshaw! it's the punch," he thought. "It was stronger than usual. We never had such a scene before. Of course I won't go. Ridiculous!"

For the satisfaction of those who sympathize with and admire Mrs. Pullet I will state that he did not go. Nor was the battle renewed either that night or the morrow. Mr. Pullet was angry with himself, and even excessively humiliated when he remembered the savage energy of his defense, and how easily it had overthrown the rash yet faint-hearted enemy. Mrs. Pullet shuddered whenever she thought of her husband's rush for the spare bedroom, which seemed to her the very next step to divorce attended by division of the children (perhaps with a sword, as in the days of Solomon), and lifelong exposure to rats, robbers, etc.

You have probably seen two kittens spit at each other with bristling backs and the next moment lick each other all over in amity; and you may be assured that this little feline drama is not a bad likeness of what sometimes happens in human families of most respectable standing. Do you suppose that two "miserable sinners" can become perfected saints simply by going to the altar together? Do you suppose because husband and wife occasionally exchange stinging words that therefore there is no love between them? I tell you that Mr. and Mrs. Pullet were very fond of each other, and that either would have been miserable had the other died, notwithstanding that this was not the first time that their constant contact had produced unpleasant friction.

The contest was, however, so much severer than any preceding one that for a week or two they bore each other's many infirmities with patience, and were more loving than usual. Mrs. Pullet, being of an elastic, light-hearted nature, recovered from the shock the quickest. Moreover, her natural craving for select and intelligent society led her to plunge anew into the companionship of Mrs. Lamson, whom she had shunned for a few days with a dim impression that in so doing she was avoiding a tempter. Mrs. Lamson very naturally inquired how she had succeeded in her appeal to Mr. Pullet's conscience. It grieves me to confess that Mrs. Pullet, while loving her husband very much, did nevertheless make disclosure of all his tyranny of will and intemperance of language. She did not mean to do it, but somehow or other she began, and before she knew it she had finished.

"Dear me!" frequently exclaimed Mrs. Lamson during the recital. "Is it possible? Well, I am shocked. You poor creature! And so you answered him patiently, did you? Well, that was right; but it must have required grace. How could he! And Mr. Pullet appears so good-hearted. Truly the age of intolerance is not past."

"No, indeed it is not," meekly answered Mrs. Pullet, beginning to think herself a martyr of whom the world was not more than half worthy.

"I should like to see Mr. Lamson forbid me being a Pontificalian!" said the elder lady, with a momentary gush of milk-and-water combativeness.

As Lamson was a Pontificalian of the straitest sect this wish was not likely to find fulfillment.

"But if he did, what should you do?" imagined Mrs. Pullet, anxious for a guide-post to direct her out of her own real perplexity.

"My dear—I—I don't know," replied Mrs. Lamson, much alarmed and confused by the supposition the moment it was pressed home to her.

"I suppose," said Mrs. Pullet, "you would go straight on—"

"In the path of duty," interrupted Mrs. Lamson, with one of those gleams of intelligence and energy which sometimes flashed from

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

her, astonishing herself more than any body else. "Yes, my dear, straight on in the path of duty. And—and—if you want my advice, my child, let me urge you to go and do likewise," closed the good lady, quoting Scripture with her usual pertinency.

So Mrs. Pullet had another general direction, of immense moral significance to the world at large, but not so distinctly applicable to her own little project as she could have desired. However, she was one of those happily constructed natures who can turn almost any virtuous maxim to suit their own pleasures; in other words, she generally concluded that to walk in the path of duty is the same sort of traveling as to have one's own way. The path which she now struck into was the flagged sidewalk which led to St. Michael's Church. She had often been there before, for she had a standing invitation to sit in the Lamson slip, and she was not a woman to throw the cold water of neglect upon the flame of any stylish friendship. Now, however, with that blessed word "duty" to sustain her, and with a consciousness, moreover, that she had a grievance to fling into her husband's face if he opposed her fancy, she inclined to Pontificacy more openly than ever before, and seldom passed a Sunday without sitting at least half a day at the feet of Dr. Surplus. Being a quick little woman, with a good memory for things she liked to learn, she was very happy in her wrestlings with the difficulties of the Prayer-Book. It was agreeable to observe the flutter of pleasure which thrilled her robes and ribbons when she found the place. She looked at the spot twice to be sure that she was right; then glanced at the audience and rector as if to see whether they had noticed her success.

Of course it was her duty and her desire to join in the responses, but not having been accustomed from childhood to "speak in meeting," she was afraid. Once when she tried it her voice failed her, decaying suddenly into a tremulous squeak, which so mortified her that she blushed crimson, and thought the whole congregation must be staring at her with anger or contempt. But Mrs. Lamson was not a woman to let a new convert stop thus at midway in a holy pilgrimage. So Mrs. Pullet at last took up this cross, and was almost equally relieved and mortified to find that the little whisper which she dropped amidst the general solemn murmur attracted no more notice than her sixpence in the contribution-box. Impunity leads to audacity; and she very soon became "as bold as brass about those responses;" at least such was the exulting confession which she made to Mrs. Jobson.

II.

While Mrs. Pullet bowed the knee at St. Michael's, her husband, as was his respectable wont, neither said nor did any thing extraordinary. It vexed him indeed not a little that his wife should leave him to run after strange worships, more especially as he had neither sympathy nor respect for her motives; but he was so ashamed of his late violence, and so resolved not to fall into like error again, that he kept his mouth shut and suffered Mrs. P. to follow her own devices. Sunday after Sunday he attended her to the door of Doctor Surplus's temple, left her there without a grumble, and passed on with the children to the sanctuary of his own childhood.

He believed that he was showing kindliness and magnanimity, and hoped that the attraction of these virtues would quietly bring his wife back to him. Such an idea never once occurred to Mrs. Pullet; she looked upon herself as the only aggrieved member of the family. If she thought of kindliness and magnanimity at all, she supposed that it was she who exhibited those noble and endearing qualities. She considered her husband's conduct a mixture of stupidity, obstinacy, sectarian prejudice, and private revenge; and she inflamed herself daily against him in her solitary meditations and in her dialogues with Mrs. Lamson. At last she resolved to bring matters to a crisis; to let Mr. Pullet know that she would no longer submit to his systematic persecutions; to establish her position, not only in private but in public, as a Pontificalian and aristocrat.

"My dear," she began, with more of a tremor in her voice than she had expected, "there is a half slip to let at St. Michael's. It is only twenty dollars. I want some money to take it."

"My dear," replied Mr. Pullet, "there is a whole slip at your service in our church. No one occupies it but your husband and children. If you don't like to be seen sitting with them, they will stay at home half of every Sunday and let you have it to yourself."

Tears of anger and disappointment started into Mrs. Pullet's eyes; but she retorted with an irony which she meant should burn like vitriol.

"I thank you, Sir. You are very kind, Sir. I am much obliged to you, Sir. How very good you are, Sir! He! he! he!—ha! ha! ha!"

Beginning with a hysterical giggle she struggled on into a passion of angry crying, wishing that she had never got married, and that she was dead; to all of which I fear that her husband was tempted to respond, Amen. However, he was destined to retract all that he had said, as well as some things that he had not said. After a woman has cried a certain time at a man, the latter instinctively takes it for granted that he is a miserable rascal, a brute, a gorilla, and falls to exculpating himself, if not to begging forgiveness. Mr. Pullet followed the custom of his sex, and dissolved to penitence under his wife's tears.

"My dear child, I hate to vex you so," said he. "I had no idea you would take it so hardly. I assure you I am very sorry. There's nothing pains me or mortifies me so much as this sort of scene between us. Come, dear,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

don't go on so. You are not strong enough to stand it."

Mrs. Pullet went on a good while, however, for she was strong enough to stand it, although her husband was not. At last a double-eagle squeezed its way into the hand of the distressed lady. At the sight of this rara avis her ruffled feathers smoothed themselves, and her little bill met Mr. Pullet's beak with a cooing murmur and a forgiving caress.

"Oh, Joseph! you are real good. I knew you would be when you realized how I feel on this subject. There—there—there; stop, don't stir, Joseph; you shall have a kiss for every dollar."

Plain conjugal kisses, without a spice of romance or danger in them, are dear at a dollar apiece; and Joseph was as well aware of that commercial fact as any other man who has been married for ten years. He knew that he was being not only overworked but underpaid; and as is usual with people thus wronged, he felt like rejecting his wages; in fact he did so, drawing away from Mrs. Pullet in the midst of her bussing. His feelings having once taken this unamiable turn, it was natural that they should roll straight onward for a while, according to the custom of—well, things in general. It annoyed him to remember that he had been brought to hire a seat in St. Michael's; and perhaps it annoyed him still more to think that Mrs. Pullet had proved herself the cock of the walk. He sought for a vengeance and found one.

"My dear," said he, "if you choose to spend that money on a slip, why you can do so, of course. But I gave it to you for a dress. You remember your birthday comes to-morrow."

I must confess that it was a cruel turn, and also that Mrs. Pullet did not bear it like a martyr. She loved new dresses with more than the common ardor of woman, and she felt now that she needed a more copious provision of them than ever before, inasmuch as Doctor Surplus's congregation was the most fashionable one of the city. She reasoned, she pleaded, she scolded, she wept, and all uselessly; for Joseph had cooled off from one fit of tender compunction, and could not immediately heat up to another. So Mrs. Pullet sought the satisfaction of a lady in rejecting the dress with scorn, in accepting the slip as the only truly desirable thing that her husband ever gave her, and in declaring that she would go to St. Michael's if she went ragged.

Now, then, the little woman had a claim on good society. She paid for a seat in the Pontifical Church, and sounded the responses from it morning and afternoon every Sunday. It was in the side aisle, to be sure, for twenty dollars could not get the best; but it was nearly abreast of the Lamsons, and a little ahead of the Robsons and Jobsons. It seemed to her that she had clambered up to the spot where the load of plebeianism ought to fall from her, as Christian's burden was loosed from his shoulders on the hill Difficulty. But her bundle did not come off as easily as she had a right to expect. There were several reasons why the aristocrats of St. Michael's did not at once give a succession of balls in honor of Mrs. Pullet. In the first place, they did not think of it. In the second place, supposing the idea had been broached to them, how could they invite Mrs. without Mr.? Finally, candidates for the favor of St. Michael's were getting rather numerous of late, and consequently were not welcomed so warmly as aforetime. Mrs. Lamson, indeed, was both able and willing to stamp Mrs. Pullet for fashionable circulation; but she did not do it for various reasons, one of which was that same common one—that she did not think of it. How could she suspect that her convert's sole object in joining the true Church was to get among fine people? Then, just as the latter most required the aid of the Lamsons, they went to Europe to make the grand tour, to finish off the young ladies at Paris, and to intrigue for entrance into coteries still more patrician than that of St. Michael's.

Thus Mrs. Pullet was left in a situation very like that of poor Robinson Crusoe when he had finished his great canoe, but found that he should need help to carry it to the water. The good society was all around her, at least every Sunday; but how should she get herself launched on its shining surface? She had a Sabbath-school speaking-acquaintance with a number of fashionable ladies; but how, oh! how could they be brought to call on her and to request the pleasure of her company? An inspiration of splendid audacity came to her aid. She would give a great party, and invite every body—no, not every body, for then she would be overrun with nobodies; no, she would invite none, absolutely none, but somebodies. Of this conclusion she informed Mr. Pullet, not a little to his amazement and alarm.

"But, my dear—" he mildly objected.

"But what?" answered Mrs. Pullet, sharply.

"But do you know all these people—these Vanderpools, and Roosevelts, and Swammerdams, and so forth?"

"Know them! Yes indeed. Of course I do. Ha, ha, ha! I should think so."

Mrs. Pullet's irony was cutting, but Mr. Pullet was tough and did not fall asunder.

"But do you know them well enough to invite them? They never call on you."

"Of course they don't. That's because we haven't invited them. Gracious! you men are so stupid; there are some things you never understand. Don't you know that if they're invited to our party then they've got to call."

"Oh! have they? I'm delighted to hear it. Why, they are quite in our power," chuckled Mr. Pullet, impudently. "But really I think we ought to ask somebody besides these very heavy swells. They might have a previous engagement, you know. In that case it would be convenient to have a few old friends on hand for the sake of the ice-cream and strawberries.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

You and I couldn't eat a supper for eighty people, could we?"

"I wish you wouldn't talk that way," answered Mrs. Pullet, her mouth beginning to quiver. "You tease me to death. You love to tease me. You never lose a chance to make me unhappy."

"Come, my dear, don't cry," replied the monster. "I didn't mean to make you cry. There, I'm sorry. But, seriously, don't you think it would be safest to ask a few persons whom we are sure of?"

"I do. I'm going to. I'm sure of the Vanderpools, and Roosevelts, and Swammerdams," replied the lady, impetuously. "I'm sure of them if they know that they are to meet only their own set. I won't mix up two sets. It's ridiculous. It isn't genteel. You might as well mix strawberries and baked beans. I'll give another party for our old acquaintance."

"But my relatives — they must come, of course," persisted this irrational husband.

"But, my dear, they wouldn't enjoy themselves at all among such gay people," remonstrated the lady. "Really, my dear, I think you had better not. Do let me have my own way for just this once!"

"Just this once!" exclaimed Pullet, half amazed and half amused. "Well, just this once," he repeated, with a burst of laughter. "However, I must insist upon one thing."

"What is that?"

"Footing the bill," grinned the husband, sardonically, as he left the room.

This insinuation of Pullet's that he paid the piper while his spouse did all the dancing rather stung that lady, and would have drawn an ounce or so of tears from her had he remained to be corrected thereby. But the dastardly rogue shut the door after him so quick that he escaped every drop of the threatened shower. So Mrs. P. remained alone in a thunder-cloudy state—very indignant at being satirized, very determined to have her own way, but somewhat fearful about the success of her proposed experiment, and a little ashamed to spend her husband's money in contradiction to his judgment and wishes. The end of it was, of course, that she decided to give the party. Mr. Pullet had not absolutely forbidden it: he had even seemed to take it for granted that she would give it in spite of him; and it occurred to her that she had better not risk a downright veto by trying to draw from him a more explicit assent. On second thoughts, indeed, it appeared wisest to lick her scheme into shape as fast as possible, lest her husband or some other adversary should destroy it in its helpless cubhood.

She turned to her card-basket, which stood on her one marble table. It was not very full; and it was one of Mrs. Pullet's greatest griefs that many of her friends did not use cards but "left their names," thereby causing the Irish "help" to invent strange cognomens for them, such as are not to be found in any directory of this world; but of such cards as there were this adroit little lady always picked out the most aristocratic and kept them uppermost, so that they might catch the eye and fill with envy the heart of curious visitors. From this pasteboard miscellany she drew forth a "party invitation," still in its envelope, which had been sent her months before by Mrs. Lamson. It was a printed affair, of patrician spaciousness and neatness and lustre. On a sheet of pink note paper she copied it, substituting "Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Pullet" for "Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Lamson," and "Wednesday, Feb. 13, 1860" for "Wednesday, Oct. 10, 1859." She carried the copy to our best engraver, with the Lamson card as a model, and urged him to elegance and dispatch.

The next business was to make out a list of those whom Mr. and Mrs. Pullet would delight to honor. I will venture to say that no President was ever more bothered in choosing the members of his Cabinet than was this lady in selecting the objects of her proposed hospitality. In place of the usual simple question, "Shall I ask the Soandsos?" there was the vastly more thorny inquiry, "Will the high and mighty Soandsos deign to come?" Had Mrs. Pullet been a reader of Shakspeare she would have thought of Glendower calling spirits from the vasty deep. Every time that she wrote out one of those aristocratic names—Vanderpool, or Roosevelt, or Swammerdam—her heart sank within her, and she was tempted of her good angel to throw the whole parcel of envelopes into the fire. Each new address obliged her to rehearse mentally the entire argument by which she had nerved herself to this social forlorn hope. Would this one decline? Perhaps so. Would that one decline? Very likely. But surely they would not all be so stuck-up, so disobliging, so horrid, as to disappoint her; and if only half of them came, the party would still be a hopeful nest-egg, pregnant with the feathers and cacklings of future fashion. Like other great souls Mrs. Pullet followed, not the past but the future, not her known possibilities but her aspirations.

The list when finished was all "blue blood"—"the cream of the cream"—as we understand those phrases in our city. The uncompromising little lady did not invite a single Bethelite, no matter how aristocratic, being determined to show once for all where she stood in religion as well as in gentility, and hoping that this exclusiveness would bring her favor in the set which she courted. For fear of premature discovery and opposition she threw her envelopes into a drawer as fast as directed, and kept it locked. Her husband saw nothing, guessed nothing, and supposed that she had forgotten her project. She would have been twice as likely to forget Jerusalem, or any other spiritual "chief joy." Not only did her plan worry her constantly by day, but by night it gave her the nightmare, causing her to see herself the wretched hostess of a reception attended only by the halt, the lame, the blind, and other such vagabonds highly recommended to hospitality in the Scriptures.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

For nearly a week she spent half her time over that drawer, reading the names on the envelopes, sometimes adding one to the awful list, doubting much, and hoping a little.

The style in which the missives were addressed troubled her greatly. Never before had her chirography seemed to her so irregular, so illegible, so altogether unworthy of being perused through aristocratic eye-glasses. "I wish Joseph would do this over for me," she thought. "He has such a beautiful handwriting. But he won't—I know he won't. He's perfectly hateful, and—and—so am I," she almost blubbered. It was but a passing spasm of compunction, not inductive to repentance and reform.

After a very shameful delay on the part of the engraver the cards came home, and the secret came out. Mr. Pullet, returning to tea from his store, and finding a boy at the gate with a package, took it into the house, fell into his rocking-chair by the fire, and proceeded to an examination. Drawing out one of the papers he read aloud, with just about as much astonishment as might be expected, "Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Pullet, Wednesday evening, February 13, at half past eight."

"The d—ickens!" he exclaimed. "Well, that's jolly—and lively. What a fast world it is! Hands round your future, all printed for general circulation, before you ask for it. Any thing more? Any appointments and desires and outreachings of mine for March and April and May? No. How short-sighted! Some of Mrs. Pullet's doings, I suppose. I'll be hanged if I ain't sometimes tempted to think she's a natural-born—well, well, never mind. I suppose it all seems very important to her, this getting into high society. Women are not men—and, on the whole, I'm glad of it."

By the time that Mr. Pullet had uttered these and a few other commonplaces his wife entered the room, and, of course, took in the whole situation at a glance, after the prompt fashion of women. Her first impulse was to be scared and ashamed; her second, to throw herself into her husband's lap and kiss every thing right; her third, the least natural, and therefore the worst, to carry the thing through "with dignity." I need hardly explain that with her "dignity" meant asperity, so much had she accustomed herself of late to consider her husband an antagonist, and so sore had she got on this subject of Pontificacy and its collaterals. Assuming an air of imperious composure she sailed across the room in silence, and carelessly taking up the bundle of cards, sat down to look at them, with a red face to be sure, but otherwise with a bold front. Now this sort of thing may impose on strangers and servants, but it does not answer with relatives and equals. Mr. Pullet did not feel disposed to be brow-beaten by a little woman, whose cold feet he rubbed every night with a flesh-brush; and, in fact, this attempt to snub him with "manner" riled him vastly more than the audacious intrigue of the party.

"So, Madame, you think you can govern the family alone, I see," he began.

"Ha? What did you say?" answered Mrs. Pullet, trembling with excitement, but pretending that she had not understood.

"As you get up the party without my consent, I suppose, of course, that you don't expect me to attend it."

The lady was alarmed. Her husband was perhaps capable of absenting himself from the reception; and that would be embarrassing and cause a vast deal of gossip. She saw the necessity of conciliation and made the best of it.

"My dear, I thought you gave your consent. You certainly said that just this once I might have my way."

"So I did. But I suppose you understood that I was joking. I certainly did not expect—"

Here Mr. Pullet fell silent for a quarter of a minute, thinking more in that time than I could tell in a quarter of an hour.

"Well, let it go," he resumed, summoning all his patience. "I agree to it since you have gone so far."

Mrs. Pullet, of course, fell upon his neck and kissed him bountifully, not without some praiseworthy shamefacedness.

"And now, whom are you going to ask?" he inquired when the task of receiving his reward had come to an end.

As the easiest method of answering, Mrs. Pullet ran for her envelopes and spread them before him.

"Vanderpool—Roosevelt—Swammerdam," he read in dismay. "What! all Pontificalians, New Yorkers, big bugs! None of our set? Good Heavens, wife! This won't do. No, no; I won't stand it; I won't be made so ridiculous. I won't come out so like a blasted fool before all my acquaintance."

It was in vain that Mrs. Pullet argued, implored, scolded, and wept; her husband was as unreasonable as a man can be who is perfectly in the right. But suddenly his manner changed; he lifted one of the cards to the light as if to make sure that he had read it correctly; then he glanced at his wife with an expression of wonder, amusement, and mischief.

"You have put it for February 13," said he. "Don't you know—?"

"Know what?" asked Mrs. Pullet, defiantly.

"Oh, nothing—nothing at all," and Mr. Pullet giggled in spite of himself.

"Well, if you're laughing because you think there's any other party that night, you're mistaken, I can tell you."

"Am I? Oh, perhaps I am; yes, I rather think you are right," assented Pullet, looking wickedly mysterious. "Well, my dear, I give it all up again. Go ahead. Send out your invitations. There isn't much time left, only a week. I'll see that the table is got up properly. Yes, yes; I am in earnest; indeed I am."

"To think that she shouldn't know that!" he laughed aloud, when she had left the room. "A

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Pontificalian for six months, and not know that! Shall I let her do it? Shall I let her put us both in the pillory to be laughed at by every body? Well, I think I shall."

Early next morning he carried the invitations in person to Mr. John Stokes, the Brown of our city, and charged him to deliver them without fail that very forenoon.

"Well, if that ain't curous!" observed Mr. Stokes to himself, after he had run over the names on the envelopes and read one of the cards. "Well, that's about the greenest. However, a job's a job, and wages is wages. You pays your money and you has your choice."

From this time forward Mr. Pullet showed an intense interest in the party. He engaged a band of eight instruments, and ordered a supper for eighty people. He attended personally to the preparations, allowing Mrs. P. to take no trouble beyond her unavoidable anguish (which he could not share) of being fitted to a new silk dress, low-necked and short-sleeved, and tight-waisted. He talked of the oncoming reception with a grin of anticipatory delight which was not reflected in the countenance of his wife, much troubled at the thought of those majestic and doubtful Vanderpools and Swammerdams. Dawned at last the morning of the thirteenth of February.

"It's clear. It's going to be a beautiful day," said the newly-risen Mrs. Pullet, drawing her curtain and looking abroad. "I think it will turn out grandly; don't you, dear? They've only sent about a dozen declines. That leaves fifty or sixty people who are sure to come—I suppose—don't you, dear?"

Mrs. Pullet was very affectionate of late, partly because her husband let her have her own sweet way, and partly because, alarmed at her own audacity in the matter of the party, she wanted to cling to somebody. Mr. Pullet, his face in the wash-basin, bubbled some incomprehensible answer.

"Yes, we may expect at least fifty—or sixty," continued the wife. "Not many, but so select! I am so glad we didn't invite any common folks and make a stupid mixture of it. It's always horrid when people don't know each other, and don't want to. I think it will turn out splendidly, don't you, dear? It must; of course it must. I wish it was over."

This last phrase was uttered with a little gasp of dread, which she could not overcome. The lady was rather less sanguine than her wont, the stake for which she played being a heavy one, you see, and the game uncommonly, not to say painfully, delicate. In spite of the eventfulness of the day the sun set about the usual time, not tarrying over Ajalon or any other locality. The supper—in all its luxuriance of game, chicken, salad, boned turkey, sandwiches, creams, jellies, kisses, cakes, wines, and lemonade—arrived, and was crowded with much difficulty upon a great table in a little dining-room. The parlors were arranged for the tenth time. Mr. Stokes and his assistants received their final directions; and the Pullets retired to put on their finest feathers. I can not stop to relate minutely how Mrs. Pullet rigged herself; how like a glove her new silk fitted, and how well it showed her plump arms and shoulders; how the color crept from her cheeks to her chin and forehead until her whole face bloomed like a peony; how she thought several times that the bell rang, and fidgeted lest the company should arrive before she was ready; nor how she perked before the glass, twisting and fluttering like a canary. All women dress pretty much alike, I am told, although I can not, of course, vouch for the statement. As for Mr. Pullet, his manner and expression varied strangely from moment to moment. Now he grinned to himself over some mysterious joke; now he looked anxious, and glanced dubiously at Mrs. Pullet. At eight precisely they descended to the parlor, where they took seats and stared silently at each other, much as people do when they are waiting the train in a railway station.

"My dear, what time is it?" asked Mrs. Pullet, after a while.

"Just half past eight," returned the husband, looking at his watch.

"Dear me! I should think it was ten."

So it might have been; and much later too, had time been counted for that evening by her heart-beats.

"My dear, what time is it?" inquired Mrs. Pullet, after another wearisome period.

"Wants eleven minutes of nine."

"Gracious!" exclaimed the lady, with ill-concealed apprehension.

"Nobody come," observed Pullet, also a little uneasy, but smiling to himself occasionally.

"Of course not," returned Mrs. Pullet, spiritedly. "Half past eight means nothing, you know. Genteel people always come late. We needn't expect a person that we have invited before nine."

The gentleman looked as if he didn't expect a person at all, but made no observations.

At nine o'clock Mrs. Pullet rose and looked out of the window for the twentieth time, by no means happy. Suddenly she danced back, clapping her hands and exclaiming, "Here is a carriage!"

Mr. Pullet gave a low whistle, as if some astonishment mixed with his joy. After the proper amount of bell-ringing had been done, a lady in white entered and rushed up stairs to the dressing-room, piloted by the blushing and stammering Irish handmaiden. Mrs. Pullet, who had got sight of the stranger through a door crack, whispered, "It's Miss Sloper. She's genteel. I've seen her coming out of the Swammerdams'!"

Another half hour elapsed, bringing no more carriages. To state a vulgar fact distresses me, but I feel bound to give an exact idea of Mrs. Pullet's feelings, and I can best do it by confessing that she perspired with anguish. There were moments when she was tempted to go up

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google stairs and murder Miss Sloper, merely to prevent her from witnessing her empty parlors.

"Oh, Joseph! don't you think they are coming?" she whimpered. "They will come, won't they? And there's that hateful old maid up stairs waiting! And there's the supper will be wasted! And the band? Oh dear! if they do stay away, after not having sent their declines, I vow it's too bad!"

She stopped talking and tried to control her feelings, for the rustle of Miss Sloper's dress was heard descending the stairway, and immediate gentility was necessary.

"How do you do, Miss Sloper?" she forced herself to say. "Let me make you acquainted with Mr. Pullet. Extremely happy to see you. You are our first arrival."

"So it appears," answered the guest slowly, as if in a state of self-possessed and rather lazy wonderment. "I came too early for your company, doubtless."

"Oh, so glad you did, to be sure!" gasped Mrs. Pullet, who was really not in a fit frame for conversation.

Miss Sloper was a fashionable lady, on the autumn side of thirty, who never missed a party for fear she might miss her destined husband, and went out unattended in preference to staying at home alone. It was after mature reflection that she had decided to come to the Pullets, on the ground that it might be pleasanter to be courted by a Bethelite than by nobody. A veteran of the world, she showed it now, however curious and puzzled, by looking perfectly at her ease, in fine contrast to Mrs. Pullet's choking mortification and Mr. Pullet's nervousness of guilt.

"Really, I suppose you are quite surprised to see me," she went on. "It is, of course, very naughty of me at this season. I suppose I don't mind these devotional matters as I ought. I am so shamefully Low-Church that it is next door to no-church. And so here I am, although it is not at all the thing—indeed thoroughly unfashionable—for Pontificalians to go out in Lent."

Poor Mrs. Pullet! In her natural thoughtlessness, or her Bethelite ignorance, she had selected for her party the first day of that great and solemn fast of the Pontifical, Episcopal, Catholic, and other venerable churches. When the Vanderpools, the Roosevelts, the Swammerdams, and so forth, received her cards they had glared in indignant wonder, not more at being invited by people whom they hardly knew by sight than at being expected to disgrace their caste by going out in that holy season. The majority of them felt that the double impertinence justified them in answering the Pullets no otherwise than by a contemptuous, and, as they supposed, a significant silence. Only a few were considerately humane enough to send the ordinary formal "regret."

Yes, poor Mrs. Pullet! She understood in an instant that she had failed, and why she had failed. It was a moment of such awful disappointment, such intolerable humiliation, that it crushed all diplomacy out of her, making her as frank as a child in the utterance of her distress.

"Oh dear! I didn't know it," she gasped.

"But, of course, you have not confined your invitations to our set," insinuated Miss Sloper, with an encouraging smile.

"Indeed I have," was the simple utterance of Mrs. Pullet's despair.

Even Miss Sloper was startled into unconcealable astonishment, not without a threatening of laughter; but in a moment she recovered herself, and in another moment she had taken her resolution.

"Then I must express my regrets," she said, with a courtesy which, considering her own disappointment, was little less than magnanimity. "I fear that you will find me the only apostate among your invitées. And now it is probably best that I should take my leave. Good-evening."

"Don't go, Miss Sloper!" exclaimed Pullet. "You are a sensible lady. You know how to do awkward things handsomely. I wish you would stay and take something, and hear a tune or two."

"Thank you, Mr. Pullet. Thank you for the invitation, and thank you most heartily for the compliment. But don't you see that I had better go? Please have my coachman told. Good-night."

She ran up stairs; she rustled down again in a minute; she was waited on to her carriage by Mr. Pullet; and she drove away, the first, the last, the only guest.

"Oh, I've done with them!" sobbed Mrs. Pullet when her husband re-entered. "They are too queer for me. I don't want any more of them. I hate Pontificalians. I hate grand people. So formal—so heartless. I hate 'em."

Mrs. Pullet kept her word, and became a faithful and bitter Bethelite from that day forward, sneering at Doctor Surplus, rejecting Pontificacy, and holding Lent in special abomination.

"Verily," Mr. Pullet used to say, "wrath is a converting ordinance."

HOW I HAPPENED TO MARRY.

SOMETIMES, in obituary notices, the newspapers give us the causes of death. Why not the causes of marriage? We should be vastly more entertained. For instance:

"After a lingering flirtation, Job Smith to Kate Fling.

"'All things come round to him who will but wait.'"

Or—

"In a fit of pique, the disappointed Washington Gray to the stupid Miss White.

"'Beware of desperate steps. The darkest day—'"

And so forth.

Now I propose to give as briefly as possible the rise and progress of my acquaintance with the second Mrs. P., and why I was induced to make her my wife.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I had thought I should never marry again. When I boarded with my little family at Mrs. Gilson's I remarked to my landlady, with deep feeling, that, in case I should be absent in time of fire, I hoped she would not forget to visit my room and take from the wall my wife's portrait. I felt that I could calmly part with a small portion of my wardrobe; but the likeness of my sainted Elizabeth I could never spare. "Where I go, thou goest," said I; "and never while I have my senses shall the canvas which represents the sweet features of my lost darling be converted by a second wife into a fire-board."

I had been for years a wholesale grocer in good and regular standing, and should no doubt have continued in the same business up to the present time if I had not been satisfied that my four children were suffering for country air and freedom. I am not a rich man, but I have a competency; and I decided to retire from the city to the town of Piccadilly, and devote my energies to the cultivation of garden seeds.

Piccadilly is a small but thriving village, with a salubrious climate, and a population of some fifteen hundred souls. For years I had heard of the superior intelligence and morality of Piccadilly. My lamented Elizabeth had been partially educated at its Academy, which still flourished there behind four Lombardy poplars.

"Papa," said Caroline, my eldest, a girl of fourteen, the week after our arrival, "'Tilda is homesick, and says she must leave us."

Matilda was our housekeeper, who had lived with us for ten years, and thoroughly understood the ways of her mistress, the deceased Mrs. Pratt. At the intelligence that she had given warning I was so much startled that I spilled my coffee into my bosom; but seeing Caddy in tears, I controlled myself, and said, stoically:

"No doubt, my dear, we shall continue to live without 'Tilda. I can only say she is a very foolish girl; and we must find some one else who will do better."

Then I left the table and went into my garden; for it was time to transplant the early tomatoes.

'Tilda asked my pardon that noon with red eyes, but with her carpet-bag dangling from her arm. "She was fit to die with grief at leaving the dear children," she said, "but stay she could not, and would not, with the whole village peeping into her pantry. She wasn't used to country folks, and wouldn't stand and be told she put too much cream into her dough-nuts. And that woman that sat in the cupalo would be the death of her yet."

I afterward ascertained that Matilda referred to Miss Peters, a worthy lady who lived opposite, and watched us from her sitting-room window, which, as affording the facilities of an observatory, Matilda had likened to a cupola.

There was no help for it, and our housekeeper left.

"It is so strange she dislikes this village," said Caddy. "I think it's beautiful; for every body takes such an interest in us, papa. I never go out but I am asked all sorts of questions about you and the children; as if people really cared for us, you know. But I think I've found out why 'Tilda wouldn't stay; it's because you're a widower."

"Because what?"

"Why, you see, papa, she says it makes remarks. 'Tilda is a young woman; and Miss Peters says you are likely to marry again. Oh tell me, dear papa, that you certainly will not!"

"You foolish child!" replied I, laughing; though at the same time I could have wept to think of my darling's head being filled with such nonsense—"I have no intention of marrying any one, certainly not my kitchen girl; so dismiss such a foolish idea."

As I spoke I looked at the portrait of my departed Elizabeth hanging over the piano, and sighed. For two years that woman had been "dust and daisies," but had I ever ceased to regret her? Had I ever thought of filling the vacant place at my fireside by any other presence? Too well I knew the matchless worth of her I had lost.

Now commenced a vigorous search for a domestic. I was proudly informed that no foreigners were to be found in that virtuous region, and I was sure of good American help. To the detriment of my early vegetables I spent days in riding about the country, like a distracted knight of chivalry, demanding of every one I met where I could find a fair Dulcinea to be queen of the rolling-pin.

Meanwhile my poor little Caddy did her blundering best. The children were kept from absolute rags, though every time I looked at them a rent appeared or a button disappeared. We had what were called breakfast, dinner, and supper, and tried to swallow the will for the deed; but one can't digest mistakes.

Matilda had been gone two weeks, and still no successor, only conditional promises from three or four quarters. Presently they began to drop in one by one. First, Arabella Jones, who had been waiting, I believe, to finish a head-dress. The most I can say of her is, that she curled her hair, and the multitudinous ringlets were a daily triumph of mind over matter. Of her other characteristics I am not qualified to speak, as she staid only one day. She was followed by a sad Mrs. Winkle, who had survived two or three husbands, wore a black breast-pin like a small tombstone, had a memorial snuff-box, made low-spirited bread, and punctuated her remarks with deep sighs.

So funereal was her appearance, so depressing her influence, that we seemed to be dwelling in a sarcophagus; and I was not sorry to learn from the communicative neighbors that she couldn't make up her mind to stay, didn't think it looked well, Mr. Pratt "being a widower so, and such a very sociable man."

I tried to recall what I had ever said to the bereaved Mrs. Winkle which would stigmatize me as a very sociable man; but could remem-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ber nothing I might not have uttered with propriety in a grave-yard. So I concluded her needless apprehensions arose entirely from my "being a widower so."

The next was a lady who loved romance, and wrote many splendid things. But "she wouldn't do for me" on account of her propensity for giving tea-spoons to the pig, and dropping pins and fish bones into the gravy. I would have overlooked an occasional dish-cloth in the pudding, but when it came to choking my children all the father arose within me, and, at the risk of wounding the feelings of the poetess, I advised her to seek some more congenial employment.

"Alas!" thought I, "a foreigner would not come amiss. Much as the villagers pride themselves on good American help, I would be thankful to set my two eyes on a capable Irish girl who is not above her business."

One day the unhappy Caddy informed me that Miss Peters from her observatory had seen the chickens entering the kitchen, the mop reposing on a wheel-barrow, and the two youngest children rolling the sieve for a hoop. Under such circumstances it seemed to Miss Peters that "a head was needed." She wondered if in all my experiments I had ever tried to engage the daughter of Widow Wilcox?

"Widow Wilcox?" The name sounded familiar, though during our short stay in the village I had not to my knowledge met such a person or any of her daughters.

I called on Miss Peters for more definite information, which I found her very ready to give. She was a lady of some fifty single summers, with a cold eye like thick blue ice, and a face which looked as if it had been steeped in the vinegar of crushed hopes.

The Widow Wilcox lived, she said, on the Low Farm "that was." "You turned off by the Academy, and kept on about half a mile till you came to a leather-colored house with green blinds and laylock bushes before the front windows. Mehetabel was as faculized a girl as there was in Piccadilly; her folks were good livers, and she could cook as nice victuals as Queen Victory."

By anxious inquiry I learned that she did not wear curls, neither took snuff nor sighed between her sentences, and was not so literary as to endanger either tea-spoons or juvenile windpipes. There was but one objection, Miss Peters assured me; Mehetabel hadn't been used to living out much, and might feel above it. The family were as poor as Job's turkey (I have since consulted Kitto's commentaries, but find no mention of Job's keeping poultry), but in spite of their poverty they were "big-feeling, stuck-up, and proud."

I sighed and remarked with pathos that I had already suffered deeply from the arrogance of "American help," and if the character of the incomparable Miss Wilcox was such as represented I should despair of securing her services.

Miss Peters soothed me by the assurance that she didn't believe but Mehetabel would come for a while any how, just to accommodate; and with this hope I left my kind neighbor and betook myself to the "leather-colored house behind the laylock bushes." It was quite unlike the habitations to which I had usually been directed, and had, so to speak, a cultivated air. A well-bred lady in a widow's cap met me at the door and invited me to enter. I inquired for Miss Mehetabel, and my hostess going to call her did not again return.

While left alone I had time to look about me and observe the appointments of the room, which were in harmony with the taste and refinement so evident in the grounds. The books scattered over the centre-table were such as one sees in any family of culture; the engravings and paintings on the walls, though somewhat cheaply framed, had been admirably selected; there was even a piano in the room, with abundance of the best sheet-music. I found myself so well entertained by some stereoscopic views that I had nearly forgotten my errand when Miss Wilcox entered. I can hardly say I was surprised to see a graceful, well-dressed young lady, for her surroundings had prepared me to expect it; but I certainly had not looked for such queenliness of manner. I muttered an inward protest against Miss Peters who had directed me to this piece of elegance, and another against my thoughtless Caddy who had allowed me to leave the house with such a shabby coat. During the reign of Elizabeth I had scarcely given a thought to my outside apparel, for that excellent woman had had a general oversight of my gear; and it now occurred to me as a new idea that I was allowing myself to fall to wreck and ruin. I felt an inclination to seize my hat and run, but, summoning all my manhood, resolved to brave it out and make myself as agreeable as possible.

Miss Wilcox, with true politeness, soon set me at ease, and in the course of half an hour I was conversing with her as unrestrainedly as if we were old acquaintances and I had come for a social call. She had known my late wife, she said, had seen her graduate with high honors at the Academy. Herself a mere child, she had been brought out of several small troubles by Miss Vennebal's kindness, and remembered her with gratitude as a peace-maker. Yes, it was so characteristic of Elizabeth to befriend the little ones. At length I asked Miss Wilcox to play for me, and found her music as charming as her conversation. In short, I owned to myself that I had not spent so delightful an evening for years.

The time came when I must reluctantly take my leave, yet all this while I had not once remembered my errand. When I did think of it, it was with a swelling at the throat. It would surely be felicity to have such an accomplished creature to preside over my house, if only "for a while, just to accommodate," as my neighbor had expressed it; but how could

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I ask such a favor? I reviewed Miss Peters's words: "Mehetabel hadn't been used to living out much." So it seemed she had occasionally done so. There was no accounting for the democracy in small country-places. Those white hands not only made the bread at home, but did it, on occasion, in the houses of others. Probably Miss Mehetabel, with all her refinement, had in her composition a tincture of the strong-minded. And why, I asked myself, should not a lady do kitchen-work for distracted families as well as write poetry for thankless editors? It is the mind that dignifies the employment. "Act well thy part, there all the honor lies."

Fortifying myself with these reflections, I began with the meekness of Tom Pinch to describe the desolation and anarchy of my home. I told Miss Wilcox I had always supposed children were as easily trained as pea-vines, and not liable to send out tendrils in any perverse or inconvenient directions, but I found myself utterly mistaken. Now "there was no king in Israel, and every child did that which was right in his own eyes."

She seemed sorry for me. I went on to describe the incompetent servants we had had, and the state of complete despair at which I had arrived. Presently I observed she was smiling, not derisively, but because the details which I related were irresistibly amusing.

Encouraged by her manifest sympathy, will you believe I was mad enough to ask Miss Wilcox to come and do my housework? Woe to the insane impulse which prompted me! Woe to the malicious Miss Peters who had sent me hither on purpose to make game of me, and at the same time to humiliate the high-bred "Mittie."

"My dear young lady," said I, clearing my throat with a "now or never" resolution, "it is true I have seen you but a short time, yet you already seem like an old acquaintance; and even before I came here this evening I knew you by reputation."

Here I hesitated. Miss Wilcox was evidently wondering what I meant to say next. I wondered myself. "I will put it on the score of humanity," thought I.

"As I was about to say, my dear Miss Wilcox, will you, whom I justly deem the—the—very person most fitted for the position—will you—with your woman's heart, seeing me as I am—as a—a suppliant as I may say, at your mercy, will you take pity on me and—"

Here I paused for want of a word which should be sufficiently inoffensive and at the same time convey my meaning. I looked at Miss Wilcox, who seemed to be bracing herself to meet some kind of a shock. How could I, though with the gentlest courtesy, ask this exquisite young lady to be my cook and chambermaid? But it was necessary to proceed.

"I hardly know what you will think of me," said I, with a ghastly smile, "for I seem to be tongue-tied, or partially so, but I—I—if you would condescend, as I said before, to take pity on a poor bereaved man with a helpless little family, motherless as you may say, I feel—I know—that your presence at my fireside would make me happier, would make—"

Miss Wilcox looked agitated.

"Mr. Pratt," replied she, seeing I had come to a long dash, "you have taken me entirely by surprise. It is true you are not unknown to me by reputation, and I remember your wife."

"Ah, yes!" exclaimed I, resolved to make an appeal to the better feelings of Miss Wilcox, who was, I feared, about to slip through my fingers. "And my sainted Elizabeth, if she could look down upon us, would, I am sure, bless you for trying to soften the lot of a struggling man. Only say yes, my kind friend, and—name the day."

I was intending to say, "Set your own price," but the mention of wages to the exquisite young lady before me seemed absolutely impertinent. In my embarrassment I quite forgot that I had not yet stated what it was I wished her to do for "a struggling man." But my unconnected words had evidently conveyed to her some sort of meaning, for she had become very pale and was leaning against a chair for support. She saw I was awaiting an answer.

"Mr. Pratt," said she, in a tremulous voice, "allow me to say that I regard your proposition as a little ill-timed. Why this desperate haste? I thank you for the honor you do me, but at least allow me a little time to become acquainted with you. You can not expect me to bestow my affections upon an utter stranger, who has not even professed any regard for me."

Imagine the situation! It came over me like lightning, flash on flash. Here had I been stammering and stuttering a proposal to this girl! At any rate she thought so. What should I do? What could I do? The perplexity may have been ludicrous, but I am sure it was very, very embarrassing! How could I tell her that what she had mistaken for an offer of marriage was only a request for her services in my kitchen?

No, if I had to burn at the stake I couldn't do it. A man of expedients might have crept out of such a noose—not I. Moreover, I didn't feel half so wretched as I should have expected. My heart gave a double beat—half fright, half joy. The fact that I had by pure accident taken a fatal step and could not retrace it, struck me then and there as a special providence. I had done it with my eyes shut, but, in Cupid's name, what better could I have done with my eyes open? Here was a superior woman, acknowledged even by the envious Miss Peters to be a capital housewife, and to my knowledge a charming companion. What more could I ask in a wife? I thought very fast, but the more I thought the more certain I was that I had only anticipated matters a little; for I was already in love, and must inevitably have come to a proposal sooner or later. It was over, and I hadn't had it to dread either—some compensation this to a diffident man!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

So without any very prolonged pause I took Miss Wilcox's hand, and this is what I said to her as I was leaving the house:

"My dear friend, I do not ask you to take a hasty step. Consult your own heart; and that you may do so more effectually I hope with your leave to give you frequent opportunities of continuing our acquaintance. Take time to consider; but, believe me, your decision will materially affect my happiness. Good-night."

Her answer was given two months afterward; and, if the editor had not objected, I should have published last Christmas the following remark:

"Thanks to the malice of Miss Jerusha Peters, the delighted James Pratt to the very obliging Miss Wilcox. No cards."

BUSHY AND JACK.

THAT fearful eruption known as the "breaking out of the war" found us in a Southern city living comfortably if not luxuriously. But in 1863 the place became "too hot to hold us," owing to the bursting of bomb-shells, and so we "refugeed" into the interior of Georgia.

What to do with our three little black "responsibilities" was a question when we thought of the difficulties of travel; but "Miss Fanny" remembered the days of her youth when their mother was her play-mate and maid, and the confidence with which the dying mother left them to her care, and she felt she could never leave them behind; they must go too; and go they did. Pete and Bob were deposited in a safe place, but Bushy followed us in our exile, and was transformed by the fate of war from the marble-playing, soldier-chasing urchin of peace times into the factotum of our poor establishment. He was house-boy, yard-boy, stable-boy, cook, at times, and occasionally even chamber-maid and baby's nurse. He took his turn at each of these employments indeed, but never in a sufficiently animated manner to fatigue or discommode himself very seriously. In regard to work, our hero was philosophically calm; in fact, he was a "fat boy," and not to put too fine a point on it, a lazy boy, except about one thing. He had one ruling passion strong in laziness—and that was for donkey-riding.

Jack was a sullen, vicious-looking quadruped, which had been purchased expressly to facilitate the movements of our fat boy in his various expeditions into town after provisions, to the post-office, and the like. The most amusing thing was, that just in proportion to Bushy's devotion to riding was Jack's detestation of being ridden; so there was always a ludicrous scene at the outset, which called forth all the inmates of the cottage to witness the departure. A stranger seeing for the first time the heavy motions and languid expression of this curly-headed darkey as he dragged baby's little carriage, or swept the newly-fallen leaves from the piazza, would have been surprised at the sudden illumination of his Oriental-looking eyes, and his general change of manner if an order was given to saddle up. It was (on a small scale) like the unexpected bugle-call to a squad of idle, loafing troopers.

Jack would be saddled and bridled in a jiffy, and led up to the back-door to wait until Bushy had received his commands; and in that waiting attitude, with head hung down and ears flopped back, to the uninitiated he looked like the embodiment of meekness. But the more knowing ones learned better to understand the expression of his "vicked old eye." It was Jack's way to preserve this appearance of humble submission until that very critical moment, when the rider, having placed one foot in the stirrup, was gracefully sweeping the air with the other in search of stirrup number two, when with the most surprising agility, and in the most extraordinary manner, he seemed to rear up behind and before all at once, and the would-be rider found himself on his own back instead of Jack's; that "'ceitful creetur" having trotted off to sulk it out either in the stable or a sly corner of the yard, rendering his recapture more or less difficult according to circumstances. Few eye-witnesses ever appreciated the fun of being in Bushy's position, however funny it might be to see him go through the performance; but the earth was soft, Jack's legs were short, and somehow donkey-riding was exactly "the thing" to the fat boy's taste.

By-and-by, after a good deal of experience, Bushy grew so up to his ways that Jack seldom succeeded in throwing him when in the act of mounting. This was managed by dispensing altogether with the use of the saddle and stirrups, instituting in place of the former a pad of his own manufacture. Adjusting this carefully, and securing it by means of a strap, he sprung into his seat with a bound, locked his fingers together in the thick mane of the donkey, and dug his heels into his ribs. Then the donkey might dance or he might prance, he might go down on his fore-legs or up on his hind-legs, he might run forward with his head between his knees, and stop with a jerk—it was all the same. The boy and the beast, like the fabled Centaur, were as one. Finding at last that it was no use rebelling, the "onwillin' mule" would pause and meditate a minute, then trot off as quietly as—well as he might have done at first. Then came the hour of triumph to Bushy as his grinning face indicated; and as his retreating form was lost to sight, his voice borne back to us in his favorite "Jödel" testified to his delight.

This "Jödel" (as we named it, because we had no word in our vocabulary to express the sound, and imagined it resembled in character that "song without words" with which the Tyrolean peasants wake their mountain echoes) warned us also of his return home. Jack's demeanor, when his journey was accomplished, was the very reverse of what it had been before starting. With firm step he climbed the hill,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

seemingly bent upon doing his whole duty, and one could almost believe he had repented of his past misconduct and resolved on reformation. But if it was so he was like many graver sinners—he forgot his good resolutions when the time of trial came. Bushy's opinion was that Jack's "ticklish" spot lay just under the saddle-cloth, and that was the reason he acted so at first, and then "got over it," and bore his burdens home so faithfully. A sack of newly-ground meal and another of grist, equally balanced on either haunch, a bundle of hay in the middle between the two sacks, the fat boy with his mail-bag dangling from his neck in front, and a basket of things in the grocery line dangling behind, and perhaps a bundle or two under his arms—it was thus they generally came back from town.

Then, besides the news contained in the mail-bag, we gathered many interesting items from the lips of our messenger, whose eyes and ears were always open in the daytime. Picking up a word here and a word there, as they dropped from the lips of people on the street-corners, he could weave them into very plausible stories, and sometimes very horrible ones. In our isolated situation, where the mind had nothing to do but to feed upon the images of battle-fields and the anticipation of an approaching army, we women were startled by every floating rumor and ready to believe any thing.

Next to donkey-riding our fat boy loved to create a sensation, and he caused many a needless panic among us. Several times he almost persuaded us to fly before Sherman's army when that army was hundreds of miles away. One of his stories, however, fixed upon him the name of the "unreliable gentleman," and ruined his reputation forever.

He came from town one day, spreading the news as he came, that "Savannah River was afire." It would probably surprise those whose nerves had not been preyed upon by a thousand cares and ten thousand vague apprehensions to know that this piece of news spread consternation throughout our little neighborhood for a day or two—in fact, until the matter could be investigated. There were some refugee negroes near us, who had left friends and property in their homes on the river, who, without reasoning on the likelihood of the story, accepted it literally and set up a great lamentation. The interpretation placed upon it by the white folks was, that the dwellings, barns, etc., on the banks of the river were being burnt. But, traced back to its origin, we found that our "little pitcher" had caught at the concluding words in a conversation between two gentlemen: "There's no telling what to believe. I should not wonder if the next news is, that Savannah River is afire!" That was enough for our sensationist.

But all things have an end, so did Bushy's felicity in going to town after supplies "a hoss-back." The boys always found him out, and gathered around him in the most annoying manner. At the very outskirts of the city the recruits began to come in; each tangle-pated tow-head forsook the construction of his mud fortification beside the dirty drain; whole garrisons gave up their forts, and besiegers threw down their arms without stopping to take possession. "Feds" and "Confeds," united by one common interest, rushed to the standard of the Jackass. Forming a triumphal procession they escorted him through all the principal streets, drawing the attention of passers-by with such cries as "Here's yer mule!" "Here's yer rider!" and occasionally varying the performance by taking such liberties with Jack's person as caused him to "cut up" in the most ridiculous way, to the infinite delight of the youthful rabble, and equal disgust of the defenseless Bushy. 'Twas not that he objected to the publicity of the thing, nor to exhibiting the graceful actions of his Rosinante, and his skill in sticking on, but his opinion was, that "there is a time for all things," that "bizness is bizness," and that when he was sent he "liked to go and come back wi'out spillin' ebery ting!"

Bushy being a sturdy boy, and having as much confidence in his pugilistic powers as in his equestrian accomplishments, fairly ached on such occasions to dismount and give the ringleaders of this lawless crowd a good polishing off; but he dared not trust his beast under such circumstances, and concluded to grin and bear it, and bide his time. It was on account of these trials that the idea of having a donkey-cart suggested itself to his imagination. He pictured to himself how he could leap from his perch at a safe distance behind Jack's heels, disperse the mob with a few well-aimed shoulder hits, and jump back without danger to his own life and limbs, or to any of his numerous packages. His heart was so set upon the said cart that it was not long before he obtained the desired article, and his way was made smooth.

Soon after this event "Miss Fanny," thinking with Mr. Sparrowgrass that chickens were good things to have in the country (especially in war times), allowed her "big yaller hen" to go to setting. When the little chicks came she was mightily perplexed to know what to do to save them from the clutches of the hawks; for the hen was the "contrayriest critter that ever was," and would go off among the bushes to look for something a little better than was provided for her near the house door. There, while the little ones were dodging the showers of leaves and sand, waiting for the mother's cluck—their dinner bell—to call them to the repast, and the foolish old hen was exulting over the lovely brood in blissful unconsciousness, Miss Fanny would perhaps espy a cruel hawk watching this interesting family group with his greedy eyes, and before she could say "Jack Robinson" down he'd swoop and carry off a chick, leaving Miss Fanny and the hen both in a state of great indignation. Something (thought the former) must be done to put a stop to these depredations, so Bushy was called in to a consultation.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

He immediately suggested a chicken-coop, to serve as a jail for the old rover, and prevent her from endangering the lives of her offspring. Bushy assumed the responsibility either to buy or build one "in no time!" Preferring negotiation to hammering, he first scoured the neighborhood to see if any body had "ary hen-coop to spare." Succeeding to the best of his wishes, he was soon on the road with Jack and his cart to bring it home.

Miss Fanny laughed as she had not laughed in many a day to see the way the lazy boy had contrived to avoid walking home. The size of the cart not admitting of any accommodation for him beside the coop, he had first mounted the platform, then caused the thing to be placed over him like an extinguisher. Not caring to be quite extinguished the brave lad had worked a passage for his head and shoulders through a sort of window in the roof of the concern, and there he rode hanging by the armpits, as happy as a lord, and singing in his lustiest voice. So ridiculous was the sight that Miss Fanny was not at all surprised to hear from his own lips that he and Jack had scared Miss Bessie Fay's well-trained horse nearly out of his wits, as that young lady happened to be taking her afternoon ride upon him, and encountered the nondescript affair in a short turn of the road. He thought it wonderful that Miss Bessie did not get "throwed," for her horse reared straight up, and then started off like a deer; but she laughed as she went, and shaking her whip at him called out, "You little rascal, you've frightened my horse almost to death!"

It was a great luxury to this youth to "spin yarns." Nothing pleased him better than to get a party of little darkeys around him at night and tell such tales of hags, buck-eyes, Jack-o'-lanterns, etc., as would have caused each particular hair to stand on end if it could have done so, and their eyeballs so to protrude that it was with great difficulty Morpheus could pull down the lids after they had gone to bed and tried to go to sleep.

Miss Fanny was sometimes alone in the evenings, or would have been alone but for the ever handy factotum. On such occasions she would willingly let him talk to make sure of his keeping awake. One winter night, when he had taken his seat in the most convenient place to replenish the fire and keep the lightwood blazing (tallow-candles being reserved for rare occasions), he waited patiently for a chance to begin. Silently he observed the effect of the lullaby on the restless baby, for he knew when its tender form had been yielded up to the soft embraces of the cradle, Miss Fanny would indulge in the luxury of a cup of tea (a luxury she would not have thought she could afford, but for the sake of that blessed baby), and that under the soothing influence of that precious beverage she would patiently listen to any of his wonderful stories. Like a skillful General he watched his opportunity, and then struck out in his own peculiar dialect.

"Miss Fanny, did you eber hear der story ob der Tar Baby; B'r Rabbit an' B'r Wolf?"

"No?"

"Well, I can tell it ter yer, jest like Uncle Pomp did tell it to we childurns in de big kitchen chimbly-corner. He say all der wild critters in der woods is 'lation to we niggers, an' so we calls um brudder. Dis am de way he tell de story:

Wunce dare wuz a ole man, en he hab wun pease-patch, an' eb'ry mornin', wen'e go for look at he pease-patch he see B'r Rabbit bin dare. No trap good 'nuff for ketch B'r Rabbit, 'tel wun day de ole man he mek wun leetle house; den he say, "Now I got um! he sure for go in dey, tink him gwine lib like buckra! Yaw! yaw!" So de ole man set down he house way'e ken ketch B'r Rabbit eye; an' wen B'r Rabbit cum'd soon een de mornin' he seed dis leetle house, an' he taut he would tek a look eenside; but quick as he get cen, de do' slam! bam! fassen B'r Rabbit up. Den de ole man cum fine um dare; so he say, "Berry well, Mister Rabbit! I'se got you at lass, is I? Nebber mind! I soon gie you sumting, an' put you way you teef no mo' my pease! jess wait wun leetle bit."

De ole man tell he son fur mek up big fire, an' him tek he hatchet, gon' der wood for cut switch. Bumbye, B'r Wolf he cum 'long a wisslin to heself, en B'r Rabbit yerry um. So he holler out, berry sweet mout, "B'r Wolf! B'r Wolf! good-mornin; jest step dis way, my fren', an' look at my new house w'at's jess done build. It am rudder small for two eenside yer, but ef you'll open dat do', I'll cum out an' let you een!" So B'r Wolf (he fool to dat, for ebber lettin' Rabbit stick him finger in he yeye), he open de do' fur let B'r Rabbit out, en him gon' een for look at de house. Soon es him get een B'r Rabbit slam de do' on um, fassen B'r Wolf up. Den he say, "Good-by, me brudder, I gie you me new house, an' you ken tek my lickin', ole fellar! an' tanky, too!" So B'r Rabbit him clean out.

Bumbye, de ole man cum. He trow down he bundle ub switch off he shoulder an' gon' for git B'r Rabbit; but B'r Rabbit ain't bin dey dat time! B'r Wolf bin dare doe, a meckin heself small as he ken an' a lookin out de corner ub wun eye. Wen de ole man see um dey, 'stid ub B'r Rabbit, him bex for sowl; him say, "Huc cum you yer, Sur? an' wat's yer bizness? an' way's dat Rabbit?" B'r Wolf, him scare, so he say, berry easy like, "Oh, beg yer pardin, massa; but B'r Rabbit him call me, say, 'Cum see me new house;' den wen I git een, him shet me up, say me muss tek him lickin!" "Oh, berry well den, Mister Wolf! so you am de gemman wot let dat teef git 'way frum me! You see ef I no gie you B'r Rabbit!"

Den de ole man he meck reddy for tekin' holt ob B'r Wolf; but der ole feller him beg so pittyful de ole man hab for lissen. Den he say: "Tell yer wot, Wolf, I'se like you berry well, an' ain't got no grudge gin you no how; so ef you kin tell me how fur ketch dat Rabbit, I'se let you off dis time." B'r Wolf say: "Oh yis, massa; I kin tell yer! You jess git wun Tur Baby, en' stan' um up by de cow-track, way B'r Rabbit b'long; stop fur drink water een de mornin wen ee dun eat you peas, an you see eff you no ketch um!"

Well, de ole man he do so; an' show 'nuff wen B'r Rabbit cum for drink out de cow-track him seed der Tar Baby, a standin' up, so impident like—so him say, berry perlite, "Good-mornin' ter yer, ma'am!" De Baby no anser. B'r Rabbit say—"Eh! eh!" ter heself; he look um straight een e yeye an ax um a'gin, "Good-mornin ter yer, ma'am!" De Baby no anser. B'r Rabbit him bex! him say, "Who'se yer pappy an' yer mammy dat larnt you, yer no-manners, Miss?" De Baby no anser. B'r Rabbit say, "Look e' yer gal! you dunno me! You no talk ter me, me larn you wat manners is!" De Baby no anser! B'r Rabbit him draw off en hit um a slap. He han fassen ter der Tar Baby face! "Nebber mine, yer imp!" ee say, "I got nudder han', eff I hit yer wid dat I meck you laff t'udder side yer mont!" He hit um wid de odder han; de odder han' fassen. He hit um wid de right foot;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google de right foc 'assen. He hit um wid de leff foot; de leff foot fassen!

B'r Rabbit him dunno wuffer do, but ee tought ee would do dee bess ee could; so he say, "Look yer gal at dis yer head ob mine, wot you tink would cum ub you eff I was ter butt yer wid it? I tell yer dis fur wunce, now, yer better lem'me go!" De Baby no anser. He butt um wid he head, an' he head fassen! Wen B'r Rabbit tink 'pon de ting, him say, "Dis B'r Wolf doings!"

So B'r Rabbit him hang dey 'tell de ole man cum. B'r Wolf cum too, an' he say, "Der goot! der goot! Yer goot-for-nutting! now you gwine ketch it, en't yer?" De ole man say nutting, him jess meck de fire bun good, an' git he switch reddy ter wip B'r Rabbit. Wen ee ware out all him switch, den him say, "Now, teef! how yer like dat?" B'r Rabbit say, "Don't like um 'tall, ole massa."

Ole man den onfassen um frum der Tar Baby, an' ee say, "Now witch you rudder me trow you een der fire, or trow yer een der briar-patch?" B'r Rabbit say, "Do, ole massa, trow me een de fire, lem'me bun up wun time! Yer trow me een der briar-patch, briar scratch out all me yeye, den how I kin see fur git me bittle fur eat?" De ole man say, "Sarve yer right, yer teef! I trow yer een der briar for true—eff yer eye scratch out yer see no mo'e for cum eat my peas!"

So he teck B'r Rabbit, an' heab 'um right een de middle ob der briar-patch. Quick as B'r Rabbit ketch on he foot, him peep at de ole man wid he two eye, en' say, "See me yeye yer! dis war all my fambly lib!—tankey, ole massa! and good-by, B'r Wolf!"

Sence dat time B'r Rabbit an' B'r Wolf nebber keeps no kumpny togedder—nuntall, nuntall; an' de ole man nebber ketch dat chile, no mo'! but ebry mornin' wen he go for look at he pease-patch, he see B'r Rabbit bin dar.

Editor's Easy Chair.

THE romance of history is getting terribly battered by the truth. Niebuhr, and Arnold following him, blew away a score of the pleasant fables of early Roman tradition. Mr. Gould, an English antiquarian scholar, performs what he calls "the painful duty" of relieving history of the figure of William Tell, by telling us that the story is a universal tradition in many countries, and dates from a Norse hero of the eleventh century. Arnold Von Winkelried will probably follow; and what is to become of Leonidas? Homer is already a very ghostly and evanescent personage; and Shakspeare is fighting for his life. Does any body feel very sure that the young George Washington told his father that he did not dare to tell a lie?

Bancroft lays an unsparing hand, in his last volume, upon many of our own Revolutionary laurels; and now an accomplished historical scholar, Mr. Charles Deane, of Massachusetts, has relentlessly plucked the delicate story of Pocahontas and Captain Smith from our annals, and cast it away as a sheer fabrication. Yet, as Mr. Adams remarks in his admirable summary of Mr. Deane's labors, in the North American Review for January of this year, "No American needs to be told that this tale of Pocahontas is probably the most romantic episode in the whole history of his country."

"Is it not enough," asks some Virginian journal, "that the ruthless Yankee has devastated our fields and ruined our homes and slain our children? Must he also despoil the tomb? Will he not rest until he has rifled our very history of its choicest traditions, and stolen the brightest jewels of our romance?" What Vandal is this, who will not spare even the monuments of a sylvan and shadowy realm? What fierce iconoclast, who gleefully shatters the statues of a poetic humanity?

It does seem hard that so many pretty stories are trampled out of existence by truth. Is there any harm in believing that the wolf suckled Romulus? Why shouldn't Wellington have cried: "Up guards, and at them?" Alas! there is no conceivable reason—but he did not. If in extraordinary circumstances people would only say extraordinary things, it would wonderfully illuminate history. But whoever has been one of the victims who are offered "after the removal of the cloth" at public dinners to the unappeasable desire of hearing speeches will remember how sadly he reflected afterward, in the contemplative seclusion of bed, what he might have said, but what did not occur to him. All the happy hits—the touches of wit, of pathos, of poetry, every thing appropriate and striking that should have been said and was not—these marshal themselves in charming order and torture the orator, who derides himself to sleep. If we could only have a volume of the occasional speeches that were never made! It would match that of the memorable sayings that were never uttered.

But what the individual orator can not do upon small occasions the public does upon great. Feeling that at certain moments certain epigrams should have been uttered or heroic acts performed, it quietly assumes that they were, and the general instinct is so fully satisfied that it accepts the report without investigation, and from a mere sense of propriety. And these are the very parts of history which appeal most to the imagination. They are culled for the books of children. They inspire the painters. The poets sing them. The philosophers reason upon them. Noble theories start from them, and are supported by them—like palaces built upon sunset clouds, and buttressed by moonshine. Sometimes the traditions are pure invention; sometimes they are simply mythical; sometimes they are the result of what may be called an extreme possibility, as in the case of the alleged phrase of Wellington's. It seems to have been easier to say it than not. His action, his feeling, the whole spirit of the act said it, and impress it as actually said upon the imagination, although it failed to get into words at the time. It is in this way that some of the speeches in Thucydides are real, although they were never spoken.

But unluckily in no such way, nor in any other, is the legend of Pocahontas real. It turns out to be as wholly untrue as Cooper's Indians are unlike. A priori it is improbable because inconsistent with universal experience of the Indian character. Magnanimity, tenderness, humanity, are not characteristic of the red man or woman. Indeed, the only intrinsic argument of the truth of the story of Pocahontas is that which makes her exceptional, and is found in the fact that her conversion to Christianity and marriage with Rolfe show a peculiar sensitiveness to the influence of the white race and of civilization,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google which might have manifested itself instinctively upon first seeing a white man in peculiar peril. But the actual evidence destroys the possible inference. The ruthless Yankee has neatly scalped error with the tomahawk of truth, by which appropriate metaphor we arrive at the facts which Mr. Deane relates.

On the 14th of May, 1607, Captain John Smith and his companions founded Jamestown in Virginia. On the 10th of December he temporarily left the settlement to explore the Chickahominy, with two Englishmen and two Indians, and at a certain point leaving the Englishmen and one Indian to guard the canoe, Smith, with the other Indian, pushed on alone. The Indians attacked the whole party, and killing the other Englishmen, took Smith prisoner. He was taken to Powhatan, by whom he was kindly treated, and in a few days was restored to his friends.

Captain Smith immediately wrote "a true Relation of Virginia," which was published in London during the next year—1608. He describes in detail all the circumstances of his voyage and capture, but says not a word of the episode of Pocahontas. He mentions her merely as a pretty and clever child of ten years old, who once came to the colony with a messenger from Powhatan.

There is but one other contemporary authority, Edward Maria Wingfield, the first President of the colony, who went out to Virginia with Smith, and was in Jamestown when Smith went to the Chickahominy, was taken prisoner, and returned. Wingfield, of course, learned all the details of the event from Smith himself, and immediately after Smith's release returned to England and wrote an account of his administration. This was circulated in manuscript in London during the summer of 1608, and is the earliest known work upon the colony. It was ready in May or June, while Smith's manuscript of the "True Relation" did not reach England until July. But Wingfield, like Smith himself, is silent upon the beautiful story of Pocahontas, as Mr. Deane ascertained upon finding a copy of the manuscript in the Lambeth Library.

Captain Smith returned to England in the autumn of 1609, and never went back to Virginia. In the year 1612 he published at Oxford a map of Virginia with a description. In this he speaks of the Indian method of execution by dashing out the brains with a club—the fate from which Pocahontas is supposed to have rescued him—but still nothing is said of that event. Indeed the account of his captivity among the Indians asserts that he obtained his own liberty. Meanwhile, in 1610, William Strachey went to Virginia, and upon his return to England published in 1615 a history of travel in Virginia, freely using Smith's previous works. Strachey's book thus speaks of the Indian maid: "Pocahuntas, a well featured but wanton yong girle, Powhatan's daughter, sometymes resorting to our fort, of the age then of eleven or twelve yeares, would get the boyes forth with her into the markett place, and make them wheele, falling on their hands, turning up their heels upwards, whome she would followe and wheele so her self, naked as she was, all the fort over." But utterly mindless of the F. F. V.'s, the cruel Strachey who describes her as a gay athlete, says not a word of her saving Smith's life.

Next, in 1615, came Raphe Hamor's "True Discourse of the Present State of Virginia," with "The Christening of Powhatan's Daughter and her Marriage with an Englishman." This work gives a full account of Pocahontas, who had become of political importance as a hostage in the hands of the English, and as a convert to the English Church, through whom a great religious work might be done among the Indians. So when in June, 1616, Pocahontas, then Mrs. Rebecca Rolfe, arrived in England, she excited extraordinary interest and attention, and was the most conspicuous personage in society. King James, indeed, was disposed to be angry with Rolfe for daring to marry an imperial Princess. At the height of her renown Purchas published the third edition of his "Pilgrimage" in 1617. He knew Rolfe well, who lent him his Discourse upon Virginia, and Smith also had "gently communicated" his notes; but Purchas does not allude to the romantic deliverance of Smith by Pocahontas. In the same year, 1617, the Indian heroine died.

Up to this time all the authorities that are known to exist, Smith himself, Simons, who wrote a supplement to Smith's Description in 1612, Wingfield, Strachey, Hamor, Purchas, and Rolfe, her husband, do not allude to the story of Pocahontas, which, if true, was the most romantic and interesting in her life. It first appears in 1622, five years after her death, in a second and enlarged edition of a pamphlet, published by Captain Smith, called "New England's Trials," and intended to awaken interest in the New England fisheries. This was the third account he had given of his American adventures; and it is not improbable that the romantic celebrity of Pocahontas, and the fact that he was the first Englishman who had ever seen her, led him to draw attention to the cause he was advocating either by adopting or inventing the pretty story. We say adopting, because there may have been a score of tales current in the popular imagination of so unique a heroine.

At last, in 1624, sixteen years after the events of which he had at the time written a description, Captain Smith published his "Generall Historie," in which the familiar story of Pocahontas is fully told. It was issued after the Jamestown massacre of 1622 as an earnest appeal to turn the public attention to the colony, and to secure for himself a position under the Virginia Company. From that time until now the incident has remained unquestioned. The historians have repeated it with admiration and eloquence. It has been the shining Koh-i-noor in the very front of our annals; and now comes the expert, and after steadily gazing and carefully testing, he says to us quietly, your diamond is mere paste. But why should Virginia be disconsolate? If Randolph of Roanoke, who may have been proud of his descent from Pocahontas, had been severely questioned and had truthfully answered, would he have insisted that his pride in his ancestress was founded in the fact that she was humane, or that she was a king's daughter? Gentle and lovely all report makes her. It is easy to believe—it is impossible not to believe—that Rolfe's wife would readily do what Powhatan's daughter was said to have done. We lose a story only, not a woman; for it can not be denied that, according to all fair rules of historical evidence, it is now

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google quite clear that the pretty romance of Pocahontas and the captive Englishman must be dismissed as pure invention.

THE gay, young European diplomatist accustomed to the charms of the great foreign capitals — London, Paris, Vienna, Rome, and the scores of smaller but delightful cities—probably regards an attachment to the embassy of his country in the United States as a Bœotian exile. But when, eagerly curious to see the capital of this remote region, he is dumped in the railroad shed at Washington, and emerges upon the depthless mud or blinding dust of the city, upon its hackmen and porters, greedy of his last penny, and upon its general hopelessness of aspect, it is not difficult to imagine how his heart sinks, and how bitter the exile seems.

To the independent native of the country, however, Washington, as a city, is simply exasperating and ridiculous. Its one truly magnificent building, the Capitol, seems to have absorbed every thing else. Like a huge wen it has apparently sucked up all the life of the other buildings. Feeble, shapeless, ineffective, they huddle along the sides of the vast avenues, and, however closely they stand, give nothing but the impression of a straggling and clumsy village. Then there is the eternal absurdity of the plan. It is not only a straggling and clumsy village, but it is utterly dislocated. Washington is laid out upon the plan of cart-wheels within cart-wheels. The stranger is always going wrong. You meet him, say, near the junction of some avenue with some Fourth and a half street north. He has the expression of a long-confirmed but mild lunatic; and after gazing at you blandly and inquiringly for a moment, he says: "I am trying to find the corner of 9th and 15th streets." Of course he is. We all are in Washington. The folly would be evident elsewhere, but in Washington it is the most natural effort possible. There is but one reply to the candid and inquiring fellow-maniac: "My dear Sir, I have not the remotest conception where I am, or where any thing is." There is a fond delusion that the city radiates from the Capitol. Nothing is more fallacious. Washington is a system of hubs, and a consequent combination of radiations.

The depression arising from arrival, and the problem of the streets, is hardly relieved by alighting at Willard's. The entrance to that hotel is a cigar shop, a newspaper stand, and a loafing room. You press through to the office; but what is man that an American landlord should regard him? The house is full, has been full, and will be full. A few crisp words inform you that by-and-by, sometime, perhaps, possibly, you may be stowed away in the seventh story, and allowed to pay four or five dollars a day. The moderation of the landlords is always a subject of wonder and gratitude. It seems a matter of mere grace and sovereign good-will that they do not charge twenty dollars a night, with the privilege of making your own bed.

"Whew!" cried Don Giovanni, when, arriving in the capital of his country, he was made to undergo these initiatory steps, "will you please to tell me one single particular in which travel in Europe is not incomparably more agreeable and comfortable than in this country?" And he went on to compare the universal comfort and courtesy of foreign travel sadly to the disadvantage of the home of the brave. "Certainly there is no country in which the guest upon reaching his hotel is treated with such laughable condescension as in this. A wretched hole of a room, shabbily furnished—with dirty walls and a suspicious bed—with a quart of water and a pocket-handkerchief of a towel, for which he is to pay four or five dollars or more daily, is awarded to the humbly expectant visitor as a high favor. A great American hotel is a penitentiary for travelers, and the gentlemen in the office are the lofty turnkeys and lord high constables. A self-respecting man will travel here as little as he can."

There is no doubt that much travel at home is a discipline, replied the Easy Chair.

"Yes," continued the indignant Don. "If you are known personally to the gentlemanly gentleman who dispenses chambers you may be tolerably quartered. But if you are merely one of the herd who have the temerity to arrive by steamer or car, you may thank your stars if you are graciously permitted to leave your luggage in the hall and to have a room 'by-and-by.'"

Now the Easy Chair humbly hopes that all gentlemanly gentlemen concerned will not understand him as making these remarks. They all proceeded from the person who has been named, and who is alone responsible. The Easy Chair has not quite come to an end of his travels; and would he malign the gentlemanly and accommodating? He desires to state distinctly that if he could not open the window of his room, it was merely because he had a foolish wish for fresh air; and if he could not turn round, it was because of the inordinate size of his trunk; and if his fingers went through the towel, it was because his manner was rude toward a chamber ornament so delicate and small; and if the sheets of the bed were not wholly fresh, it was because the gentlemanly and accomplished chamber-maiden lady was of a nobly economical turn of mind; and if the bell would not ring, it was because some former guest had been so little able to restrain himself as to pull it down. Indeed there was nothing which did not admit of the fullest explanation. It is only the unreasonable who would complain of paying five dollars a day for such accommodations. "Let me tell you, Sir," whispered the gentlemanly gentleman at a certain office to a bewildered person who had been ordered up to a burrow in the seventh story, "you are very lucky to get in at all." But the bewildered traveler's face, it is asserted, was not so humbly grateful as the circumstances demanded.

Washington itself merely multiplies the impression of Willard's. Every thing is feverish and transitory. The fine houses are rented by Senators, by Representatives, by foreign Ministers, by army and navy officers, by families from other cities. They are taken for a season. Those who occupy them have no permanent interest in the city. The rule is almost universal. The Capitol, the White House, the Departments, the public buildings, are all full of men who came yesterday and are going to-morrow. Washington is a huge perch. All this tumult of twittering is from birds upon the wing who have lighted for a moment only. Even the noisiest

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google crows, the most solemn owls, are but for a day, or for two years, or for four years, or for six years.

There is a certain permanent population of the military and naval bureaus, over whose heads the storms of fashion and politics roar and break like tempests that toss the surface of the sea far above the placid monsters and coral insects of the deep. And there are a few immemorial office-holders, quiet men, who have grown old in certain ruts in which they can run with a facility that is absolutely essential. They feel that they have become part of the Government. The very oldest Senators and Representatives excite in their breasts a kind of compassionate sympathy as mere boys and tyros. And like heirs of old royal lines long since superseded, who cherish a secret conviction that modern times are a mere delusion and progress an absurd infatuation, and who are sure that some day the world will suddenly discover what a huge mistake it made in not continuing to be governed by the extinct line, and so return to its allegiance, the faithful plodders in the official ruts do still believe that the party—whatever it was—which appointed them is the Heaven-appointed ruler of the country, and that when the froth of the present moment is blown away the clear, deep, sound, good old times will be again discerned. The droll old Jacobites! They drink to the king over the water. They might as well drink to the king with his head cut off.

THE exterior of the Capitol at Washington is most imposing and even magnificent. But that the usual absurdity of things in that extraordinary place may not fail, the huge pile turns its back upon the city and fronts an inconceivable metropolis which will never be built. But when you enter this vast building, either by going around it so as to see the front, or by ascending directly from the city, then amazement and indignation begin. The old Capitol is absorbed in the new. The Rotunda is a museum of rubbish. Pictures good and bad, without the slightest relation to each other or to the building, without the least symmetry of form or arrangement are hung around the walls, and the apartment which should be impressive and beautiful affects the spectator like a poorly furnished old curiosity shop garnished with queer trumpery. Of the intrinsic excellence of the pictures we say nothing. But every principle upon which painting should be combined with architecture and sculpture is violated in the Rotunda.

If from the centre you turn in one direction you pass through a dark, unmeaning way into the old House of Representatives. It is a miracle of architectural abomination. And instead of being annihilated, it is left bare and dismal. A few years since it was sacred to apple-women and old men selling cookeys. But the outraged sense of the nation has intervened to banish the unworthy intruders and has also fenced a path across it from one door to the other, and behind the fence has collected a few hideous casts and plaster statues, both from Brobdignag and Lilliput. Following the path and pushing on, the astonished visitor passes through the massive bronze doors of Mr. Rogers into an entirely new structure of the costliest marble and bronze. His first emotion is that Congress has darned the expense, or words to that effect. The most superb staircases invite him to ascend. Upon the landing of one hangs a portrait of General Scott, as ludicrously out of place as Michael Angelo's Last Judgment in a parlor. This is a canvass; but upon another staircase is the fresco of the Western emigrants, which time, or the plaster, or some malign influence, has so abused that it resembles a piece of worsted-work—a result of which we wholly acquit the painter.

In the corridors, as this astonished citizen proceeds, he sees a few busts of life-size in marble, and then a colossal statue. He perceives that there is no order, no meaning, no satisfaction. It is plain that from time to time Congress has been cajoled into buying a statue, or a bust, or a picture, and however good in themselves they are utterly ruined by the stupid fragmentary way in which they are scattered about. If they were evidently parts of a general method, however atrocious in itself, there would be less of the feeling of horrible waste which pursues the spectator wherever he turns. Descending, he finds upon the floor below elaborately frescoed corridors—a reminiscence in intention of the Golden House of Nero. But even if Raphael had painted them they are invisible, for the corridors are dark. Doors open into spacious and sumptuous committee-rooms, and the confounded citizen sees that they combine all the splendor of a steamboat cabin with the gorgeousness of a superior oyster saloon. The door closes, the glory is gone, and he dimly discerns a bronze railing upon a marble staircase, which is most elaborate and most costly, and almost hidden in this extraordinary cellar. He ascends again into the main corridor, and it is no consolation to him for the time and labor and enormous expense of the work below that it is generally invisible.

If he peers into the Representatives' Chamber, he finds a handsome hall dimly lighted from above, and on cloudy days obscure and mournful. The galleries are dark; but there are no columns, and the general design is agreeable. Passing, then, once more through the bronze gates, the astounded citizen walks the whole length of the old Capitol from end to end before he reaches the Senate Chamber. As he goes out of the Rotunda upon his way across the Capitol he enters a mysterious and obscure region with a circular row of columns—a dark and dismal well for no conceivable purpose, for it gives darkness, not light—and beyond this he reaches the door of the Supreme Court Room, the old Senate Chamber. It is a very small, plain, dim, semi-circular apartment, which seems hardly large enough even for the smaller Senate of the days of Webster, Clay, and Calhoun. After more marble corridors and splendid staircases the traveler reaches the Senate Chamber, which is of the same general character with that of the House.

The impression of the whole structure is that of enormous and frightfully foolish waste of space and money. Neither patriotism nor good sense nor good taste directed or controlled this vast expense. Of course we do not complain as seeing any remedy. It is unavoidable. The money for our great public buildings is spent by order of Congress, and while we might hope for economy we have no right to expect taste. There is, however, a false feeling which represents economy in such public works as meanness;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

while the truth is that lavish expense for such objects is justified only by the erection of truly noble monuments. The Capitol gives us an impressive dome, and a magnificent front, in the rear; but when we think of the interior, what an imposition, what a whited sepulchre it is!

THE latest and one of the most striking and effective pleas in the great pending cause of the living arts against the dead languages has just been made by Dr. Jacob Bigelow, of Boston, late President of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. The age and the fame of the advocate command the most attentive and respectful hearing: for Dr. Bigelow is almost if not quite an octogenarian, yet, as this address shows, with all his intellectual freshness and vigor unimpaired; while, as a friend writes, he is the originator of rural cemeteries in this country, the enlightened medical reformer, the pioneer botanist of his part of the country, the author of the first English work on Technology, and one of the shrewdest and most sensible of men.

But his plea amply justifies itself. A lover of the classics, and a variously accomplished scholar, Dr. Bigelow boldly assaults the majestic traditions which tyrannize in our colleges and schools and general opinion, and with strong and skillful blows reveals their points of weakness. The bodily and mental vigor of the Caucasian race, he declares, is not different now from what it was two thousand years ago; and whether we shall prefer ancient or modern studies, as they are called, must depend upon the relative power of intellectual works before or since the Middle Ages to contribute to our present pleasure or advantage. Comparing them as to the truth of the things taught, and the value of those things as means of happiness and progress, Dr. Bigelow forcibly and strikingly asserts, and amplifies illustration, that the powers of the ancient mind were misdirected, and during five thousand years had done very little indeed for the advancement of human welfare; while the last five centuries have been prolific of actual discoveries which have infinitely benefited mankind. Meanwhile the study of classical literature, which has been the especial business of what was called scholarship, has been really of small advantage. The first three centuries of the Christian era walked in the light of the wisdom of the ancients, and went from bad to worse, says the Doctor; the last three, with modern literature and the useful sciences and arts, have gone steadily from better to better.

That classical studies "train the mind" Dr. Bigelow does not deny; but as education means not only development of the mind but the acquirement of useful knowledge, it is not enough that the prime of youth should be given to learning how to learn. The very elaboration of structure, even of the Greek language, is an impediment rather than an advantage. It is a useless not a useful difficulty. But it is not against any knowledge of the dead languages that he pleads, so much as against their traditional and overshadowing supremacy. And this supremacy is due to many other causes than their especial aptitude for strengthening the mind. Some of these causes the Doctor acutely analyzes, and with pungent humor. He subjects Homer to an exegesis which might make Lord Derby stare and Mr. Gladstone shiver, and claims for modern genius not less scope and power than that of the Greek and Roman. Then he proceeds to the bold and true assertion that the great triumph of modern civilization in making the world wiser and better and happier is due to men who broke away from the routine of scholarship, and who developed and utilized the illimitable forces of the material world.

"Classical literature is the aid and ornament, and may well enter into the foundation of the most liberal form of education." But its exclusive or superior value is an error which is rapidly disappearing. The report of the English Commission upon the great public schools confirms the amusing and appalling statement of Sydney Smith, speaking of the young Englishman, that "the great system of facts with which he is the most perfectly acquainted is the intrigues of the heathen gods." The admirable letters of Mr. Atkinson, and this racy and forcible address of Dr. Bigelow, strike in unison with Sydney Smith. They are the pleas of scholars for a truer scholarship: the protests of men for a more generous manhood. Nor need any honest devotee of the old system fear that these protests will merely confirm the perilous tendency of America toward superficial knowledge. If that be the bent of the American mind it will be as shallow in classics as in science. The change of direction will not remedy a fault of force. But the truth is, that a more strenuous study, a sterner discipline, are essential to master the modern than the ancient knowledge. In every direction the exploring genius of man is heroically proving all things, and invites us to share in the delight of an expanding knowledge which lengthens life, mitigates pain, extinguishes disease, annihilates space, subdues the elements, and tames the globe. These have been instincts, and longings, and hopes. And now, exclaims the venerable student, himself familiar with the revelations of science and the resources of classical study, "the solution of all these problems is now achieved by the triumphs of utilitarian science. The nineteenth century, one-third of which is yet to come, has already converted all these wants and wonders into physical and historical facts. Would the recovery of the lost books of Livy, the orations of Hortensius, or the poems of Sappho be any compensation for the loss of any one of these from among our own contemporaneous revelations?"

IT has, perhaps, struck some reader of the daily papers that Adah Isaacs Menken, a person at whose name he may have smiled as he casually saw it placarded upon a play-bill in the Park or elsewhere, is mentioned in letters from Paris as being very successful, and exciting great public interest. When she plays in New York do the correspondents of the London and Paris papers devote a paragraph to her? Certainly not, because her coming and playing and going here are unremarked, except by those whose business it is to follow the story of the stage from day to day, or by those who habitually resort to the theatres where she plays. Nor are the paragraphs in the foreign letters to be viewed as advertisements, any more than their notices of Patti.

But who is Adah Isaacs Menken? is the question which many a reader of these lines is asking.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

She is an actress of the strictly physical school. My form is my fortune, Sir, she said. Her great triumph is in the part of Mazeppa, in which play she appears as the hero bound upon a fiery steed. Mazeppa, indeed, is a man, and Menken is a woman. But flesh-colored tights drawn over her luxuriant form, with a short-skirted tunic about her waist, enable her "to disfigure or present" the noble figure of the victim. The criticisms of her acting, we have observed, are mainly confined to discussions upon the length of her skirts. Indeed, the whole performance, which it has not been our fortune to witness, seems to consist of that kind of display for which concert saloons with female waiters are chiefly distinguished. It has, therefore, not hitherto made a sensation in the city of New York. La Menken has not yet played at the French theatre, and was unknown upon the boards of the late Academy. Ma, in Hispania! But in Paris it is another thing.

There are many sharp things truly said of New York; and the ludicrous inanity and pointless extravagance of its fashionable society can not be too pungently satirized. It has, also, its sins as well as its follies, but it has nothing so exquisitely shameless as the fine society of Paris. While in New York la Menken rides half nude across the stage in a theatre unknown to fashion, in Paris la Thérèse sings the loosest songs in the most gilded circles. But la Thérèse has been a toy for three years, and is just falling from the hand of fashion. It is now written that the most select company of the imperial court flocks to see Cora Pearl. Who is Cora Pearl? She is what la Thérèse was yesterday, what Laura Bell was the day before, what la dame aux Camèlias was last year, what "a woman of quality" was last century in Smollett's novels. She is one of the women who do not last like Ninon de l'Enclos: who have no Pericles like Aspasia, no Homer like Helen, but who are notorious for a day and then utterly laughed at and forgotten. Their fate is so swift and hideous that there is a certain moral advantage in their dazzling career. Becky Sharpe, in Vanity Fair, disappears at last from the reader's sight at charity fairs for religious purposes. Laura Bell, who was the heroine of the London letters four or five years ago, who drove exquisite equipages and gave ravishing suppers, and fluttered for a tinsel hour, "became converted," as we read in a late London letter, "and now in an exquisite dress, but with faded beauty and angular features, preaches to men and women with eager concern.....she gets good society to her dinner parties, and talks over human depravity with earls and marquises, and kisses pious countesses upon the cheek."

And while this takes place in London the Laura Bell of the moment in Paris, Cora Pearl, with "a good deal of wit" and a superb figure, who is twenty-six years old and a fearless rider, who lives in apartments hung with rich crimson velvet and furnished with a dozen servants, intensely interests Parisian society, superseding the gossip of the Legislature and the Court and the salon, by the announcement that she will play Cupidon in Orphée aux Enfers. This announcement, we learn from the faithful correspondent of the Boston Advertiser, stirred the finest society to its very centre. "For fifteen days, then, Paris waited in breathless excitement to see this celebrated character of the demi-monde appear in a thin, transparent, flesh-colored stuff with a pretty blue velvet mantle, ornamented with flowers and a gold fringe draping her shoulders, sporting blue wings with white and gold feathers, and sandals that yellow straps attached to her ankles. Artificial hair in which curls were interspersed rested on the top of her head and around her neck, which was further adorned with twining pearls. Her arms, her legs, her neck, her whole body was to stand confessed in the plenitude of its delicate contours. Tickets rose to a fabulous price, and the theatre was crowded to its greatest capacity."

The correspondent cries aloud for the Social Science Association. But it is doubtful if even that virtuous body could medicine this disease. It is but a sign of the social condition of Paris—a condition which every great and highly-civilized capital has always revealed. Much of the responsibility may fairly be attributed to the desire of the Government to amuse the public mind and divert it from serious thought; but there are other and more subtle causes. Bad as we are, it may console us to know that New York is still immeasurably behind Paris in this kind of career. Vain and vulgar persons abound who live with vain and vulgar profusion and ostentation. The Black Crook is still fascinating. But the Black Crook is but a ballet, like hundreds with which the city has been long familiar; and he is not a shrewd moralist who thinks its popularity a sign of the same kind of significance as the adoration of Cora Pearl. Meanwhile there is a certain visible tendency among us to an extravagance which ends in perilous luxury. But in the present situation of the country, with an enormous debt to pay, such extravagance is more than foolish, it is criminal. The debt can be paid only by individual sacrifice. A modest private expenditure is as imperative a moral duty as a wise public economy.

It is impossible to read of the wild dissipation of Paris without thinking of Couture's picture of the Decadence of the Romans which hangs, admonishingly, in the Luxembourg. To turn to that picture from Cora Pearl playing Cupidon amidst the enthusiasm of the high society of Paris, is to turn from the original to the representation.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 28th of February, just four days before the present Congress comes to an end. So many important measures remain to be acted upon that we defer until the next Number a resumé of the action of Congress in regard to the principal questions of general interest. There is, as we close, little probability that the great financial subjects of the Tariff, the Internal Revenue bill, or the Bankrupt bill will be finally acted upon by this Congress.——The Judiciary Committee, to whom was referred the resolution referring to the impeachment of the President, have given no intimation of the action which they have taken or propose to take.——The bill repealing the amnesty powers granted to the President, and that regulating the elective franchise in the Territories, referred to in our last Record, have become laws in default of having been either approved by the President or returned, with his objections, within the time specified by the Constitution.——The bill admitting Nebraska as a State into the Union has been passed over the President's veto by more than the requisite majority of two-thirds (in the House, finally, February 9, by 120 to 44), and thus becomes a law.

MILITARY GOVERNMENT FOR THE SOUTH.

The most important measure which received the final action of Congress during the month of February was the passage, by a decisive majority in both Houses, of a bill establishing military government over the States lately in insurrection. In the House, on the 6th, Mr. Stevens, from the Committee on Reconstruction, presented a bill "to provide for the more efficient government of the insurrectionary States." On the 20th a bill to the same general purport was finally passed by Congress. We give the bill as it was originally introduced, and as it was finally passed, and note the prominent features of the action to which it was subjected in Congress:

[Mr. Stevens's Bill.]

A Bill to provide for the more efficient Government of the Insurrectionary States.

Whereas the pretended State governments of the late so-called Confederate States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas were set up without the authority of Congress and without the sanction of the people; and whereas the so-pretended governments afford no protection for life or property, and countenance and encourage lawlessness and crime; and whereas it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in the so-called States until loyal and republican State governments can be legally established;

Therefore, be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the so-called States shall be divided into military districts and made subject to the military authority of the United States as hereinafter prescribed; and for that purpose Virginia shall constitute the First district; North Carolina and South Carolina the Second district; Georgia, Alabama, and Florida the Third district; Mississippi and Arkansas the Fourth district; and Louisiana and Texas the Fifth district.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the General of the army to assign to the command of each of said districts an officer of the regular army not below the rank of brigadier-general, and to detail a sufficient military force to enable such officer to perform his duties and enforce his authority in the district to which he is assigned.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of each officer assigned as aforesaid to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish, or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace and criminals; and to this end he may allow civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and to try offenders; or when in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize military commissions or tribunals for that purpose, any thing in the constitution and laws of the so-called States to the contrary notwithstanding; and all legislative and judicial proceedings or processes to prevent or control the proceedings of said military tribunals, and all interference by said pretended State governments with the exercise of military authority under this act shall be void and of no effect.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That courts and judicial officers of the United States shall not issue writs of habeas corpus in behalf of persons in military custody unless some commissioner or officer on duty in the district wherein the person is detained shall indorse upon said petition a statement certifying, upon honor, that he has knowledge or information as to the [Bill as passed.]

An Act for the more efficient Government of the late Insurrectionary States.

Whereas no legal State governments or adequate protection for life or property now exist in the rebel States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas; and whereas it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said States until loyal and republican State governments can be legally established; therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That said rebel States shall be divided into military districts and made subject to the military authority of the United States, as hereinafter mentioned; and for that purpose Virginia shall constitute the First district; North Carolina and South Carolina the Second district; Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, the Third district; Mississippi and Arkansas the Fourth district; and Louisiana and Texas the Fifth district.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the President to assign to the command of each of said districts an officer of the army not below the rank of brigadier-general, and to detail a sufficient military force to enable such officer to perform his duties and enforce his authority within the district to which he is assigned.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of each officer assigned as aforesaid to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish or cause to be punished all disturbers of the public peace and criminals; and to this end he may allow local civil tribunals to take jurisdiction of and try offenders; or when in his judgment it may be necessary for the trial of offenders, he shall have power to organize military committees or tribunals for that purpose; and all interference under color of State authority with the exercise of military authority under this act shall be null and void.

SEC. 4. That all persons put under military arrest by virtue of this act shall be tried without unnecessary delay, and no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted, and no sentence of any military commission or tribunal hereby authorized affecting the life or liberty of any person shall be executed until it is approved by the officer in command of the district; and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google cause and circumstances of the alleged detention, and that he believes the same to be wrongful, and further, that he believes that the indorsed petition is preferred in good faith and in furtherance of justice; and not to hinder or delay the punishment of crime, all persons put under military arrest by virtue of this act shall be tried without unnecessary delay, and no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no sentence of any military commission or tribunal hereby authorized affecting the life or liberty of any person shall be executed until it is approved by the superior officer in command of the district; and the laws and regulations for the government of the army shall not be affected by this act, except in so far as they conflict with its provisions.

SEC. 5. That when the people of any one of said rebel States shall have formed a constitution and government in conformity with the constitution of the United States in all respects, framed by a convention of delegates elected by the male citizens of said State twenty-one years old and upward, of whatever race, color, or previous condition, who have been resident in said State for one year previous to the day of such election, except such as may be disfranchised for participation in the rebellion or for felony at common law, and when such constitution shall provide that the elective franchise shall be enjoyed by all such persons as have the qualifications herein stated for electors of delegates, and when such constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the persons voting on the question of ratification who are qualified as electors for delegates, and when such constitution shall have been submitted to Congress for examination and approval, and Congress shall have approved the same, and when said State by a vote of its Legislature, elected under said constitution, shall have adopted the amendment to the constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-ninth Congress, and known as article 14, and when said article shall have become part of the constitution of the United States, said State shall be declared entitled to representation in Congress, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom on their taking the oath prescribed by law, and then and thereafter the preceding sections of this act shall be inoperative in said State. Provided that no person excluded from the privilege of holding office by said proposed amendment to the constitution of the United States shall be eligible to election as a member of a convention to frame a constitution for any of said rebel States; nor shall any such person vote for members of such convention.

SEC. 6. That until the people of the said rebel States shall by law be admitted to representation to the Congress of the United States any civil governments that may exist therein shall be deemed provisional only, and shall be in all respects subject to the paramount authority of the United States at any time to abolish, modify, control, and supersede the same; and in all elections to any office under such provisional governments all persons shall be entitled to vote, and none others, who are entitled to vote under the provisions of the fifth section of this act; and no person shall be eligible to any office under such provisional governments who would be disqualified from holding office under the provisions of the third article of said constitutional amendment.

Mr. Banks, on the 9th, offered a proposition referring specially only to the State of Louisiana, to the following effect: The present Government of Louisiana having failed to protect loyal citizens, is not to be recognized. A commission of three persons, one to be named by the Senate, one by the House, and one by the head of the War Department, to be sent to Louisiana to re-establish civil government. This commission to register all loyal male citizens, without regard to color or former condition, who have either formerly been entitled to the right of suffrage, or have served in the army or navy of the United States, or own property of the value of $100, or can read and write; all such persons to be entitled to the right of suffrage. No person who having taken any official oath to support the Constitution of the United States, afterward aided the rebellion, to be allowed to vote or hold office; but this disability may be removed by a two-thirds vote of Congress. Registered voters to take an oath that they have not voluntarily borne arms against the United States, or voluntarily upheld any Government hostile thereto; and that they will support the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign or domestic. The Commissioners to call a Convention, to which shall be submitted the following propositions: (1.) The acceptance of this act as a basis of the restoration of civil government; (2.) The ratification of the proposed Constitutional Amendment. If these are acceded to, the Convention shall frame a Constitution for the State, to be submitted to the people; if they adopt the Constitution it shall be submitted to Congress, and if approved by Congress it shall be declared to be the Constitution of the State of Louisiana. The military commander of the Department to have power in case of necessity to declare martial law in any district. No definite action seems to have been taken upon this proposition.

The Committee appointed to investigate the New Orleans riot presented a long report, giving the history of that tragedy. They report that the number known to have been killed was 38, of whom 37 were loyal and one disloyal; 48, all loyal, were severely wounded; 98 slightly wounded, of whom 88 were loyal and 10 policemen; besides these there was evidence, though not fully certain, that ten more were killed and 20 wounded. Of those known to be killed 34 were colored, of the severely wounded 40, of the slightly wounded 79. The Report shows that the whole affair was brutal and wanton attack, set on foot by disloyal persons. The Committee reported a bill for the establishment of civil government in Louisiana, the essential provisions are that the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a Governor and a council of nine members who shall temporarily exercise the powers of the Government; that in June, 1867, the qualified voters shall elect State officers. Qualified electors in general to be all male citizens, who have not engaged in hostility against the United States, without distinction of color. In October, 1867, an election to be held for members of a Convention to form a State Constitution; which Constitution shall be submitted to the people, and if ratified by them, may be submitted to Congress for the admission thereunder of the State to representation in Congress. The President to designate a general officer of the army as military commander, who shall have power to see that crimes are punished and order preserved whenever the civil authorities fail to do so. Until Louisiana is restored to the Union, the State to be entitled to a delegate in Congress with the same rights as are awarded to delegates from the Territories.—This bill was passed in the House, February 12, by 113 to 48; but appears not to have been acted upon by the Senate, the general military bill for all the seceding States superseding it.

On the same day, February 13, Mr. Stevens's

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

bill providing Military Governments for all the seceding States was considered in the House. Mr. Blaine moved that it be referred to the Judiciary Committee with instructions to report it back with an amendment providing that when any State should have ratified the proposed Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, conformed its Constitution and laws thereto in all respects, such Constitution having been ratified by the people and approved by Congress, then the State shall be entitled to representation in Congress, and the bill become inoperative in that State. The Democratic members, and a large section of the Republicans, at first voted for this motion; and when all the names had been called there was only a majority of two or three against it. Many of the Democrats then changed their votes, and when the result was finally announced there were 69 ayes to 95 nays. So the motion was lost, and then the bill as reported was passed by a vote of 109 to 55, and was sent to the Senate.

In the Senate the bill came up on February 15. Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, offered the amendment proposed in the House by Mr. Blaine; and Mr. Wilson offered a bill reciting that the Constitutional Amendment having been ratified by the requisite number of States, had now become a part of the Constitution of the United States; and when any of the States lately in insurrection shall have ratified the Amendment, shall have conformed its laws and Constitution thereto, secured impartial suffrage without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude, except as to such persons as "may be disfranchised for participation in the late rebellion;" and shall have "provided by its Constitution and laws that all citizens of the United States shall equally possess the right to pursue all lawful avocations and business, to receive the equal benefit of the public schools, and to have the equal protection of all the citizens of the United States in said State;" and when this Constitution shall have been ratified by the people of the State, submitted to and approved by Congress, the State shall then "be declared entitled to representation in Congress, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom on taking the oath prescribed by law."

These propositions gave rise to much debate. Mr. Hendricks wished to insert the word "impartial" before "suffrage" in the Johnson amendment. Mr. M'Dougall said that the adoption of universal suffrage would enfranchise 50,000 Chinese in California. Mr. Doolittle hoped the suggestion would be adopted, for upon this depended its acceptance by the Southern people; they would not accept universal suffrage; they would prefer a military government. Mr. Saulsbury was so much opposed to every principle of the bill that he would vote for no amendment; there was not, he said, a single thing in it that any honest and just court would not pronounce to be unconstitutional; he wished to have it as odious as it could be made. The foregoing amendments were disagreed to, and on the 16th Mr. Sherman offered a substitute for the entire proposition before the Senate. This substitute, the title of the bill having been changed so as to read, "An Act for the more efficient Government of the late insurrectionary States," was adopted by 29 to 10—13 Senators not voting.

This bill then went to the House, which on the 19th refused to concur, and asked for a committee of conference. The Senate refused to appoint a committee, and adhered to its bill. The House then, by a vote of 98 to 70, acceded to the amendment of the Senate, but added an amendment to the amendment. The Senate on the 20th, by a vote of 35 to 7, concurred in this amendment by the House, and the bill was finally passed in the form already given. Among those who voted for it was Senator Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland. He said that, if he could have his wish, he would immediately receive Southern Senators; but he could not have his wish, and must therefore acquiesce with the majority in any thing that held out any hope, however faint, of accomplishing that object. He should vote for the bill because he saw in it a mode of rescuing the country from the perils that now threaten it, and not because he approved of it in any particular.

CONDITION OF THE SOUTH.

Concurrent accounts, coming from too many quarters and too strongly corroborated to admit of doubt, represent the condition of a great portion of the South as utterly deplorable. Destitution, amounting to famine, prevails in extensive sections. Moreover, a bitter feeling is extensively prevalent against Southerners, charged with having been Union men, and against Northerners who have gone South. In many parts no Union men are safe. This state of things prevails quite as extensively in portions of Tennessee and Kentucky as in the regions farther South. In Tennessee Governor Brownlow, February 25, announced his determination to call out the militia to protect Union men. Some portions of Kentucky are completely under the rule of desperadoes who have returned to their homes from serving in the Confederate army. They issue their orders that all persons obnoxious to them shall leave the State. These outlaws, as stated by Governor Bramlette in a special Message to the Legislature of Kentucky, have become so emboldened as to publish their orders of banishment and condemnation in the public journals, and in several cases have put to death persons against whom they have a special spite. In South Carolina, as shown by a report from a Committee of Congress, three Union soldiers were deliberately murdered. Four persons, one of whom had been a Georgia State Senator, charged with the offense, were brought to trial before a Military Commission convened by order of General Sickles, found guilty and condemned, two to be hung, and two to be imprisoned for life. The punishment was commuted by the President to imprisonment on the Dry Tortugas; the place of confinement being subsequently changed to Fort Delaware. Judge Hall, of the United States Court for the District of Delaware, had these men brought before him on a writ of habeas corpus, and discharged them on the ground that their trial by a Military Commission was illegal. The majority of this Congressional Committee sum up the evidence upon the general subject by saying that, according to the testimony of Generals Schofield, Thomas, Sickles, Baird, and Wood, "For punishment for crime in their Departments the Courts can not be relied upon. Where soldiers, Union men, or freedmen are con-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

cerned, justice is practically denied, and offenses of grave character against them go unpunished, neither magistrates nor jurors being disposed to discharge their duties in this respect."—That there are wide exceptions to this state of things is doubtless true. The best men of the South urge submission to the laws and an acquiescence in the new state of things. Prominent among these are Governor Orr, of South Carolina, and Joseph E. Brown, formerly Governor of Georgia. The latter, in a published letter, dated February 25, says:

"I consider it the duty of the Governor of Georgia to call the Legislature together without delay, and to recommend the passage of an act calling a convention of the people of this State so to change our State constitution as to provide for universal suffrage in conformity with the measure which has passed Congress known as the 'Sherman amendment,' and to provide for the early election of a Legislature which will adopt the constitutional amendment in accordance with said requirement. We now have the assurance of Congress in the passage of this bill that this shall settle the question of our admission. We shall never get better terms. Let us comply with them, and be ready to be presented in the next Congress as soon as possible.....If the State will adopt this line of policy, and the Convention will memorialize Congress, asking that the judges, county officers, and others necessary to the efficient working of the State government, be relieved from the provisions of the Constitutional Amendment, I believe the petition, if presented in a proper manner, will be granted, and we shall soon be relieved of much of the gloom which is now widespread over the whole South. If we reject the terms proposed in the Sherman bill, I confess I see no hope for the future. Should we accept them, I trust the example of Georgia may be followed by other States, and that this vexed question may soon be permanently settled upon the best terms which we will ever be able to get. I am aware of the rapidity of the changes which we are required to make, and of the natural prejudices which our people entertain against negro suffrage, but we should not forget that in yielding to an inevitable necessity, these people were raised among us and naturally sympathize with us. Their conduct during the war proved this. If, then, we treat them kindly, pay them their wages promptly, and in all respects deal justly by them, we shall seldom have cause to complain of their refusal to respect our wishes or consult our interest at the ballot-box."

SOUTHERN AMERICA.

The evacuation of Mexico by the French troops has fairly commenced. On the 5th of February the garrison withdrew from the Capital, and the command passed into the hands of the Mexican General Marquez, acting in the name of Maximilian. Marquez issued a proclamation virtually establishing martial law. On a signal of alarm being given by the great bell of the Cathedral sounding for ten minutes, all the inhabitants are directed to retire to their houses, close their doors, and not appear at the windows or balconies until a signal is given by the ringing of the bell that the alarm has ceased. Any person, of whatever rank, who violates this order will be arrested and punished; as well as those who arm without permission from head-quarters, or "discharge any fire-arm, or cause any alarm by means of any detonation, or make any demonstration of hostility, or use subversive expressions, or utter aloud alarming or seditious cries, or in any manner excite the slightest disorder." The instant any fire-arm is discharged or detonation produced in any house, the soldiers will enter, by force if necessary, and seize the culprit; if he be not found all the inmates will be punished. When the alarm has ceased, the inhabitants may open their doors, go into the streets, and engage in their occupations.—Marshal Bazaine, on leaving the capital, issued a proclamation declaring that in the four years during which the French had occupied the city they had found no reason to complain of any lack of sympathy between themselves and the inhabitants; and that it had never been the intention of France to impose upon the Mexicans any form of government contrary to their wishes.—The first of the transports for conveying the troops to France arrived at Vera Cruz on the 12th. It is a large vessel capable of conveying 1500 men, and was expected to sail in a few days.—There are rumors and reports of various affairs, all through the interior, between the Imperialists and Liberals; the balance of success appears to be in favor of the latter. The general impression is that Maximilian will soon abandon the country and return to Europe.

From the seat of war on the Plata the intelligence comes down to near the close of January. The war was almost at a stand-still. The allied army, 45,000 strong, seem to be unable to make any forward movement until the fleet clears away the obstructions in the river.—A revolutionary movement of some apparent importance has been set on foot in one of the western provinces of the Argentine Confederation. The declared object is to separate the western provinces from the central Government at Buenos Ayres, and to make peace with Paraguay.

No further hostile operations are reported between Spain and Chili. The Chilians are meanwhile making strenuous preparations for defense in case of another attack. The new fortifications at Valparaiso are represented as impregnable by a naval force.

Another revolution is anticipated in Peru, though under which leader, or for what purpose beyond the overthrow of the present Government, seem to be understood by nobody.

The Colombian Confederation, at the head of which is President Mosquera of New Granada, is reported to have determined to annex the State of Ecuador. Mosquera is said to have written that there need be no anxiety about an alliance of Chili and Peru with Ecuador, for before the Pacific States call upon the latter to join them he shall have occupied the country. If an attack is made by Colombia upon Ecuador, it is assumed that Chili and Peru will aid in resisting it.

EUROPE.

The British Parliament was opened on the 5th of February by the Queen in person, this being her first official appearance in public since the death of Prince Albert. The royal speech was much longer than usual. The following is a resumé of its principal points: Her relations with foreign powers are satisfactory. It is hoped that the late war between Austria, Prussia, and Italy may lead to the establishment of permanent peace in Europe. There has been "suggested to the Government of the United States a mode by which the questions pending between the two countries, arising out of the civil war, may receive an amicable solution. The efforts made by her Government, in conjunction with the Emperor of the French, to effect a peace between Spain and the republics of Chili and Peru have failed. In common with the other great Powers, she had not actively interfered in the contest in Turkey, but they had endeavored to bring about improved relations between the Porte and its Christian

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google subjects. The negotiations in respect to the Danubian Principalities had been terminated by a satisfactory arrangement, sanctioned by all the Powers concerned. A bill would be submitted for a consolidation of the principal British Provinces of North America. An abundant harvest had mitigated the severity of the famine in India. The apprehensions of an outbreak in Ireland had been allayed, and it was hoped that there would be no necessity for exceptional legislation for any part of the Empire. A bill would be introduced to improve the relations between landlords and tenants in Ireland, which, "without interfering with the rights of property, will offer direct encouragement to occupants of land to improve their holdings, and provide a simple mode of compensation for permanent improvements." In respect to the Reform agitation, the Queen simply expresses the hope that the deliberations of Parliament "may lead to the adoption of measures which, without undue disturbance of the balance of political power, shall freely extend the elective franchise." She hopes that Parliament will "readily assent to a moderate expenditure calculated to improve the condition of the soldiers, and to lay the foundation of an efficient army of reserve."—Many other subjects of purely local interest are introduced.

Reform demonstrations of rather ominious import have been continued. Thus, on the occasion of the opening of Parliament, the Queen and Royal family, on their way to the Parliament House, were coldly received by the populace, who filled the streets, shouting loudly for "Reform." Soon after a "mass meeting" of the working-men of London was held, in which it was asserted that the whole Fenian excitement had been gotten up by the Government in order to distract the attention of the people from the Reform agitation, but, it was added, the trick would not succeed. Moved by these and similar demonstrations, Mr. Disraeli, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, introduced into the Commons a series of resolutions on Reform. These by no means met the views of the Liberal party, and were vigorously denounced by Mr. Bright. At length, on the 26th of February, these resolutions were withdrawn, the Ministry promising to introduce a regular Reform Bill.

Something like a Fenian demonstration has actually occurred. On the 11th of February several hundreds of strangers, roughly clad, but apparently unarmed, made their appearance in the little town of Chester, in England. In the castle was a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition guarded by only a few men. These strangers were assumed to be Fenians, come with the intent to seize the arms. Troops were hurried down, and the strangers dispersed. Two days later it was reported that a formidable rising had taken place in the wild region of Kerry County, in Ireland; but the report seems to have been based upon no adequate foundation. Meanwhile, on the 13th, two steamers from Liverpool appeared in Dublin Bay. It was asserted that they contained a large body of Fenians. The boats were boarded by the police, and some 70 of the passengers arrested. Most of them professed to be laborers discharged from work at Liverpool, making their way home; some said they were from America, and had served in the army. It is as yet impossible to decide whether these affairs are connected with a contemplated Fenian movement, or whether they are a part of the normal state of discontent in Ireland. That the Government looks with apprehension upon the condition of affairs is evinced by strict orders given to watch all vessels coming to Ireland, whether from across the Channel or from America; and by the fact, as reported by telegraph, February 26, that the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in Ireland is to be continued for three months.

The French Chambers were opened on the 15th of February. That part of the Emperor's speech which related to European politics was almost a commentary upon the saying of Napoleon at St. Helena, that "One of my greatest ideas was the agglomeration and concentration of the same geographical nations which revolutions and politics have broken up and divided." The Emperor says that "the transformations which have been effected in Italy and Germany are preparing the realization of the vast programme of a union of the States of Europe into a single Confederation." In regard to his own part in the late movement, he says: "While I did not arm one additional soldier or advance one regiment, yet the voice of France had influence enough to arrest the conqueror at the gates of Vienna."—He says, that the idea which presided over the expedition to Mexico was a grand one; "to regenerate a people, to implant among them ideas of order and progress;" but, he adds, "when the extent of our sacrifices appeared to me to go beyond the interests which called them forth, I spontaneously decided on the recall of our army. The Government of the United States comprehended that an attitude of a non-conciliatory character could only have the effect of prolonging the occupation and envenoming relations which, for the advantage of the two countries, ought to remain of a conciliatory character." Of the withdrawal of the French garrison from Rome, he says: "The Government of the Holy Father has entered upon a new phase. Delivered to itself, it remains firm by its own forces, by the veneration which all feel for the Head of the Catholic Church, and by the superintendence which is loyally exercised on the frontiers by the Italian Government; but if demagogical conspirators should endeavor, in their audacity, to menace the temporal power of the Holy See, I have not the slightest doubt that Europe would not permit an event of such a character to take place, calculated as it would be to cause so great a disturbance in the Catholic world." The relations of France with foreign Powers are touched upon, and said to be entirely harmonious.—Of the new army law, he says: "The conditions of warfare being changed, the increase of our national force is required; and we must organize ourselves in such a manner as to be invulnerable. The army bill, which has been prepared with the greatest care, lightens the burdens of conscription in time of peace, offers considerable resources in time of war, and, by distributing in a just manner the charges among all, satisfies the principle of equality. Do not forget that the neighboring states impose on themselves much heavier sacrifices for the effectual constitution of their armies, and have their eyes fixed upon you to judge whether the influence of France is to increase or diminish in the world." After speaking in congratu-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

latory terms of the general financial and commercial condition of the Empire, he says: "Our task at this moment is to form the public manners to the practice of more liberal institutions. Until now in France liberty has been only ephemeral; it has not been able to take root in the soil because abuse has immediately followed its usage; and the nation has preferred limiting the exercise of its rights to submitting to disorder. But now the extension of great principles will not, as formerly, compromise the necessary prestige of authority. The Government is established, and ardent passions will be extinguished in the immensity of universal suffrage."

A Constitution has been drawn up for the North German Confederation, which will be in fact, if not in name, the German Empire. The Confederation is to be composed of twenty-two States, having 43 votes in the Federal Council: of these Prussia has 17, Saxony 4, Mecklenburg and Brunswick 2 each; all the others 1 each. Any State may send as many delegates as it pleases; but the body of delegates of each vote as a unit, in the proportion above stated. Any State can submit propositions in the Council. The Diet is chosen by universal and direct suffrage. It can not originate measures, but only act upon those submitted to it by the King of Prussia. The powers of the Legislative Body, composed of the Council and the Diet, conform to those of the French Chambers rather than to those of the American Congress or the British Parliament. Federal authority is supreme over all local authority. The King of Prussia is President of the Confederation. He declares war, makes peace, concludes treaties, sends and receives embassadors in the name of the Confederation, has command of the army and navy; and is in effect sovereign of the Confederacy, with powers strikingly analogous to those of the Emperor of France. Every male inhabitant of the proper age is obliged to serve in the army without being allowed to furnish a substitute. They serve in the active army from the age of 20 to 27, and in the Landwehr until 32. The effective of the army, for the next ten years in time of peace, is fixed at one per cent. of the whole population. In time of war the whole population of military age, all of whom will have been brought under military organization, can be brought into the field. Thus, at one step, Prussia, which is really the Confederacy, becomes a Power inferior to none in Europe.

The war in Crete apparently still goes on, but direct tidings are not of later date than the early part of January. Meanwhile later the Sultan of Turkey officially informed the leading Powers of Europe that he had decided to call together an assembly of the notables of all the religious creeds in the Ottoman Empire for the purpose of deliberating upon and adopting measures for the more effectual execution of the firman of 1856, which professed to place the professors of all creeds upon a footing of civil equality.

Editor's Drawer.

DEAR DRAWER,—A few years ago, while practicing in Washington, D. C., a case of larceny came up before the Criminal Court of the District of Columbia in which a colored man, by the name of Massie, was indicted for the larceny of sundry articles, and convicted by the clear and incontrovertible evidence of Joe White, a darkey whose color vied in lustre with the raven's wing. During his examination L—— handed the following to the District Attorney:

"Joe White he was of blackest hue,
And put upon the stand
To tell the jury all he knew
Of Massie's sleight-of-hand.
The jury wondered as they looked,
To think so black a sight
Could throw upon a subject dark
So bright a gleam of light."

ALLOW me likewise to contribute the following epigram:

"The crows behold the corn-fields green
From off the mountain gray;
And, thankful for kind Nature's gifts,
They all descend and prey."

THE politeness of parsons is proverbial. For instance: In one of the largest towns on the Erie Railway a very worthy clergyman was one Sabbath morning expounding the 10th and 11th verses of the nineteenth chapter of St. John, in which Pilate's question, "Knowest thou not that I have power to crucify and power to release thee?" is answered: "Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above." The good man, quoting the answer, rendered it: "Thou couldest have no power at all against me, my dear Sir," etc., etc., probably better adapting it, though unintentionally, to the more polite (?) vocabulary of the present time.

SOME one sent to us, in 1859, for the Drawer, a copy of an epitaph in P—— church-yard beginning,

"They tasted life's bitter cup," etc.

Something equally ridiculous is the following, which has since been chiseled into a stone in the same church-yard:

"Many stood round,
Though none could save
This blooming youth from a watery grave;
Great search was made the corpse to obtain,
But all their searching was in vain.
Long time elapsed—the corpse did rise,
And eager friends did seize the prize!"

THE last case of legal impudence is narrated by a St. Joseph, Missouri, correspondent thus:

Jeff C—— was retained to defend one William Smith, charged with assault upon a man residing in Buchanan County, a few miles distant from St. Joseph. After a tedious trial the jury found a verdict of guilty. Whereupon Jeff arose and demanded the immediate discharge of his client, for the reason that the Court had failed to administer to the jury the "test oath!" as required by the new Constitution of Missouri, consequently the verdict was without force or effect. Now it is well known that juries in Jus-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tices' Courts are not required to subscribe to said oath; but Jeff knew there were present in court nearly every man in the county who could qualify as a juror, and that all of them must have formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused. The Justice "saw the point," and discharged the defendant, at the same time remarking: "Confound these city lawyers, they beat the very d—l, and put on so many high old airs that it makes a feller feel mad!" The prosecuting witness, quite chagrined, left court remarking that he would "have Smith 'korralled' eventually, and that it would 'pan out' big to his satisfaction."

Of the hundreds of juvenile smart things sent every month to the Drawer, the subjoined, from Exeter, New Hampshire, is the best of the April crop:

At the time there was so much excitement about iron-clad vessels, my brother happened one day to be at dinner, and was carving a piece of mutton. Said he: "This mutton seems to be very tough." Little Walter, a six-year-old, looked up, and said: "Father, I guess it came off our iron-clad ram!" Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A warrior contributor tells us that during our recent little difficulty with the South there was often issued to the soldiers, as rations, a quantity of dessicated vegetables, but the boys became tired of the diet, and called them desecrated vegetables. I was reminded of this the other day, on overhearing an industrious woman narrate her troubles in making the usual supply of domestic soft-soap. "I tried and tried," said she, "day after day. I put in more grease, and then more ley, and then more water; and then I biled it more, till I got out of patience, and then sent to the store and got a box of that consecrated lie, and then it came right off!"

It is a custom of the English courts, when a barrister is admitted, that he should "give rings and a motto," so that when the Reports appear with the names of the newly-fledged attorneys the mottoes stand out as indices of their character and hopes. Three years ago, when the colored gentleman from Boston was admitted to the Supreme Court of the United States, Chief-Justice Chase presiding and assisting, there was some consternation, the "conservative element" looking on in mute wonder till the deed was done. A hush occurred, when Mr. C——, the learned and witty member of the bar at Washington, passed up a note to the Chief-Justice, offering, for his dark brother, to "give rings," with this motto: "Hic niger est!"

A correspondent at Lynn, Massachusetts, where all the shoes are made, pegs out the following:

One of those grumbling creatures who "enjoy miserable health," walked into our drug-store the other day, and asked if we had any of Seidlitz's Powders?

"Certainly; will you have a box?"

"Are they genuine?"

"Yes, Sir! No mistake about that."

"Well, I didn't know; 'cause there's a good many counterfeits around."

"Can't be any counterfeit about these. We got 'em straight from old Seidlitz himself!"

Satisfied on this point, he handed over the requisite coupon and left. We effervesced.

A small one for insurance men:

Some years ago, when one of the insurance companies of Hartford first established an agency in this city, it is said that their policies contained so many of those cautious words, "whereas," "and it is hereby understood," "and it is further provided," etc., etc., that it was somewhat difficult for one to know whether he were really insured or not. A Quaker man, doing business in Pine Street, took a $5000 policy, and, like a prudent merchant, proceeded carefully to read it over; but so perplexed did he become by the perusal that next morning he took it back, and said: "Friend Jones, I have read over thy policy, and don't see that in case of fire I am insured at all."

"Well, Friend Waldo," was the agent's response, "if thou art, it is an entire inadvertence!"

Friend Waldo had that notion, and surrendered the policy.

In one of the prettiest towns in Southeastern Ohio resides Dr. T——, whose sayings are often quoted in that propinquity. Passing along the street one day he met a couple of lady acquaintances walking together—one of whom was named Wood, the other Stone. Pausing as he met them, the Doctor made one of his most graceful bows, and repeated these two lines of the well-known Missionary Hymn:

"The heathen, in his blindness,
Bows down to Wood and Stone."

A Vermont contributor sends on his little pleasantry to this effect:

In the winter of 1861–2, while a Massachusetts regiment was stationed on the Potomac, it happened that several of the officers, including the chaplain, were discoursing of the war, and the final disposition which should be made of rebels and their property. One Yankee lieutenant was of the opinion that the farms in the South should be distributed among the officers according to rank, and that the women should be distributed in like manner—in order, as he expressed it, "that loyal men might raise up a good loyal population." As he gave his opinion in a very earnest way, the chaplain asked:

"Do you think, lieutenant, that Providence would smile on such an arrangement?"

"Smile!" answered the lieutenant, "it would snicker right eout!"

A correspondent of a medical turn of mind in Skull Valley, Arizona, mentions a scene that occurred in a village in Illinois, where dwells a magistrate named Helser. The minister of that village one day received a call from a soldier and a blushing maid, who wished to be married at once. On being asked for the marriage license, the "boy in blue" declared he had none—and, moreover, that he needed none, as he had known the girl four years, and they liked each other, and didn't want license or permission from any one. The clergyman assured him that without a license he could not perform the ceremony. The lover entreated without avail, when the par-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google son rather impatiently remarked: "You had better take the girl and go to Helser." "Go to hell yourself, Sir!" was the reply; and the couple indignantly "evaded the premises," with the conviction that profanity was not by any means confined to the army.

A HARDWARE man in Boston says: A Quaker, chasing his broad-brim hat, which the wind had blown off, saw a boy laughing at his calamity. Exceeding wroth at his futile endeavor to recover the tile, he said:

"Art thou a profane lad?"

"Once in a while," replied the boy.

"Then," said he, handing him a quarter, "thee may damn that hat the money's worth!"

DURING a revival at Barnstable, Massachusetts, the Baptist minister deemed it his duty to diffuse himself about the country and induce as many of the unregenerate as possible to come to meeting. Among others, he called on an illiterate old farmer, and asked if he knew of any lost sheep of the house of Israel about there.

"Well, no," was the reply, "I r'ally don't know of any. Fact, the only sheep I do know of 'bout here are owned by Squire Francis Bacon."

A CITIZEN of Nashville, Tennessee, requests the half-million of intelligent people who read these pages to take note of the ensuing:

A jury in Alabama had been empaneled in the case of a Mr. Johnson, charged with killing his wife. The evidence was positive and conclusive, leaving not a doubt of his speedy conviction. To the amazement of all, the jury, after a short absence, returned a verdict, "Guilty of horse-stealing!" The judge, astonished, asked an explanation, stating that the indictment was not for horse-stealing, but manslaughter. The foreman, with his hand upon a huge law-book, and with an amusingly dignified air, informed the Court that "it was not a case of *man*slaughter, but *woman*slaughter, for which the law made no provision; but being satisfied the man deserved to be hung, they had brought in a verdict of horse-stealing, which, in that county, would be sure to swing him!"

FROM Rockwood, Illinois, we have word that Roley B——, a ready-witted Irishman, still lives, and is able to get outside of his regular liquids. The other day one of the boys, thinking to have a little fun out of him, said,

"Roley, have you heard the news?"

"No; what news?"

"Why, the devil's dead."

Not a word said Roley, but putting his hand in his pocket and pulling out a ten-cent shinplaster, handed it to his questioner, who asked what it was for. "Why," answered Roley, "in the ould country, where I came from, it was the custom to give the children something when the parents died." Whereat there was some laughter, but no more inquiries.

A WISCONSIN correspondent, who hath good memory for things that have edified pious people in his bailiwick, makes mention of a church anniversary, recently held, at which assisted all the ministers who had had pastoral charge of the congregation. They sat together in the pulpit. Each in turn gave history of such special seasons and acts of grace as had been vouchsafed during his ministry. In due course one of the "dominoes" (as a wicked little wretch once in our hearing called the parsons) took occasion to allude to his pastorate, during which nothing of importance had agitated the brethren until the war broke out. "The history," said he, "of the church on the occurrence of that great event he was proud of. She had sent forth her sons to battle, and they had done their duty like heroes. Some had fallen on the field and gone to heaven, while others, thank God! had returned home!" The applause that followed this burst scarcely allowed the audience time to consider whether it were really better to go to the former place or return to the latter. Let the elect decide.

THE same correspondent is curious to know, if it is all correct and legal for manufacturers to take out patents for their newly-invented collars, why the proprietors of this Magazine should not file a caveat for "Drawers."

BROTHER FARGO tells a story of a hungry citizen who had hired out during haying-time to a devout farmer, who never sat down at table without first asking the customary grace. This little preliminary, however, was something our friend had not been accustomed to. When the horn blew for dinner Bob drew a "bee-line" for the place whence that diapason emanated, and after abluting, seated himself before the bountiful dinner, and, with the appetite of a wolf, seized knife and fork, and was about to "sail in," when he was tapped on the shoulder by the master of the house, who said:

"Wait a minute, if you please; it's always customary here to say a little something before we eat."

"Oh!" replied Bob, "never mind me. Say what you darn please! You can't say any thing that'll turn my stomach!"

With which he proceeded to insert much victual into himself, and for a brief space embarrassed the head of the family. Next day his manners, and let us hope his morals, were improved.

JUDGE B——, a witty gentleman and wise judge of one of our higher courts, was one day admitting to the duties of citizenship such members of the Milesian and Teutonic persuasions as came armed with the proper documents and could satisfactorily answer the interrogatories the Judge deemed it his duty to propound. One of these was Michael Mahoney, whose face wore a genial smile and his body an old army overcoat. Taking his eye in his hand and throwing it at the prisoner (to speak metaphorically), full and strong, the Judge thus:

"What's your name?"

"Michael Mahoney, yer Hon'r."

"How long have you been in this country?"

"Six years, yer Hon'r."

"Never been out of it during that time?"

"Nivver a wanst, yer Hon'r."

"Sure of it?"

"Bedad you can say that."

Turning to the witness accompanying Michael, and receiving satisfactory replies to the usual

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google questions as to moral character, etc., the Judge was on the point of putting his initials to the application, and thus passing it, when Michael interrupted him by asking:

"Judge, what was that ye were after asking about being out of the country?"

"Have you been out of the United States at any time during the last six years?"

"Well, yer Hon'r, I may have been out of it a little, just wanst."

"When was that?"

"Well" (and he gave a wink at the Koort), "that was at the first battle of Bull Run. D'ye moind that?"

The Judge judged judgmatically by giving Michael his papers; and the jolly Patlander went off, took rye, and registered.

Judge V——, of Buffalo, is widely known throughout Western New York for his habits of unflagging industry, as well as for an appreciation of all sorts of wit. On or off the bench, no one knows better how to enjoy a good thing. A case was before him in which the reputation of one of the parties was involved.

"What is the general character of the defendant?" asked the prosecuting officer.

"Character for what?"

"Why, his morals?"

This particular point was just what the witness was not over-desirous of answering; and knowing the Judge quite well, he cast toward him an appealing look, as much as to say, Can't you help me out of this? The Judge comprehended the situation, and, with a face of stony gravity, suggested that the answer desired might perhaps be attained by a slight variation of the question. "Suppose you ask him, 'How are his *im*morals?'" The witness looked upon the Court, the Court dittoed upon the witness, while the latter replied: "Well, Judge, I should say that his *im*morals stand very high!" The Court "noted the exception," while most of the by-standers adjourned to Bloomer's to—talk the thing over leisurely.

The Roman Catholic clergy, unlike the Protestant, are constantly called upon to settle little family difficulties, many of which arise from a too liberal use of—let us say beer. Mistress Mulrooney's other, but not better, half, Phelim, had come home one night in a very illigant state, and disposed to be critical and exacting with his really good wife. Gently remonstrating with him on his discreditable condition and the pernicious example it put before the childer, Phelim became suddenly irate, and commenced not merely a string, but regular cable of abuse, making it the more emphatic by commencing to smash such few chairs and things as were convanient. Mrs. Mulrooney pondered a moment and set off for Father Daly, to whom she narrated the facts. "And Father Daly, wouldn't ye be just afther comin' and seein' Phelim and givin' him the moighty good roastin' he desarves?" The good Father, allowing that he would, soon found himself in presence of the toper, and administered such a rebuke and warning as made the vagabond quake. "Ain't you ashamed of yourself, to maltreat your family in this way, to say nothing of the scandal and disgrace you bring on the Church?" Which, with other words of like tenor and effect, rather sobered Phelim, who not only promised to reform, but actually took the pledge. Alas, for poor human nature! Only a week later Phelim had another turn, worse than the last. Off posted wife for the priest, who, on arriving, found Phelim in a state of Hail Columbia, and in the midst of a general smash. The worthy Father stood upon scant ceremony, but freed his mind with a freedom and bluntness that made Phelim tremble. "I'm ashamed to see you again in this beastly condition, after the solemn promise, made only a week ago, that you would never more get drunk, and after having taken the pledge. It's a burning shame to you, and a sin against God and the Church, and sorry I am to be obliged to say so."

"Father Daly," said Phelim, in a tone half tipsy, half laughing, "did you say you was sorry to see me so?"

"Yes, I am indeed."

"Are you sure you're sorry?"

"Yes, very, very sorry."

"Well, then, Father Daly, if you are sure you're very, very sorry—I'll forgive you!" and he took the priestly hand in his own, squeezed and shook it fervently, and looked maudlinly up into the poor Father's face, as though he were "sorry" from the very bottom of his heart. Father Daly thought it wouldn't pay to dwell much longer with the brother just at that time, so took his 'at and left.

If there be any one who doubts that General Grant is "human," let him bend his faculties to a consideration of what is thus related by a telegraph operator in Louisville:

During the siege of Vicksburg the General often went around the lines on foot, usually in citizen's dress, unaccompanied by staff or orderly. On one occasion, wishing to obtain a better view of the rebel works, he ascended a signal tower. The guard, not knowing the General, ordered him down in language more expressive than elegant. The General paid no attention to the summons. The guard remonstrated with him, saying it was a very dangerous place on account of sharp-shooters. After taking another survey Ulysses descended and went his way. A soldier who knew the General spoke to the guard, telling him who the visitor was. The guard ran and overtook the General, and apologized for the language used. The General, without uttering a word, drew out a plug of "navy" from his pocket, handed it to the guard, saying, "It's all right —take a chew?"

Doubtless one of the most important nautical institutions of this country is a close corporation existing at New Rochelle, Westchester County, New York, known as the "Quauhaug Club," whose great object is to foster a noble spirit of maritime adventure on Long Island Sound, and encourage a taste for clams. It is quite a salty organization, embracing many of the older navigators, and most of the hardy young men of the town, who do sing, as did C. Columbus:

"I'm bound to be a saileure boy,
By the jin-go or die."

The fleet is ordered out monthly, in summer time, when the weather is not too windy or rainy, for improvement in seamanship and things. The

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google ladies always, on these occasions, form a strong part of passengers and crew, and much enjoy the romance of shivering timbers and splicing the main embrace. On one of these voyages, after the squadron had moved majestically out of the harbor, and reached the roadstead free from peril, there arose much sailor-talk as to the proper handling of ships. One veteran skipper claimed to know all about it, because he was of pure ocean descent; for, chanted he,

"My father was a marri-neer,
And my mother he marri-ed,
And that is the reas-i-on
That I'm here, I suppose."

And so it went on until a tall youth, leaning against the mast, asked the gory Major Harry S——, of Boston, this serious question: "Do all the old salts live at New Rochelle?" The interrogatory presenting a combination of the medical and marine for which the Major was not prepared, it was turned over to Uncle N. S——, to be presented for "improvement" at the next meeting of the School Trustees.

It seems to be agreed that the feelings of this community have been hetcheled by the liberal way of stating things noticeable in the recent works of Charles Reade and Swinburne. It reminds us of one of the brilliant men of the Church of Rome, whose winsome ways were not more remarkable than his wisdom and wit. Alas! "we ne'er shall look upon his like again!" The writer had loaned him Charles Reade's novel, "The Cloister and the Hearth; or, Maid, Wife, and Widow"—then just published. A week afterward it was returned with the following verse:

"Charles Reade's new novel, you have read it, maybe,
Is all about a Maid that has a baby;
A Wife, but so romantic is her lot,
That nary husband has the lady got;
A Widow with a husband, last, not least,
For he, bedad! is both a Monk and Priest!"

And that is about the "ground-plan and elevation" of the whole book.

A military friend at Shreveport, Louisiana, says: Talking of four-year-old boys, I was once on a mountain with such a youngster, and picked for him, from the top of a bush, some nice black-haws. In answer to my question of how he liked them, he replied, "Oh, Mr. ——, they are as sweet as a female!" That boy should come to New York and join a club.

An amusing incident occurred some years ago in the northern portion of the State. Old Judge B——, of the Circuit Court, patiently listened to the argument of counsel on the subject of demurrer. At the conclusion of the argument he "took the papers" and rendered a decision, thus: "The complaint, according to the arguments, I think is not good; yet it is my duty to weigh the intention of the parties. I am satisfied it was the intention of the Alligator to make his complaint good. I shall therefore decide that it is good." Counsel for defendant jumped up and declared that he would appeal the case. "Will you?" said the Judge. "Clerk, make the record show that I revarse my decision!"

Deep affection and accuracy of statement were touchingly combined and exhibited in the case of one Jones, who dropped a tear or two, perhaps three, to the memory of his beloved friend, Abihu Dusenbery!

From Centralia, Illinois, we learn something of "poor B——," who sought the bubble reputation at the cannon's mouth. He was never at a loss for repartee. He happened once to be reprimanded for neglecting to salute his superior officer, and a day or two afterward was observed saluting with greatest deference some of the contrabands belonging to the camp. On being asked the cause of this, he replied, that he had been reprimanded for not being polite, and now he meant to salute every body—field-officers and field hands!

At a Sabbath-school "concert," held in one of the prettiest towns in Western New York, a portion of the exercises consisted in each scholar repeating a verse of Scripture in which should be found the word love. When it came to the turn of Miss J——, a beautiful young lady of eighteen, and "in the market," she was unprepared with an answer; but before the exercise was concluded she remarked to her teacher that she had found the verse. It was: "I love those who love me, and those who seek me early shall find me." Excellent girl that!

And what a true specimen of the large-hearted benevolence of our noble frontiersmen was a grand old Sunday-school Superintendent, who one Sunday morning told his scholars that he "would like to have them get up a conscription to make the circus-preacher a little present!"

Operators in "Bennehoff," "Gunnell," or "Gregory," may perhaps be able to see the point of the following, which comes from a California wag, who setteth much store by the Drawer:

During the silver-mining excitement which "took off" so many of our wealthy citizens two or three years ago, a very amusing incident occurred, which perhaps may explain to New York stock-holders in some of the big things in Washoe why their dividends collapsed so suddenly.

R——, a prominent Front Street merchant, holding at one time a large interest in a very promising mine in Esmeralda, was honored by being elected President of the Company—he knowing, as he confidentially communicated to a friend, "about as much of silver-mining as a hen does of astronomy."

At the first meeting of the Board one of the enthusiastic Directors stated that there was an enormous quantity of rich ore in sight, and moved that an assessment of $30,000 be immediately levied to build a mill. R—— suggested that before adopting the motion it might be well to have a number of tons of the ore worked in some mill in the district; which suggestion, after considerable opposition from the more sanguine, prevailed, and the President was directed to have thirty tons of the best ore crushed and reduced in a custom mill. In due time the work was completed, and the eyes of the stock-holders in San Francisco were gladdened by the sight of a beautiful little bar of silver, carefully assayed, and stamped of the value of $1280. No account being sent with the bullion, R—— immediately wrote for a detailed statement of the cost, and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google the following week received full vouchers, accompanied by a draft of $1456 50 for necessary expenses in getting out and reducing the ore yielding the bar of silver aforesaid! The draft was paid, and the following dispatch from the President passed over the line of the State Telegraph Company the same afternoon:

"To ——, Supt. of the —— Mine, Esmeralda.
"Ship no more bullion; the market is overstocked, and it don't pay!"

At the next meeting the President resigned, on the ground that he was not eligible to the office, holding no stock.

A LOUISVILLE contributor furnishes the following:

I once heard an anecdote from Judge Randolph, of Governor Duval, the famous "Ralph Ringwood" of Washington Irving. In passing, I may state that Irving was so enchanted with this original and fresh Buck of the Woods he followed him from Kentucky to South Carolina, to gather his inimitable stories.

Governor Duval visited an old aunt whom he had not seen for many years. When he arose in the morning he missed the usual decoction of leaves, sugar, water, and Bourbonum vini it was the custom in the old days of Virginia and Kentucky to indulge in as an appetizer. He was not sufficiently familiar to ask for it, yet a walk in the sunshine around the garden, glowing in rose and dew, would not supply the want of the "mountain dew." The good dame met him as he entered the house, and, to her question about his walk, he launched out in praises of its beauty and the singing of the birds. "It seemed," he said, "that he could understand the language of these bright choristers." "Indeed!" smiled the old lady through her spectacles, "and what did the birds say?" "Aunt-ee, aunt-ee! Get up, get up! Julep, julep!" The julep came at the call of the birds.

THE Governor was the most uncalculating of mortals in money matters. He began to build a house in Florida, but his original design grew with wing on wing, until it flew away with all his cash capital, and more too. He was in debt to architects, carpenters, masons, and for every thing about his new dwelling. One bright morning in March, as he leaned meditatively over the front fence looking in toward his Aladdin palace, a stranger passing by asked, "Sir, who does that handsome edifice belong to?" "That," said the Governor, with a sparkle in his eye, "is just what I am trying to find out!"

BEFORE the recent rebellion had assumed the reality of warfare, and after Senator Sumner was assaulted by "Bully" Brooks, one of my neighbors in the country was old Charley C——, a very nice man, who, when sober, was a Buchanan Democrat, and when slightly inebriated a stanch Fremont Republican; that is to say, he changed his politics regularly every morning and evening, mixing his opinions with his libations. One evening he spoke of John Brown's raid, and, merging his conversation into Congressional matters, became quite enthusiastic between his hiccoughs. Said he: "Jest let them fellers from down South [hic] knock down another Northern man [hic] in Congress, as they've been doin' [hic], and s'elp me! I'll take my shot-gun on my shoulder and go down there, and—[hic]—and—and there won't be any more [hic] South after THAT!" I regret to add that when the war broke out Charley didn't enlist, and I never heard that the draft reached him.

IN this wide-awake age nearly all the prominent rocks, board fences, and other available places in proximity to, and on the thoroughfares leading to, the principal marts of the country are filled with advertisements of quack medicines, gift enterprises, and general notices, "all and singular." Baltimore is a focus for a full share of these inscriptions, and among them, on the turnpike from the city to the county seat at Towsontown, may be seen, on a board fence well adapted to the purpose, the imperative command, "Take Ayer's Pills!" Some zealous colporteur had appropriated a rail immediately underneath for the admonition, "Prepare to meet your God!" A wag, taking advantage of the "situation," connected the two inscriptions with a conspicuous "And," and thus left it.

Whether Dr. A. has sold more pills in consequence of that advertisement the writer knoweth not.

IT used to be the custom in Rhode Island to subjoin the peaceful manœuvres of a clam-bake to the more blood-thirsty evolutions of general trainin'. In the town of Foster (named in honor of Governor Foster, who was called Governor from the fact that he was the only man left in that State who had not filled the office of Chief Executive—vide Mount's Annals, vol. 1, p. 8) the war-scarred veterans of the 275th Rhode Island had mustered for inspection and review. Some five hundred braves were on the war-path, and courageously went through the usual ordeal of "Shoulder hoo!" and "By the left flank file right!" After which came dinner. Of course there were speeches and music and the roar of artillery. After drinking with all the honors "The President of the U. S.," "The Army," "The Navy," "The Bench and Bar," and that "Great Moral Engine, the Press," there came the usual loyal sentiment, "The American Fair." To this noble and truly American toast it was arranged that a response should be made by old Deacon Weatherwax, a veteran who had "fit into the war of eighteen-twelve." The ladies, largely represented on the occasion, were eager to hear what the gallant old cavalier should say. The speech was quite up to concert pitch. "And now," said he, "permit me to give, in conclusion, to the ladies present, the ensuing sentiment: The Fair of Foster; though admiring of the milingtery, yet vartuous on their cu-rosity!" And with this tribute to the feminine descendants of Mr. and Mrs. Roger Williams, the old gentleman subsided, and the heroes moved en echelon toward home.

MANY years ago a Baptist clergyman, just starting in his professional career, now occupying high rank in that religious body, officiated at the installation of a young brother, and in the course of his "charge" urged upon him the importance of avoiding every thing in walk and conversation that could be made the subject of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google unfriendly criticism. "Especially," said he, "do I advise you not to yield to the unbecoming fashion of wearing a beard and mustache, to avoid the use of tobacco in all its forms, and never to frequent the public house." Some years later our brother saw the reverend man who had thus "charged" him seated on the piazza of a hotel in Troy, wearing a flowing beard and mustache, and smoking a "long nine," his feet cocked up on the railing at an angle of forty-five—the favorite posture of an American citizen.

NOT long since the writer was quietly seated in his sanctum with "Brother Jeems," who, "with fragrant and serene cigar pressed satisfactorily between his lips," gave, in his quaint way, many pleasant reminiscences of the olden time. Said he: "I once heard of a gentleman of an Episcopal turn of mind who had a wife whose Presbyterianism was of the deepest azure. A son was born to them. The mother insisted upon having the infant baptized in the 'meeting-house,' to which her lord reluctd; but, as many a good husband had done before him, he finally succumbed. By-and-by the mother died, and then the old Churchman's 'rubrics' rose up stronger than ever. He proceeded to his friend and neighbor, the Bishop, stated the case, and said: 'Now, Bishop, I want that boy baptized over again. I want you to baptize all the Presbyterianism out of him. Get it all out; leave no "bluing" behind.' The Bishop, not exactly seeing how another baptism would 'wash,' talked to him sensibly, as a bishop should, and concluded by saying, in a tone the least bit jocular: 'Instead of attempting to wash the 'ism away, perhaps you had better give him a dose of salts.' The old gentleman pondered a moment and left the presence. What he did has not been recorded. In due time the boy became an Episcopal clergyman, but was one of those restless, crotchety chaps who are always giving bishops trouble. Something recalling the baptismal proposition to the Bishop's mind he said: 'I do remember recommending "Epsom" in lieu of "aqua," and begin to be quite confident that the old gentleman must have given the uneasy fellow an overdose, for they seem to have been operating ever since!'"

A WORTHY padre was one day walking with a Unitarian clergyman in Boston, and happened to pass near the church of the latter, on which was a clock, but just at that juncture the clock did not indicate the correct hour. The Unitarian imagining what might be passing in the brother's mind, said:

"Oh! you mustn't rely upon my time, for it isn't right."

"My dear Sir," replied his friend, "it isn't your time that I was thinking of; it's your eternity!"

That was fair—for Boston.

THE robes of a bishop and the services of the Episcopal Church sometimes give occasion for odd comment, especially in places where the liturgy is for the first time heard. A Western prelate, with the view of making his visitation more acceptable and edifying, took along his good wife, who was of much assistance in making the responses, in singing, etc. But this went against the grain of a Campbellite sister who happened to be present, and who was mindful of what the New Testament saith of women who speak out in meeting. No sooner had Sister Tuttle got beyond the church door than, turning to a neighbor, she said: "Did you ever see such a sassy woman as that preacher's wife? She set there in meetin' and sassed her husband all the time he was readin'!"

KENTUCKY appears to enjoy the Drawer, and is occasionally moved to send on its little jokelets. Here is one that's tolerable:

At a gathering of the sovereigns for a political purpose, where high debate was held on the "principles of '98," "the Virginia resolutions," and other cognate subjects, the question of the Dred Scott case and Judge Taney's decision was under comment. One of the crowd, doubting the accuracy of some statement that had been made in reference to it, expressed the belief that "Dred Scott never decided the question in any such way!" There being some dubiety as to exactly what "Mr. Scott" did decide, further consideration of the subject was dropped.

THERE are men in this world so utterly depraved as not to be fond of little children. It is reported of Alvan Stewart, a man of mark in his day, that some thirty years ago he was voyaging on one of the Erie Canal packet-boats when there happened to be on board an unusual number of ladies with babies, and the little cherubs continually did cry. This annoyed Alvan to such an extent that, at dinner, he "arose in his place, and with a glass of water in hand, said, "Ladies, I have great pleasure in proposing to you a toast, which seems to me to be very pertinent to the present occasion. I give you—The Memory of the much-abused King Herod!"

Anxious mothers snuggled up their "little preciouses" at the very thought of the bloody-minded old Tetrarch; and one goody, a little riled, remarked that if Mr. Stewart remembered how quickly Herod died after the unpopular performance he had hinted at, he wouldn't have proposed a toast to his memory.

WE believe it was the celebrated and witty Dr. Wistar, of Philadelphia, who is reported to have made the allusion to our colored sister quoted in the following history:

The Doctor was a warden of one of the Episcopal churches in Philadelphia, and, as such, it became his duty to pass the plate. In the grave discharge of that duty, one Sunday morning, he had passed down the whole distance of the aisle, and gathered in but a beggarly account of pennies, dimes, and quarters. In the last seat, next the door, sat a negro woman, whose skin was really unnecessarily black. She was a well-to-do and charitable person, and dropped into the plate a five-dollar gold piece. The Doctor looked at it intently for a moment, and said to himself, in an under-tone: "Well, that's a guinea nigger, any how!"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

No. CCIV.—MAY, 1867.—Vol. XXXIV.

THE PICTURED ROCKS OF LAKE SUPERIOR.

THE CHAPEL, LOOKING WEST.

THE range of sandstone cliffs known as the Pictured Rocks of Lake Superior are in Schoolcraft County, Michigan, on the south shore of the lake, about one hundred miles from the Sault St. Marie, and sixty this side of Marquette; being, therefore, a pleasant (and profitable) summer retreat, with some few disadvantages, the chief of which is the appalling fact that it is about two or three days' canoe journey, either way, to a beef-steak.

Among my memories of school-boy readings are accounts of long voyages of explorers, Jesuit missionaries, and Canadian voyageurs, all of whom describe the wonderful beauties of the Grand Portal, Chapel, and of the surrounding rocks. One winter evening, many years ago, an Oneida Chief put up at my father's tavern in Central New York, and having been a friend of the family in the East, he was invited to the kitchen, where the great wide-mouthed fireplace warmed his heart and illuminated his countenance, while he astonished and delighted a large circle of listeners, who half neglected their apples and spiced cider listening to the story of his journey to the Great West, selecting a new home for his tribe, who were to be Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by Harper and Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google removed by the Government at Washington. During that long golden evening I sat snugged up in the corner, swallowing every word, with hair rising and flesh crawling at the thrilling tales; and, when I could take my eyes away from his face long enough, looked among the pictures in the fire for the rocks and waves, bears and deer, panthers and otters, Indians and Canadian voyageurs, wigwams and birch canoes of his enchanting harangue.

Many times since then I have wished and resolved to see the rocks, and the desire has at length been gratified, and just as if some good spirit had ordered the fulfillment of my dreams. The way to get there is simple enough to those who have read of Solomon's Carpet and its wonderful journeys. A steamboat is a much more wonderful thing than Solomon or Haroun al Rasheed ever dreamed of; and when you are prepared for the trip, with pencil, note-book, sketch-book and colors (if you can use them), cans of preserved milk, and any other eatable and drinkable you please, and plenty of thick clothing, one of them will take you from either Buffalo or Chicago, and in a very short and eventful trip you find yourself, some fine morning about sunrise, far out into Lake Superior, glass in hand, looking southward, trying to make out whether it is rocks or sand banks that you see. For this side the rocks, extending many miles, there are immense banks of sand three hundred feet high, called the Grand Sable, a name given by the French, meaning Big Sands. Having been told that we should be in sight of the rocks at sunrise, we were out on deck shivering in the cold starlight several times during the night, expecting to see them loom up in the dim, uncertain light. But the only visible objects besides the steamer were the stars, so very bright, whose light the steamer was trying to puff out with its double column of pitchy smoke. As you look and shiver, the strange notion seizes you that the boat may be a thing of life after all, such energy and power and seeming purpose, heaving its way through the dark waters!

After breakfast you catch the first glimpse of the Sable, far away to the south, gray and cloud-like. Then two or three hours after the rocks are made out through the glass, and now is the time for excitement among the passengers. Swiftly the boat glides along, and point after point of shore is left behind with their fairy-like forms and colors—a truly grand procession of wonders, not equaled in its kind in all the world.

But it is our business to get ashore, and take to the small-boat for an exploration. One glimpse is not enough; we must linger here for weeks, and become familiar with the scenes we have so long desired to see. Before landing us on Grand Island the steward of the steamer Planet cooked up a supply of beef-steak, and put it into our carpet-bag, packing it with crackers and a peck of apples, saying: "This will keep you in memory of civilized life while in the wilderness." Thus supplied, we felt valorous and ready for a trip of any reasonable extent.

We were directed to inquire of the Indians or fishermen on the island for Mr. Williams, who would probably lend us a boat, and in due time found him in his new house (not quite finished, although it has been building for several years). On the way to it from where we landed we were so occupied in watching the Indian women and children on the shore cleaning fish that we did not notice the water coming into the batteau we were using; so our things were soaked in dirty water, and had to be spread out on the grass to dry. Shirts, stockings, and all our useful dry-goods were discouraging objects a thousand miles from our wash-woman. The carpet-bag containing the meat was laid in the grass near the house when we rapped at Mr. Williams's door, and was left there a few moments while chatting with the old patriarch. In a few words, always direct and without waiting to be questioned, he gave us an account of his coming there forty or fifty years ago, his family grown to be men and women having families of their own. But not all of them were living—four of them, his sons and daughters, having been drowned in a storm when return-

INDIAN DOGS.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

GRAND ISLAND HARBOR.

ing in a small-boat from Marquette, where they had been for stores.

We could have listened longer, but a growl or two at the door attracted the old man's quick ear, when he asked: "Is there any thing in your carpet-bag that dogs would like to get at?" In a moment we were at the door; but it was too late. We explained what was in the bag to Mr. Williams, when we discovered it emptied and the steak gone. What was said in the inspiration of the moment was doubtless said forcibly, perhaps eloquently, but not respectfully. There was no respect shown to dogs, most especially to Indian dogs. Patience, meekness, and forbearance were virtues not then in demand, certainly not in use. Vocabularies of terms, exact and otherwise, suggesting ideas derived from a belief in the Plutonian system and others, were exhausted, and the crowning effort was that of the gray-haired pioneer when he learned that an untold amount of savory sirloin ready for the tooth had been devastated by the dogs. He lifted up his voice (rich and sonorous from his long outdoor habits), but he did not weep. He drew it mild, in a patriarchal manner, discovering much learning and experience on the subject of Indians and their dogs.

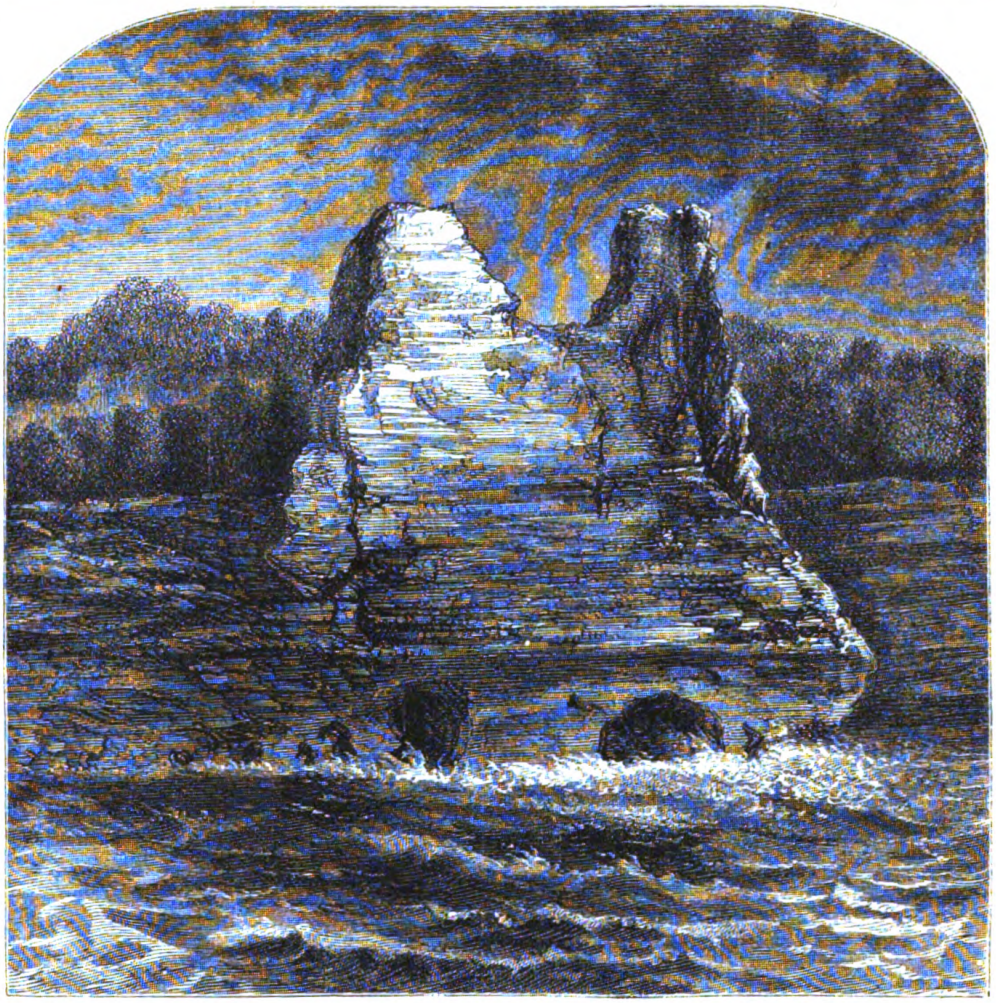
There are resident on the island a few Indians of the Chippewa tribe, whose wigwams are built a few rods from Mr. Williams's houses, and who seemed to have imbibed just enough civilization to wear calico dresses, old coats, and dilapidated stove-pipe hats, and drink whisky, when the latter is to be got. Tea and tobacco, of course; but these are no evidence of civilized habits. As you stand under the Point of Pines, near Mr. Williams's houses, and look toward the Indian wigwams, you see only such sights as belong to a wild life. There are several wigwams around which squaws and papooses are busy at work or play; and several birch canoes pulled up on the sand beach. "Bully," son-in-law of the old chief, a half-breed, French and Indian, is helping his squaw clean fish—white-fish and trout—which he has just taken from the pound-net, which is set a few rods from the shore in the harbor. The pure Indians will not help their squaws do such work, as it is considered unfit for men to perform dirty labor. And so it is; but then men

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

BILL LEMM.

differ so materially as to what may be called dirty work.

Here we are, then, looking on as much Indian life as there is to be found this side the Rocky Mountains. Now turn around where you stand and look the other way, and the scene changes. These log-houses, one story high, built very solidly, with small windows, very stout door, are the original strong-hold of Mr. Williams, built when he first located here fifty years ago. This first was dwelling, the second blacksmith shop, the third a store, now full of goods, and the fourth the cooper-shop, where the barrels are made for putting up the fish caught in the harbor; and the last house is Bill Lemm's, son-in-law to Mr. Williams. The house on the hill to the left is new, and belongs to the present, and has no flavor of age about it yet—white and staring; while the old ones are covered all over with delicate grays, purples, and browns, and soft green mosses and lichens—very comfortable-looking in their old age—innocent of paint, whitewash, or carpet, overshadowed with venerable pines, and their sides half hidden by masses of weeds, tall grasses, and creeping vines.



We found Mr. Lemm ready to take us to the rocks "in the best boat on Lake Superior, if he did build it himself;" fifteen feet long by four beam; mast and oars, with a provision-chest, and named after his daughter, Cora E. Lemm. (And it may be here remarked in parenthesis, that all this is true even to the name, which was written all over the stern in elegant English text.) Mrs. Lemm, he said, would cook up biscuit, and we could go early next morning. Part of our luggage was taken down to Lemm's house, where we were to sleep that night. How glorious it is to sleep in the country! Please imagine that the biscuit business had been carried on in one of the largest stoves, with fine dry wood, until half past ten, and our bed was spread out on the floor within ten feet of the stove. The time is July, and the mosquitoes have gathered in millions to welcome the strangers. Careful women shut the windows and doors close. Further particulars concerning the comforts of sleeping in the country are unnecessary. Then, again, it does seem impossible to get ready to go to bed. "Early to bed and early to rise" was torn out of the primer they used when young, and Lemm seemed inclined to stay up all night telling us his history, most especially about his gun. "The best gun in the States, sure." Could draw a bead on a deer in the most difficult and unheard-of places. Drew a bead on a buck once; could just see his nose and one horn, perhaps one eye, right by the side of a huge pine-tree; but just as he pulled the trigger the deer bounded off into the woods. "But, you know, he carried that ball away with him! Deer are getting more and more scary every year."

Next morning we were off bright and early, and as we rowed across the bay Lemm recited the Legend of Munising. This was a grand project of the Philadelphians, artfully laid out on paper, with squares, city lots, hotels, and what not. Back of it a little way—a half mile or so—is a pretty waterfall, sixty feet high, in the midst of the woods—a delightful place to

THE FIRST INHABITANT OF MUNISING

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

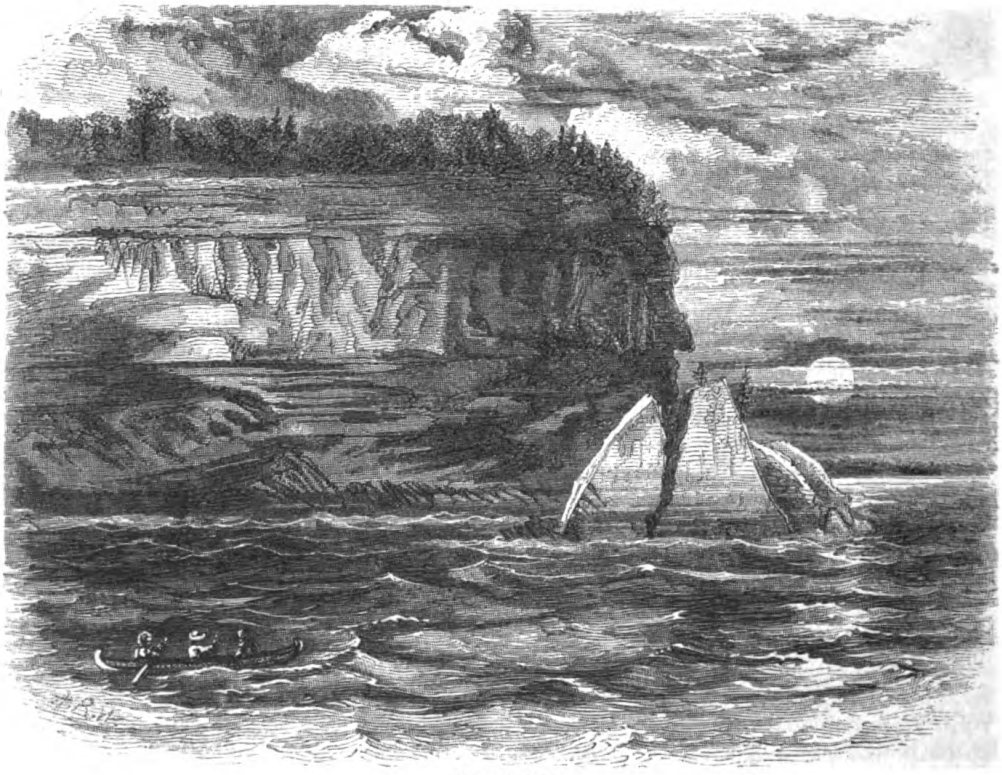
MINER'S CASTLE.

spend summer in. The hotel there, built and furnished in grand style, was occupied one season; but now the furniture is all stored in heaps in one or two rooms, and only one man lives there to keep watch over the things. Indians steal the bed-clothes when they get a chance.

"Splendid site! that Munising. Ought to have had the railroad from Escanaba through to this place instead of to Marquette. But, you see, the iron interest carried the day. It runs now through a swamp most of the way; but this route would a been good land all the way. Besides, and this every one who has lived on the lake knows, Grand Island Harbor is the only real safe harbor on the entire lake. Shut in from the storms in all directions, vessels and steamers put in here for safety when a storm is raging outside. Waves may roll high as a meetin'-house out in the lake, and it will be calm as a mill-pond in this harbor. Bad job carryin' the road to Marquette. We've been through to Green Bay, in winter, by this route, many a time; and Bully has carried mail here for several years when the navigation was closed, always starting into the wilderness for Munising. Back of the town, or where it was laid out to be, the hills rise suddenly about two hundred feet, as you can see from here; and then the country is quite level, all the way to Green Bay, and is heavily timbered."

"Any game in that direction?"

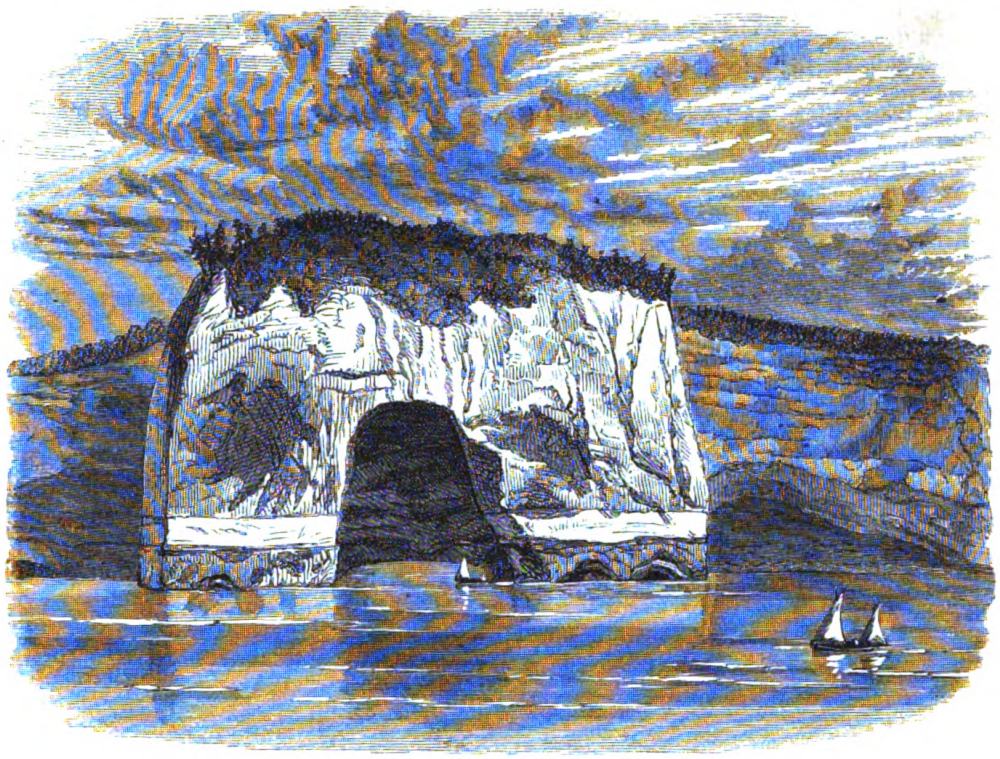
"Deer, panthers, bears, wolves, rabbits, ducks, and a'most any thing you are a mind to shoot, and good trapping all winter. Right here, where the point of Grand Island comes down into the harbor, the water is deep, and the steamers can run close; but on the other side there is half a mile of shallow water, with a hard-pan bottom, and vessels often get aground on it. Pilots and old sailors know it. The harbor seldom freezes over. A little round the shores and up into the bays the storms and winds make a pretty strong current, which keeps it open. That platform, half a mile from shore, was built for a landing, and it was intended to connect it with the shore by a plank-walk and carriage-way; but the whole project went under at once. The railroad to Marquette did



Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

it. That spoilt Grand Island, or we'd all been rich."

The only inhabitant of this that was to be mighty city is a pretty smart man; but then he can't draw a bead with Lemm. It is two miles to the Chimneys—tall, slender columns of rock, among the trees, very much like factory-chimneys, and one expects to see smoke issue from them. A mile or two farther is the Castle—called Miner's Castle, the first of the principal features of the rocks. Tall towers, solid walls, battlements, doorways, loopholes; in general effect, at a proper distance, there is to all appearance a real Norman Castle, and a more solid, impregnable, never was built. Here we go into the great doorway, and our boat sails far in until we lose sight of the entrance. Miner's River enters the lake beside the Castle and is a stream thirty or forty feet wide, and forms quite a safe harbor for small boats in rough weather. Cliff on the west shore of the river and a sand-beach about thirty rods long on the east. Last season Lemm says that a venturesome young lady climbed to the top of the highest point of the Castle, nearly a hundred feet above the water.



Lemm says this beach is not so good for a camp as the Chapel Beach, so we are to go there to build our hut. Just beyond the Miner's Beach the Pictured Rocks begin to show their wonders. Worn into strange shapes by frost and storm, and stained by a thousand dyes in every possible variety of arrangement, far beyond the power of words to correctly describe, and all this profusion repeated mile after mile, keeping up the interest by some new prospect of sweeping curve, or abrupt angle, or fantastic form.

The first cascade we met was two miles beyond the Castle, where the water falls about twenty-five feet perpendicular, and then slides, at an angle of about forty degrees, a hundred and fifty feet farther. Here the colors are quite monotonous and dull, and arranged in stripes running downward. Lemm said that the next headland but two beyond the cascade was the Sail Rock, and we pulled hard to reach it. Just as we neared it we discovered a profile in the end of the cliff which bore a striking likeness to Franklin. The likeness from the other side was not so recognizable, the features appearing sharper. The Sail Rock is composed of several fallen slabs of sandstone which rise above the water about seventy-five feet, and from the east appear like a schooner with sails set, running in toward the rocks. The illusion is complete. When we saw it from the steamer, a mile or two distant, it was supposed to be a fishing or pleasure party cruising along the rocks. Two headlands intervene between the Sail Rock and the Grand Portal—the Great Door. These headlands are being continually formed and changed by the waves and the elements, and are rounded outward with a convexity of generally one foot in ten; and one is usually connected with another with long or short concave sweeps of cliff—the outline taking the character of a telegraph-line suspended rather slack between poles set at unequal distances. The general direction of the coast

SAIL ROCK.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

GRAND PORTAL—EXTERIOR.

from the Castle to the Door is northeast; and from the Door by a sharp angle nearly due east to the Sable. All along the coast there are heaps of rocks which have fallen from the cliff, and where the waves have not worn them down (and the sandstone, of all the strata, readily disintegrates) still afford a landing-place. Lemm says these avalanches usually happen in the spring.

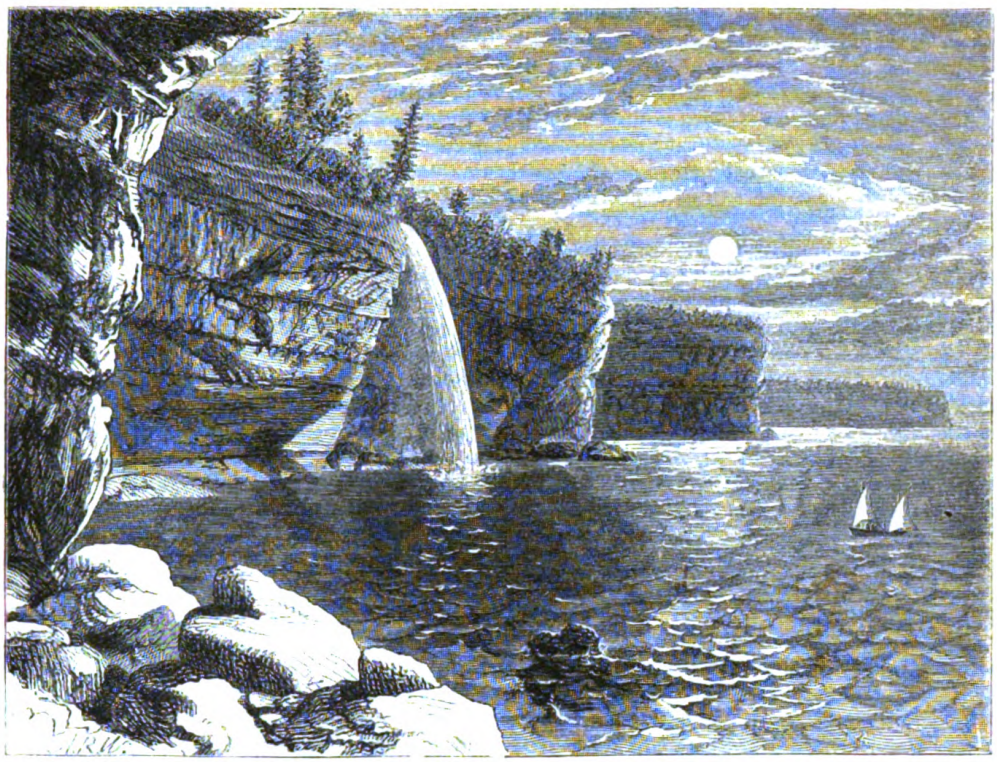
We were in a hurry to get to the Chapel Beach before dark and put our hut in order, so we made but a few moments' halt in the Great Door. Sublime spectacle, a dome high in the air, vast and impressive — echoing our voices and the splashing of our oars, and alive with flocks of gulls, we reluctantly pulled away from it, resolving to come again, as soon as we should be located, to measure and explore it. But we did not then know the inconceivable attractions that lay beyond, and prevented our return for many days. On the way to the Chapel Beach from the Door you pass by ten or twelve headlands formed very much like each other, and each resembling the stern of a vessel; and this group we named the Stranded Fleet—from its resemblance to a fleet of immense vessels gone ashore bows on.

Here we are at length at the Chapel Beach, and there is the Chapel. Is it not truly named? Like the ruin of some ancient temple, whose roof still rests on a few crumbling columns and is overgrown with trees, carrying its date far into the dim past. The Indians locate a Manitou in the Chapel, and another in the Grand Portal.

Did you ever build a birch hut in the wilderness? No. Well, look on, and see how it is done. Cut a few poles for the frame, and stick them firmly into the sand, and tie them together at the top to form the apex of the roof. Roof! why, it will be all roof and floor like a garret. Now peel birch bark in as broad pieces as you can, and get the inner bark of the cedar for strings, and tie the birch bark pieces on the poles, overlapping to shed the rain. Drive stakes deep into the sand and tie poles over all to anchor against the wind. Make a door, and your hotel is complete. Of course the fire is outside.

See, our friend the Indian is quietly making a fire to boil coffee. How expert these red men are in woodcraft! He stripped two pieces of bark to my one; and did you see how skillfully he doubled up the corners of one large piece which he is now using as a pail to bring water from the spring? Birch bark becomes flexible by warming, and may be bent without breaking. "I wonder if his birch would be as safe in a high wind as your boat, Lemm?" The idea that any craft could be compared with his boat for an instant so dumbfounded Lemm that he stalked silently away, only giving us a pitying look for answer.

Hurrah! now for work! "Come, Doxtater, while Lemm is busy catching some trout for dinner or supper, as we happen to want it, let us cruise along the rocks; and first we will visit the Chapel. But I say, Lemm, did you ever notice the resemblance to a lion's head in the rock at the top of the Chapel?"



Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Yes, seems as if he was lying down and taking a quiet look at the lake. I could show you many another animal and figure among the rocks. Always finding new ones." Where is my measuring tape? Feet and inches take the romance out of it, do you say? I imagine that my friend the Indian felt more than he could put into words, unless volumes were condensed into the single emotional ejaculation which burst from his very soul as he stood in the dome of the Chapel—a space large enough for several hundred people to assemble, with a ruinous floor, but a very solid roof; a single mass of sandstone one hundred and ninety by sixty feet, supported by the cliff on the east side and rear, and by several columnar masses on the front and west sides. The "pulpit" is formed by one of these columns which has been worn away to a height of only three feet above the floor, and is six feet across a level top. One column stands detached, and ten feet west of the main structure. The height is eighty feet from the water to the top. Viewed from either side, but more especially from the east, the impression received is that it resembles the ruin of some vast church. Those immense columns at Abou Simbel, on the Nile, are more artistical, but not more sublime. Being the work of men's hands gives importance to the Egyptian ruin, and being the handiwork of the Supreme Architect ennobles the American Chapel. There are but few stains of color about the Chapel, and these yellow and brown, and only on the lower strata. Beautiful mosses and lichens cover the sides and roof, in some places concealing the stone. You can climb up the cliff by the waterfall and enter the Chapel by the rear, but if you have a boat the best way is to land on the rocks at the front, where are very regular steps in the sandstone, it having crumbled away leaving plates varying from a few inches to several feet in thickness, each receding behind the last, forming a natural stairway up to the main rooms. The Storm King is janitor here, clearing the temple walls and floor by his wind and waves. There are holes in the rock at the level of the water, some extending ten feet or so into the cliff, and three or four feet wide at the outside, which, when there is a high sea, receive a rushing wave and spout back the water and spray for a hundred feet,

CHAPEL BEACH AND HUT.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE CASCADE.

with a roar like cannon at a distance. In a storm a thousand of these holes keep up a continual roar as of artillery in a battle.

One of the cliffs is made memorable by the wreck of the steamer Superior in 1857, whose timbers and machinery is still to be seen, when the water is calm, at about twelve to fifteen feet depth. Lemm has fished up many pieces of iron, and is still hovering around it. The steamer broke its rudder and drifted ashore here in a storm, and the water being shallow soon pounded the hull to pieces on the solid rock bottom; and there was no landing possible, the cliff being nearly two hundred feet high and overleaning the water. Half a mile east of this place is the largest cascade of the rocks, a sheet about thirty feet wide falling clear down one hundred and seventy-five feet into the lake. The overhang of the cliff makes a space of twenty or thirty feet between the sheet and the rocks, where you can row in your boat if you are willing to take a shower-bath. There are several headlands visible in one view from near the Cascade, and the colors are bright and varied. All along the rocks east to west they are crowned with trees, mostly evergreens; here and there an oak or birch. As the rocks crumble away, or are split off by the elements, the trees are undermined, lean over the verge, and finally tumble into the lake. Sometimes an avalanche of rock goes down in a compact mass with the trees standing unharmed. Such an event has made a rocky island, covered with foliage, near the Sail Rock. The rock thus left bare shows its natural color, which is yellow, or golden brown, varying in the different strata; some light, others dark, nearly burned sienna tint, and others warm brown or dull orange. A few years covers the bared rock with lichens and stains uniform with the older surface.

Beyond the Cascade eastward the next place of interest is the Grand Amphitheatre. This is the largest of the concave sweeps of cliff line, and is a display of form and color surpassing any other locality in attractiveness, except, of course, the Chapel and Great Door. The cliff is nearly two hundred feet high, overhangs fifteen to fifty feet, wet with the drain of springs in the soil above or from the rains; and colored with the greatest variety of form and hue. In the view engraved some of these stains are represented as far as black lines are capable of doing this. Near the centre of the view there is a heap of rocks recently fallen, last spring probably, for the cliff above shows the clean bright color of the sandstone. Each side of this bare spot the color is strong and varied as usual. The upper strata, about fifty feet thick, are grayer, and lie in thin slabs or plates, and are less stained than those below. The next under them are colored yellow and brown and russet in confused patches; and below these again appear the blue and white and green tints. Some stripes are as white as chalk, others verdigris green, or pale blue, changing gradually as it goes down the rock to green, and finally dark-brown or black. The source of the color seems to be in mineral oxyds carried over the rock by water, besides the usual lichens and crystallizations. There is a stratum of gravel loosely ce-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

mented by sand and clay, varying from two feet thick at the Castle to thirty at the Great Door, and twenty at the Amphitheatre. Most of the strata appear to be thicker at the Great Door, and the cliff is generally elevated fifty to seventy-five feet above the height at five miles' distance each way from that centre. The scene was sketched from the top of a pile of sandstones recently fallen, very similar to that shown in the distance, and where the water from the cliff overhead dripped thirty feet beyond me, affording a cool shade in a hot July day. Perhaps it would be well to say now before I forget it, that in all that trip, except a few hours in the middle of the day, it was very comfortable in a good thick coat and gloves, and morning or evening an over-coat was quite indispensable, while a good blazing fire was desirable, besides being useful for making coffee. The winds are very cold, and when they come over the lake sweep away mosquitoes, gnats, sand-flies, midges, and all the other torments of sultry days, and give you a good night's sleep in peace.

It was our constant amusement to look for shapes among the forms and colors on the cliffs and name them. One would discover a resemblance to a group of horses of various colors, and another see a long procession of boys carrying fish; and of women with expansive skirts, and parasols as large as cavalry tents. Here were elephants grouped with serpents a hundred feet long, seeming to come up out of the water. There a city dimly pictured, with roofs, towers, and spires. There is really no end to this amusement but your own inclination to indulge in it. It was amusing as well as curious to notice the different impressions that the same groups produced on different persons. While the pale faces saw only such objects as were familiar to their common experience, the red man saw the shadows of the past; the history of his race reproduced, written by the Almighty. Where the waves and current make a beach of the sand the gravel from the stratum spoken of is washed quite clean, and among the pebbles are found many fine ones in color and form; agates, jasper, and carnelians. One agate owned by Peter White, of Marquette, and set in a breast-pin, has thirteen hundred lines of differing colors in an inch. We brought home a few pieces of rock and some of the pebbles; the rock very soon fell into sand, and the pebbles are now our only reminiscence of the rocks, except a wide piece of silver birch bark, which was cut near the beaver pond back of Chapel Beach, and the deer-skin which was got in the midst of tribulation.

One evening Lemm said the waves would run too high next day for us to make any attempt at a cruise, and he proposed a tramp in the woods, visiting the beaver ponds, and if we

THE AMPHITHEATRE.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google started early we would be likely to see the beaver at play and perhaps get a crack at a deer. Deer tracks had been seen several mornings on the sand not far from our hut, which encouraged us, and the trip was arranged. So before it was fairly light we were all away, creeping silently as possible toward the ponds. The beaver-dam is a hundred rods long, very strong, and floods thousands of acres, forming two ponds, besides wide marshes, where lilies grow, making feeding-places for deer. High hopes and feverish excitement ruled that morning, and we tried to move through the woods very silently, and it must be that we did, for Dox said he could only hear us half a mile.

After some hunting about we found the very best spot imaginable for a look-out—on a high bank overlooking the island where the beaver-houses are built in the lower pond. There were several beavers busy running about, at work or play, and old and young were very lively. We wondered if some showman would not like to transport that island, with its tenants so full of graceful motion and playful habits, to New York or its vicinity. The First National Beaver-Dam Sample-Room would be the popular resort. We could have enjoyed the scene for hours, and not even Lemm's desire to get a crack at a deer would have moved us; but just as we were whispering our debates a sliding plunge into the water under the bank where we lay attracted our attention. Dox said it was a beaver who had been watching us, and had now gone to give the alarm. Sure enough, in a few moments all the islanders were invisible, and after waiting for a little while we concluded that the curtain was dropped on the show, and left for the upper pond, where we arrived about sunrise.

Lemm went direct to the raft he had used on a previous visit, the year before, and he and I got aboard, while Dox preferred to walk along the shore. We had hardly shoved off before we heard a splashing and snorting the other side of a clump of trees, on a little point of land, and Lemm was frantic to get out far enough to get a sight of the deer. In our haste we broke the rotten withes that bound the raft together, and the lilies and grass pulled the logs apart, spilling us into two feet of water, with a very oozy and uncertain bottom. This humiliation was very rapidly taking the conceit out of two would-be deer-slayers, when the crack of Dox's rifle was heard toward the head of the pond, and that finished the business for them. Lemm's face grew very pale and his voice tragically husky as he said, with a groan, "There! Dox has scared them off! I was afraid he would." We waded back to land, and on coming up with Dox found him loading his gun.

"Scared 'em off?" suggested Lemm.

"Yes," said Dox; "scared one."

And sure enough, there he lay, in the edge of the marsh. Lemm referred to the raft in very classic English, of the heroic school. However, venison, roasted or fried in the wilderness, is an excellent remedy for wounded feelings. And we roasted and ate and chatted, recounting former exploits, and so whiled away the rest of that day, drying our clothes by the fire, and when weary with wagging our tongues, late in the night, arranged ourselves to sleep.

Cowper says, in the "Sofa:"

> "But comes at last the dull and dusky eve,
> And sends thee to thy cabin, well prepared
> To dream all night of what the day denied."

And he has hit it exactly, except that we had no dull, although several dusky evenings; and that last line touched our case exactly. And another fine old English poet, Holty, says:

> "Happy the man who has the town escaped!
> To him the whistling trees, the murmuring brooks,
> The shining pebbles, preach
> Virtue's and wisdom's lore."

Splendid lines! With what pleasure can one recall the dulcet strains of the rural poets when in the wilderness. I think it is in the opening of the "Time-Piece" where Cowper says:

> "Oh for a lodge in some vast wilderness,
> Some boundless contiguity of shade!"

expecting to find there relief from certain ills which civilized men fall heirs to. But who shall sing the joys of sleeping in the woods, or on the Chapel Beach?

Lemm said, one night, soon after we had sandwiched ourselves for sleep, that he knew there was a rat or mouse, or something of that kind, crawling over his legs, and proposed a hunt. Dox and I got pine knots lighted and looked all through the hemlock and pine carpet in the hut, but no living thing was to be found except the aroused Lemm; and again we courted sleep. Early next morning he said he had felt it again, whatever it was, several times during the night. Dox was out at the fire, heaping on wood and getting coffee-water hot, when he called to us to come out and help catch a snake. This was the disturber of Lemm's slumbers—must have been, for Dox saw it crawling out from that side of the tent where Lemm slept. It was a beauty, and three feet long.

"How do you like that sort of bed-fellow, Lemm?"

"Ho! that's nothing. Find one under your head some morning, as I have, and a moccasin to boot."

I wonder if it is not within the possibilities of chemical science to compound an unguent protection against flies, mosquitoes, and most especially midges and sand-flies. It would be a constant companion in all country excursions. Even Long Branch or Coney Island would be more peaceful, especially if the article had an appropriate name and agreeable perfume. Some one has recommended crude petroleum, but it is an open question whether the remedy is not worse than the evil. Sleeping in the woods gives one such a keen appetite. No matter what is prepared to eat that is only wholesome;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

INTERIOR OF GRAND PORTAL.

and you are hungry again so soon that the days seem to stretch out very needlessly.

The beauties of all lands are dull and commonplace to the inhabitants thereof, however much they may be prized by strangers. And the Pictured Rocks are no exception to the rule. "High and rough and stained, and rather curious; still, nothing but rock, after all. Can't see why people come all the way from New York to see nothing but stones. Curious, maybe; but we can see 'em any time when we've nothing else to do. Good place to fish —for some kinds. Where the streams run in, and near the cascades, you are sure to get brook-trout, very fine flavor; and since the steamer was wrecked something can be made fishing up old iron; but no one hereabouts ever feels like wasting time just to look at the rocks. As for the picturs, every one has a notion of their own about them. No two sees 'em alike."

Now for a trip to the Grand Portal. Lemm says he just as lieve go and try his luck at the wreck, fishing for old iron, and be back about sundown; so Dox and I go in the birch. Modestly we enter by the side opening of the cave, and while the sketch is in progress, from the fallen rocks at the back, Dox in the birch goes along the walls, peeping in and out, exploring for pebbles and specimens of rock and lichens and crystallizations.

Imagine yourself in a room four hundred feet long, by one hundred and eighty wide, and one hundred and fifty to two hundred feet high to the arched roof, built of yellow sandstone, seamed with decay and dripping with water. Shout, and your voice is multiplied a hundred-fold by echoes that reverberate several seconds, sharp, metallic. Here the stratum of gravel is elevated about fifty feet, while at the Castle it is nearly down to the water-level, and at the Amphitheatre is about twenty feet above. The waters are undermining the foundations, and wearing holes every where in the support of the walls and roof, and in some day—how far into the future it is impossible to guess—the sandstone will be entirely cut through, and the immense roof come down into the waves, to be carried away in sand to make wider the Chapel Beach, or perhaps increase the Grand Sable. The water in the cave increases in depth as you go out toward the lake, from the bare rocks of the back end to about fifty feet at the opening,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and a few rods from the shore it is a hundred feet or more. The water is much deeper near the rocks at the Great Door, and a mile or two each way, than at any other place along the shore. The cliff on the west, next to the Grand Portal, is hollowing out, forming an immense cave, increasing yearly, being much larger now than it was a year ago. Then we visited it with two photographers from Chicago, and we had one of their views with us as a record. Great blocks had fallen and enormous cavities formed where last year it was apparently solid rock, stained with the accumulation of years. This change impressed us with a feeling of great insecurity, which increased so much that we hastened to finish our sketch and remove to some more secure position less in danger of being ground to powder.

Dox said he had no doubt we could bring down a rock from the roof inside by firing a pistol; so we paddled to the mouth and fired back into the cave. Either our gun was too small, or the rock was not ready to respond and come down, for the only result was some very sonorous echoes which set the flocks of gulls to whirling and screaming, some coming very near and looking fiercely at us as they sailed swiftly by, as much as to say, "Clear out, you meddlesome chaps, and stop trying to disturb our ancient nesting-place!"

Again we paddled into the great cave, and looked along its walls, and followed the flowing waves and the accompanying reflections chasing each other up the sides and dancing in the roof. It is beyond the power of the pencil to represent the effect of the reflected light in the roof as seen from the rear. Especially when the sun is toward the west the bright light is reflected back from the waves into the cavern, and undulates like a sea of light overhead; a picture in living colors, so tender, so quiet—luminous, pearly grays, bright flashes, cool high lights, all warmed by the yellow sandstone, dripping with water, on which the effect is thrown. We tried firing the pistol again at the rear, but with no other result than a series of deafening echoes. This would be an awful place in a storm. There is no rock on which you could climb more than six or ten feet above calm water-level, and waves coming in with a high wind would wash the rocks for a hundred feet in height; and no one could possibly live a single day, much less during a storm of a week.

The fishermen understand the treacherous nature of the storms on Lake Superior, and are generally provided for the weather by carrying several days' provision when going even a few miles from home. The unfortunate man, if trapped on one of the beaches, where he could escape into the wilderness in the rear, could, by making a long circuit, avoiding the bays and creeks, possibly find his way to the shore opposite Grand Island, at Munising. If he lost his way—not at all improbable in a storm—his only salvation would be his gun, and the possibility of reaching Marquette, Escanaba, or some lumber settlement on Green Bay, a good hundred-mile tramp.

Our last glimpse of the Grand Portal was near sunset one day after rain, when the rays of the sun lit up the yellow sandstone with a glory that melted the shining mass into burnished gold.

"Lemm, how far will we have to row to get to the Grand Sable?"

"Wa'al, about ten or fifteen miles to see the high banks; and you'd better be keerful of the weather, for it won't do to be caught there in a storm. No such thing as landing a boat in any safe place."

"Well, Dox, as our provision-chest has nearly given out, and Lemm will have to go home for a new supply, let us take two or three days' rations, and manage to meet him on his return to the Chapel Beach."

The rations we took were ten biscuits, about three pounds of maple-sugar, and a cooked trout of two pounds' weight. The stay at the rocks had been much longer than was calculated upon, and therefore the short allowance. Lemm thought he could return by the next day noon, certain, and away he pulled. Dox and I set out in the birch for new explorations. We passed the Cascade, the Wreck Cliff, Amphitheatre, Cliff of Tombs, End of Rocks, and then five miles along the Sable. Ocean sands are an index of infinity—a type; the desert also is a type, with its limitless expanse of sand. What shall we say of these mountains of sand? Two hundred to three hundred feet elevated against the sky, clothed with a forest; forever crumbling, changing, water-worn, wind-tossed, restless sands. We found a point where several large trees, fallen from the top, had been washed together in a heap by the storm, and packed solid by the sands around them, made a landing. Here we pulled up our canoe and rested. An attempt to climb up the bank was almost reckless, but at it we went, and after two hours of continual climbing succeeded in reaching the top. The sand was very dry and mealy, rolling under our feet, and seriously retarding our progress. I have been in the crater of Ætna and climbed the Pyramids of Ghizeh, but, if both could be combined, the ashes of the one and the steep of the other would not be a more difficult ascent than the Grand Sable.

The forest is pine, hemlock, spruce, birch, and cedar, with a very few oaks and maples. As you go back from the shore hard wood becomes more abundant. We dared not go far away, as it was said that in an hour or two a storm might burst on us, which might carry off our canoe from its landing or prevent our return to the Chapel Beach. We spent some little time hunting for stones to roll down the sands into the lake, but none were to be found; so we tugged at a half-decayed log and an old stump, and sent them tumbling down, bounding from heap to heap, with a final plunge into the water, sending the spray flying about like the big ruff around Queen Elizabeth's neck in

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE GRAND SABLE.

the authorized version of her portrait. The climate on the Sable is much warmer than on the rocks. It is hot. July asserts his usual prerogative there, and log-rolling is more like work than fun. One old pine that was some three feet diameter, standing on the very edge, with roots hanging in the air, reaching far down the retreating sands, tempted us to work at undermining it, so we might enjoy the event of its mighty plunge. Two hours very hard work with poles, clearing away sand and turf, and with hatchet chopping off roots on the upper side, at length rewarded us, when the immense tree bowed to force of circumstances and went down, its branches singing a death-song as they whizzed through the air; but, as if struggling against its fate, the great mass plowed so deep into the sand as to lodge itself just as it reached the water, only just dipping the top fifty feet or so under the waves.

We were too tired for any more experiments, and debated whether to try to return to Chapel Beach or stay at the Sable all night. Dox voted to stay; and as the fifteen miles of paddling, with a red sunset and prospect of wind from the northwest, just the direction to blow us ashore, was on his side of the question, it was decided to sleep where we were. The canoe being carried up the sand fifty feet or so, and well tied to some stakes driven in below it, we made a nest for ourselves of pine and hemlock boughs, well covered over, as a precaution against rain or wind.

We lay alongside an immense fallen tree, and all night I dreamed of rolling down the Sable into the lake, and started up out of fitful slumbers only to find Dox sleeping very quietly, and to look at the stars, and again to sleep and dream. We hurried back to the Chapel Beach, arriving near sunset the next day, and found Lemm had brought an addition to our party, whom we will call Frederick Wilson, Esquire.

"So you are the artistical gentleman that Mr. Peter White, of Marquette, told me was down at the rocks? You know Peter White, cashier of the First National Bank—he knows you. Says you drew off the entire rocks for him last year, in an album style, very large size, in water-colors, and I have come down to learn the art. Can stay a week or ten days; not longer than ten, as I have engagements in

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

F. WILSON, ESQ.

Milwaukee that will take me away then. Mr. White says you know how to finish up photographs also in water-colors, and you get a high price for some of them. Besides, I would like very much to take a few lessons in landscape painting in oils; and I wish you to understand that the cost will make no difference at all to me. All I want is the tricks and the dodges of colors and so on, and any reasonable price is ready."

"My dear Sir," said I, when I could catch my breath, "I have found, after twenty years' application to art, that, after learning a few technicalities, progress in art is the result of accumulated knowledge and information concerning the subjects you are to represent; and your success will be very nearly in a ratio to the sum of what you know, and your ability to represent what you know in your materials, so that others may understand you, and think and feel with you. Then, if you have the genius to think and feel rightly, and use the best means of representation, you may hope to become an artist if you work hard several years."

"But all I want to know is how you sketch 'em off—just the slight way you make those so much admired water-color sketches that you do in an hour or two. And I say again I don't care what it costs."

Again, choking down a disposition to misuse my mother tongue, I replied:

"To be able to sketch well is like ripe fruit on the tree—there is a long life of art study and practice between beginning and sketching. I could not undertake to teach any thing of real value to you in less than a year."

F. W. again, blatant: "I see advertisements nearly every day of those who will teach in ten or twelve lessons the whole art in oil and water-colors, landscape figures and photographs. I think there must be some prejudice you have got against me, or you would let me into your secret."

If this individual had appeared to me in my studio I could have taken my hat and left, or quietly shown him the door; but there was no leaving the beach nor kicking him off, so it became a necessity to bear with his importunities to be "let into the secret for any reasonable price" for nearly a week. He cut my stay short many days. Flies, mosquitoes, snakes, rain, hunger, and thirst, the dangers of the waves, were all swallowed up in this one great visitation. I could only revenge myself by sketching him as he would sit on our wash-tub table, hour after hour, looking over my sketches, with polished hat perched on three hairs, cigar in position, lost in wonder and admiration, and burning with desire to be "let in." It is a standing wonder that any mortal can be so uninformed on art matters. Naturalists spend a whole lifetime, with the most brilliant talents, acquiring a sufficient knowledge of their science to enable them to distinguish, and name, and classify animated nature, and the most capable men have added the experience of their most valuable lives in perfecting the methods of study; and botanists, and geologists, and men in every profession and trade, and every walk of life, find the years too fleeting and few for a perfect mastery of the things brought into their special notice. Even a house carpenter is contented to serve a term of years at the trade; but here is a man whose lofty conceit and profound ignorance drive him frantic because a poor artist will not undertake to "let him into" Nature's world of infinite mysteries in a week.

As a sheet-anchor in this sea of trouble Dox, my Indian friend, whiled away many an hour of twilight or foggy morning with his violin, on which he is an excellent performer. Old Oneida knows the power of his bow, when with my uncle as second he went from dance to dance the county round. Sometimes my flute took up a tune which we both happened to

MR. WILLIAMS.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

DOXTATER.

know, and we together waked melodious echoes in the neighboring cliffs. Lemm too was not always blowing about his gun; he now and then varied his tale by his exploits by land and water, near and far, and with a touch of plain history, accidentally dropped, concerning the earlier and later days on the island, made him, all in all, a very social, companionable man.

We were not favored with a breeze on our return to Grand Island, and having to paddle the whole way, Dox and I took to the canoe, leaving Lemm to bring F. W., Esq., with the other baggage.

At Mr. Williams's house we found a gentleman from Detroit in the last stages of consumption, so his friends kindly said, quite unable to enjoy himself or any body else. He seemed glad of the opportunity of getting to Marquette with us, and we counted him one with our party. Mr. Williams, among other interesting traits, possessed a firm belief in the curative powers of certain Spiritualist doctors. He gave us an account of his experience with several. He never was sick in his life—always been strong and hearty; but some of his children had been sickly, and one daughter had died lately of consumption. Some years since, when she began to fail and he felt alarmed for her, some one recommended her to visit a medicinal spring. Her letters from there during the first few weeks were encouraging, but afterward she failed so rapidly that he had to go and bring her home on a bed. Then a Spiritualist doctor was recommended, and as soon as she was able she went there. Again she improved for a few days, and then again rapidly declined. Another doctor, a trance medium, now discovered that all had gone wrong so far, and took charge of the case. Progress of patient up and down again as before. About this time he received letters from New York from a healing medium, who announced (as if it was a revelation) that he understood that a Mr. Williams, living, etc., etc., had a daughter most grievously afflicted, etc., and offered to restore her to youth and health in a marvelously short time, either at her own home or at his, in the city—which latter would be much more desirable, being under his immediate and personal inspection. And so on, all this time paying very heavy bills unto the end. But why does Mr. Jones believe in Mr. Williams's spiritual doctors? Because he only succeeded in finding a real, true, faithful healing medium, just before his daughter died, who could have cured her if he had been called in the first place, but only knew of the case when it was too late; so into the hands of this last most merciful and kind trance and healing medium was Mr. J. anxious to place himself.

Mr. Williams's eldest son proposed to take us to Marquette in the large sail-boat, as he had a lot of white-fish and trout ready for market; and we therefore made up a party, including Jones and F. W., Lemm and Bully, Williams Junior, Dox, and I.

Bully was son-in-law of an old Chippewa Chief (who was said to be over a hundred years old), and had been a mail carrier during the winter, when navigation was closed, for several years; making the journey to Detroit from Marquette in about two weeks, sleeping on the snow, wading rapid streams—an exceeding perilous task. He dressed just as he could catch it, in clothes new or second-hand, in style or out, military or civil, fits or not; and was a good-hearted fellow at all times. What his other name was besides Bully we did not learn, nor what he was Bully for; but guessed he was considered bully for whisky, as he earned some such title on our way up.

Williams Junior said we had better land on a little island just outside the entrance on the east of Grand Island Harbor, and visit the cave there. He described it as a most curious place, full of columns, rooms, passages up and down, altogether a fairy-like and strange cave. The party seeming inclined to see the sights, we landed, and drank the health of whatever god was dwelling there at the time, and sailed away again. The wind played a fast-and-loose game with our sails, and teased us along a mile or so

"BULLY."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

an hour, just enabling us to go ashore at Laughing-Fish Creek and cook supper, and build a lean-to of poles and boughs, with a bed of pine and hemlock, when the sun set with a glorious display of colors. The color of the water of the lake is a clear blue, and where the sunlight illuminates it with the slanting morning ray near the cliff, or overshadowing forest, it becomes a cool bright green, nearly like lemon yellow shaded with pale blue. The night was bitter cold for July, and we built a rousing fire and fared sumptuously on roasted fish, fried fish, good bread, and coffee, with huge lumps of maple sugar, and good sweet milk.

There joined us for the evening two men who lived near, on a point of rocks, in a snug house with garden and stables for cows and pigs and fowls, and who seemed delighted to find several pairs of fresh ears into which to pour their side-splitting jokes and adventures of summer and winter; giving us in such brilliant brief extracts a complete history of as much of their lives as they cared to have us know. Lemm said next day that they were a curious set. The old one came from the East; had plenty of money and every thing, seldom went to town or any where, fished a little, hunted less, but was always bragging about his rifle, "when he knew so and so," and the like. The reader must imagine Lemm's conclusion to be a very modest reference to his own trusty gun.

We were a merry party and made the forest ring again, late into the night, and after our visitors left stowed ourselves away, some under the roof we had built, others in the bushes, to the windward of the fire, while Jones, the sick man, crept out into the weeds, far away from the fire, slept quietly all night, not coughing, and said in the morning that he had not slept so well for years.

At Marquette our party broke up. Jones took steamer for Detroit, and Dox the cars for Green Bay, where his tribe is located; Lemm Junior and Bully returned to Grand Island, and I to my easel; no more to dream of the Fairy-land of the Great Lake, but to revisit it in the midst of pleasant memories. Not all the wonders of the Grotto of Antiparos, or the splendors of Fingal's Cave in Staffa, or the magnificence of the Rocks of Etretat in Brittany, can compare with the unrivaled and peculiar glories of the Pictured Rocks of Lake Superior.

THE GUIDE MARQUETTE.

LAST DAYS.

CHANGE! change!
Another leaf is turned,
And back into the old and strange
Sinks the half-learned.
Out of the quiet ways,
Into the world's broad track
We go forth in the summer days,
And never wander back.

Not death!
We do not call it so;
Yet scarcely more with dying breath
Could we forego.
We cross an unseen line,
And, lo! another zone;
We learn to make a stranger clime
Familiar as our own.

Not one,
But many lives, we hold:
Our Hail to every work begun
Is Farewell to the old.
At every bound we say,
"When will the days be past?"
But start with vain regret some day
In presence of the last.

The last!
Last looks are tenderest;
The sunset light is on the past;
The last wine is the best.
Oh days most sad and sweet!
The old life's fairest wreath—
No record ever is complete
Without that last word—Death.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE IMPENDING CHECK-MATE.

My little love, do you remember,
  Ere we were grown so sadly wise,
Those evenings in the bleak December,
Curtained warm from the snowy weather,
When you and I played chess together,
  Check-mated by each other's eyes?
  Ah! still I see your soft white hand
Hovering warm o'er Queen and Knight.
  Brave Pawns in valiant battle stand:
The double Castles guard the wings:
The Bishop, bent on distant things,
Moves, sidling, through the fight.
  Our fingers touch; our glances meet,
  And falter; falls your golden hair
  Against my cheek; your bosom sweet
Is heaving. Down the field your Queen
Rides slow her soldiery all between,
  And checks me unaware.
  Ah me! the little battle's done,
Dispersed is all its chivalry;
Full many a move since then have we
'Mid Life's perplexing chequers made,
And many a game with Fortune played—
  What is it we have won?
  This, this at least—if this alone:
That never, never, never more,
As in those old, still nights of yore
  (Ere we were grown so sadly wise)
  Can you and I shut out the skies,
Shut out the world and wintry weather,
  And, eyes exchanging warmth with eyes,
Play chess, as then we played, together!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE DODGE CLUB; OR, ITALY IN MDCCCLIX.

THE SPANIARDS!

X.

ON THE WATER, WHERE BUTTONS SEES A LOST IDEA AND GIVES CHASE TO IT, TOGETHER WITH THE HEART-SICKENING RESULTS THEREOF.

ON the following morning Buttons and Dick went a little way out of town, and down the steep cliff toward the shore.

It was a classic spot. Here was no less a place than the cave of Polyphemus, where Homer, at least, may have stood, if Ulysses didn't. And here is the identical stone with which the giant was wont to block up the entrance to his cavern.

The sea rolled before. Away down to the right was Vesuvius, starting from which the eye took in the whole wide sweep of the shore, lined with white cities, with a back-ground of mountains, till the land terminated in bold promontories.

Opposite was the Isle of Capri.

Myriads of white sails flashed across the sea.

One of these arrested the attention of Buttons, and so absorbed him that he stared fixedly at it for half an hour without moving.

At length an exclamation burst from him:

"By Jove! It is! It is!"

"What is? What is?"

"The Spaniards!"

"Where?"

"In that boat."

"Ah!" said Dick, coolly, looking at the object pointed out by Buttons.

It was an English sail-boat, with a small cabin and an immense sail. In the stern were a gentleman and two ladies. Buttons was confident that they were the Spaniards.

"Well," said Dick, "what's the use of getting so excited about it?"

"Why, I'm going back to Naples by water!"

"Are you? Then I'll go too. Shall we leave the others?"

"Certainly not, if they want to come with us."

Upon inquiry they found that the others had a strong objection to going by sea. Mr. Figgs preferred the ease of the carriage. The Doctor thought the sea air injurious. The Senator had the honesty to confess that he was afraid of sea-sickness. They would not listen to persuasion, but were all resolutely bent on keeping to the carriage.

Buttons exhibited a feverish haste in searching after a boat. There was but little to choose from among a crowd of odd-looking fishing-boats that crowded the shore. However, they selected the cleanest from among them, and soon the boat, with her broad sail spread, was darting over the sea.

The boat of which they went in pursuit was far away over near the other shore, taking long tacks across the bay. Buttons headed his boat so as to meet the other on its return tack.

It was a magnificent scene. After exhausting every shore view of Naples, there is nothing like taking to the water. Every thing then appears in a new light. The far, winding cities that surround the shore, the white villages, the purple Apennines, the rocky isles, the frowning volcano.

This is what makes Naples supreme in beauty. The peculiar combinations of scenery that are found there make rivalry impossible. For if you find elsewhere an equally beautiful bay, you will not have so liquid an atmosphere; if you have a shore with equal beauty of outline, and equal grace in its long sweep of towering headland and retreating slope, you will not have so deep a purple on the distant hills. Above all, nowhere else on earth has Nature placed in the very centre of so divine a scene the contrasted terrors of the black volcano.

Watching a chase is exciting; but taking part in it is much more so. Buttons had made the most scientific arrangements. He had calculated that at a certain point on the opposite shore the other boat would turn on a new tack, and that if he steered his boat to a point about half-way over, he would meet them, without appearing to be in pursuit. He accordingly felt so elated at the idea that he burst forth into song.

The other boat at length had passed well over under the shadow of the land. It did not turn. Farther and farther over, and still it did not change its course. Buttons still kept the course which he had first chosen; but finding that he

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was getting far out of the way of the other boat, he was forced to turn the head of his boat closer to the wind, and sail slowly, watching the others.

There was an island immediately ahead of the other boat. What was his dismay at seeing it gracefully pass beyond the outer edge of the island, turn behind it, and vanish. He struck the taffrail furiously with his clenched hand. However, there was no help for it; so, changing his course, he steered in a straight line after the other, to where it had disappeared.

Now that the boat was out of sight Dick did not feel himself called on to watch. So he went forward into the bow, and made himself a snug berth, where he laid down; and lighting his pipe, looked dreamily out through a cloud of smoke upon the charming scene. The tossing of the boat and the lazy flapping of the sails had a soothing influence. His nerves owned the lulling power. His eyelids grew heavy and gently descended.

The wind and waves and islands and sea and sky, all mingled together in a confused mass, came before his mind. He was sailing on clouds, and chasing Spanish ladies through the sky. The drifting currents of the air bore them resistlessly along in wide and never-ending curves upward in spiral movements toward the zenith; and then off in ever-increasing speed, with ever-widening gyrations, toward the sunset, where the clouds grew red, and lazaroni grinned from behind——

A sudden bang of the huge sail struck by the wind, a wild creaking of the boom, and a smart dash of spray over the bows and into his face waked him from his slumber. He started up, half blinded, to look around. Buttons sat gazing over the waters with an expression of bitter vexation. They had passed the outer point of the island, and had caught a swift current, a chopping sea, and a brisk breeze. The other boat was nowhere to be seen. Buttons had already headed back again.

"I don't see the other boat," said Dick.

Buttons without a word pointed to the left. There she was. She had gone quietly around the island, and had taken the channel between it and the shore. All the time that she had been hidden she was steadily increasing the distance between them.

"There's no help for it," said Dick, "but to keep straight after them."

Buttons did not reply, but leaned back with a sweet expression of patience. The two boats kept on in this way for a long time; but the one in which our friends had embarked was no match at all for the one they were pursuing. At every new tack this fact became more painfully evident. The only hope for Buttons was to regain by his superior nautical skill what he might lose. Those in the other boat had but little skill in sailing. These at length became aware that they were followed, and regarded their pursuers with earnest attention. It did not seem to have any effect.

"They know we are after them at last!" said Dick.

"I wonder if they can recognize us?"

"If they do they have sharp eyes. I'll be

"A THOUSAND PARDONS!"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google hanged if I can recognize them! I don't see how you can."

"Instinct, Dick—instinct!" said Buttons, with animation.

"What's that flashing in their boat?"

"That?" said Buttons. "It's a spy-glass. I didn't notice it before."

"I've seen it for the last half-hour."

"Then they must recognize us. How strange that they don't slacken a little! Perhaps we are not in full view. I will sit a little more out of the shade of the sail, so that they can recognize me."

Accordingly Buttons moved out to a more conspicuous place, and Dick allowed himself to be more visible. Again the flashing brass was seen in the boat, and they could plainly perceive that it was passed from one to the other, while each took a long survey.

"They must be able to see us if they have any kind of a glass at all."

"I should think so," said Buttons, dolefully.

"Are you sure they are the Spaniards?"

"Oh! quite."

"Then I must say they might be a little more civil, and not keep us racing after them forever!"

"Oh, I don't know; I suppose they wouldn't like to sail close up to us."

"They needn't sail up to us, but they might give us a chance to hail them."

"I don't think the man they have with them looks like Señor Francia."

"Francia? Is that his name? He certainly looks larger. He is larger."

"Look!"

As Buttons spoke the boat ahead fell rapidly to leeward. The wind had fallen, and a current which they had struck upon bore them away. In the effort to escape from the current the boat headed toward Buttons, and when the wind again arose she continued to sail toward them. As they came nearer Buttons's face exhibited a strange variety of expressions.

They met.

In the other boat sat two English ladies and a tall gentleman, who eyed the two young men fixedly, with a "stony British stare."

"A thousand pardons!" said Buttons, rising and bowing. "I mistook you for some acquaintances."

Whereupon the others smiled in a friendly way, bowed, and said something. A few commonplaces were interchanged, and the boats drifted away out of hearing.

XI.

THE SENATOR HAS SUCH A FANCY FOR SEEKING USEFUL INFORMATION! — CURIOUS POSITION OF A WISE, AND WELL-KNOWN, AND DESERVEDLY-POPULAR LEGISLATOR, AND UNDIGNIFIED MODE OF HIS ESCAPE.

It was not much after ten in the morning when Buttons and Dick returned. On reaching the hotel they found Mr. Figgs and the Doctor, who asked them if they had seen the Senator. To which they replied by putting the same question to their questioners.

He had not been seen since they had all been together last. Where was he?

Of course there was no anxiety felt about him, but still they all wished to have him near at hand, as it was about time for them to leave the town. The vetturino was already grumbling, and it required a pretty strong remonstrance from Buttons to silence him.

They had nothing to do but to wait patiently. Mr. Figgs and the Doctor lounged about the sofas. Buttons and Dick strolled about the town. Hearing strains of music as they passed the cathedral they turned in there to listen to the service. Why there should be service, and full service too, they could not imagine.

"Can it be Sunday, Dick?" said Buttons, gravely.

"Who can tell?" exclaimed Dick, lost in wonder.

The cathedral was a small one, with nave and transept as usual, and in the Italian Gothic style. At the end of the nave stood the high altar, which was now illuminated with wax-candles, while priests officiated before it. At the right extremity of the transept was the organ-loft, a somewhat unusual position; while at the opposite end of the transept was a smaller door. The church was moderately filled. Probably there was as many people there as it ever had. They knelt on the floor with their faces toward the altar. Finding the nave somewhat crowded, Buttons and Dick went around to the door at the end of the transept, and entered there. A large space was empty as far as the junction with the nave. Into this the two young men entered, very reverently, and on coming near to the place where the other worshipers were they knelt down in the midst of them.

While looking before him, with his mind full of thoughts called up by the occasion, and while the grand music of one of Mozart's masses was filling his soul, Buttons suddenly felt his arm twitched. He turned. It was Dick.

Buttons was horrified. In the midst of this solemn scene the young man was convulsed with laughter. His features were working, his lips moving, as he tried to whisper something which his laughter prevented him from saying, and tears were in his eyes. At last he stuck his handkerchief in his mouth and bowed down very low, while his whole frame shook. Some of the worshipers near by looked scandalized, others shocked, others angry. Buttons felt vexed. At last Dick raised his face and rolled his eyes toward the organ-loft, and instantly bowed his head again. Buttons looked up mechanically, following the direction of Dick's glance. The next instant he too fell forward, tore his handkerchief out of his pocket, while his whole frame shook with the most painful convulsion of laughter.

And how dreadful is such a convulsion in a solemn place! In a church, amidst worship-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ers; perhaps especially amidst worshipers of another creed, for then one is suspected of offering deliberate insult. So it was here. People near saw the two young men, and darted angry looks at them.

Now what was it that had so excited two young men, who were by no means inclined to offer insult to any one, especially in religious matters?

It was this: As they looked up to the organ-loft they saw a figure there.

The organ projected from the wall about six feet; on the left side was the handle worked by the man who blew it, and a space for the choir. On the right was a small narrow space not more than about three feet wide, and it was in this space that they saw the figure which produced such an effect on them.

THE SENATOR.

It was the Senator. He stood there erect, bareheaded of course, with confusion in his face and vexation and bewilderment. The sight of him was enough—the astonishing position of the man, in such a place at such a time. But the Senator was looking eagerly for help. And he had seen them enter, and all his soul was in his eyes, and all his eyes were fixed on those two.

As Dick looked up startled and confounded at the sight the Senator projected his head as far forward as he dared, frowned, nodded, and then began working his lips violently as certain deaf and dumb people do, who converse by such movements, and can understand what words are said by the shape of the mouth in uttering them. But the effect was to make the Senator look like a man who was making grimaces for a wager, like those in Victor Hugo's "Nôtre Dame." As such the apparition was so overpowering that neither Buttons nor Dick dared to look up for some time. What made it worse, each was conscious that the other was laughing, so that self-control was all the more difficult. Worse still, each knew that this figure in the organ-loft was watching them with his hungry glance, ready the moment that they looked up to begin his grimaces once more.

"That poor Senator!" thought Buttons; "how did he get there? Oh, how did he get there?"

Yet how could he be rescued? Could he be? No. He must wait till the service should be over.

Meanwhile the young men mustered sufficient courage to look up again, and after a mighty struggle to gaze upon the Senator for a few seconds at a time at least. There he stood, projecting forward his anxious face, making faces as each one looked up.

Now the people in the immediate vicinity of the two young men had noticed their agitation as has already been stated, and, moreover, they had looked up to see the cause of it. They too saw the Senator. Others again, seeing their neighbors looking up, did the same, until at last all in the transept were staring up at the odd-looking stranger.

As Buttons and Dick looked up, which they could not help doing often, the Senator would repeat his mouthings, and nods, and becks, and looks of entreaty. The consequence was, that the people thought the stranger was making faces at them. Three hundred and forty-seven honest people of Sorrento thus found themselves shamefully insulted in their own church by a barbarous foreigner, probably an Englishman, no doubt a heretic. The other four hundred and thirty-six who knelt in the nave knew nothing about it. They could not see the organ-loft at all. The priests at the high altar could not see it, so that they were uninterrupted in their duties. The singers in the organ-loft saw nothing, for the Senator was concealed from their view. Those therefore who saw him were the people in the transept, who now kept staring fixedly, and with angry eyes, at the man in the loft.

There was no chance of getting him out of that before the service was over, and Buttons saw that there might be a serious tumult when the Senator came down among that wrathful crowd. Every moment made it worse. Those

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google in the nave saw the agitation of those in the transept, and got some idea of the cause.

At last the service was ended; the singers departed, the priests retired, but the congregation remained. Seven hundred and eighty-three human beings waiting to take vengeance on the miscreant who had thrown ridicule on the Holy Father by making faces at the faithful as they knelt in prayer. Already a murmur arose on every side.

"A heretic! A heretic! A blasphemer! He has insulted us!"

Buttons saw that a bold stroke alone could save them. He burst into the midst of the throng followed by Dick.

"Fly!" he cried. "Fly for your lives! It is a madman! Fly! Fly!"

A loud cry of terror arose. Instantaneous conviction flashed on the minds of all. A madman! Yes. He could be nothing else.

A panic arose. The people recoiled from before that terrible madman. Buttons sprang up to the loft. He seized the Senator's arm and dragged him down. The people fled in horror. As the Senator emerged he saw seven hundred and eighty-three good people of Sorrento scampering away like the wind across the square in front of the cathedral.

On reaching the hotel he told his story. He had been peering about in search of useful information, and had entered the cathedral. After going through every part he went up into the organ-loft. Just then the singers came. Instead of going out like a man, he dodged them from some absurd cause or other, with a half idea that he would get into trouble for intruding. The longer he staid the worse it was for him. At last he saw Buttons and Dick enter, and tried to make signals.

"Well," said Buttons, "we had better leave. The Sorrentonians will be around here soon to see the maniac. They will find out all about him, and make us acquainted with Lynch law."

In a quarter of an hour more they were on their way back to Naples.

XII.

HERCULANEUM AND POMPEII, AND ALL THAT THE SIGHT OF THOSE FAMOUS PLACES PRODUCED ON THE MINDS OF THE DODGE CLUB.

THEY had already visited Herculaneum, but the only feeling which had been awakened by the sight of that ill-fated city was one of unmitigated disgust. As honesty was the chief characteristic of the whole party they did not hesitate to express themselves with the utmost freedom on this subject. They hoped for better things from Pompeii. At any rate Pompeii was above ground, what might be there would be visible. No fuss with torches. No humbugging with lanterns. No wandering through

VILLA OF DIOMEDES.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PHEW!

long black passages. No mountains bringing forth mice.

Their expectations were encouraged as they walked up the street of Tombs leading to the Herculaneum Gate. Tombs were all around, any quantity, all sizes, little black vaults full of pigeon-holes. These they narrowly examined, and when the guide wasn't looking they filled their pockets with the ashes of the dead.

"Strange," quoth the Senator, musingly, "that these ancient Pompey fellers should pick out this kind of a way of getting buried. This must be the reason why people speak of urns and ashes when they speak of dead people."

They walked through the Villa of Diomedes. They were somewhat disappointed. From guide-books, and especially from the remarkably well-got-up Pompeian court at Sydenham Palace, Buttons had been led to expect something far grander. But in this, the largest house in the city, what did he find? Mites of rooms, in fact closets, in which even a humble modern would find himself rather crowded. There was scarcely a decent-sized apartment in the whole establishment, as they all indignantly declared. The cellars were more striking. A number of earthen vessels of enormous size were in one corner.

"What are these?" asked the Senator.

"Wine jars."

"What?"

"Wine jars. They didn't use wooden casks."

"The more fools they. Now do you mean to say that wooden casks are not infinitely more convenient than these things that can't stand up without they are leaned against the wall? Pho!"

At one corner the guide stopped, and pointing down, said something.

"What does he say?" asked the Senator.

"He says if you want to know how the Pompeians got choked, stoop down and smell that. Every body who comes here is expected to smell this particular spot, or he can't say that he has seen Pompeii."

So down went the five on their knees, and up again faster than they went down. With one universal shout of: "Phew-w-w-w-w-h-h-h!!!"

It was a torrent of sulphurous vapor that they inhaled.

"Now, I suppose," said the Senator, as soon as he could speak, "that that there comes direct in a bee-line through a subterranean tunnel right straight from old Vesuvius."

"Yes, and it was this that suggested the famous scheme for extinguishing the volcano."

"How? What famous scheme?"

"Why, an English stock-broker came here last year, and smelled this place, as every one must do. An idea struck him. He started up. He ran off without a word. He went straight to London. There he organized a company. They propose to dig a tunnel from the sea to the interior of the mountain. When all is ready they will let in the water. There will be a tremendous hiss. The volcano will belch out steam for about six weeks; but the result will be that the fires will be put out forever."

From the Villa of Diomedes they went to the gate where the guard-house is seen. Buttons told the story of the sentinel who died there on duty, embellishing it with a few new features of an original character.

"Now that may be all very well," said the Senator, "but don't ask me to admire that chap, or the Roman army, or the system. It was all hollow. Why, don't you see the man was a blockhead? He hadn't sense enough to see that when the whole place was going to the dogs, it was no good stopping to guard it. He'd much better have cleared out and saved his precious life for the good of his country. Do you suppose a Yankee would act that way?"

"I should suppose not."

"That man, Sir, was a machine, and nothing more. A soldier must know something else than merely obeying orders."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

By this time they had passed through the gate and stood inside. The street opened before them for a considerable distance with houses on each side. Including the sidewalks it might have been almost twelve feet wide. As only the lower part of the walls of the houses was standing, the show that they made was not imposing. There was no splendor in the architecture or the material, for the style of the buildings was extremely simple, and they were made with brick covered with stucco.

After wandering silently through the streets the Senator at length burst forth:

"I say it's an enormous imposition!"

"What?" inquired Buttons, faintly.

"Why, the whole system of Cyclopedias, Panoramas, Books of Travel, Woodbridge's Geography, Sunday-school Books—"

"What do you mean?"

"I mean the descriptions they give of this place. The fellows who write about it get into the heroics, and what with their descriptions, and pictures, and moralizing, you believe it is a second Babylon. It don't seem possible for any of them to tell the truth. Why, there isn't a single decent-sized house in the place. Oh, it's small! it's small!"

"It certainly might be larger."

"I know," continued the Senator, with a majestic wave of his hand—"I know that I'm expected to find this here scene very impressive; but I'll be hanged if I'm satisfied. Why, in the name of Heaven, when they give us pictures of the place, can't they make things of the right size? Why, I've seen a hundred pictures of that gate. They make it look like a triumphant arch; and now that I'm here, durn me if I can't touch the top of it when I stand on tip-toe."

In all his walk the Senator found only one thing that pleased him. This was the celebrated Pompeian institution of a shop under the dwelling-house.

"Whenever I see any signs of any thing like trade among these ancients," said he, "I respect them. And what is more satisfactory than to see a bake-shop or an eating-saloon in the lower story of a palace?"

Their walk was terminated by the theatre

A STREET IN POMPEII.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and amphitheatre. The sight of these were more satisfactory to the Senator.

"Didn't these fellows come it uncommon strong though in the matter of shows?" he asked, with considerable enthusiasm. "Hey? Why, we haven't got a single traveling circus, menagerie, and all that could come any way near to this. After all, this town might have looked well enough when it was all bran-new and painted up. It might have looked so then; but, by thunder! it looks any thing but that now. What makes me mad is to see every traveler pretend to get into raptures about it now. Raptures be hanged! I ask you, as a sensible man, is there any thing here equal to any town of the same population in Massachusetts?"

Although the expectations which he had formed were not quite realized, yet Buttons found much to excite interest after the first disappointment had passed away. Dick excited the Senator's disgust by exhibiting those raptures which the latter had condemned.

The Doctor went by the Guide-book altogether, and regulated his emotions accordingly. Having seen the various places enumerated there, he wished no more. As Buttons and Dick wished to stroll farther among the houses the other three waited for them in the amphitheatre, where the Senator beguiled the time by giving his "idee" of an ancient show.

It was the close of day before the party left. At the outer barrier an official politely examined them. The result of the examination was that the party was compelled to disgorge a number of highly interesting souvenirs, consisting of lava, mosaic stones, ashes, plaster, marble chips, pebbles, bricks, a bronze hinge, a piece of bone, a small rag, a stick, etc.

The official apologized with touching politeness: "It was only a form," he said. "Yet he must do it. For look you, Signori," and here he shrugged up his shoulders, rolled his eyes, and puffed out his lips in a way that was possible to none but an Italian, "were it not thus the entire city would be carried away piecemeal!"

XIII.

VESUVIUS.—WONDERFUL ASCENT OF THE CONE.—WONDERFUL DESCENT INTO THE CRATER.—AND MOST WONDERFUL DISAPPEARANCE OF MR. FIGGS, AFTER WHOM ALL HIS FRIENDS GO, WITH THEIR LIVES IN THEIR HANDS.—GREAT SENSATION AMONG SPECTATORS.

To every visitor to Naples the most prominent object is Vesuvius. The huge form of the volcano forever stands before him. The long pennon of smoke from its crater forever floats out triumphantly in the air. Not in the landscape only, but in all the picture-shops. In these establishments they really seem to deal in nothing but prints and paintings of Vesuvius.

It was a lovely morning when a carriage, filled with Americans, drew up at an inn near the foot of the mountain. There were guides without number waiting, like beasts of prey, to fall on them; and all the horses of the country—a wonderful lot—an amazing lot—a lean, cranky, raw-boned, ill-fed, wall-eyed, ill-natured, sneaking, ungainly, half-foundered, half-starved lot; afflicted with all the diseases that horse-flesh is heir to. There were no others, so but little time was wasted. All were on an equal footing. To have a preference was out of the question, so they amused themselves with picking out the ugliest.

When the horses were first brought out Mr. Figgs looked uneasy, and made some mysterious remarks about walking. He thought such nags were an imposition. He vowed they could go faster on foot. On foot! The others scouted the idea. Absurd! Perhaps he wasn't used to such beasts. Never mind. He mustn't be proud. Mr. Figgs, however, seemed to have reasons which were strictly private, and announced his intention of walking. But the others would not hear of such a thing. They insisted. They forced him to mount. This Mr. Figgs at length accomplished, though he got up on the wrong side, and nearly pulled his horse over backward by pulling at the curb-rein, shouting all the time, in tones of agony, "Who-a!"

At length they all set out, and, with few interruptions, arrived at a place half-way up the mountain called The Hermitage. Here they rested, and leaving their horses behind, walked on over a barren region to the foot of the cone. All around was the abomination of desolation. Craggy rocks, huge, disjointed masses of shattered lava-blocks, cooled off into the most grotesque shapes, mixed with ashes, scoriæ, and pumice-stones. The cone towered frowningly above their heads. Looking up, the aspect was not enticing. A steep slope ran up for an immense distance till it touched the smoky canopy. On one side it was covered with loose sand, but in other places it was all overlaid with masses of lava fragments. The undertaking seemed prodigious.

The Senator looked up with a weary smile, but did not falter; the Doctor thought they would not be able to get up to the top, and proposed returning; the others declined; whereupon the Doctor slowly sauntered back to the Hermitage. Mr. Figgs, whom the ride had considerably shaken, expressed a desire to ascend, but felt doubtful about his wind. Dick assured him that he would find plenty when he got to the top. The guides also came to his relief. Did he want to go? Behold them. They had chairs to carry him up or straps to pull him. Their straps were so made that they could envelop the traveler and allow him to be pulled comfortably up. So Mr. Figgs gracefully resigned himself to the guides, who in a short time had adjusted their straps, and led him to the foot of the cone.

Now for the ascent.

Buttons went first. Like a young chamois this youth bounded up, leaping from rock to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google rock, and steering in a straight line for the summit. Next the Senator, who mounted slowly and perseveringly, as though he had a solemn duty to perform, and was determined to do it thoroughly. Then came Dick. More fitful. A few steps upward; then a rest; then a fresh start; followed by another rest. At length he sat down about one-third of the way up and took a smoke. Behind him Mr. Figgs toiled up, pulled by the panting guides. Three stout men in front—two others boosting from behind.

THE ASCENT OF VESUVIUS.

A long description might be given of this remarkable ascent. How Mr. Figgs aggravated the guides almost beyond endurance by mere force of inertia. Having committed himself to them he did it thoroughly, and not by one single act of exertion did he lessen their labor. They pulled, pushed, and shouted; then they rested; then they rose again to pull, to push, to shout, and to rest as before; then they implored him in the most moving terms to do something to help them, to put one foot before the other, to brace himself firmly—in short, to do any thing.

In vain. Mr. Figgs didn't understand a word. He was unmovable. Then they threatened to drop him and leave him half-way. The threat was disregarded. Mr. Figgs sat on a stone while they rested and smiled benignantly at them. At last, maddened by his impassibility, they screamed at him and at one another with furious gesticulations, and then tearing off the straps, they hurried up the slope, leaving him on the middle of the mount to take care of himself.

It might be told how the Senator toiled up slowly but surely, never stopping till he had gained the summit; or how Buttons, who arrived there first, spent the time in exploring the mysteries of this elevated region; or how Dick stopped every twenty paces to rest and smoke; how he consumed much time and much tobacco; and how he did not gain the summit until twenty minutes after the serene face of the Senator had confronted the terrors of the crater.

Before these three there was a wonderful scene. Below them lay the steep sides of the cone, a waste of hideous ruin—

"Rocks, crags, and mounds confusedly hurled,
The fragments of a ruined world."

Before them was the crater, a vast abyss, the bottom of which was hidden from sight by dense clouds of sulphurous smoke which forever ascended. Far away on the other side rose the opposite wall of the abyss—black, rocky cliffs that rose precipitously upward. The side on which they stood sloped down at a steep angle for a few hundred feet, and then went abruptly downward. A mighty wind was blowing and carried all the smoke away to the opposite side of the crater, so that by getting down into the shelter of a rock they were quite comfortable.

The view of the country that lay beneath was superb. There lay Naples with its suburbs, extending for miles along the shore, with Portici, Castellamare, and the vale of Sorrento. There rose the hills of Baiæ, the rock of Ischia, and the Isle of Capri. There lay countless vineyards, fields forever green, groves of orange and fig trees, clusters of palms and cypresses. Mountains ascended all around, with many heights crowned with castles or villages. There lay the glorious Bay of Naples, the type of perfect beauty. Hundreds of white sails dotted the intense blue of its surface. Ships were there at anchor, and in full sail. Over all was a sky such as is seen only in Italy, with a depth of blue, which, when seen in paintings, seems to the inexperienced eye like an exaggeration.

The guides drew their attention from all this beauty to a solid fact. This was the cooking of an egg by merely burying it in the hot sand for a few minutes.

Buttons now proposed to go down into the crater. The guides looked aghast.

"Why not?"

"Impossible, Signor. It's death."

"Death? Nonsense! come along and show us the way."

"The way? There is no way. No one ever dares to go down. Where can we go to? Do you not see that beyond that point where the rock projects it is all a precipice?"

"That point? Well, that is the very spot I wish to go to. Come along."

"Never, Signor."

"Then I'll go."

"Don't. For the sake of Heaven, and in the name of the most Holy Mother, of St.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Peter in chains, of all the blessed Apostles and Martyrs, the glorious Saints and—"

"Blessed Botheration," cried Buttons, abruptly turning his back and preparing to descend.

"Are you in earnest, Buttons?" asked Dick. "Are you really going down?"

"Certainly."

"Oh, then I'll go too."

Upon this the others warned, rebuked, threatened, remonstrated, and begged. In vain. The Senator interposed the authority of years and wisdom. But to no purpose. With much anxiety he sat on the edge of the crater, looking for the result and expecting a tragedy.

The slope down which they ventured was covered with loose sand. At each step the treacherous soil slid beneath them. It was a mad and highly reprehensible undertaking. Nevertheless down they went—farther and farther. The kind heart of the Senator felt a pang at every step. His voice sounded mournfully through the rolling smoke that burst through a million crevices, and at times hid the adventurers from view. But down they went. Sometimes they slid fearfully. Then they would wait and cautiously look around, sometimes the vapors covered them with such dense folds that they had to cover their faces.

"If they ain't dashed to pieces they'll be suffocated—sure!" cried the Senator, starting up, and unable to control his feelings. "I can't stand this," he muttered, and he too stepped down.

The guides looked on in horror. "Your blood will be on your own heads!" they cried.

As the Senator descended the smoke entered his eyes, mouth, and nostrils, making him cough and sneeze fearfully. The sand slid; the heat under the surface pained his feet; every step made it worse. However, he kept on bravely. At length he reached the spot where the others were standing.

At the foot of the declivity was an angular rock which jutted out for about twelve feet. It was about six feet wide. Its sides went down precipitously. The Senator walked painfully to where they were standing. It was a fearful scene. All around arose the sides of the crater, black and rocky, perpendicular on all sides, except the small slope down which they had just descended — a vast and gloomy circumference. But the most terrific sight lay beneath.

The sides of the crater went sheer down to a great depth inclosing a black abyss which in the first excitement of the scene the startled fancy might well imagine extending to the bowels of the earth from which there came rolling up vast clouds dense black sulphurous which at times completely encirled them shutting out every thing from view filling eyes nose mouth with fumes of brimstone forcing them to hold the tails of their coats or the skirts it's all the same over their faces so as not to be altogether suffocated while again after a while a fierce blast of wind driving downward would hurl the smoke away and dashing it against the other side of the crater gather it up in dense volumes of blackest smoke in thick clouds which rolled up the flinty cliffs and reaching the summit bounded fiercely out into the sky to pass on and be seen from afar as that dread pennant of Ve-

THE DESCENT OF VESUVIUS

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

suvius which is the sign and symbol of its mastery over the earth around it and the inhabitants thereof ever changing and in all its changes watched with awe by fearful men who read in those changes their own fate now taking heart as they see it more tenuous in its consistency anon shuddering as they see it gathering in denser folds and finally awe-stricken and all overcome as they see the thick black cloud rise proudly up to heaven in a long straight column at whose upper termination the colossal pillar spreads itself out and shows to the startled gaze the dread symbol of the cypress tree the herald of earthquakes eruptions and—— ——There—I flatter myself that in the way of description it would not be easy to beat the above. I just throw it off as my friend Titmarsh, poor fellow, once said, to show what I could do if I tried. I have decided not to put punctuation marks there, but rather to let each reader supply them for himself. They are often in the way, particularly to the writer, when he has to stop in the full flow of a description and insert them—

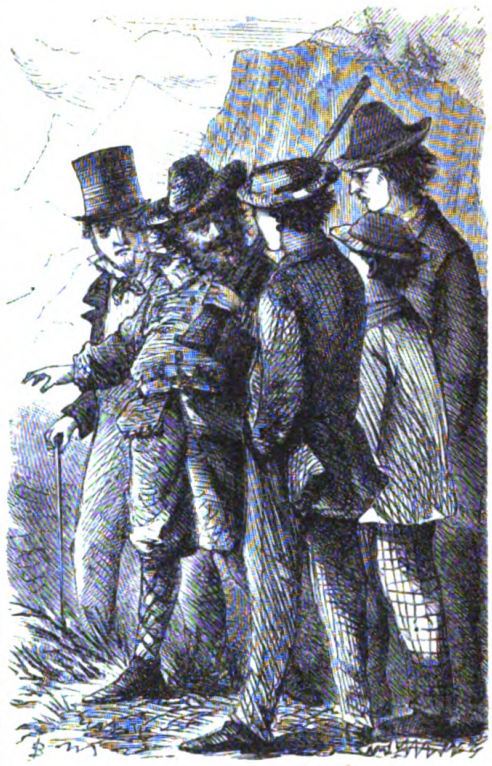
But—

We left our friends down in the crater of Vesuvius. Of course they hurried out as soon as they could, and mounting the treacherous steep they soon regained the summit, where the guides had stood bawling piteously all the time.

Then came the descent. It was not over the lava blocks, but in another place, which was covered with loose sliding sand. Away they started.



Buttons ahead, went with immense strides down the slope. At every step the sliding sand carried him about ten feet further, so that each step was equal to about twenty feet. It was like flying. But it was attended by so many falls that the descent of Buttons and Dick was accomplished as much by sliding and rolling as by walking.

The Senator was more cautious. Having fallen once or twice, he tried to correct this tendency by walking backward. Whenever he found himself falling he would let himself go, and thus, on his hands and knees, would let himself slide for a considerable distance. This plan gave him immense satisfaction.

"It's quite like coasting," said he, after he had reached the bottom; "only it does come a little hard on the trowsers."

On their arrival at the Hermitage to their surprise they saw nothing of Mr. Figgs. The Doctor had been sleeping all the time, but the landlord said he had not been that way. As they knew that the neighborhood of Vesuvius was not always the safest in the world, they all went back at once to search after him.

Arriving at the foot of the cone they went every where shouting his name. There was no response. They skirted the base of the cone. They walked up to where he had been. They saw nothing. The guides who had thus far been with them now said they had to go. So they received their pay and departed.

WHERE'S FIGGS?

"Of all the mean, useless, chicken-hearted dolts that ever I see," said the Senator, "they are the wust!"

But meanwhile there was no Figgs. They began to feel anxious. At last Buttons, who had been up to where Mr. Figgs was left, thought he saw traces of footsteps in the sand that was nearest. He followed these for some time, and at last shouted to the others. The others went to where he was. They saw an Italian with him—an ill-looking, low-browed rascal, with villain stamped on every feature.

"This fellow says he saw a man who answers the description of Figgs go over in that direction," said Buttons, pointing toward the part of the mountain which is farthest from the sea.

"There? What for?"

"I don't know."

"Is there any danger?"

"I think so—Figgs may have had to go—who knows?"

"Well," said the Senator, "we must go after him."

"What arms have you?" said the Doctor. "Don't show it before this rascal."

"I have a bowie-knife," said Buttons.

"So have I," said Dick.

"And I," said the Senator, "am sorry to say that I have nothing at all."

"Well, I suppose we must go," said the Doctor. "My revolver is something. It is a double revolver, of peculiar shape."

Without any other thought they at once pre-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

pared to venture into a district that for all they knew might swarm with robbers. They had only one thought, and that was to save Figgs.

"Can this man lead us?" asked Dick.

"He says he can take us along where he saw Figgs go, and perhaps we may see some people who can tell us about him."

"Perhaps we can," said the Senator, grimly.

They then started off with the Italian at their head. The sun was by this time within an hour's distance from the horizon, and they had no time to lose. So they walked rapidly. Soon they entered among hills and rocks of lava, where the desolation of the surrounding country began to be modified by vegetation. It was quite difficult to keep their reckoning, so as to know in what direction they were going, but they kept on nevertheless.

All of them knew that the errand was a dangerous one. All of them knew that it would be better if they were armed. But no one said any thing of the kind. In fact, they felt such confidence in their own pluck and resolution that they had no doubt of success.

At length they came to a place where trees were on each side of the rough path. At an opening here three men stood. Buttons at once accosted them and told his errand. They looked at the Americans with a sinister smile.

"Don't be afraid of us," said Buttons, quietly. "We're armed with revolvers, but we won't hurt you. Just show us where our friend is, for we're afraid he has lost his way."

At this strange salutation the Italians looked puzzled. They looked at their guns, and then at the Americans. Two or three other men came out from the woods at the same time, and stood in their rear. At length as many as ten men stood around them.

"What are you staring at?" said Buttons again. "You needn't look so frightened. Americans only use their revolvers against thieves."

The Doctor at this, apparently by accident, took out his revolver. Standing a little on one side, he fired at a large crow on the top of a tree. The bird fell dead. He then fired five other shots just by way of amusement, laughing all the time with the Senator.

"You see," said he—"ha, ha—we're in a fix—ha, ha—and I want to show them what a revolver is?"

"But you're wasting all your shot."

"Not a bit of it. See!"

And saying this he drew a second chamber from his pocket, and taking the first out of the pistol inserted the other. He then fired another shot. All this was the work of a few moments. He then took some cartridges and filled the spare chamber once more.

The Italians looked on this display in great astonishment, exchanging significant glances, particularly when the Doctor changed the chambers. The Americans, on the contrary, took good care to manifest complete indifference. The Italians evidently thought they were all armed like the Doctor. Naturally enough, too, for if not, why should they venture here and talk so loftily to them? So they were puzzled, and in doubt. After a time one who appeared to be their leader stepped aside with two or three of the men, and talked in a low voice, after which he came to Buttons and said:

"Come, then, and we will show you."

"Go on."

The Captain beckoned to his men. Six of them went to the rear. Buttons saw the manœuvre, and burst into roars of laughter. The Italians looked more puzzled than ever.

"Is that to keep us from getting away?" he cried—"ha, ha, ha, ha, ha! Well, well!"

"He's putting a guard behind us. Laugh like fury, boys," said Buttons, in English.

Whereupon they all roared, the tremendous laughter of the Senator coming in with fearful effect.

"There's nothing to laugh at," said the man who appeared to be captain, very sulkily.

"It's evident that you Italians don't understand late improvements," said Buttons. "But come, hurry on."

The Captain turned and walked ahead sullenly.

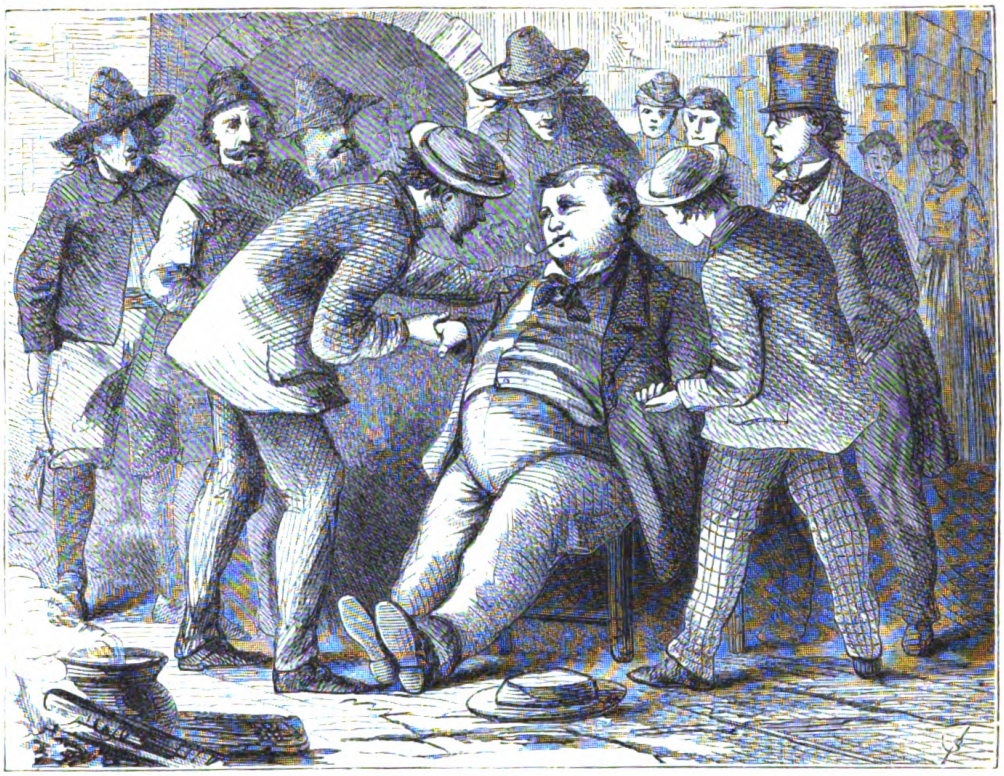
"It's all very well to laugh," said the Doctor, in a cheerful tone; "but suppose those devils behind us shoot us."

"I think if they intended to do that the Captain would not walk in front. No, they want to take us alive, and make us pay a heavy ransom."

After this the Club kept up an incessant chatter. They talked over their situation, but could as yet decide upon nothing. It grew dark at length. The sun went down. The usual rapid twilight came on.

"Dick," said the Doctor, "when it gets dark enough I'll give you my pistol, so that you may show off with it as if it were yours."

"All right, my son," said Dick.



Shortly after, when it was quite dark, the Doctor slipped the pistol into the side-pocket of Dick's coat. At length a light appeared before them. It was an old ruin which stood upon an eminence. Where they were not a soul of them could tell. Dick declared that he smelt salt water.

The light which they saw came from the broken windows of a dilapidated hall belonging to the building. They went up some crumbling steps, and the Captain gave a peculiar knock at the door. A woman opened it. A bright light streamed out. Dick paused for a moment, and took the Doctor's pistol from his pocket. He held it up, and pretended to arrange the chamber. Then he carelessly put it in his pocket again.

"You haven't bound them?" said the woman who opened the door to the Captain.

"Meaning us, my joy?" said Buttons, in Italian. "Not just yet, I believe, and not for some time. But how do you all do?"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MR. FIGGS.

The woman stared hard at Buttons, and then at the Captain. There were eight or ten women here. It was a large hall, the roof still entire, but with the plaster all gone. A bright fire burned at one end. Torches burned around. On a stool near the fire was a familiar form—a portly, well-fed form—with a merry face—a twinkle in his eye—a pipe in his mouth—calmly smoking—apparently quite at home, though his feet were tied—in short, Mr. Figgs!

"Figgs, my boy!"

One universal shout and the Club surrounded their companion. In an instant Buttons cut his bonds.

"Bless you—bless you, my children!" cried Figgs. "But how the (Principle of Evil) did you get here? These are brigands. I've just been calculating how heavy a bill I would have to foot."

The brigands saw the release of Figgs, and stood looking gloomily at their singular prisoners, not quite knowing whether they were prisoners or not, not knowing what to do. Each member of the Club took the most comfortable seat he could find near the fire, and began talking vehemently. Suddenly Buttons jumped up.

"A thousand pardons—I really forgot that there were ladies present. Will you not sit here and give us the honor of your company?"

He made a profound bow and looked at several of them. They looked puzzled, then pleased; then they all began to titter.

"Signor makes himself very much at home," said one, at length.

"And where could there be a pleasanter place? This old hall, this jolly old fire, and this delightful company!"

Another bow. The Captain looked very sullen still. He was evidently in deep perplexity.

"Come, cheer up there!" said Buttons. "We won't do you any harm; we won't even complain to the authorities that we found our friend here. Cheer up! Have you any thing to eat, most noble Captain?"

The Captain turned away.

Meanwhile Figgs had told the story of his capture. After resting for a while on the slope he prepared to descend, but seeing sand farther away he went over toward it and descended there. Finding it very dangerous or difficult to go down straight he made the descent obliquely, so that when he reached the foot of the cone he was far away from the point at which he had started to make the ascent. Arriving there, he sat down to rest after his exertions. Some men came toward him, but he did not think much about it. Suddenly, before he knew what was up, he found himself a prisoner. He had a weary march, and was just getting comfortable as they came in.

As they sat round the fire they found it very comfortable. Like many evenings in Italy, it was damp and quite chilly. They laughed and talked, and appeared to be any thing but captives in a robber's hold. The Captain had been out for some time, and at length returned. He was now very cheerful. He came laughingly up to the fire.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE LADIES.

"Well, Signori Americani, what do you think of your accommodation?"

"Delightful! charming!" cried Buttons and Dick.

"If the ladies would only deign to smile on us—"

"Aha! You are a great man for the ladies!" said the Captain.

"Who is not?" said Buttons, sententiously.

After a few pleasant words the Captain left again.

"He has some scheme in his villainous head," said Buttons.

"To drug us," said the Doctor.

"To send for others," said Dick.

"To wait till we sleep, and then fall on us," said Mr. Figgs.

"Well, gentlemen," said the Senator, drawing himself up, "we're more than a match for them. Why, what are these brigands? Is there a man of them who isn't a poor, miserable, cowardly cuss? Not one. If we are captured by such as these we deserve to be captives all our lives."

"If we don't get off soon we'll have a good round sum to pay," said Mr. Figgs.

"And that I object to," said Buttons; "for I promised my Governor solemnly that I wouldn't spend more than a certain sum in Europe, and I won't."

"For my part," said the Doctor, "I can't afford it."

"And I would rather use the amount which they would ask in some other way," said Dick.

"That's it, boys! You're plucky. Go in! We'll fix their flints. The American eagle is soaring, gentlemen—let him ascend to the zenith. Go it! But mind now—don't be too hasty. Let's wait for a time to see further developments."

"Richard, my boy, will you occupy the time by singing a hymn?" continued the Senator. "I see a guitar there."

Dick quietly got up, took the guitar, and, tuning it, began to sing. The brigands were still in a state of wonder. The women looked shy. Most of the spectators, however, were grinning at the eccentric Americans. Dick played and sang a great quantity of songs, all of a comic character.

The Italians were fond of music, of course. Dick had a good voice. Most of his songs had choruses, and the whole Club joined in. The Italians admired most the nigger songs. "Oh, Susannah!" was greeted with great applause. So was "Doo-dah;" and the Italians themselves joined energetically in the chorus. But the song that they loved best was "Ole Virginny Shore." This they called for over and over, and as they had quick ears they readily caught the tune; so that, finally, when Dick, at their earnest request, sang it for the seventh time, they whistled the air all through, and joined in with a thundering chorus. The Captain came in at the midst of it, and listened with great delight. After Dick had laid down his instrument he approached the Americans.

"Well, old hoss," said the Senator, "won't you take an arm-chair?"

"What is it?" said the Captain to Buttons.

"He wants to know if your Excellency will honor him by sitting near him."

The Captain's eye sparkled. Evidently it met his wishes. The Americans saw his delight.

"I should feel honored by sitting beside the illustrious stranger," said he. "It was what I came to ask. And will you allow the rest of these noble gentlemen to sit here and participate in your amusement?"

"The very thing," said Buttons, "which we have been trying to get them to do, but they won't. Now we are as anxious as ever, but still more anxious for the ladies."

"Oh, the ladies!" said the Captain; "they are timid."

Saying this he made a gesture, and five of his men came up. The whole six then sat with the five Americans. The Senator insisted that the Captain should sit by his side. Yet it was

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google singular. Each one of the men still kept his gun. No notice was taken of this, however. The policy of the Americans was to go in for utter jollity. They sat thus:

The Captain.
The Senator.
Bandit Number 1.
Mr. Figgs.
Bandit Number 2.
The Doctor.
Bandit Number 3.
Dick.
Bandit Number 4.
Buttons.
Bandit Number 5.

Five members of the Club. Six bandits. In addition to these, four others stood armed at the door. The women were at a distance.

But the sequel must be left to another chapter.

SUGAR-MAKING.

THE crocus rose from her snowy bed
As she felt the spring's caresses,
And the willow from her graceful head
Shook out her yellow tresses.

Through the crumbling walls of his icy cell
Stole the brook, a happy rover;
And he made a noise like a silver bell
In running under and over.

The earth was pushing the old dead grass
With lily hand from her bosom,
And the sweet brown buds of the sassafras
Could scarcely hide the blossom.

And breaking nature's solitude
Came the axe strokes clearly ringing,
For the chopper was busy in the wood
Ere the early birds were singing.

All day the hardy settler, now
At his tasks, was toiling steady;
His fields were cleared, and his shining plow
Was set by the furrow ready.

And down in the woods, where the sun appeared
Through the naked branches breaking,
His rustic cabin had been reared
For the time of sugar-making.

And now, as about it he came and went,
Cheerfully planning and toiling,
His good child sat there, with eyes intent
On the fire and the kettles boiling.

With the beauty Nature gave as her dower,
And the artless grace she taught her,
The woods could boast no fairer flower
Than Rose, the settler's daughter.

She watched the pleasant fire a-near,
And her father coming and going,
And her thoughts were all as sweet and clear
As the drops from his pail o'erflowing.

For she scarce had dreamed of earthly ills,
And love had never found her;
She lived shut in by the pleasant hills
That stood as a guard around her.

And she might have lived the self-same way
Through all the springs to follow,
But for a youth, who came one day
Across her in the hollow.

He did not look like a wicked man,
And yet, when he saw that blossom,
He said, "I will steal this Rose if I can,
And hide it in my bosom."

That he could be tired you had not guessed
Had you seen him lightly walking;
But he must have been, for he stopped to rest
So long that they fell to talking.

Alas! he was athirst, he said,
Yet he feared there was no slaking
The deep and quenchless thirst he had
For a draught beyond his taking.

Then she filled the cup and gave to him,
The settler's blushing daughter;
And he looked at her across the brim
As he slowly drank the water.

And he sighed as he put the cup away,
For lips and soul were drinking:
But what he drew from her eyes that day
Was the sweetest, to his thinking.

I do not know if her love awoke
Before his words awoke it;
If she guessed at his before he spoke,
Or not till he had spoke it.

But howsoe'er she made it known,
And howsoe'er he told her,
Each unto each the heart had shown
When the year was little older.

For oft he came her voice to hear,
And to taste of the sugar-water;
And she was a settler's wife next year
Who had been the settler's daughter.

And now their days are fair and fleet
As the days of sugar weather,
While they drink the water, clear and sweet,
Of the cup of life together.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE MOUNTAINEER.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR.

BY A VIRGINIAN.

[Seventh Paper.]

CONCENTRATION.

May 26, 1862, Monday.—Bright and warm. I arose much refreshed, and feeling stronger than I had done for some time. The streets of Williamsport were alive with the sweepings of yesterday's march—all full of cheerfulness and exhilaration. Passing through the crowd my hand was grasped by many an unknown friend, felicitating me on my safety.

There were inquiries for those who were missing. Captains Abert, of the Engineers, and Collis, of the Body-Guard, had been cut off with the rear-guard and not since heard of. There were many others whose fate was yet a subject of doubt and anxiety among their friends. Mr. Thayer Abert's flying ferry was still working industriously and successfully, while hundreds of wagons and thousands of soldiers and refugees still tarried on the Virginia shore, awaiting their turn. There had

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

been no appearance of the enemy this side of Martinsburg, and the crossing had been effected without haste or disturbance.

Hatch's Cavalry had crossed by fording, and was found in the streets of the town. Two batteries were planted on the bluffs commanding the ferry and opposite slopes, while hundreds of weary soldiers lay sleeping in the sun upon the green knolls overlooking the canal. I was gratified to see Adolph, the Staff steward, and Fenelli, our cook, dashing about as usual with their foraging wagon; and also to receive assurance that my own baggage was over safe. My trunk, it seemed, was in one of the wagons

HARPER'S FERRY REVISITED.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

BELOW THE RIDGE.

that swamped in the attempt to ford. It lay on top, and in consequence had only been partially submerged. The water had risen in it as high as the tray, soaking my clothes thoroughly; but my important papers, notes, and sketches, which had been packed in the tray, were unhurt. At the hotel I ascertained that my mare had been stolen during the night and taken as far as Hagerstown, where she was stopped and sent back by some of my friends. The thief was one of our army bummers, who was taking advantage of the retreat to get to his home North.

About mid-day I saw Colonel Clarke mounted and about to start for Harper's Ferry. Feeling anxious to understand the meaning of the enemy's movement, I determined to accompany him, thinking if I could push my way as far up as Charlestown I could communicate with my family there, assure them of my safety, and at the same time obtain some reliable information as to Jackson's force and intentions. We reached Sharpsburg by the river road and there dined. During our halt we saw a number of our stragglers, who had escaped by way of Shepherdstown, and whose adventures in connection with the Sowder's Battery are narrated in a former chapter.

Night overtook us before we reached Harper's Ferry. In passing through a wood near the river we met a large party of men, women, and children on foot, and loaded with bundles and baskets. As it was too dark to distinguish their faces I supposed they were negroes, and inquired where they were from and who they belonged to? A man's voice replied: "We

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google are from Jefferson County, Virginia, and have always believed until lately that we were free white men. We are now fugitives from oppression, and seeking a shelter for our wives and children in a free land." I advised them to locate their families, and return with muskets on their shoulders to assist the Government in making Virginia a fit habitation for free men. They promised to do so.

At the point where the road strikes the river we were halted by a guard, and having given a satisfactory account of ourselves, were permitted to pass. From thence to the Railroad Bridge the narrow passage between the cliffs and the canal was so encumbered with sleeping soldiers that we made our way with difficulty. The Railroad Bridge was gone; and we found the means of crossing the river by a rope ferry somewhat awkwardly arranged. After some difficulties and hazards we landed in the town of Harper's Ferry, and immediately reported at head-quarters..

We found General Saxton in command, with about five thousand raw troops, mostly new levies and militia regiments turned out on the spur of the occasion. These were backed by a battery of heavy guns on the Maryland Heights, manned by about three hundred sailors. General Hamilton, recently relieved of command in the Peninsula, was present in citizen's dress, and also Colonel Miles, commander of the post.

May 27, Tuesday.—Fair. The fatigues of the three preceding days had begun to tell quite heavily upon me, so that I was glad to find a comfortable room and rest with my friend Kelley of Harper's Ferry. Saxton had information that Jackson's main column was moving on Harper's Ferry, and he was preparing to defend the place with such troops as could be hastily gathered together. He had several batteries of light artillery, and the naval battery before mentioned, in which were included a nine-inch Dahlgren gun, a hundred-pounder rifled piece, and several ship's howitzers of lighter weight. New regiments were coming in which would increase his force to about seven thousand. If Jackson really intended to strike Harper's Ferry, with M'Dowell and Fremont on his flanks and rear, his only chance of success is in moving rapidly; yet, to date, his movements are unaccountably slow. To-morrow General Saxton will order a reconnoitring force to move on the Charlestown and Winchester road. I asked and received permission to accompany it. After dinner I rode to the summit of Smallwood's Hill, or "Bolivar Heights," which commands an extensive view of the Valley southward, but could see no dust-clouds, or any thing that indicated the advance of an enemy.

The excitement at Washington is said to be great. They refused to accept the warnings of the coming storm, given in time to have averted it. Now they are on the other extreme, and have become alarmed. For my own part I can not believe that Jackson will risk himself so far down the Valley as Harper's Ferry.

May 28, Wednesday.—Clouds. This morning I rode out to Bolivar Heights, where I found a company of cavalry, awaiting orders to move with the reconnoitring party. It was shortly understood that I was the only officer present who had heard the crack of a hostile gun or had seen the face of an enemy. For the rest, it was their maiden adventure. I was in consequence invited to ride with the Colonel as chief adviser, and on that hint began to assume some authority.

For a while the road was smooth, and the only difficulty experienced was to prevent the cavalry from dispersing in quest of horses with which the surrounding country was supposed to abound. When the head of our column reached the toll-gate near Charlestown it was checked by a sharp fire of musketry from a wooded ridge in front, the site of the fair grounds. This produced a sensation, and a council of war was held in the road, whose proceedings were enlivened by a caterwauling of musket-balls, with which our refractory fellow-citizens in the wood continued to pelt us.

Perceiving the inevitable white horse figuring in front of the enemy's line, I guessed it was Ashby with a portion of his command, and advised the Colonel to deploy two companies of his infantry as skirmishers and order them to drive him out. He preferred forming a neat line of battle on either side of the turnpike, and awaiting the attack. As I guessed there was nothing more than a picket-guard on the hill, and we were too distant for an effective use of the musket, the prospect of a fight was not imminent. As usual the artillery was called on, and the Captain ordered to give them a few shells. I put in a special request that he would deliver his shots low, as our gunners generally wasted their ammunition in the air. Moreover, in the village behind, and in the direct range of his guns, dwelt my wife and daughter. The Captain politely acceded to my recommendation, and I never saw better practice. Every shell raked the crest of the hill and exploded among the enemy.

They immediately scattered into the wood right and left, sheltering themselves behind the heavy timber and peppering away with their small-arms without intermission. Major Cole then sent a squad of twenty men around their right flank, intending to charge them with his squadron as soon as they abandoned their sheltered position. The detachment started off with spirit, fetching a circuit through the open meadows to the right of the hill. As I stood with the Major watching the effect this move would have upon the enemy our artillery, which had been quiescent for some minutes, opened again with great rapidity. To our astonishment we saw our flanking party suddenly dispersing and tumbling off their horses, which galloped riderless over the fields wild with terror. At the same time we observed the shells bursting among them right and left. I at first thought the enemy had opened a battery, but on

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

looking back saw our own guns trained upon them and firing as rapidly as they could load. The artillerymen were in ecstasies at their success. At every shot they shouted, "Hurrah! there went twenty more of the darned rascals! Bang! Hurrah! Look at them running and tumbling; we've killed them all in four shots! Bang! Hurrah! come on with your rebels, we're ready for you! Captain, ain't this glorious?" I had to ride in front of the guns to stop them long enough to get in an explanation. At length convinced that they were firing on our own men they stopped, with apparent reluctance, as if more vexed at the loss of their sport than remorseful for the probable mischief they had done. Meanwhile the enemy had mounted, and the rising dust-clouds showed that he had taken to his heels. At the same time, to our great satisfaction, our flankers rose from the dead and went streaking it over the meadows to catch their horses. They were presently remounted to a man, and started in hot pursuit of the enemy. The infantry had been too well and ceremoniously drilled to permit so signal a victory to pass unimproved. Forming around the battery, each officer's name was called in turn and saluted with three roaring cheers.

Growing impatient, Major Cole, at the head of his squadron, dashed into the town as fast as he could drive, leaving his allies to finish their celebration at their leisure. As we rode in at one end of the village the enemy rode out at the other. Our troopers rushing on, yelling like Comanches, and firing their pistols right and left without aim or object. The street as we entered was deserted, the houses all closed, save one, from whence two white handkerchiefs waved joyful salutation in spite of the flying pistol-shots, the dust-clouds, and wild outcries of our troopers. As we dashed past I recognized my wife and daughter at the door. Now, as the enemy seemed gone beyond pursuit, and, from the demonstrations, it appeared as if our men were about to sack the town, I returned to exchange greetings with my family, and give them the protection of my presence.

By this time the infantry and artillery had got up, and I discovered the market-house and hall on fire, and burning at a rate which threatened to destroy the village. I applied to all the officers I met for assistance in extinguishing the flames, but was persistently refused. I then tried to induce some white citizens and negroes to get out the fire-engines; but they were afraid to meddle with it, saying the soldiers had threatened to shoot them if they did so. Espying a young officer at the head of a squad of cavalry, twenty or thirty men, who apparently did not belong to our command, I asked his name and regiment. It was Captain Healy of the Eighth New York Cavalry, who acknowledged that he was here without orders, having followed up the reconnoitring party in the hope of seeing a fight. I requested him to put himself under my orders. He consented with alacrity, glad, no doubt, to be put on duty. I had his troop formed around the burning building with carbines cocked, and ordered to shoot any one who should interfere with the parties extinguishing the fire. With this protection I was enabled to induce a friend to head a working-party, chiefly of women and negroes, who by tearing down fences and some adjacent buildings succeeded in arresting the progress of the flames. The market-house and hall originally fired were already past saving, and burned to the ground.

Shocked and disgusted with this state of things I returned to my mother-in-law's house. Dinner was hastened, and I sat down to partake, inviting an infantry officer and a trooper to join me. When about concluding my meal the boom of a gun was heard. Ah, that's our battery! Another thug—two—three—four—five—in quick succession. "The devil! Good-by, folks—that is what we came up to see about!"

"Stay, won't you wait for coffee?"

"For coffee?—yes; but let us have it without delay!"

The coffee was served with trembling hands and piping hot. Boom—boom—boom! I believe I burned my throat in swallowing, for just at the moment the whole body of our cavalry rushed by at full speed toward Harper's Ferry. Going upon the street to mount I saw the infantry moving after them at a double-quick, reporting the enemy upon them in great force with two batteries.

Wishing to assure myself by ocular demonstration I rode to the farther end of the village, and saw the enemy on a crest in the edge of a wood about half a mile distant. The cannonading still continued, and I counted the smoke of four guns. I had not believed it possible that Jackson would risk himself so far down the Valley; but he was certainly expected in Charlestown, and this was doubtless his advanced-guard. Having satisfied myself on this point I followed the retreating column.

The street and highway were strewed with the débris of plunder and equipments. There were knapsacks, haversacks, and blankets in abundance, all span-new, just as issued from the store-houses of the Government. These were interspersed with plugs of tobacco, dry-goods, and other trumpery, the results of their plundering. I did not observe that any of the troops cast away their arms, although among the leavings were numerous sabres, carbines, and other old pieces, found in the market-house and elsewhere, and appropriated by the men as trophies.

On overtaking the infantry I observed that, notwithstanding its rapid movement, it had kept its organization remarkably well, there being not over a dozen stragglers from the ranks. I prevailed on its commander to reduce its speed to common time, and in a few minutes the battalion was marching as steadily as it had done in the morning.

At the fair grounds we met a squadron of cav-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

alry and a regiment of infantry advanced to support us. As we passed they faced about, and the whole force returned to Harper's Ferry undisturbed, except by a few harmless shells thrown by the enemy at long-range.

On Bolivar Heights we found our whole army—six or seven thousand men, with three batteries—drawn up in order of battle. I met General Hamilton here, and gave him an account of the day's work, from which we concluded the battle would not come off immediately, and so rode back to Harper's Ferry together.

While the reconnoitring party had accomplished every thing required of it, and for raw troops had showed a commendable degree of spirit, yet all might have been accomplished in an orderly and creditable manner had the command been restrained from its miserable plundering. As it was, the cavalry lost ten or a dozen men, killed, wounded, and taken; while the infantry, for the sake of a few plugs of mean tobacco and some cheap store goods, were surprised into a hurried retreat, and threw away not only their pitiful spoils but some thousand dollars' worth of United States blankets and equipments, to say nothing of the strong probability of the capture or destruction of the whole command, but for Trimble's very unnecessary caution in approaching the town.

At night a Yankee woman, just arrived from Winchester, was brought into head-quarters. She had a pass from the rebel authorities there, and professed to have conversed freely with some of their chiefs. She says the people of Winchester were duly apprised of Jackson's coming, and were making hospitable preparations to receive their friends for at least a week in advance. On Thursday or Friday before our retreat she remarked a horseman, unarmed and clad in the gray homespun dress of a farmer, riding through the streets and stopping occasionally to exchange words with eager and anxious-looking citizens. As he passed near the window where she sat she thought his civil costume but ill concealed the air and bearing of a soldier, and from a conversation carried on in suppressed and earnest tones she overheard these detached phrases: "In great force"—"Yes, in a few days." She did not suspect their meaning at the time, but the riddle was soon solved. On Sunday morning she went out to see the battle, and when our troops retreated she says the rebels burst into the town like a flood of dirty water—rugged, ragged, and infinitely varied in the fashion of their rags—but showing entire uniformity of color from top to toe; hats, faces, beards, clothing, equipments, and shoes (where they had them) all smothered in tawny dust. As they marched, the streets were enlivened by their ludicrous antics, their yells, and uncouth war-whoops. They rushed into shops, stores, and private houses, demanding food and drink; there was meeting and greeting of friends and kindred; in short, dull and abject Winchester, as we had been accustomed to see it, was suddenly transformed into a theatre of the wildest joy and savage exultation. The troops seemed half-famished, and lost at least twice as many men as we did in the skirmish on Sunday morning. She had seen a considerable number of their dead and the severely wounded collected at Holliday's stone-mill. There were but few bodies of the Federals visible. One she saw lying in the street, near the Old Union Hotel—a man who had received a slight wound in the head, and who had evidently died of a bayonet-stab in the throat inflicted after he had fallen.

May 29, Thursday.—Fair and warm. From Bolivar Heights to-day we could see the enemy's advanced post at Halltown. From hence he pushed a reconnoissance toward Harper's Ferry, using artillery. As they approached within range of our position we opened with all our batteries. Artillerymen, guns, and all are quite new, and from unskillfulness or defective ammunition the firing was wretchedly bad. The shells burst midway in their flight—some immediately after leaving the muzzle of the gun; others tumbled into the fields without exploding. In case of an attack our light artillery will be of little service, I fear.

While this practice was going on we observed dust rising between Charlestown and Halltown, indicating the advance of a large force, for the whole line of the road was marked by a continuous cloud. The horizon to the right, stretching from Charlestown to the Potomac River, was also obscured by rising dust; and another dusky line indicated the movement of a column toward the Shenandoah on our left. Meanwhile our troops had all moved out, and were ranged in order of battle behind the crest of the Ridge. In front of each regiment was a chaplain gesticulating and praying at the top of his voice. Without the slightest inclination to scoff I can not say that I was favorably impressed with the exhibition. Perhaps a double jigger of whisky and a sharp military appeal would have been better calculated to make the men stand up to their work, especially at a time when "the awfulness of a sudden entry into another world and their unpreparedness to face judgment" is too apt to get possession of their minds unsuggested. They were not put to the test, however, for the sun went down in peace, and the Generals, with their Staffs, returned to quarters.

A deserter was brought in and examined. He states that on yesterday the Confederate army was encamped two miles south of Charlestown. To-day they advanced to Halltown, with sixteen thousand men and fifty-eight guns. A brigade, with a battery, had crossed the Shenandoah at Keyes's Ferry with the intention of occupying Loudon Heights. Another strong detachment had moved toward Shepherdstown, with a view of crossing into Maryland, probably at Antietam Ford, thus proposing to cut off and capture our force at Harper's Ferry. After sifting the fellow I became convinced that he was dealing sincerely and intelligently. His

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google news was corroborative, and the plan set forth very feasible.

A council of war was held, and it was determined to move all our stores, baggage, and the great body of the troops to the Maryland side of the river. This was effected during the night by a very tedious process. There was a rope ferry, with a single scow, requiring an hour at least to cross, discharge, and return. In addition, the single track of the railroad bridge was floored with rough plank, forming a passage-way, without hand-rails or parapets, a thousand feet long, forty feet above the river, and about seven or eight feet wide. The infantry marched two abreast; the cavalry, dismounted, led their horses in single file; the artillery was pushed over by hand. Several horses got frightened and leaped over into the water; one, falling upon a railroad engine which lay overthrown in the stream, was instantly killed. Strange to say, the others, striking deep water, swam ashore and were saved.

May 30, Friday.—Fair and pleasant. I arose at daybreak and mounted my mare, prepared for any emergency. The crossing was still going on, and I found General Hamilton about departing for Washington. I had, on the ground of former acquaintance, been acting as his volunteer aid. His departure left me a waif in the crowd, and free to go where I pleased. Meeting Colonel Miles, he advised me to visit the Naval Battery on Maryland Heights, and I determined to do so. Mounting the steep and rocky road which led up the Heights, I presently reached the battery of heavy guns before named, and manned by a detachment of sailors about three hundred strong. This powerful battery commands the town of Harper's Ferry and all its approaches. Its fire rakes the summit and side of the Loudon Mountain, and sweeps the crest of the Bolivar Ridge most effectually. It is supported by a brigade of infantry on either flank, holding the woods and passes through which it may be assailed on the Maryland side.

Bolivar Ridge, clean shaven and deserted, terminates the view southward. Behind it lies Jackson's army. Saxton is intrenching an inferior and shorter line about a mile this side, and retains twenty-five hundred men and two light batteries to defend it. Should the enemy attempt to cross the Ridge he will be swept by shell and shrapnell from this battery, and get the fire of the intrenched line at the superintendent's house full in his face. I feel some confidence that Jackson will smell brimstone if he attempts Harper's Ferry at this time.

Going down to Sandy Hook I met with some friends, and got an invitation to dinner, which was thankfully accepted. In the afternoon there was quite a rapid cannonading on Bolivar Heights, and I recrossed to Harper's Ferry to see what was going on. Arriving at the intrenched line I ascertained that our light batteries from Bolivar Heights had engaged with the enemy's artillery on a ridge about three-quarters of a mile south. But we were quickly driven off, being outnumbered in guns and excelled in practice.

I then rode forward to the Ridge to reconnoitre. It was entirely abandoned except by a line of pickets, who were obliged to lie concealed while they observed the enemy. I met an officer returning, who warned me that if I appeared on the summit I would draw the fire of the rebel batteries.

Returning to the town I saw men occupying the crest of the Loudon Mountain, and standing in groups upon the old block-houses. This confirms the report of our deserter, yet it seems singular that we don't hear from these people on Loudon Heights. What can they be after?

The military situation is gloomy and perplexing. Jackson seems to have deliberately set about investing this place as if M'Dowell and Fremont were not in existence. As its defenders are chiefly raw and undisciplined troops he might easily take it by a coup de main; but he has been dawdling around for several days, and has made no serious attempt as yet. I am in hourly expectancy of hearing of his crossing at Antietam or Shepherdstown. I must acknowledge that I am profoundly mystified.

Crossed over to Sandy Hook, where I got a comfortable bed at Welch's, and retired early, that I might be in good condition to meet the events of to-morrow.

May 31, Saturday.—Fair. I arose refreshed in body but troubled in mind. I had been aroused several times during the night by the roar of the heavy guns from the naval battery. Their reverberations through these rocky gorges are sublime, and fully equal to first-class thunder. The firing was still kept up at intervals.

I endeavored to get over to the town to obtain the latest official intelligence, intending to return to General Banks's head-quarters to-day. I found the bridge occupied by railroad trains, the ferry-boat on the other side and deserted, and the ford impassable. The enemy had made a feeble attack during the night on the Bolivar lines, but had been so easily repulsed that it must have been only a feint. There had been no demonstration from the Loudon Mountain, and our sailors were carrying its sides with an occasional discharge of shrapnell. The road to Antietam was open, and finding a detachment of cavalry en route for that post, I determined accompanying it.

At Antietam Creek I found Colonel Johnson with the Fifth New York cavalry, and two guns in position to dispute the crossing. No force of the enemy had appeared on the Virginia side, and he had heard of no crossing above. I dined here, and then started for Williamsport with an escort tendered by the Colonel. I reached my destination late in the afternoon, without other incident than a furious thunder-storm, which drenched me thoroughly. I immediately repaired to General Banks's quarters, and found him very easy in regard to the enemy, our cavalry occupying Martinsburg, and a brigade of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google infantry en route to join the cavalry. I informed him of the condition of things at Harper's Ferry when I left in the morning, and in consequence a messenger was sent to halt the infantry at Falling Waters until further orders. The next news received was that the enemy had retired from before Harper's Ferry, and was falling back toward Winchester.

June 1, Sunday.—Raining and variable. Now that the dust has settled somewhat we are enabled to understand and estimate the events of the last ten days. Our losses, both in men and material, are much less than at first supposed. The Chief Quarter-Master tells me our train has not lost over fifty-five wagons, about one-half of which were overthrown and burned by ourselves, on account of the breaking down of the animals. Some hundreds of our men and several officers whom we had given up for lost have returned, and our column has not lost over fifteen hundred effective, in killed, wounded, and prisoners.

From the best information I can gather I make up the following summary of the late operations: After uniting with Ewell and Edward Johnson in Augusta, Jackson found himself at the head of a force numbering from twenty to twenty-four thousand men and sixty guns. The National forces, aggregating over sixty thousand men, were distributed from Fredericksburg to Moorfield, under different commanders, without intercommunication or unity of purpose; often occupying positions where they were utterly useless, or exposed in bodies of convenient size to be gobbled up in detail, whenever the rebel commander thought proper to do so. Perceiving that affairs at Richmond would presently be brought to a crisis by the advance of M'Dowell, General Joe Johnston ordered Jackson to commence operations so as to create a diversion and prevent the threatened movement. General Millroy, of Fremont's command, was moving on Staunton with his brigade, but I can not understand why he was alone so far in advance of Fremont's main body. Leaving Ewell to watch Banks, Jackson took from ten to twelve thousand men and went after Millroy, expecting to capture or crush him. He found the Federals in position at a place called M'Dowell, and instead of a victim Jackson found he had caught a Tartar.

The shades of night afforded the Federal commanders an opportunity of viewing the situation in a cooler light, and being convinced that they could not hope for ultimate success against the overwhelming numbers of the enemy, concluded to fall back on Franklin. This they did during the night, without precipitancy or molestation. Having thus relieved Staunton from immediate danger Jackson again united with Ewell, and moved his whole force against Banks's position. Leaving the open and direct route by the Valley turnpike, he chose a more secluded road by the Luray Valley, which debouches upon Front Royal. This post was held by Colonel John T. Kenley, with the First Maryland Volunteer Infantry and a section of Knapp's Battery. The account of the fight which occurred here is best given in the Colonel's official report, written while he lay wounded and a prisoner in Winchester, and is well worth reading, but I find that my space will not allow me to reproduce it.

While this action was in progress Ashby, with his mounted command, moved around the base of the Massanutten Mountain with the purpose of destroying the railroad bridge over Passage Creek at Buckton Station, thus to cut off the direct communication between Front Royal and Strasburg. The post was successfully defended by Captain Hubbard with two companies, Ashby having met a bloody repulse, losing several valuable officers and a number of men. Perceiving, however, from the general aspect of affairs that the post was no longer tenable, General Banks advanced a regiment and withdrew Hubbard from his dangerous position during the night.

It was doubtless owing to the clouds of cavalry which the enemy threw between Front Royal and Strasburg that none of Colonel Kenley's couriers reached our head-quarters, and not a solitary fugitive even, except the negro mentioned in a previous chapter who left very soon after the fight commenced and could give no satisfactory account of any thing. Thus it seemed almost incredible that, while these events occurred within seven or eight miles of General Banks's head-quarters, he should have had no reliable intelligence of them until he received the telegram from Winchester late in the afternoon.

Every thing, however, was got ready for movement or battle as circumstances should decide. The trains were loaded and took the road, camps were struck, and the troops passed the night with their arms in their hands.

Next morning (24th), telegraphic communication with Winchester being still uninterrupted, the sick and baggage trains were started in that direction. The column commenced moving about eight o'clock, the General and Staff starting between ten and eleven; the reports from our reconnoitring parties satisfactorily establishing the fact that the enemy in considerable force was on the north side of the Shenandoah, apparently moving toward Winchester.

About this time the first demonstration was made upon our line of march near Newtown by a dash of cavalry on our ambulance train, capturing some invalids, and perhaps some ambulance horses. This produced a stampede among the teamsters along the whole line, which was presently checked without other result than the loss of half an hour's time. The column continued to move with the utmost deliberation, the troops taking their usual rests, and the General with his Staff stopping frequently to listen to the complaints of the good people, whose hen-roosts, bee-hives, or stables had been disturbed by his troops.

At Newtown, eight miles from Winchester,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

about two or three hours after mid-day, another rather feeble demonstration was made on our right by a larger body of cavalry under Brigadier-General George Stuart.

About this time the head of the enemy's main column, composed of all arms—infantry, artillery, and cavalry—coming in by the Front Royal road, struck our line of wagons at Middletown. The only troops of ours at that point were a battalion of cavalry under Lieutenant-Colonel De Forest, about two hundred and fifty strong, a battery of light artillery, and a company of light infantry, the Zouave body-guard under Captain Collis, about seventy men. This company, with Captain Abert of the Engineers, had been left to burn the bridge over Cedar Creek after the passage of the army train. This duty having been accomplished, the body-guard had reached Middletown on its way to rejoin head-quarters when the enemy's column came in sight.

The Zouaves, immediately deployed as skirmishers and taking position behind a stone fence, opened fire on a regiment which was advancing, checking its march as well as that of another regiment moving on its flank. They continued to hold their position until they had fired several rounds, then fell back toward Strasburg, maintaining their skirmish line, loading and firing as coolly as if they had been on parade.

The enemy's advance, thus temporarily checked, continued to manœuvre with the greatest caution, pelting the train from a distance with artillery.

One of the wagons, having been accidentally knocked over by a shot, the teamsters within range stampeded as usual; and the abandoned teams, rushing wildly forward, overthrew and crushed each other in the road, thus hopelessly blocking the passage to those behind. The head of De Forest's cavalry column, purposing to push through at all hazards, charged recklessly into the dust-clouds raised by this mêlée of the wagons, and falling upon the obstructions, rolled riders and horses in a bloody and struggling heap. I am told that from twenty to thirty men were lost in this way.

De Forest retired with the remainder of his troop toward Strasburg. Meanwhile Collis, with his company, had fallen back on the battery, which took position, unlimbered, and opened fire on the enemy's columns.

To finish the story of the rear-guard. The cavalry and the Zouaves, with thirty-four wagons of the train, made their way to the mountains, passing through Berkeley Springs, crossing the Potomac at Hancock, and rejoining the command at Williamsport on the 27th. The battery made a circuit by a back road, and rejoining the army at Winchester, took part in the action next morning.

To return to the column at Newtown. The enemy continued to show himself on our flank and rear, feebly demonstrating but easily held in check by our guns until dark, when the "impedimenta" being all safe, the troops resumed their march, Gordon sometimes moving his regiments in squares to secure himself against the cavalry, which was becoming more impudent as it grew darker. The enemy's infantry followed cautiously, suiting its pace to ours, their advance occasionally falling into our ambuscades and getting a rap over their noses which made them still more cautious.

Arrived at Winchester the army lay on its arms on the south side of the town. The trains were parked, the animals fed and rested, and every thing wore an air of easy confidence.

It was midnight before the troops were all located, and from that time until daylight there were occasional collisions between the outposts, but nothing of a serious character. The citizens of Winchester, prisoners taken during the day, and several rebel officers who wandered into our positions (supposing the town was occupied by their own troops), gave information of such a character as to convince General Banks that he was in the presence of a greatly superior force and would be attacked at dawn.

The baggage-trains were started on the Martinsburg road at an early hour, and at daylight the National forces were posted in order of battle between Winchester and the enemy. General Banks, reinforced by the Tenth Maine Infantry, was enabled to show about five thousand men of all arms. Soon after four o'clock the fight opened with artillery, and was then taken up by the infantry, the enemy manœuvring cautiously and demonstrating feebly, several of his regiments suffering repulse with considerable loss.

Jackson, after spending several hours in these slow manœuvres, suddenly displayed his overwhelming force, overlapping and threatening to envelop both flanks of Banks's army. At this exhibition some of the Federal regiments faced about and commenced a retrograde, which was judiciously legitimized by a general order to retreat. The manner of the retreat from this point to Martinsburg and Williamsport has already been described.

Notwithstanding many reports to the contrary, all our escaped and paroled prisoners and returned stragglers unite in giving a good report of their treatment by the enemy and by the people of the country generally. Many fugitives were fed and assisted by the families of those whose male relatives were in the advancing army of the enemy. The gush of human sympathy was unchecked by the reflection that the arm which they strengthened might ere long, at the call of duty, be raised against the life of their best beloved.

Captain Abert, after assisting in the affair of the rear-guard, attempted to rejoin the main column by a circuitous road. Hearing the guns, and seeing the clouds of dust indicating the movement of troops, he was making his way toward the turnpike, when a lady clad in mourning weeds ran out from a house and by her earnest calls induced him to turn back.

"Do not go in that direction, Sir!" she ex-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AT THE REBELS' GATE.

claimed; "our troops occupy all the roads, and you will certainly be killed or taken!"

The Captain expressed his astonishment at this manifestation of friendly interest in a stranger, and especially one whom she must naturally regard as an enemy of her people. She answered, with deep emotion:

"Alas! Sir, I have lost a husband in this unnatural war, and I would not wish another to suffer as I have. Take the road to the mountains and you will be safe."

He followed her friendly counsel, and rejoined the command at Williamsport. It is pleasant to gather these flowers of courtesy, which spring so rarely from the hot and deadly scoriæ of civil strife.

June 1, Sunday.—Raining and variable. A man was brought in by the patrol last night who gave us information of the enemy which possibly contained some truth, but certainly a great deal of absurdity and falsehood.—Ashby occupied Martinsburg with cavalry and infantry; Shields was in Winchester with the advanced division of M'Dowell. On the arrival of this news the rebels were thrown into great confusion, and started off in haste, Ashby having been heard to say, "We have got ourselves in a bad box!"

June 2, Monday.—Fair and warm. I accompanied the General on a visit to Hagerstown, traveling in his ambulance. We there heard confused rumors of a battle before Richmond, in which the rebels had suffered a repulse with great loss.

On this side of the town they met De Forest with his cavalry going in.

Shields's advance has struck Front Royal, recapturing every thing there not already destroyed, liberating some of our prisoners, and taking some of the enemy. Artillery was heard all day yesterday, indicating a collision between Jackson and Fremont. Our advance occupies Winchester, and we move forward to-morrow, co-operating with Sigel, who moves in the same direction from Harper's Ferry.

REFUGEES RETURNING.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

UP WITH THE FLAG AGAIN.

June 3, Tuesday.—Fair and warm. Wishing to visit some friends in Martinsburg I got permission to start ahead of the Staff and rode forward alone. The road was alive with the fugitive population, now en route for home. There were many negroes among them, eminently cheerful at the idea of getting back to their homes. They had had a rough time since they crossed the river, being for the most part without shelter, provisions, or money. They swarmed through the country, encamping in the fields and crowding into barns and outhouses—provisioning themselves as folks usually do who are without friends or money. The proprietors, in self-defense, were obliged to drive them off their premises; and so the poor creatures, gathering up their babies and bundles, wandered from place to place homeless, helpless, and friendless. For several days they have been besieging the Provost Marshal's office for permits to return to Virginia.

In Martinsburg I found a detachment of our troops breaking into stores, pillaging, and misbehaving generally; but as soon as the General and Staff arrived order was restored, and a handsome dress parade with fine music brought out the population in great numbers and filled with joyful enthusiasm. The absent had returned to their families. National flags again fluttered from the housetops, and Martinsburg was free once more. The general joy culminated in a voluntary ovation to the commander as he rode through the town with his Staff and suite. Ladies and children crowded around the cavalcade, frightening the horses with their cambric handkerchiefs and showering smiles and bouquets upon the officers.

June 4, Wednesday.—Heavy and continuous rain. The enemy's troops occupying Martinsburg during the last week seized every thing edible they could find, and with as little scruple helped themselves to changes of raiment—a proceeding to which no reasonable person can object who has seen their need. In other respects the citizens give a good report of their behavior. I have observed, indeed, that, after relieving their domineering necessities for food, fuel, and clothes, the soldiers on both sides are usually inclined to treat their mutual fellow-citizens, and especially the women and children, with every consideration.

When the national banner floats from the flag-staff and boys whistle Yankee Doodle in the streets, our fair rebels, meek and plausible, cultivate their Union acquaintances, and through them find means to replenish their empty sugar boxes and flaccid coffee bags, to renew their faded and unfashionable apparel, and to escape the harassing domiciliatory visits of the military police — those hateful pryings into ladies' trunks and wardrobes, where the astonished officer, rummaging among kid slippers, silks and muslins, develops unexpectedly a pair of cavalry boots a mile too big for a lady's delicate feet, and anon a laced jacket with the complementary garment of stout gray jeans, bifurcate and all unmeet for ladies' wear, in the present state of public opinion. When the ragged reb-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

el rules the roast, just in from "The sweet South, stealing and giving odor," as Shakspeare has it, then the star-lit banner goes under, and our Union dames nudge their smiling and triumphant neighbors, delicately reminding them of former friendships and recent favors, which are not always forgotten. The rebels leave their sick and wounded in the care of the Union man's family, and the bitter memory of wrongs and insults is lost in sympathy for the dying stranger. The disabled Yankee sleeps in security beneath the rebel's roof, and enriches the poor man's scanty board with his varied and superfluous rations.

Courage. This war after all is but the distemper of an immature people. We will emerge from it a nation, full-grown and united, respected and self-respecting—a power that no man can measure, with a future that no man can conceive.

At head-quarters every body is looking dreary as the tombs. News had been received that Jackson had escaped scot-free. My judgment from the first comprehended the futility of the movements made to catch him, still I had nurtured a hope of some lucky accident in our favor; but the game was concluded, and I felt the disappointment as keenly as the rest.

A ride to Winchester through a dreary rain, over a road dreary with wreck and ruin, a dreary room in a dreary tavern, and the tag-end of a cold, dreary dinner concluded this dreary day. At table I sat beside a plain and rather boyish-looking man in citizen's dress, and somewhat eccentric in manners. Seeing Colonel De Forest opposite, I opened conversation with him on the military situation. At some remarks indicating a knowledge of the country in front, the stranger pricked his ears, and then with a marked German accent commenced asking questions which showed his familiarity with the "technique" of the military art.

I had begun to suspect who it was, when he rose, and, introducing himself as Major-General Sigel, asked me to accompany him to his room. Here he produced his maps, and continuing his suggestive questions, traced the lines of march and indicated points of occupation with a rapidity and accuracy of comprehension which proved him an adept at Bureau warfare at least, and as he brings from the West some reputation as a commander in the field I have great hopes of him.

June 5, Thursday.—Drizzling clouds. I walked out to-day to verify my observations in regard to the firing from private houses during the passage of the army on the 25th. The man who was shot within a few feet of me belonged to Colonel Ruger's regiment, the Third Minnesota. I forgot to note his name, but ascertained that he had been carried to the hospital and died next day. There were some holes in the wooden fence and gate behind from whence the shot was fired. The occupant of the premises was a truculent secessionist, and had fled Southward on the approach of our returning army. I had also seen a soldier fall on the sidewalk, nearly opposite the Taylor Hotel, and was informed that another citizen had left that house following in the wake of Jackson's army.

The Register of the Taylor Hotel significantly records the variations of the political atmosphere. For a long time the current sets steadily from the North, showing unbroken ranks of loyal names and national hieroglyphics. On the morning of the 25th of May the wind suddenly changes, and blows a perfect hurricane

THE UNION MAN'S HOUSE.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google from the other quarter. Page after page of ink-spattered and triumphant flourishes mark the rushing tide from the South: Major-General Jackson and Staff, General Turner Ashby, and a host of other personal acquaintances and quondam friends. The heated term lasts about ten days, and on the 5th of June there is a reflux from the North, which goes on steadily increasing. This same Register will be valuable some day as an historic relic.

June 6, Friday. — Clear and cool. The guard has been informed that quantities of commissary stores are concealed in the town, and our troops being short of rations a general search has been ordered. The inhabitants are wild with terror and indignation. The women, so sullenly secluded since our return, are now cackling and flying around like hens when a mink gets into the poultry-yard. I am sure the search will be futile, for Jackson's hungry hordes have not only eaten up all the spoils they took, but have denuded the country besides.

June 7, Saturday. — Bright and warm. I visited the Paymaster this morning, and find that I can not draw pay without showing my commission. That document not having come to hand as yet, I am advised to visit Washington to look after it in person. The General cheerfully accords me ten days' leave of absence for the purpose. Leaving my effects in charge of my faithful servant John, of Strasburg, I mounted forthwith and started for Charlestown, riding by the Martinsburg turnpike to Bunker's Hill, and thence by Smithfield, reaching my destination late in the afternoon, and just in time to escape a violent thunder-storm. I found my wife and daughter there, and passed a joyful evening in spite of the lowering sky and our late military disasters.

June 9, Monday.—Clear and warm. Went to Baltimore with my family, carrying divers letters, packages, and messages to Southern prisoners in the forts. The blooming and peaceful fields of Maryland presented a delicious contrast to the war-wasted region I had just left, while the savory cuisine and elegant rooms of the Eutaw quite abated my martial spirit, and the lines of Horace rose unbidden to my lips:

"O fortunati mercatores, miles ait."

On looking around I find the secession infatuation worse here than it is in Winchester, where low diet and blood-letting have somewhat lowered the fevered pulse and relieved the surcharged brain of the patients. A great many people here, it seems, are chuckling over the disasters of the National troops, and prophesying, with ill-concealed delight, the speedy downfall of the Government. They remind me of a pleasant story on Patrick and Denis, two hodmen, who were working at a five-story house in New York. Feeling thirsty, Denis offered to bet Patrick a gallon of whisky that he could not carry him to the top of the house in his hod. The wager was promptly accepted, and with Denis in the hod Patrick slowly ascended the dizzy scaffold. At length landing his man safely at the top, Patrick claimed the whisky. "Ye've won it fairly," quoth Denis, looking rather crest-fallen. "Ye've won it dacently, me boy; but, d'ye mind, coming up the fifth ladder nigh the top yez stumbled. I thought I had ye then—I was in great hopes."

I WAS IN HOPES.

Now the cause of the nation has stumbled, and Baltimoreans "are in great hopes." Of what? Of seeing their fertile and prosperous State the theatre of a savage and devastating war, her own citizens slaughtered and pillaged, her banks robbed, the city bombarded perhaps, and a stone fleet sunk in her harbor.

Took the afternoon train for Washington.

June 11, Wednesday. — Fair and cool. I went this morning to the war office, and in an interview with Major Garesché ascertained that my commission had been made out long since and sent to the address of a friend in the city. Through the Major's kindness a duplicate was immediately prepared, and my business concluded without the least circumlocution.

In the evening I called at Willard's, to pay my respects to Governor Pierpont, of Virginia. I found him surrounded by a number of his friends, and was warmly welcomed to the circle. I was pleased with this opportunity of meeting face to face the distinguished leader of loyal Virginia, as I had from the commencement been impressed with the importance of the movement which he headed.

When this new ship of state was fairly launched, amidst clouds of prejudice, doubt, and discouragement, and a howling tempest of opposition and menace, a man was needed to take the helm. Francis H. Pierpont had faith in his own work, and did not hesitate to embark in it

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google his life, fortune, and sacred honor. He will pilot his vessel through the breakers, for he brings to the work a noble sincerity, unflagging zeal, and undoubted ability.

IS IT CONSTITUTIONAL?

The loyal government of Virginia being now formally, legally, and constitutionally established, it is proposed to divide the State and erect a new and separate government for the division west of the mountains; the line to be drawn by the crest of the Alleghany Ridge, comprehending within the limits of the new State all those counties watered by the streams emptying into the Ohio River. This idea of dividing Virginia is not by any means new, nor does it owe its origin to the recent political convulsions. It has long been cherished by the inhabitants of these trans-Alleghany districts, and is not unfamiliar to the people of the eastern division. In a Gazeteer of the State published in 1835 we see an article describing the resources of Western Virginia, and urging the completion of the James River and Kanawha Canal, in which the following paragraph occurs:

"Among the high considerations that so strongly prompt her to the employment of her resources and credit in achieving this great work those of a political character are important. Its connecting influence upon the States themselves, and upon the two great divisions of Virginia, now hanging but loosely together, must be apparent to all; and if the Union is ever destined to crumble, such a line of intercommunication, with the connections and associations to which it must give rise, can not fail to unite in the same destinies the Southern States and those of the great Valley of the Mississippi."

The reasons advanced by the Western Virginians favoring this division are, first, topographical and commercial. They assert that the Alleghany Mountains form a natural boundary and an impassable barrier to all available commercial intercourse between the sections, the Ohio River and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad being the only great lines of trade and travel practicable for the population of the Western counties. Secondly, they ask for divorce on the score of incompatibility of opinion, social, moral, and political. The Western Virginians are practically non-slaveholding, there being not over twelve thousand slaves to a white population of three hundred and thirty thousand in the proposed new State. They are hard-working and thrifty, with the habits, ideas, and modes of living common to the Free States. Their proximity to the free communities of Ohio and Pennsylvania, from whence a portion of their population is immediately derived, has impressed these ideas and opinions upon them, while at the same time it exhibits in striking contrast the progressive prosperity of their neighbors and their own comparative stagnation. They believe that this difference is owing to free labor, on the one hand, and slavery on the other; hence their desire to be relieved of the dead weight which alone prevents their rising to an equality with their neighbors. They complain that for many years the whole policy of the State has been made to centre and turn upon the slaveholding interest to the disadvantage of all others. They denounce the principle of slave representation in the State government, and have made the most determined efforts to break it down, to the end that the political power in the Commonwealth shall be distributed in proportion to the free white population. In brief, the same irrepressible conflict that was waged at Washington between Massachusetts and South Carolina may be distinctly recognized in the sectional jealousy and strife between Eastern and Western Virginia. And in looking to the root of the matter, we may perceive that these antagonisms are of older date and on deeper foundations than the mere accidental jealousies arising from locality or supposed diversity of interests.

Virginia below the Blue Ridge, commonly called Old Virginia, was chiefly settled by English deeply imbued with the dominant prejudices and opinions belonging to the English of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The pride of birth, the inordinate respect for landed estates, deference for the high offices of Church and State, an unconquerable preference for the independence of rural life, the undisguised contempt for the mechanic arts or manual labor of any kind, which characterized a certain class of English in that day and generation, all belong to the Lower Virginian by right of inheritance, not omitting a handsome stock of native ability, courage, and imposing manners.

In the early part of the eighteenth century the high cavalier, Church and State Governor of Virginia, by a wise, but, considering the times, rather surprising act of toleration, encouraged settlements of Scotch-Irish Presbyterians in the Valley of the Shenandoah, which were followed by other dissenters, non-conformists,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and independents, both in politics and religion, from Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and various points in the British Kingdom direct. Among these came a column of Protestant Germans pouring into the Valley from Pennsylvania, settling largely in the counties of Berkeley, Frederick, Shenandoah, and Rockingham, preserving to this day in a great measure their original manners, habits, and language.

Thus we perceive that the two great geographical divisions of Virginia were originally settled by offshoots of the British race, antagonistic in politics, religion, manners, and habits of life, bringing with them the scars of recent civil wars and the bitter memories of mutual hatred and persecution. Time and circumstance did much toward obliterating the traces of these differences, especially in the Valley, where there was a partial intermingling by emigration and intermarriage. But after the great Revolution of 1776, where they fought side by side in a common cause, and joined in establishing a common government based on principles of entire civil and religious liberty, the fusion was to all appearance complete.

The hereditary partisans of political and religious equality had realized in it their most cherished aspirations. The ex-royalist embraced the new system with enthusiasm, and magnanimously sacrificed his ancient idols upon the altar of liberty. All but one. The interests of the lower country were too deeply involved in the question of negro slavery to admit of hasty action, and while its incompatibility with their present professions was very generally acknowledged, its consideration was postponed to a more convenient season. And here was the fatal error which rendered nugatory all which they had achieved and sacrificed in behalf of the great Idea. Where the inequality of man is established by law the fundamental principle of an aristocracy is acknowledged. The mind of the educated Virginian was too logical not to perceive the irreconcilable inconsistency between this institution and his democratic professions, and for a number of years the best men in all parts of the State were sincerely desirous of accomplishing its extinction.

Up to the year 1833 the population west of the Ridge were almost unanimously in favor of abolition; and at that time a distinguished member of the Assembly from Winchester was burned in effigy by his indignant constituents for having voted against a bill providing for the gradual emancipation of the slaves. Meanwhile cotton began to play an important part in the commerce of the world, and in consequence slave property doubled and trebled in value. Popular opinion in one section rose with the market, while in the west the friends of emancipation, disappointed at perceiving the indefinite postponement of their wishes, became more discontented and importunate. The world within their sight and hearing was moving and rejoicing, while they were held in leaden bondage, the victims of a system in whose miserable gains they had no participation, and which effectually debarred them from the greater advantages enjoyed by citizens of the Free States. In this provincial antagonism the ancient lines of the Old World party strife were distinctly visible.

In the Convention for remodeling the State Constitution, held at Richmond in 1850, some of the western and Valley members menaced the lower country with the armed legions of the mountains unless they relaxed their pretentions in the matter of slave representation. In 1859 I heard the probabilities of disunion on the slavery question discussed by certain distinguished Virginians, on which occasion the State was mapped off into reliable and unsound districts with an accuracy which has since proved to have been prophetic. The western counties en masse, the Alleghanies, the Valley of the Shenandoah, and the Potomac border counties of Loudon and Fairfax were denounced as "rotten with abolitionism." I had at the time but a vague idea of the significance of this calculation, when at length these vexed questions culminated in armed rebellion. The Lower Virginian, no longer constrained to harmonize incongruities, or reconcile his sham democracy with existing slavery, followed the lead of his hereditary instincts, and shouldering his black burden, with undisguised satisfaction retrograded several centuries into the dim twilight of traditionary opinion, proclaiming to the nineteenth century that popular government is a failure, political equality a delusion; that the great law of nature is inequality and subordination; that negro slavery is a Divine institution; that the Yankee is a serf, and himself an Anglo-Norman gentleman, and can whip him one to five. The hereditary freeman of the western division showed himself equally true to the spirit and opinions of his ancestors, and rallies as promptly under the flag of the nation to defend his personal rights and the great cause of humanity.

Unfortunately in this, as on other questions, the subtlety and audacity of his adversary has obtained an advantage in the division. Through complications arising from the apparent sectional character of the national quarrel, and a perverted use of the machinery of State government, the Richmond party has succeeded in implicating a large portion of the population in their treason, whose feelings, interests, and antecedents would have led them to side with the nation. This is especially true in regard to the population of the Valley of the Shenandoah, where the masses were almost unanimously loyal, but through fraud and violence are now armed in a cause equally abhorrent to their common sense and hereditary instincts. Their favorite military hero of the present hour is a case in point. "Stonewall Jackson" is a West Virginian by birth, lineage, and education. While there are numerous other notable exceptions to this general view on both sides of the Ridge, it will nevertheless be found to exhibit with approximate correctness the real condi-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tions of the antagonism between Eastern and Western Virginia.

In pursuing our inquiries still further into the adjoining States south we find corroborative and convincing evidence of the reliability of these observations. It is well known that the same stream of emigration which poured from the northward into the fertile valleys and mountain districts of Virginia continued southward, following the valleys and clinging to the mountain slopes of the Alleghanies east and west, populating the western districts of North and South Carolina, Northern Georgia and Alabama, and East Tennessee. These populations have without exception manifested the high spirit of independence and loyalty to free institutions which we see in the Western Virginians. This whole region, as the rebel leaders well understand, is their weakness and danger, and it is fiercely denounced as "the rotten heart of the Confederacy."

Thus are set forth the reasons which, from the earliest settlement of the country, have been tending toward a separation between the great geographical divisions of Virginia, and which have induced the loyal men of the West in the present crisis to demand a separate State organization. Who shall gainsay the justice of their demand? For my own part I favor the division more with a view to national than local advantages. It will create a free and loyal State, wedged in between slaveholding Kentucky and Virginia, and in the rear of slaveholding Maryland, thus securing beyond a peradventure the speedy abolition of slavery in the great Border States. In the second place, it will do much to secure the national cause against the disgrace and ruin of a compromise or an untimely conclusion of the war. Once admitted into the sisterhood of loyal States, West Virginia will never return to her former thralldom while her people can pull a trigger. And once having accepted, the nation can never abandon her, though it may yield all else. On the other hand, I feel equally well assured that rebellious old Virginia will never submit to dismemberment while she can raise a cake of corn-bread and a charge of powder to maintain the contest. This engages us to prosecute the war to a crushing conclusion, the only one compatible with the dignity, safety, and future peace of the country. And now, having considered these local and special questions, we may turn with clearer and more comprehensive understanding to a general view of the great contest.

Here we may see arrayed upon the soil of the New World all the conflicting elements—moral, social, political, and religious—which for so many ages have divided the peoples of Christendom, on the one part battling for the enfranchisement and elevation of the people, on the other for the maintenance of prerogatives, hierarchies, and oppressions. On the side of the nation we find all the sincere and educated Republicanism of this country; those who have accepted in good faith the "self-evident truths" set forth in our Declaration of Independence, who neither desiring nor acknowledging preeminence other than that voluntarily yielded by a free and enlightened people to superior character and achievement—who know of no condition more noble, no title more illustrious than that of an American citizen. We find among them the children and descendants of all those whom oppression and persecution has driven to seek an asylum upon our shores, refugees from the lost battle-fields of freedom of many lands and languages. At the sound of the first gun, even before we clearly understood its significance ourselves, the Liberalism of Europe recognized our cause as its own, and, like the excited spectators in a vast amphitheatre, have risen up with one accord to watch the progress and issue of a conflict so fraught with terrors, doubts, and cherished aspirations.

On the other hand, we see in the ranks of our enemies whatever residuum of ancient despotism in manners, usages, and opinions may have survived the progress of free government in the North, or has been fostered under the shadow of negro slavery in the South. We see in their leaders men corrupted and inflated by too long continuance in place and power until they had begun to consider high office their especial prerogative, and to despise the people who had given it into their hands. Prominent among its friends and sympathizers is that social pretention and its attendant flunkyism which apes the state of decayed aristocracies, and forfeits, by its paltry aspirations, the only true dignity which the citizen of a republic can legitimately claim.

While fortunately there is no Christian sect or denomination which has as a body declared in favor of the hideous programme adopted by the rebellion, we see a numerous clergy supporting it with truculent zeal, circulating pamphlets, instructing their flocks in the propriety of violating oaths of allegiance to the National Government, and claiming, for the cause of licensed oppression, ignorance, and anarchy, the special favor and protection of Divine Providence. We see Right Reverend Major-Generals in the field, recalling the palmiest days of chivalry when sturdy bishops in armor cracked pates alternately with burghers or barons in holy quarrels over lands and revenues—all suggesting a retrospective longing for the days of fat glebes and ecclesiastical establishments. In brief, we see all those elements in State, Church, or society which have exhibited in any manner an itching for domination, prerogative, or the distinctions of caste, siding with the great rebellion against free government.

June 13, Friday.—Fair and warm. On my way to the Paymaster's Office I met Captain B——, who told me Jackson had been reinforced, and having defeated both Shields and Fremont, was again marching down the Valley. As my informant was just from head-quarters I was startled, and, hurrying to the War Office,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google called on the Assistant Secretary to ascertain the truth of the report. I here learned that there had been an indecisive action between Fremont and Jackson, both parties claiming the victory, and that Shields's advanced brigade, under Carroll, not over two thousand strong, had been badly cut up, losing from eight hundred to a thousand men, and seven guns, Jackson still retreating toward the Virginia Central Railroad.

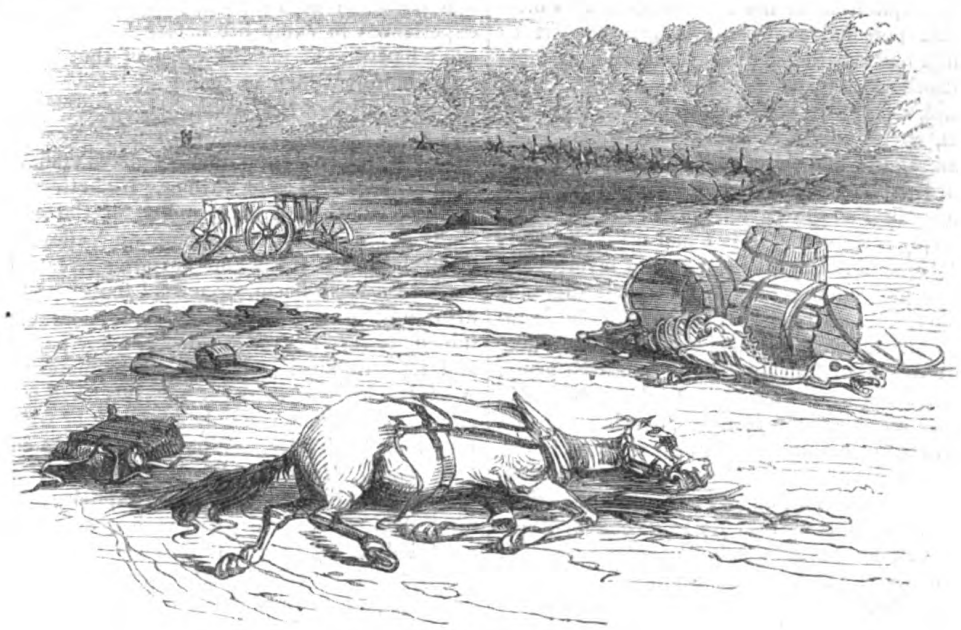
Being fresh from the scene of operations in the Valley I was invited to a private interview with the Secretary of War. In describing the campaign I showed how the division of the Federal forces had enabled Jackson to concentrate all his power and to cut up our scattered commands in detail. While the well-planned strategy of his movements and the simple weight of his columns had secured him all the advantages of victory, yet in the dealings with Banks's column and elsewhere, as far as I knew, our troops had exhibited decided superiority over the enemy in steadiness and discipline, and our officers had shown themselves fully able to cope with their adversaries in the tactical conduct of a battle-field. We had every where met their overwhelming numbers with admirable firmness, and had withdrawn our army, guns, and material with a loss which, under the circumstances, was astonishingly small. At the same time it had appeared to me that the enemy's pursuit was conducted with a degree of caution and feebleness which was entirely unaccountable. He seemed afraid to press his overwhelming advantages to any decisive conclusion, and content, for the most part, to follow as we retired, gathering up the superfluous stuff with which our dépôts were stored and our column overloaded. This weakness was especially manifest in front of Harper's Ferry, where they had Saxton at a great disadvantage, but failed to make any serious attempt upon his lines, manned by raw militia only. Doubtless the remembrance of his terrible mistake at Kernstown, the sanguinary obstinacy of Millroy at M'Dowell, the chivalric devotion of Kenley at Front Royal, and the cool, judiciously calculated audacity of Banks at Winchester, all combined to temper the native ardor of the rebel commander, and caused him to lose many of the secondary fruits of the campaign, which his own admirable strategy and the faulty disposition of the Federals ought to have insured to him.



The Secretary then remarked that more artillery had been called for in the Valley—some four or five batteries, which seemed an inordinate quantity. I replied that, as far as my observations extended, we had relied too much on artillery, and especially on the rifled guns. I thought the prevailing habit of pushing forward the artillery on all occasions, instead of clearing out minor obstacles by a dash of cavalry, or feeling an enemy by an advance of skirmishers, had a tendency to injure the efficiency of both cavalry and infantry. I had observed and commented on the disadvantages of this practice, both on our side and that of the enemy, in our alternate advances and retreats. It kept the decisive arms lying idle, while the long-range guns were carrying on a duel as futile as it was interminable, and enabled a contemptible rear-guard to check the movements of a powerful army at its pleasure.

The Secretary then asked what measures I thought should be adopted to check the enemy's successes. I replied, all I had to say on that subject might be comprised in one word—"Concentration." He said it was evident enough, and had already been determined on. After some agreeable general conversation the interview ended.

In the ante-room I met several distinguished Bureau officers, and the relations between the Governmental Departments and the armies in the field were freely discussed. It was insisted that the Government had furnished the Generals with ample means to have accomplished the ends proposed. It had answered all their requirements with unquestioning liberality, and had allowed them full latitude in the use of their resources. They, however, did nothing for themselves, and seemed to think they could not blow their noses without orders. At their own request, and upon their own representations, discretionary orders were sent them, and when they failed Governmental interference was denounced as the cause. Without undertaking to gainsay these statements it was urged that the manifest and fatal error in our general plan had been the division and subdivision of the military command in Northern Virginia, for which the Government was undoubtedly responsible. How far political necessities might be urged in justification we could not know, but from a military point of view it was indefensible. The conduct of the commanders in the field must be judged from a special standpoint, and according to the circumstances by which they were respectively controlled and surrounded. These criticisms were not dictated by a spirit of caviling, but solely with a view to the public good. The country is young in war, and must foot the bill for its high-priced experience with a good grace. All had lost their tails in the same trap, and, having resolved to avoid it hereafter, our forces could be recuperated by another draft on the illimitable faith and resources of the nation.

Having finished my private business in Washington, I returned by way of Baltimore and Harper's Ferry to Charlestown, and from thence, on horseback, to our head-quarters at Winchester. My ten days of peace, civilization, and strawberries, has had the effect of softening my nature, and as I turned from the Opequan hills into the Winchester road at Mill Creek I looked upon the wrecks of war with loathing. The sight of the dead animals, whitening bones, scattered equipments, and broken vehicles, was less disgusting even than the living débris of filthy stragglers, thieving horsemen, and trad-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ROAD TO WINCHESTER.

ing wagons laden with all the shams and counterfeits of food and clothing invented to cheat the poor soldiers.

At head-quarters I was glad to meet my old friends of the division; but every body seemed more or less out of humor, and the general situation decidedly chaotic. Shields is at Front Royal, and Fremont at Woodstock—both divisions said to be sadly disorganized, the officers accusing each other and the troops plundering. Our Union friends have been greatly disconcerted by late events, and seem to have lost all faith in us. Our rebel fellow-citizens, who, won over by the blandishments of Yankee greenbacks and store-goods, had become so hopefully modified in their sentiments and feelings, have had the "sacred fire" rekindled in their hearts, and are now fuming and stewing more than ever. They live in daily and hourly expectancy of Jackson's return, and the slightest movement of our troops or trains is watched with intense anxiety. On Friday, June 20, Banks's command was moved up to Strasburg. As the head-quarter baggage-train passed down the cross street I observed various knots of men on the corners, and women peeping from doors and windows, in a state of the greatest excitement. They were persuaded that it meant another stampede. Rebel faces were beaming with hope, while the loyal were white with terror. When, at the turning, the train took the Strasburg road, "Hope for a season" retired in disgust, and the negroes grinned.

Ashby is certainly dead, having fallen in a skirmish near Harrisonburg, in which the Pennsylvania Bucktails were engaged on our side. The Valley rebels can not make up their minds to believe it, for they regard him as the right arm of their cause. I have always considered him more of a knight-errant than a soldier, and imagine he owes his exaggerated reputation rather to his personal popularity than his military exploits. In the fall of 1861, at the head of fifteen hundred men and three guns, he moved on Harper's Ferry, for the purpose of taking possession of a large quantity of wheat stored in Kerr's Mills, at that place. Colonel Geary, of Pennsylvania, crossed the river with four hundred and fifty men, supported by one gun, and with trifling loss drove Ashby entirely out of the field, capturing one of his guns and routing his command. In the recent affair at Buckton Station he met a bloody repulse from a very small force, and in the retreat the only cavalry we felt was the Second and Sixth Virginia Regiments, Ashby's undisciplined followers being chiefly occupied in pillaging knapsacks and sutlers' wagons. He was, however, complimented and promoted for good conduct in covering the retreat of Jackson's column on several occasions, and distinguished at all times for personal gallantry. His appearance I have described in former chapters—rather below the medium height, light but vigorous frame, with very dark complexion and a heavy black beard. His countenance was saturnine, his manners courteous but reserved, his bearing knightly. A superb horseman, expert in the use of arms, and delighting in personal adventure, he had all the essential characteristics of a popular hero; and the gloomy grief into which he was plunged by the death of his brother (killed near Romney in the beginning of the war) served still more to increase the romantic interest with which the popular imagination had invested his character. The Valley rebels, in spite of his military misadventures, regarded him with unbounded admiration, circulating and believing

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google with implicit faith the most marvelous stories of his personal prowess, the greater part of which had not the slightest foundation in fact; and others so extravagantly exaggerated, that Hatch's Cavalry, who had daily dealings with him, could not have recognized them. The most reliable and significant compliment I have heard paid to Ashby's character was from the head-waiter at the Taylor Hotel in Winchester. In reply to some inquiries I had made, he said:

"General Ashby was a universal favorite and a true gentleman; he was sober and dignified always, kind and considerate toward the humblest servant, generous as he was brave. There were not many like him in the Southern army. The officers were often hard drinkers, vulgar in speech and coarse in manners, overbearing and insulting to servants and inferiors. You know, Sir, we servants have the best opportunities of observing and judging. People don't hide their natures from us as they do from one another. We knew he was fighting against our cause and our freedom, but we all liked and admired General Ashby."

This simple and sincere testimony of the slave is, to my mind, worth more than all the overstrained, hate-inspired laudation of him that I have heard since I entered the Valley.

On the way to Strasburg I overtook General Banks traveling in his ambulance, and being invited to join him, gave my horse to an orderly and made the remainder of the journey in the carriage. Approaching Middletown we saw two sentinels posted at the gate of a country house, and, on inquiry, ascertained it was the head-quarters of General Sigel.

General Banks called to pay his respects, and while these two talked together a third Major-General joined them. He was a man of middle age, medium stature, with quiet and rather engaging manners. I was introduced to General Fremont. During the few minutes that he was engaged in conversation I observed the great Path-Finder narrowly. His features were good but much weather-beaten, indicating familiarity with hardships. His beard was short, thin, and grizzled; his eyes keen and alert in their motions, but remarkably close together, which, according to Gall and Spurzheim is accounted a defect. I was, nevertheless, agreeably impressed with the general effect of his appearance and deportment.

When the conference closed we remounted, and in due time reached our head-quarters, near Middletown. The camp was beautifully located on the green-sward in the edge of a park-like forest; the evening air was delicious, and the twilight view from my tent-door charming beyond description.

On the following morning I was dispatched to Harper's Ferry on some military business, and returned to Middletown on the 23d, finding our camp changed to a locality more pleasant even than the former one. Here I found my tent ready, and neatly furnished, through the care and ingenuity of my faithful boy John. My experiences in camp life before I entered the army had taught me the value of that wealth and comfort which is found in "poverty of wants." My bed roll, trunk, horse-equipments, and arms, constituted my whole property in the field. I preferred spreading my couch upon the ground, because I slept warmer. No better seat was needed than a rock, a log, or the ever-ready sward. In the Shenandoah Valley one never lacked a fresh and gurgling stream to serve as a wash-basin, or a cool fountain as a drinking-cup. A small compact trunk contained my very limited wardrobe, army papers, and topographical instruments and materials. Adolph, our Staff mess caterer, furnished food and French coffee, the only stimulant of which I partook habitually. What more does a soldier want? Indeed, old campaigners often complimented me on this wise simplicity; but my "Squire," it seems, was both grieved and mortified at my unostentatious establishment. In my absence he had, with boards, nails, and rustic stakes, constructed a neat bunk for my bed, a table, and wash-stand, duly furnished with a tin wash-basin, water-pitcher, and drinking-cup. My extra cavalry boots were greased and a camp-stool placed beside the table.

"What does all this mean?" I exclaimed. "Whose tent is this?"

John bowed in meekness and confusion: "This is your tent, Captain. I thought I would fix you up a little comfortable."

"Where did you get the camp bedstead, tables, and stand?"

"I made them, Sir."

"And the basin, pitcher, and all that?"

"I bought them from the sutler, Sir."

"And the camp-stool? You didn't manufacture that?"

"I borrowed that from Major Perkins. I hope you'll find it all agreeable, Captain?"

John looked a little dashed and nervous.

"Certainly," I answered. "It is superb; I shall enjoy it immensely."

June 24, Tuesday.—We had a heavy thunder-shower last night, and when I awoke it still rained. I slept soundly on my board bed, scarce conscious of the change from the luxurious mattress on which I rested the previous night; but when my eyes wandered over the mildewed canvas that roofed my dwelling, wet and dotted with spiders of all forms and sizes; the carpet of trampled grass, weeds, and sticks; the weather-beaten garments festooned on the picket-rope stretched between the tent-poles; the pistols, spurs, and sabre that lay upon the rough table, I could not repress a sigh for the springy sofas, the velvet carpets, the lace and damask curtained chambers of peace.

Outside the picture was equally disheartening. There was an area of wet grass and dripping trees. A semicircle of closed tents: no one was up. Beyond were groups of lonesome-looking horses, nibbling the grass or barking the trees to which they were tied. Solitary

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google sentinels, wrapped in their over-coats crouching like bedraggled roosters under the bushes, or walking their sloppy beats with arms secured. Asthmatic horns and muffled drums attempting the réveille in distant camps; and near at hand the grunting of an adventurous pig, attracted by the pickings, and already doomed to death by the watchful eye of the Zouave sentinel as soon as he is relieved.

The dreary scene only recalls, in more vivid colors, another antithetical picture. The fragrant roses in full bloom, the luscious strawberry-beds, the petted dogs, the cheerful children, the affectionate friends I have so recently taken leave of. But there is a smoke rising from Adolph's kitchen tent, let us see what comforts we may glean from the present hour.

Aha! a cup of café noir, strong as laudanum, a real eye-opener, a cobweb sweeper; how soon it develops the romance of our present life and surroundings. If I must follow the trade of war, give me the tented field and wild bivouac fire always in preference to town-quarters in dismantled houses and degraded taverns.

The General is making strenuous, but, I fear, unavailing efforts to check the abominable horse-thieving that is going on in this Valley behind our lines. It is practiced most extensively, it seems, by persons hanging on to the army, frequently having no employment or connection with the service. The troops get all the odium while the rogues carry off the plunder in their name. It is thought that fifteen hundred horses have been thus illegitimately run off beyond the Potomac.

It was in anticipation of this very state of things that I have from the commencement favored the plan of subsisting the army on the country, of seizing by authority all the provisions, forage, and animals that could be taken without starving the inhabitants, and appropriating these supplies to the maintenance of our troops; paying cash in hand to all citizens of well-established loyalty, and giving to others a certificate entitling them to payment at the end of the war, upon their furnishing satisfactory proof of loyalty from the date of certificate. At the same time adopt the most rigorous and summary measures for the suppression of illegitimate plundering. By this plan we would improve and maintain the discipline and efficiency of our troops. The rich resources of this region would contribute to the support of the National armies, and the enemy to that extent be deprived of their use. The inhabitants would be bound by their interest to the maintenance of their loyalty, or at least to scrupulous abstinence from disloyal practices. The land-sharks and bummers would find less opportunity and encouragement to continue their wasteful, irritating, and disgraceful robberies. This plan looks very well on paper; but, after all, if we must have civil wars, I doubt whether any plan can be devised to avoid, or even ameliorate, their inevitable accompaniments of rapine, outrage, and suffering. These evils must find their solution and limit in the general character and civilization of the nation.

June 25, Wednesday.—Clear and cold after a blustering night. We have various and startling rumors of the whereabout and intentions of the enemy. Jackson is reinforced, and about attacking us; Ewell is marching on New Creek with ten thousand men. As I have suffered somewhat by my incredulity heretofore, I am not disposed to dogmatize concerning these reports; but I don't believe any of them for all that. Meanwhile we are in a most unsatisfactory condition. We have four armies in the Valley, with four major-generals, fifteen brigadiers, one hundred and twenty pieces of artillery, and not over twenty thousand fighting men all told.

We are lying here awaiting an attack apparently—a most discouraging and ruinous policy. We should be active, and rather initiate the attack. General Crawford, who occupies Front Royal with his brigade, reports a reconnoissance through Milford on the Luray road, and thence across the ridge through Little Washington and Sperryville, meeting no enemy but the Luray road guarded by strong pickets.

June 26, Thursday.—Fair and temperate. Crawford does not believe the enemy holds Luray with any considerable force, and desires permission to break through their picket lines in that direction. We have no authentic information of the enemy from any quarter. This silence is always ominous. Affairs have nearly reached a crisis before Richmond, and we may expect startling news of some sort before long.

June 27, Friday.—Fair and warm. To-day we have tidings that General Pope has been appointed to chief command in Northern Virginia. I know nothing of the merits of this new commander, but thank God that the military anarchy heretofore existing is about to end.

I hear a good deal of indignation expressed by staff officers of the different Generals supposed to be aggrieved by this order. One asked the direct question, if I did not think General Banks should and would resign rather than submit to the indignity of serving under a junior officer. I replied emphatically that, in my opinion, he should not, and, if I had rightly estimated his character, he would not; but, if necessary, would rather shoulder his musket and march a private in the ranks than abandon the cause of his country in the hour of her greatest need. The nation has its Argus eyes upon its servants and defenders, and will jealously discriminate between the patriotism which is self-seeking and that which is sincere; and, mark my words, the man who, having girded on the sword, now falters or turns back—who leaves the field from personal pique, or shows that he estimates the dignity of his shoulder-knots above the nation's welfare—that man had better have been born a Copperhead, for he will

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google sink into oblivion so deep that it will be forgotten that he ever lived.

After tea the General and Staff rode over to Fremont's quarters. These we found established in the Hite House, near Cedar Creek—an old manorial mansion of quaint and characteristic design, built of cut limestone, I believe, by one of the first settlers of the Valley. The Generals conferred together in private, while the officers discussed affairs in the halls and porches. From hence we rode to Sigel's quarters; and, after a brief sojourn, returned to camp and to bed.

June 28, Saturday.—Fair and hot. I had risen early this morning, as was my wont, sipped my coffee, and walked to and fro in front of my tent, enjoying the most delicious hours of the day. Presently I saw what I took to be a regiment of cavalry turn from the turnpike into the road which led to our camp. As the column approached I recognized General Fremont at the head of his Staff. He halted, and, with a number of his chief officers, dismounted opposite General Banks's tent. Being the only officer afoot, I went forward to receive him, and then hurried to inform our General of his arrival. He had just risen, and presently came out to meet his distinguished visitor. Fremont wore his usual uniform and a white slouched hat. Many of his Staff indulged in greater luxury of apparel, and shone with gold lace, ribbons, medals, and crosses. Fremont had requested to be relieved of command, and his request had been granted. He came simply to pay his respects and take leave. As the Generals conversed the morning sun lit up the scene with his earliest rays, twinkling and flashing among the arms and trappings of the martial assembly.

In a few moments General Fremont remounted, and, with a graceful parting salute, resumed his journey down the Valley, followed by his long retinue in double files. As the cavalcade disappeared among the rolling hills I turned to the friend with whom I had discoursed on the previous evening, and prophesied: "There sets a star which will never rise again."

JOSEPHINE.

YEARS ago there stood near St. John's Park a tall brick house, with a high stoop, a great brass door-plate, and a heavy knocker. It had a breadth and roominess denied in these days to any thing but a "palace;" trees shaded its strip of sidewalk, and its outlook was into the very heart of the Park greenery. From the front windows you could see the nicely-kept turf, the pretty fan-tail pigeons coquetting about the walks, and old Cisco, the sable genius of the place, pursuing his tutelary labors. The house stands there yet, perhaps, but its air, its dignity, have passed away. At the time of which I write the neighborhood was of the first respectability; the haute volée had indeed winged their flight up town, but substantial families still dwelt under their own roofs around St. John's; still took their airings in its bounds, and looked with comfortable exclusiveness through its rails at locked-out passers-by.

One May afternoon a party of three issued from the tall brick house—Katharine Courtenay, with her sisters Mary and Josephine. Every thing about them harmonized with the season; no tint of hair or cheek refused to blend; they had but put on fresh garb to be at one with Nature. Spring is the time for young people; its fitful grace, its loveliness bearing ever the promise of greater loveliness to come, are all for them. To us who are older, Autumn speaks, its swift splendors telling of decay, even at their height. For youth, the buds that prison summer's glory; for us, the boughs that shall be leafless soon.

Of such a time the girls had no foreboding; they loitered about the paths enjoying the soft air, the pale sunshine, the brightening verdure. They talked of their last May in the country; of woods where spring-beauties carpeted the earth with delicate blossom, and every little hollow was fair with groups of up-springing anemone; where tall hemlocks lifted their heads into the sky, and the soft lapse of waters made the whole air drowsy.

"Do you remember the beds of adder-tongue, like plots of sunshine?" asked Katharine.

"Yes; and the strange, spotted leaf that had such a look of guilt and mystery. I used to wish I were Mr. Hawthorne to write a story from it," said Mary.

"And the vine with its dark, glossy leaves and scarlet berries"—here Josephine took up the word—"I wished for it to dress the church at Christmas. And those white flowers of the wake-robin that were so like a lily, how beautiful they would be upon the altar!"

"Never mind the altar now," said Mary, with a shadow of impatience repeated the next minute and atoned for by-and-by.

So, the life of the city surging round, they talked of those far, quiet scenes till the influence of spring days stole over them; that feeling, too ethereal for us to call it sadness; that light haze, as it were, over our joy in the surrounding beauty.

Josephine was the first to arouse from it. "Half past four!" she exclaimed, looking at her watch. "I must go."

"Why?" said Katharine. "It is early."

"You forget that this is the Month of Mary."

"Victor is coming to tea," said Katharine, indolently.

"That happens often, doesn't it? And the service will be over before tea-time."

"Well—but it is so pleasant here—and there's no obligation, you know."

—"If you look at it in that way. Will you come, Mary?"

Mary did not care much to stay longer; besides she felt guilty of the few words just before. So they went home for their prayer-books.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

There is a vast difference in prayer-books. Mary's was nothing but a vade-mecum of small size, containing the ordinary offices. But Josephine's was a ponderous Roman Missal, richly bound, and held every form of service known to the Church. Devotional pictures marked it here and there, and the emblem of salvation was blazoned on either cover. As she walked slowly along the street, her eyes cast down, the gilt cross gleaming through the transparent folds of her handkerchief, all who met her must recognize a devout young Catholic maiden.

It was twilight in the church ere the office ended, though day yet lingered without. Beautiful was the blooming shrine whence the lights gleamed upward on the face of the Virgin Mother with the Hope of the World cradled in her arms. The perfume of flowers mingled with frankincense and myrrh, the heavenly voices of the choir echoed through the darkening aisles. Mary, good Catholic as she was, had seen through it all that Mrs. M'Bride wore her second bonnet instead of that lovely one she came out with on Easter Sunday, and thought how unbecoming apple-green was to Julia Depau's complexion. But Josephine gave no heed to such vanities; her heart swelled within her, a divine exaltation bore her from earth, and she was only recalled by the close of the service and the departure of the worshipers.

The house was aglow with light when the girls reached home, and the family were at tea. Mrs. Courtenay sat behind the urn dispensing the fragrant beverage to her husband and their numerous olive-branches. A life of ample means and quiet heart, unfettered by striving after fashionable display, had left her a handsome woman at the close of five-and-forty years.

"What kept you so late?" she asked, as the two came in.

"Josephine wanted to stop at the French church, mamma, to see the Sepulchre in the Rock; they have left it there from Holy Week."

"Don't you hate French piety?" said Victor to Katharine, at whose side she sat. "Its cut-paper and artificial flowers are enough to drive one straight to Voltaire. No wonder all French men are skeptical; you ladies, I suppose, delight in these little prettinesses."

Katharine smiled; Josephine was shocked. "We must let people manifest their devotion as they will," said Mrs. Courtenay. "Different nations will carry their characteristics with them even into their religion. We Americans can not, perhaps, enter with sympathy into all the observances of foreigners, but we can at least respect the faith that prompts them. I am talking as if you were one of us, Victor," she added; "and, indeed, I think you are by right a Catholic."

"I am afraid no church would consider me a great acquisition, Aunt Agnes," responded the young man—and turned the conversation to another theme.

Tea over, they adjourned to the front parlor. There are no rooms of that sort left in New York now, fashion and luxury have been fatal to them. It had neither rosewood doors nor Aubusson carpet, and the chair-covers were not even brocatelle. But it was large and lofty, and pictures hung upon the walls; the furniture was dark and solid, more for service than for show; hyacinths blossomed in their glasses on the mantle, there was a pleasant litter of books and magazines about the tables. Not many elegances or bits of virtu could be seen; nothing was too delicate or costly to be used; it was a room where people lived and enjoyed life every day, not one to which they were summoned when the door-bell rang. What friendly morning calls were made there, on what cheerful evenings the plain chandeliers looked down! No special effort was made to entertain the guests; the natural good spirits and kind feeling of the household simply formed an atmosphere in which every one was at ease.

To-night Miss Thieriot and her brother came in; the card-tables were drawn out and whist proposed.

"Will you play, Josephine?" asked Katharine, aside.

"Not unless I am needed; I had rather work on my stole."

"There will be enough without you. Victor and Miss Thieriot, her brother and Mary. John and I can play chess or watch the others. Don't try your eyes too much with that close work."

The players took their seats and Josephine began her pious labors. There was a good deal of jesting over the cards, pretended exultation on the one hand, little groans of despair from the unsuccessful. Victor was in high spirits and great fortune; and how bright Miss Thieriot seemed! No wonder, thought Josephine. It was always pleasant to be Victor's partner; he played so well that you were sure to win; or if you lost it was still pleasant. John and Katharine had postponed their chess and were watching the game. Katharine sat near Victor, who showed her his hand at every fresh deal; she looked the cards over, and nods and glances passed between them.

"Do you call this quite fair?" said Alfred Thieriot to Mary. "We are working two against three."

"Never mind," she responded, laughingly. "Victor plays a great deal better than Katharine, her advice will probably be to our advantage."

Of course, Josephine was sure of that. But how handsome Katharine looked to-night! She was a magnificent girl, her style ample, luxuriant, with great dark eyes, melancholy in repose but lighting up to splendor when she smiled. And she smiled often on Victor. Josephine saw, or fancied that she saw, a new meaning in their manner to each other. There must always be a moment, more or less defined, when the careless heart of childhood is invaded by a sense of deeper things. The moment came to her now. She grew lonely over her velvet

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and gold thread; it seemed as if she were set aside and forgotten. She longed to lay down her work and go forward to the table, to have her share in the jesting and companionship. A week ago she would have done it without hesitation, or had she tarried would have felt a virtuous superiority to such trifling. Now a reserve, hitherto unknown, held her back and left her without compensation. She turned resolutely from the group and gave herself with renewed zeal to her embroidery.

The game was finished. "Will you take my place, John?" asked Victor of his cousin. "I shall retire on my laurels."

He sauntered to Josephine's table. She felt his coming in every nerve, but she looked steadily at her needle.

"What a little recluse you are, off here in your corner!" he said. "A saint in her niche. Sancta Josephina, ora pro nobis!"

She shook her head reprovingly at the words. "Now you are shocked! However, I think I see a smile breaking through the holy sternness. Pray what is the meaning of these hermit airs? Why do you forsake us with such scorn?"

"I wanted to get on with my work," she answered, concisely, "and I did not suppose I should be missed among so many."

"As if I should not always miss you, no matter how many there were. What are you making? A pair of braces for me?"

"Indeed no!" she replied, with assumed indignation. "It is a stole for Father Verheyden."

"That is the stout old gentleman, I think, who sometimes officiates at St. Vincent de Paul. Josie, I am terribly jealous of Father Verheyden. I suppose I might beg a week for a pair of slippers, and here you lavish yard after yard of velvet on those broad shoulders of his."

"Oh, Victor! will you never learn a little reverence?"

"My education has been so neglected in that line. But I'll try—if you will be my teacher."

Josephine felt the color rising to her cheeks at the glance that accompanied these words.

"Shall I read to you a while?" he continued. "Or are you tired? Would you like to join them at cards?"

"No, I am not tired. You may read if it is not too much trouble." He took up a volume of Byron that lay near and began,

> "'The lamp must be replenished, but even then
> It will not burn so long as I must watch.'"

He read well, and was not averse to a display of the accomplishment, nor is seventeen a severe critic when it is a dear voice that speaks. As, turning the pages, he gave here and there a scene, the thrilling tones more than the verse perhaps absorbed the young girl's attention, her work slid from her hands, she listened with fixed attitude and earnest gaze.

"'One word for mercy! Say thou lovest me!'" pronounced Victor, with despairing intensity; and his eyes met Josephine's. He had been carried away by the passion of the poem and his own dramatic fervor; his cousin had for the moment represented Astarté to his mind. If she had understood this, he thought, if he could have explained it to her, she would not have colored so deeply. As it was, perhaps he had gone a little too far.

"I am wearying you," he said, laying down the book and pretending to repress a yawn. "It is stupid business this reading poetry; I ought to have chosen something livelier." He walked slowly away while Josephine remained overcome by chagrin. She had been so happy, she had forgotten even the presence of the others; and while she felt thus Victor had found the reading stupid. She did not know how his heart throbbed as he moved so carelessly about the room, how he saw every where before him the listening face, the gaze of innocent devotion. Lacking such knowledge, the rest of the evening was like a painful dream, and she went to rest with a heavy heart.

She awoke next morning abashed at her folly, yet reassured. In the calm prosaic daylight it was difficult to credit the reality of those exaggerated feelings. It was all a mistake, a passing fancy. Victor was her cousin, just as he was John's or Mary's. She liked him, as they did, only she feared that hers was perhaps a jealous disposition. She remembered crying bitterly, years ago, because one of her brothers, in some childish game, chose her less often than he did the other girls. Here was a fault to be atoned for and prayed against.

Victor had staid all night, and they would meet at breakfast. Therefore she was rigorous with herself, and gave less care than usual to her toilet. Yet, only that such thoughts were sinful, she would have wished that the face reflected in her mirror were more like Katharine's. Josephine was the least pretty of the girls. Her figure was too small and slight; the irregularity of her features would have been conspicuous but that they were so delicate. Still nobody had ever called her plain; her sweet eyes, beautiful complexion, and graceful manner forbade the verdict.

Certainly Victor did not think her plain as she came into the breakfast-room. With a half-glance—for he would not look—he saw her girlish charms: the sea-shell tints, the slim fairness of her hands, the soft contrasts of hair and brow. No, he would not look; he was determined. He had other things to think of than such nonsense. Poor and in debt, loving ease and loving luxuries, he was not going to put a climax to his fate by loving one of his cousins too. They were nice girls, all of them, and the house a delightful one to visit; but not one of them should tempt him. Not Katharine's gorgeousness, nor Mary's bright and glancing beauty; resistance was easy enough so far, since neither of these had ever tempted him; no, nor even dear little Josie's shy and tender ways. What was the child thinking of last night? he wondered. Was that blush a mere chance, or had the graceless cousin un-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

wittingly gained a lodgment in her heart? Pshaw! here he was wandering off into danger again. He began to talk vigorously with Aunt Agnes of Turkish and Parisian coffee, each of which he had tried in its own locality.

Josephine had soon a little struggle with herself. There was a service of some sort, I know not what, and she would not neglect it, hard as it was to leave the cheerful group. Her self-denial had a speedy reward. Coming down stairs, bonneted and shawled, she found Victor awaiting her in the hall.

"We may as well have each other's company as far as our way lies together," he said.

"But I go up town, you know."

He hesitated a moment; then inclination triumphed.

"Very well. I will go too. Business will not suffer by half an hour's delay."

They walked on. Victor, angry at his own want of self-control, would talk of no themes but the most commonplace. Josephine, all ignorant of his feelings, was happy enough in having him beside her. The fresh air, the sunshine, the roar of the great city awaking to its daily life, stirred and revived her spirit; all these morning influences blent imperceptibly with her gladness. The walk was too short; she was sorry to see the door of the church.

"Will you not come in?" she asked.

"Not to-day, thank you. You must be devotional for both of us. Good-by." He was going down the steps, but turned. "And mind, Josie," he said, taking her hand one instant in his own, "that you are not carried off in a holy ecstasy, for I should not like to lose you."

If the words were trifling his eyes were earnest. Josephine went in, blessed yet bewildered. She passed the basin of holy water without remembering to cross herself, and had to turn back half-way up the aisle. In the sacred place she strove to banish earthly feeling, but the young love tinged every thought, mingled with every aspiration.

As for Victor he could have stamped with vexation. "Am I more fool or knave?" he asked himself. "But this is the end—the very last of it."

Josephine foreboded no such sudden finis. The volume was but opened; she had just begun to turn its eloquent leaves; dreaming over the story of to-day she beholds new enchantments in the pages yet unread. Should we not warn her? Shut up the book, child. It is a silly tale, worn out and vapid. Or were it beautiful and wondrous, as you say, it belongs to some one else; it is not meant for you.

The day's happiness was unclouded; in her content of heart the girl marveled at the restless trouble of the previous night. She did not think of love; she only felt how kind was Victor, how pleasant every thing became when he was near. There was a shade of disappointment when he did not come that evening, nor the next.

The third night it rained in torrents; it was useless to expect him. Having said this to herself she listened to every step upon the pavement, hoping that it might be his. Eight o'clock by the little time-piece on the mantle; but then that always is too fast; and nine even would not be very late. Her father read his newspaper by the drop-light. Mrs. Courtenay was busied with some master-piece of fancy knitting. Katharine sat at the piano and sung from "Norma." How mournful her voice sounded! The long swells, the lingering cadences, seemed a farewell to Hope.

Suddenly the door-bell pealed above the singing. Every one paused and looked up.

"Who can that be this rainy night?" said Katharine.

"John, I presume," said Mary. "He is always forgetting his latch-key."

Josephine made no such tame conjectures; her heart leaped to the hope that he had come. There was a brief, sharp pause of doubt while he took off his wrappings in the hall; then the door opened and the world grew bright again; but not for long.

"Don't let me interrupt your music," he said, going to the piano when the first greetings were over. "'Norma!' How I wish you could hear it as I have done, with Grisi for prima donna! But they say we shall actually have the Opera in New York next winter; at least some friends of mine, who know about these things, assure me that the attempt will be made."

"If it only would succeed!" said Katharine, warmly. "I would give any thing to hear an Opera! But we have always been told that it was too costly an enterprise for this country."

"I don't see why. We have a good deal of wealth and taste; we lack culture, but that comes with time, if indeed it is necessary in this case. Half the people, knowing the thing is fashionable and patronized abroad, will flock to it if they do not understand a note. Come, songstress, begin your melodies. What will you give us? Casta Diva?"

"I am not so presumptuous. But you should hear Miss Haydon sing it."

"She has a wonderful voice, even now," said Victor.

"Yes, indeed. When Malibran was in this country—when she was Garcia—she and Miss Haydon were intimate. Malibran used to say that Miss Haydon's voice was better than her own by nature; that with equal cultivation she would have been the greater singer."

"She had enough of cultivation herself, poor thing!" said Mrs. Courtenay. "Garcia was a cruel tyrant; he stood over her with a whip while she practiced, and if any thing went wrong he did not spare her. You needn't look incredulous; it is true. She led a life of public splendor and private wretchedness. How well I remember her eyes! They were the saddest I ever saw in any face."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Begin, our Malibran," said Victor, turning to a favorite air. Katharine was in excellent voice; she sang without apparent effort, and there was a power, a softness in her tones, rare and delicious. Why did skill in music suddenly become to Josephine the one great and desirable attainment? Her own voice, a sweet, slim little pipe, had not been thought worth cultivating; she sang sometimes, but as a child does, careless of effect; nor had it once occurred to her that pains-taking and study were worth while in her own case, familiar as they were in Katharine's. Now she pondered the possibility of patient labor and great achievements by-and-by; something that Victor could praise as he was praising her sister. When he called for song after song, and hung entranced upon the notes, that new, strange trouble came upon the young girl; combat it as she would it still prevailed.

"I am tired," said Katharine, at last, "and I dare say the audience sympathizes with me." She left the piano and walked about the room, a little excited by the music and the images of beauty it evoked; perhaps, too, a little elated by consciousness of her own powers.

Victor watched her admiringly. "You would be a splendid Norma," he said; "of the real Grisi style. And we haven't even a bouquet for you after the feast you have given us."

He crossed to the mantle, and breaking a creamy hyacinth from its stem, placed it in Katharine's raven braids.

"A stolen tribute!" she laughed. "The hyacinths belong to Josie."

"Ah?" he said, carelessly. "I will send one to-morrow to replace it."

Josephine was amazed at the storm of feeling that swept over her at this simple act. It seemed the crown of all the evening's cruelties. Was it not enough that she had sat unheeded, longing for a word or look, while all was lavished on another? Must even her poor blossoms go, plucked by his hand, to adorn that rival? Escaping to her own room she tried to still the tumult. Grief and jealousy thrilled and tormented her by turns. Frightened at her own emotions, she fell on her knees, beseeching a higher aid to exorcise this evil spirit.

The little room had been a sanctuary hitherto; the other girls smiled sometimes, half kindly, half amused, at its religious character. The numerous pictures were all devotional; the Sacred Heart of Jesus, the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, and many another well-known subject; over one arm of the large crucifix hung a rosary, ebon and gold, blessed by the Holy Father himself. In this haven had Josephine found refuge from the slight troubles that disturbed her tranquil life; here had been always peace and consolation. Now she gazed long upon the Mater Dolorosa; that image of holy sorrow rebuked but did not still her own selfish grief. She looked at the Marriage of St. Catherine, remembering how often she had dreamed of giving herself one day to the same Mystic Bridegroom. Unworthy aspirant! caught so soon in the meshes of an earthly passion!

The promised flowers came next morning, not hyacinths alone, but balmy heliotrope and blue, pathetic violets, and roses, their fair, odorous petals tinged with a faint bloom. Clustered in an alabaster vase they made a poem eloquent of May.

Josephine began her penance. Just glancing at them, enough to feel their beauty, she devoted them to her atoning purpose. Katharine was going out that evening; when her toilet was nearly finished her sister came into the room.

"Here is your bouquet," she said, holding out the handful of beauty and fragrance. "Sit still while I fasten these roses in your hair; I have saved the prettiest for that."

"Oh, thank you!" exclaimed Katharine; "but it is a shame to rob you so."

"They would be faded in a day or two, at any rate;" and she secured the roses in their place. Katharine was gone a minute later, the flowers with her. How Josephine would have loved to hang over them, study their beauty, drink in their odor; when they were faded, to keep their sere remains among her treasures! They had served a better use, she thought.

Days grew into weeks. Josephine was often absent from the evening circle. "What a little saint it is!" thought Mary, knowing how those hours were spent which the rest of them gave up to gayety. The father was disquieted.

"I don't like this excessive devotedness," he said to his wife. "I wish she cared for the natural pleasures of her age instead."

"I see what you are afraid of," returned Mrs. Courtenay. "Josephine has always been different from other girls; from her earliest childhood she delighted in those acts of piety which to most people are unwelcome duties. Still I am not alarmed, though I should be as sorry as you for any such result. I don't want any nuns or priests in the family. I hope my children will get to heaven in some easier way."

"But suppose she should have a true vocation?"

"It would be sacrilege to oppose her then, of course; but I don't think it will prove so. Romantic girls have often a fancy for a convent; I had myself when I was young."

"You, Agnes!"

"To be sure. And here are my husband and seven children in spite of it. Doesn't that encourage you? Let the child meet some one she can like, and this romance will take an earthly turn. She will give up a few masses and confessions, and settle down into a good wife and mother."

Those who loved her best knew little of her. If Josephine thought sometimes of a convent it was no longer because her soul aspired to an entirer consecration—it only seemed a possible refuge from her griefs. Her accustomed peace had fled. Often the sound of music or of laugh-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ter broke on her retirement, often she found herself pausing in her prayers to listen for the dearest voice. Then she longed to go down and taste life with the rest; the room seemed so lonely, a cell, a burial-place. If she yielded all her sweets were dashed with bitter; there was the spectacle, wearily-familiar, yet ever freshly painful, of Victor's devotion, Katharine's graciousness. Or did it fail, did she fancy for a moment that she had been mistaken, that he did not love her sister, his indifference to herself was yet more certain. Only at times.

This was the worst. Would Victor but have left her alone, had she convinced herself that she was nothing to him, pride and delicacy would have aided her. But this he would not do. Resolutely prudent, he had no thought of marrying for love; he looked forward to far other nuptials where an ample fortune and a willing bride awaited him. Meanwhile, if Josephine appeared preoccupied or distant, if any thing, however slight, led him to imagine that his power grew weaker, love or vanity awoke. Gentle words and acts of tender meaning made her restless, hopeful, till the next interview brought fresh disappointment and fresh misery. Foolish child! wasting the brightness of youth upon this tinsel dream! Poor heart! to which dark eyes and gayety and grace represented all that was noble or desirable in life.

She bore it till she could bear no longer. She must escape, must go away from this constant trial and temptation.

"Mamma," she said, when they were alone one day, "there is something I wish so much to do. I hope you will not refuse permission."

"Something reasonable, I trust."

"May I spend a few weeks at the Sacred Heart? It will do me good, I am sure, and the Sisters will be glad to have me. Sister Constance used to say I would come back to them."

The mother was startled and looked grave.

"You know a retreat is not unusual," continued Josephine, pleadingly. "It is very common before confirmation, and many people make one in their own homes from time to time."

"Can not you do so, too?"

"Our family is so large, mamma; we have so many comers and goers. There every thing is arranged for quiet and seclusion. Do consent."

"I can not till I have seen your father."

Mr. Courtenay shook his head at the proposal; it seemed to him that his fears were hurrying to fulfillment. His wife, after a little, thought it wisest to indulge the fancy—a brief experience of recluse life might be the best cure for any penchant toward it. With some misgivings he yielded to her views, and Josephine received the consent she so desired. Victor, inquiring for her at his next visit, learned whither she had gone. The news filled him with disquiet. What if this absence foreboded a perpetual one? and what would life be like if her share in it were finally and forever withdrawn? Our own selfishness is certainly a safe thing to trust to, only we should be careful not to overrate its strength in any one direction. Victor began to fear lest he had not exercised this care.

In the quiet cloister the unquiet heart implored for peace. There was a sweetness in this life, given to good works, measured by devotion, that would once have drawn the young girl with a resistless charm. She felt it now, but with the consciousness that it could no longer satisfy her. Earthly memories vexed the sacred calm; as the days passed they gained in power. She yearned to return, even to the troubles from which she had fled. "The world," that great vortex of vanity and danger, was dearer than this seclusion, hallowed though it were. It was a sad lapse from early fervor; she felt it so, but the truth remained.

They made it a feast-day when she came home again. There was a little banquet, seasoned with great rejoicing. All had missed her, missed her gentle ways, her soft companionship, yes, and even the little sanctities at which they sometimes smiled.

"I hope you haven't set your heart upon returning," said John, "because I for one shall never give consent."

"No," she replied, "I have no wish to do so." How genial, how happy seemed the dear home-life, how bright all the beloved faces! Only one was missing, and that she would not think of now.

"Oh, Josie," exclaimed Katharine, suddenly, "we've such a piece of news for you—about Victor! Guess."

"Is he going to be married?" she asked, while a dull, dead certainty weighed down her heart.

"Pretty well, upon my word," said John. "Here's a young lady just out of a convent, and her first thought is of matrimony!"

"How could you guess so soon?" said Katharine. "I should have thought of his going abroad again, or having a fortune left him, or any thing sooner than that. We had not the least idea of it; I only heard it yesterday at the Depaus. It is that Miss Romaine—don't you remember seeing her last winter at Mrs. Sutton's concert?—a tall, striking-looking girl with black eyes. She is an heiress, they say, which will make her none the worse match for Victor."

Here it was then. She had so longed for news of him, and now it met her at the very threshold.

"No great compliment to you girls," observed John. "Here are three of you, not so bad-looking, and the youth breaks away from your united charms to bestow himself elsewhere."

"What an idea!" said Katharine. "One would as soon think of marrying a brother as a cousin." At these words Josephine hid her poor little secret yet deeper in her heart.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"I think Victor has behaved very badly to us," said Mary. "We had a right to hear such news from himself, not to get the first word of it from our acquaintances."

"For that matter," said Katharine, carelessly, "I suppose that we and our claims are the last things he has troubled himself about; he has had more interesting things to think of. He has hardly been in the house since you went away," she continued, turning to Josephine; "but of course we never guessed how he was occupied."

All these weeks she had been dreaming of him, seeing him in his accustomed place, hoping that he missed her sometimes; while he, absorbed in the new love, had never once thought of her!

"Well, you may take it so quietly if you like," said Mary, in answer to Katharine's explanation; "but I shall let him know what I think the very first time he comes here."

She had soon an opportunity. Before the evening ended Victor appeared.

Josephine was the first object of attention, naturally. He shook hands with her in a cousinly manner, asked after her health, and pronounced that she was thinner than before her absence.

"Yes," growled John, "the good sisters have fasted her down to a mere shadow. I hope they made it up to her in spiritual food."

Then Mary opened her complaint; the others offered congratulations. Victor said little in acknowledgment or self-defense; seemed, indeed, unwilling to admit the charge. The girls rallied him upon his lack of candor.

"You needn't pretend to deny it," said Katharine. "Julia Depau says it has been going on for months."

"She has probably sources of information superior to mine."

"Now, Victor, this is very shabby behavior. It is a poor compliment to the lady, too."

"It is her doing, you may depend," said Mary. "She is ashamed of him, and wants to keep it still as long as possible."

While this bantering went on Josephine slipped into the front parlor. Standing at the window she stared steadily forth, neither knowing nor caring what she saw. A voice close at hand made her start.

"What a charming prospect!" it said; "two sidewalks and a lamp-post. But ain't you rather selfish in keeping it for your own benefit? And why do you run away from us all, after such an absence?"

As if he had cared about her absence! But she could not allude to that.

"You were so occupied in talking," she began—and paused.

"On a subject that did not interest you. You are quite right; it affects me in the same way. A precious piece of news, isn't it?"

She looked up surprised, and met Victor's smiling eyes. "Josie," he said, "you didn't believe it! I thought you knew me better—and liked me better, dear, than to credit such a thing!"

Then the skies opened, and Paradise was let down into the young girl's life.

All this was five-and-twenty years ago—years that have changed the city almost beyond recognition, and dispersed our family from its old roof to various homes.

Going down the Avenue any morning when people are in town you may see Victor descend the broad steps of his handsome house. He keeps the old grace of manner, the smile that used to be so winning; time has taken but little from his dark, manly beauty. No child follows him to the door; no face of blooming maidenhood watches him from the window. Perhaps a stately woman, no longer young, may pause there a moment, and look after the receding form. Can our little Josie have developed thus? No. This tall shape, these striking traits, belong to the former Miss Romaine.

Where, then, is Josephine? We shall look for her in vain. Long years ago her mortal part was given to the keeping of our common mother. A brief period of bliss, of faith that saw nothing, foreboded nothing that could grieve—and the fatal work began. Softly and slowly she faded out of life, sustained by all that was dear in love and holy in religion.

A year only had been lost, and Victor was free again. No more haunting doubts and rebellious inclinations; no more strife of love and prudence. The dream had been dreamed out to its close, and he could turn unhindered to the absolute and practical in life.

It is long since she left him, and the atmosphere he dwells in is not favorable to sentiment. But sometimes the sight of a lily, the perfume from a bunch of violets, brings up her memory, tender as if it were only yesterday she died. And he wonders what she has been doing all these years, and if she loves him still.

RISTORI.

WHEN Campbell attempted the Life of his friend Mrs. Siddons, he grew sadly puzzled over his subject. "There is nothing to say," he despairingly exclaimed. Pure English prose had been the even tenor of her way, and there was little to write saving that she had been a good woman and a great actress. Ristori's future biographer will chant a different refrain, for Romance seems to have presided over her birth, and to have strewn her path with as many incidents as flowers. Good fortune having given me the key to much of this romance, I now string the pearls together, that others besides myself may know what generous impulses and fine principles make up the character of that incomparable actress who has brought Myrrha, Camma, Medea, Lady Macbeth, Elizabeth, and Mary Stuart back to life. "An ower true tale," wherein truth shames fic-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tion, is of no such common growth that we can pass it by without comment.

Propensities in parents often become genius in their children. Had not Antonio Ristori and his wife, Maddalena Pomatelli, been very mediocre actors in Cavicchi's wandering company, probably the Adelaide Ristori, who was born in the little Venetian city of Cividale del Friule, would not now be the one great living tragedienne. "Link follows link by necessary consequence," and what in itself may be of little benefit to humanity, is as indispensable to the attainment of great ends as the acorn is the required precedent of the oak.

Born a dramatic gipsy, Adelaide Ristori made her first appearance on the stage when two months old, in the comedy entitled Il Regalo del primo Giorno dell' Anno—"The New-Year's Gift." Introduced in a basket, the unconscious infant did not on this occasion give any evidence of dramatic ability. Four years later, however, when la piccola Ristori became a regular member of the company, large audiences greeted her whenever she appeared in a child's part, La Giovannina dei bei cavalli e della bella carrazza, being her leading part at that early period. Even then Ristori's salary was greater than that of her parents. But despite her success Adelaide was very unwilling to act. She showed much greater love for music, and there is little doubt that Ristori would have made a prima donna had she not been an actress, for nature endowed her with a magnificent mezzo-soprano voice, which of course has since been ruined by incessant speaking. As a girl, she was wont to introduce songs in certain comedies, accompanying herself upon the piano-forte, singing and playing entirely by ear, not knowing one note of music from another, yet producing more effect and throwing more feeling into her canzoncine than many a trained artist. The old passion still remains, and Ristori will go to the piano and sing the Italian popular songs with admirable expression. This musical taste was inherited from her father, who possessed so wonderful an ear that he played upon several instruments without the slightest knowledge of any, and so well as to have performed in public in the place of artists who failed to keep their engagements.

Teresa Ristori, Adelaide's grandmother and first teacher—who had been a fine actress in her day—looked with no favor upon the old guitar which her little pupil preferred thrumming to memorizing parts, and as a punishment for not studying, would put her granddaughter in an open trunk during meal-times. This seemed to produce the desired effect. Exceptional in her talents, "the little Ristori" was equally exceptional in her pleasures. When other children were dressing and undressing dolls, she was laying them out, surrounding them with candles, and "playing dead!" This peculiar propensity developed later into an almost passionate sympathy with burying-grounds; and more than once, when driven to desperation by circumstances of a private nature, Ristori has sought temporary refuge and quiet in the poetical and beautiful "holy fields" of Italy. If any thing can bring peace and humility to the soul, if any thing can teach the utter nothingness of human passion and ambition, it is those arched and silent cloisters with their cold, colorless mural inscriptions to the memory of the dry bones crumbling behind them.

Possessed of much religious fervor, Ristori, while performing at Faenza in 1841, became an object of veneration to its imaginative and superstitious people. Always dressed very simply in black, with a black veil thrown over her head—a covering at that time customary in Romagna—the young actress, accompanied by her maid, was in the habit of attending mass daily at five o'clock in the morning, that she might avoid observation. Knowing her reason for coming at this early hour, a priest was always in waiting, and began the service as soon as she entered the church. This unusual conduct, taken in connection with Ristori's quiet demeanor and equally quiet life—which away from the theatre was passed at home in reading, writing, and embroidering; the last of which occupations she indulged in to such an extent as to have impaired her sight—led the simple Faenzesi to look upon Ristori as a creature little lower than the angels, a saint in embryo. So intense grew the interest in her movements that the windows of her room became a target for the town's eyes; and when it was noticed that her light was left burning very late, public curiosity one night actually perched itself on top of a ladder, and in the character of "peeping Tom" watched Ristori's midnight vigils. She read, she wrote, she embroidered, and then throwing herself on the bed in her street dress, accidentally went to sleep without extinguishing the light. This was the only report that "peeping Tom" could make—the expected visitation of angels not having taken place. Yet the Faenzesi still put faith in Ristori's future canonization; and when she bade farewell to their city, scattered flowers and prints of herself in her path. Moreover, an article of dress which she left behind her was divided among the good people and kept as a holy relic.

Leaving the nomadic manager Cavicchi for the equally nomadic Giuseppe Moncalvo, Ristori at the age of twelve acted soubrettes. At fourteen she undertook the very important rôle of Francesca da Rimini, but was so tall and thin that it required every possible artifice to convert the undeveloped girl into a woman. Notwithstanding the great encouragement given her whenever she appeared in a tragic part, her father, who seems to have possessed much theatrical wisdom, insisted that his daughter's repertoire should be limited to the ingénues. For this discipline Ristori has ever been most grateful. From that time forward the young actress not only supported her parents but also her six brothers and sisters, who being younger than herself, were educated by her; none, however,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google with the exception of Cesare, evincing any positive dramatic ability.

It was at this period that Ristori became a member of the Royal Sardinian Company, directed most ably by Gaetano Bazzi, and located for six months of the year at Turin. Those were the palmy days of the Italian Drama, when talent was concentrated, and Carlotta Marchioni, Antonietta Robotti, Rosina Romagnoli, Luigi Vestris, and many another whose light would now shine as of a star of the first magnitude, were seen together on the same night. This was the company into which Ristori was ushered as ingéune and amorosetta; and here she took her first lessons in real art.

What Sanson was to Rachel Carlotta Marchioni was to Ristori. The accredited equal of Mademoiselle Mars, generous as she was great, enamored of her art and anxious that the Italian stage should be nobly upheld, La Marchioni watched with a jealous care all young actresses who came within the range of her observation. To her, then, Ristori's advent was the promise of the dawn. Hers was the greeting of the setting to the rising sun. She saw in Adelaide one to whom might be bequeathed her crown, and took the young girl to her heart. Adelaide farà una grande carriera—"Adelaide will have a great career!" La Marchioni would exclaim, with satisfaction; and when asked if there were not others of equal ability, would shake her head incredulously.

Ristori made so much progress during three years of constant intercourse with her teacher that La Marchioni, on retiring from the stage in 1840, wished her pupil to assume her rôles. "But, Signora, I can not," Ristori pleaded; at which want of confidence the maestra became greatly enraged. But sanguine as La Marchioni was in Ristori's ultimate greatness, her criticisms were terribly severe. Having a country house near Turin, she would invite her protégée to make long visits, but always set aside certain hours for study. Whenever Ristori had an important part to act, La Marchioni was sure to be found in her box in the theatre sitting in judgment on her youthful successor; and at the conclusion of the performance she would go behind the scenes for the purpose of delivering her verdict to the aspiring actress, who awaited it with fear and trembling.

"Well, maestra, how did I act to-night?" Ristori would falteringly ask.

"Like an imbecile! You had better go and wash dishes! Don't flatter yourself that people applaud your acting. It is your beauty. Their bravas are worth nothing. I tell you that you are an idiot."

This was when Ristori had done something which La Marchioni did not like. At other times, when satisfied, she would fold her arms, and endeavoring to hide her content under a look of assumed displeasure, would mutter: "I'll have nothing more to do with you! You act too much as I would have you!" Then Ristori was radiant with delight.

Remaining with the Sardinian Company until her sixteenth year, being one year after La Marchioni's retirement, Ristori, upon being offered better terms, accepted a seven years' engagement with Romualdo Mascherpa, Director of the Ducal Company of Parma.

Working incessantly, acting seven nights a week, Ristori's health, which during her girlhood was never robust, began to fail. She was threatened with consumption, physicians declaring that she would most certainly die if she did not temporarily withdraw from the stage. In despair at this news, knowing how dependent her family were upon her, Ristori, having no other alternative, applied to her impressario for leave of absence, but was cruelly refused. Obliged then to break her engagement, she retired to a friend's villa near Bologna, and there remained, having no other companion than a cousin, and seeing her father but once a week. Removed from every species of excitement and annoyance, Ristori was so far recovered at the end of four months as to be able to return to her profession.

In 1842 Ristori first began to create, from which time to 1848 she sustained a brilliant reputation as a comedienne and as a delineator of the romantic drama. Her reputation was then based upon Goldoni's three master-pieces—La Locandiera, Gli Innamorati, Zelinda e Lindoro; upon La Lusinghera and La Fiera of Nota; upon Leone Forti's admirable play of Cuores ed Arte; upon the younger Marenco's tragedy of Piccarda Donati, Martini's comedy of La Donna di Quarant' Anni, and the many plays of Gherardi del Testa, author of a charming little comedy, Il Regno d'Adelaide, written expressly for Ristori.

Destiny willed that the comedienne should be gradually fitted for the grandest tragic rôles by such dramatic situations in real life as fall to the lot of few mortals. The year 1846, which was so memorable to Italy, was no less vital an epoch to Adelaide Ristori. Rome, which witnessed her artistic triumphs, witnessed also the dawning of a passion whose course ran no smoother than that of many another true love. The heroine of fictitious sufferings became a heroine in her own right. For to love and be loved by Giuliano del Grillo, a son of the Marchese Capranica, and heir to the del Grillo estates, was an outrage upon the convenances of society not to be tolerated by one of Rome's oldest ducal families.

To own theatres was legitimate, but however willing that one should bear their name, the Capranicas were not willing that the glory of all theatres should be equally privileged. Though Ristori—like her own beautiful creation, Mary Stuart—wore a triple crown; though virtue, beauty, and genius were her title-deeds to the only true nobility, such trifles mattered little to the jealous defenders of an ancient name. Adelaide Ristori was of humble origin, and worse, an actress. With all the terrible parental power which Italians possess, and know so well

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

how to exert, the father of Giuliano del Grillo left no means unturned to alienate from her the affections of his son. He labored in vain. Necessity, however, brought about a separation which the Marchese Capranica hoped to make eternal.

Obliged to leave Rome in order to fulfill an engagement in Florence, Ristori bade a tearful adieu to del Grillo, who, having been deprived of a passport through the representations of his father, found himself utterly powerless in the hands of fate. Owing to the espionage to which the young Marchese was subjected, even letter-writing became well-nigh impossible; but as love has defied obstacles ever since the world began, del Grillo mastered the situation. To buy the secrecy and services of a poor man, to hire a room for his accommodation, to which the lover could speed in order to write and to receive letters, all of which should pass through the hands of this accomplice, were ideas that were no sooner conceived than they were carried into effect.

Receiving at last the intelligence that Ristori was suffering greatly from a bronchial affection, and unnecessarily torturing himself with suppositions of her death, del Grillo implored Ristori to meet him at Civita Vecchia, which city being within the Papal jurisdiction he was able to visit without a passport. Regardless of consequences Ristori set out for Civita Vecchia, accompanied by her father and maid, and after a terrible passage, during which shipwreck stared them in the face, they arrived at the appointed rendezvous. Fearing to meet inside the walls of Civita Vecchia, where spies are as thick as the vermin of that dirtiest of Italian towns, del Grillo had taken up his temporary abode in the old castle of Santa Severa, which stood lonely and gloomy in the neighboring Campagna. This hiding-place had been procured through the devotion of his friend Camillo, a nephew of Cardinal Pacca. There the lovers had a stolen interview of an hour's length.

Fortune had favored the brave. No less a dignitary than Pio Nono himself being the unconscious instrument of their deliverance from parental thralldom. Charged by his Holiness with an embassy to Cesena, the young del Grillo saw in this journey the opportunity of accompanying Ristori the greater part of the way to Florence; but how to obtain transport for La Ristori, her father, and maid without being discovered by that lynx-eyed, aristocratic father who would have detained his son in Rome had he dared to dispute Papal authority, was a matter requiring the greatest finesse. For Ristori to have entered Rome would have given rise to all manner of suspicion. At that time, too, Rome was beside itself with revolutionary ideas, and every sort of conveyance was in requisition for very different purposes than those of love. Nevertheless, having the will, del Grillo found the way. Engaging three places in different parts of a diligence, Ristori made the circuit of the Roman walls, stopped at the first post-town on the road to Florence and there took the diligence; the young papal emissary pursuing the same route at the same time, and of course meeting her at every stopping-place. But the journey could not last forever.

Arrived at a little post-town within a short distance of Cesena, del Grillo, desperate at the idea of separating from Ristori without being able to claim her as his own, exclaimed, Adelaide, vuol essere mia moglie?—"Adelaide, will you be my wife?" The tide was at its flood and must be taken. "Yes," replied Ristori.

Moments were precious, for the horses would soon be changed and the diligence en route. But how was the marriage to be consummated? Entering a church near by where mass was being celebrated, Ristori, her father, and del Grillo knelt down before the altar, and at the conclusion of the services, in the presence of the priest and his audience the lovers proclaimed themselves man and wife, after the manner of Manzoni's Promessi Sposi. In the Romagna a marriage of this kind is, in default of any other, considered valid; but as a reparation to society and law, the bride and bridegroom are shut up in prison for a few days before being permitted to enjoy matrimonial felicity. On this occasion imprisonment was dispensed with, and the young couple parted at the church-door. Ristori continued on her journey to Florence, and del Grillo betook himself to Cesena.

Correspondence was impossible, and del Grillo found little satisfaction in a honey-moon of such exceeding bitterness, and determined, in spite of all obstacles, to join his wife. A passport was an absolute necessity. Buying one of a ballerino for eight hundred dollars, disguised in the garb of a peasant, del Grillo journeyed over the Apennines in an open mule-cart, entered Florence trembling with fear lest the custom-house officers should, upon opening his trunk, recognize the cipher wrought upon his linen. Having successfully run this gauntlet, and not daring to go to a hotel, chilled and weary, del Grillo made his way to Ristori's apartment, where, upon returning from the theatre laden with flowers which were the trophies of her night's triumphs, the young wife found a Leander, who, if he had not swum the Hellespont to embrace his Hero, had braved as much in defying gens d'armes, bleak winds, and jagged mountain roads.

The die was cast. From that time forth Ristori and her husband were inseparable. The Capranica family still remained inexorable, nor did strange incident cease to follow Ristori's fortunes.

Being in Bologna not many months after her singular marriage, and having purchased a very valuable set of stage jewels from an artiste who was about to marry Prince Lichtenstein, Ristori became an object of interest to a band of brigands, who, supposing that the jewels were real, determined to capture them. The opportunity for which they waited arrived when Ristori and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google family set out for Florence in two coaches—herself, mother, father, and maid being in one, and her husband and brother in the other. Eleven miles from Bologna Ristori's carriage, which happened to be some distance in advance, was suddenly stopped by these gentlemanly Fra Diavolos, who demanded their money or their lives, suiting the action to the word by presenting arms. Helping themselves to the contents of Signor Ristori's pockets they then proceeded to lay violent hands on his wife, whereupon Adelaide poured out the vials of her wrath so fearlessly and with such effect that the brigands, overcome with surprise at seeing a woman exhibit so much courage under such circumstances, abstained from further spoliation in that direction. Attempting to take Ristori's purse from her, which contained the key to her jewel-box, she resisted in such vigorous Italian that the robbers finally gave up the effort and betook themselves to overhauling the baggage. At this Ristori jumped out of the coach, and running rapidly in the direction of the second carriage, so frightened the brigands by her calls that they, thinking a strong party might be approaching, fled with comparatively little plunder. No harm having been done, laughter succeeded fear; the idea of a band of desperadoes being awed out of their usual professional etiquette by the denunciations and cries of a woman striking them as exceedingly funny.

Though the young couple returned to Rome the hearts of the Capranicas still remained obdurate, nor did the birth of their first child soften the Marchese. Del Grillo's mother, however, a good and noble woman, could no longer withhold her consent, and, visiting her grandchild surreptitiously, soon learned to love the object of so much family hate. Then it happened that, by advice of Cardinal Pacca, who shook his head dubiously when questioned regarding the legality of Ristori's union with del Grillo, a second marriage was celebrated with all due solemnity. This ceremony occurred in 1847, on the day of that happy saint, Fattibuoni. Del Grillo's father persisted in refusing to recognize what he considered a mésalliance; and it was not until the death of Ristori's first child and the birth of her second that he allowed himself to be taken to his son's house when his indignation melted into a benediction.

"Noblesse oblige!" exclaimed the Capranica family, and Ristori retired from the stage, nothing loth at the time, as she was disgusted with the audiences of Turin, the press of that inartistic city declaring, even as late as 1852, that Ristori with her new school put people to sleep. They had of late been accustomed to rant, and consequently did not take kindly to Nature. But Art has its laws, which are as unalterable as those of the Medes and Persians. Once an artist always an artist. Miserable pride may rob the stage of its brightest jewels; but the day of reckoning comes surely if not always swiftly. As the heart pants after the water-brooks so does the actress of genius hunger and thirst for expression; and it is as impossible for aristocratic edicts to stifle this innate passion as it is for human will to stay the sun's course. Society has no more right to deprive the actress of her stage than it has the right to rob the poet of his pen or the painter of his brush. Every gifted intellect has its appointed work which no other can do as well, and for which it was created. Society would shudder at the idea of deliberately cutting off a human arm or leg, yet will not hesitate to cut off brains. Its victim suffers an endless craving for natural food; 'the world is so much the poorer for this waste of divine material; and Art stands and waits for its revenge. Nobility claimed Sontag; and twenty years after the ruined nobleman who was her husband hastened to retrieve his losses at the gaming-table by the exertions of his beautiful wife. Nobility claimed Ristori, and the actress yielded—for one year.

During her retirement, which was in the stormy times of 1848, when French bombs sought to lay the Eternal City low, and one of these devilish emissaries burst into Ristori's bedroom, the young Marchesa never lost sight of her old professional comrades. Learning one day that Pisenti, one of her former managers, had been imprisoned for debt, the Marchesa del Grillo determined to give three representations for his benefit. Rome besieged the theatre, stormed the entrance, broke the windows, shouted, "Brava! Bravissima!" and demanded the rendering unto Cæsar of those things that were Cæsar's. The stern father saw and acknowledged the greatness of his daughter-in-law, forgot his prejudices in his enthusiasm, and withdrew his objections to her pursuing the career for which she had been born. So, too, did her husband's heart relent, and the Marchesa del Grillo became once more and forever Adelaide Ristori.

More earnest, more serious in her art than before her marriage, Ristori listened to the advice of Madame Caroline Internari, the Mademoiselle George of the Italian theatre, and determined to give herself up to the study of high tragedy. She made her début in Alfieri's master-piece of Myrrha, but being physically incapacitated at the time, did not achieve a success. Disgusted with what she called a complete failure, it was not until 1850 that she again took up the part at the urgent request of Madame Internari, who promised to support her in the character of the old nurse Euryclea. Thus did Ristori create that Myrrha which no other living actress has dared to attempt.

The one great need of genius is recognition—not the recognition of the unthinking but that of intellect, beyond which there is no appeal. Triumphant throughout all Italy, Ristori wished to put her talents to the test, not knowing her real value, and never dreaming of the great fame and equally great fortune which two hemispheres have since accorded to her. Paris became the goal of her desires; for in Paris sits

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the world's tribunal. An artist may be great and never have seen Paris, but no artist is really great that can not stand the test of Parisian criticism. France is the centre of art; all other countries are provincial. There lies the Ultima Thule of artistic aspiration, and there Ristori looked for her letters of credit. In 1852 Rachel had visited Italy. Why then was it not fitting that Ristori should visit France? But Riquetti, the manager of the Royal Sardinian Company, of which Ristori was the prima donna, trembled at the daring of the enterprise. To transport an entire dramatic company to Paris, to attempt to act before Frenchmen who are themselves born actors, and who are most intolerant of foreign languages, to brave Rachel on her own impregnable ground, passed the understanding of the timid impressario. The Marchese del Grillo and Ristori alone remained resolute. Both had confidence in the ability of the company, both had a national pride in the undertaking. The Marchese assumed all the risks, and on the 22d of May, 1855, when Paris was going wild over its first Universal Exposition, the Royal Sardinian Company made their first appearance at the Italian Opera-House in Silvio Pellico's tragedy of Francesca da Rimini.

The character of Francesca is not all-important. Paolo more than divides the honors, and on this occasion was admirably rendered by Ernesto Rossi. But critical Paris saw no one but Ristori. Some had gone to scoff, they remained to bring Francesca back to life by recalling her three times before the curtain. The audience was not large, for an Italian fame meant nothing to France; but that audience made haste to proclaim the coming of a new prophet to whom they gave papers of naturalization and called "Nôtre Ristori."

Dumas père, the greatest gamin of the age, made haste to write: "Last night I was at the representation of Francesca da Rimini at the Salle Vendatour. I looked around the theatre, but did not see Rachel. I beg that she will go and see how the death scene is performed." Rachel would not play Dumas. Here was the author's terrible vengeance—unkind and undeserved, but none the less cutting to the great tragedienne, who for fifteen years had undisputed worn her crown.

Scribe paid court to the new favorite, and Jules Janin, the clever "Figaro" of the Journal des Debats, and Fiorentino sealed her fate by their enthusiastic criticisms.

The Royal Sardinian Company being composed, for the most part, of really excellent comedians, several comedies were given in succession after the début of Ristori in Francesca da Rimini, but the Parisians failed to grow ecstatic. Even the best of Italian actors could teach them nothing new in comedy, which is the strong point of the French stage. They would go to see no one but Ristori; and on the 29th of May, one week after her début, she made her entrée in Myrrha. Francesca da Rimini was forgotten. The farthing rush-light went out in the presence of the sun. Ristori was "la sublime actrice," the stage was carpeted with flowers, critics laid their offerings at the shrine of the Italian muse, artists and authors celebrated her triumph on canvas, in marble, in prose, and in verse.

The Italy of 1855 was not the Italy of to-day. French littérateurs wrote of it contemptuously as the land of the dead; and it was no easy matter for them to believe in the good that came out of Nazareth. "Who would have suspected," exclaimed Alexander Dumas, "that Italy, which has applauded the scum of our theatres, possessed such actors!" It was difficult, too, for Janin to realize Alfieri's excellence as a dramatic poet; but of Ristori's Myrrha there was—very much to her surprise—but one opinion. "How very singular it is," she said one day, "the Parisians spend ten francs a night to see me perform, and even then all can not obtain admission; while at Turin, where I could be heard in Myrrha for eighty centimes, no one came!" The honor of the Italian drama was redeemed, and Ristori's success opened the way to that of Salvini—the greatest Othello and Hamlet of the contemporary stage.

The most flattering triumph was yet to come. Before knowing that there was a Ristori in the world Rachel resigned her position as a sociétaire of the Théâtre Français, and the throne thus abdicated was officially offered to her rival by the director, Arsène Houssaye. It was a terrible temptation, one that few artists would have been strong enough to resist. France encouraged the idea; but Méry, loving Art more than his language, attempted to stem the current of popular advice in words that are worthy of remembrance:

"Report says that Ristori will throw herself into the arms of our Tragedy, that she will desert to the camp of the Greeks.—Nulla fides.—Madame Ristori belongs to the country of the Trojans. Let her remain a Trojan. Her ruin would date from the moment in which she heard the words: 'Madame on vient en ces lieux'—because she would descend. By an imprudent invasion of the Alexandrine she would lose all her auxiliaries, and would suffer by inevitable comparison. It is true that her stupendous pantomime must ever remain the same, but this advantage would not suffice. There would then be exacted precisely what she could not give; what she possesses would not be asked for; Paris would demand that she spoke her beautiful Italian language in French.....Oh, noble Arethusa! make the passage of this Parisian ocean, keeping a jealous watch over the purity of thy name. Leave French Tragedy alone, and force Paris to study Italian."

Adelaide Ristori refused the offer; but the Théâtre Français would not acknowledge itself vanquished. What Arsène Houssaye did not succeed in M. Fould, Minister of State, attempted to accomplish, sending for Ristori and speaking to her in the name of Napoleon. Imperial persuasion availed naught. Ristori was first an Italian, and then an artist. To have forsaken la lingua del sì would have been no less criminal in her eyes than for Garibaldi to have deserted his flag. Alfieri, not Racine,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was her star. True to her country and her art, Ristori plead for both when M. Fould endeavored to convert her to the worship of new gods.

"Paris gladly welcomes Italian singing and dancing," she said; "let the Italian drama enjoy equal privileges. If Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, and Verdi can obtain a hearing for six months during the year, surely Paris should accord the rights of citizenship to the masterpieces of the Italian Theatre."

M. Fould was a faithful embassador. The Emperor lent a friendly ear to Ristori's impulsive petition; and the next day the brave actress was gratified by the reception of an Imperial decree authorizing her to give dramatic performances at the Théâtre Italiens during the months of February, March, and April for the space of three years!

After the production of Myrrha it was useless for other members of the Sardinian Company to expect to obtain a hearing. Even the Orestes of Rossi did not succeed in attracting attention. Myrrha was repeated; and on the 26th of June Ristori made her entrée in Maria Stuarda, a part in which Rachel was justly celebrated. The critical ordeal through which the Italian passed was fiery; yet she escaped unscathed. Paris was enthusiastic; and Rachel, not willing that the field should be entirely left to her rival, gave one representation of the captive queen at the Théâtre Français on the same night that Ristori performed the part at the Italiens.

The Reverend Father Veuillot, editor of the ultramontane journal L'Univers, so far forgot his clerical propriety as to witness Ristori's rendering of a character which has very great interest to every Catholic. Not content with seeing, the reverend Father wrote an ardent criticism thereupon, confessing at the same time that he had committed a great indiscretion in going to the theatre.

The drama of Maria Stuarda has brought incident as well as fortune to Ristori. "In writing Mary Stuart our Schiller never thought to find so admirable an interpreter," said the fastidious Viennese; and in 1856 Verona selected the night of its performance—February 8—for the rendering of such homage as no other living artiste has received. At the conclusion of the third act, when Ristori had electrified her audience by her denunciation of Elizabeth, when her proud exclamation, "Questa è un' ora di vendetta e di trionfo," still rang in the ears of every one, the curtain rose, in answer to enthusiastic applause, disclosing not only Ristori but the inscription, "Teatro Adelaide Ristori," which, surrounded by a garland of roses, was seen at the back of the stage. This baptism was repeated in front of the theatre in illuminated letters; and after being escorted to her hotel by a torch-light procession, the heroine of the night was presented with a beautiful album surmounted by her cipher and crown in silver, while beneath her windows a military band played fragments from Donizetti's opera of Maria Stuarda. It was indeed "an hour of triumph!"

On another occasion, when performing the same character at Pavia to an audience composed for the most part of students who had renounced their bottle of wine for that night in order to see Ristori, one of their number became so interested in the fate of the beautiful Queen of Scots as to lose sight of the fiction, and when, in the fourth act, Elizabeth seized her pen to sign the death warrant of her hated rival, the young fellow rose from his seat and screamed out: "No, no, per Dio!"—"No, no, for God's sake!" Yet the imperturbable Queen of England was not moved from her resolve, and the student sat down amidst universal laughter.

Ristori's first season in Paris terminated on the 10th of September, realizing the round sum of half a million of francs. Francesca da Rimini, Myrrha, Maria Stuarda, and Pia de' Tolomei had made for her a fame by which she could henceforth command audiences throughout the world. She had given three performances of Francesca, seventeen of Myrrha, twenty-two of Maria Stuarda, and seven of Pia. She had acquired the friendship of such men as Lamartine, Legouvé, and Alfred de Vigny; and on the day of her benefit she had been presented with a medal struck in her honor by the Italian residents of Paris, containing an epigraph written by Joseph Montanelli. She had had her portrait painted by Ary Scheffer, and had been the recipient of such imperial approbation as France had extended to no artist since the days of Talma. Through the medium of Moquard, his private secretary, Napoleon sent to Ristori a beautiful bracelet in the form of a serpent, the head sparkling with diamonds, to which was attached the following note:

"L'Empereur sera charmé de vous entendre avant votre départ; mais en consentant de recevoir vos adieux, S. M., comme le public parisien, compte sur une courte absence; et dans les applaudissements qu' elle vous réserve, se trouveront, n'en doutez pas, et l'invitation de revenir et l'espérance de vous revoir bientôt. Je suis heureux, Madame, d'être l'interprète de l'Empereur auprès de la grande artiste italienne devenue française, et je vous prie d'agréer," etc.

Diamonds were not the only gifts awaiting Ristori in all the Courts of Europe. In 1858 the King of Prussia was so delighted with her noble conception of Mosenthal's Deborah that he decorated her with the Order of Merit, an honor never before or since extended to a woman. More's the pity!

Upon Ristori's first visit to Spain, which took place in September, 1857, there occurred one of the most remarkable incidents of her life, which I will endeavor to relate in her own words so far as memory and translation permit. Ristori's manner and animation in narration of course defy description. Seated with her one day, very early in the morning, she in her morning-gown expecting the arrival of her English teacher, I said:

"Do tell me about that extraordinary adven-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ture of yours in Spain by which you saved the life of a poor soldier?"

"Ah, what a romance was that!" replied Ristori. "It is a long story, and can not now receive just treatment; but had you been in Madrid at the time you could have made something fine out of it. It is one of many singular things that have happened to me without the least seeking on my part. Andiamo. It was on the third night of my first season. Medea was the heroine of the evening. Before dressing for the part, I was seated in the little salon into which my dressing-room opened, talking, according to custom, with many of the actors who were in the habit of congregating there before the performance and during the entr'actes. On this particular occasion the subject of conversation was, naturally, Madrid and the customs of a country which we saw for the first time. 'By-the-by,' said one of the company, 'did you hear that bell to-day?'

"'What bell?'

"'Why, the bell of the Misèricordia, to be sure. It appears that in Spain, whenever any one is condemned to death, the Fratelli di San Giovanni go from house to house on the day preceding the execution, asking alms in behalf of the criminal. The money thus collected is divided into three parts: One goes to the Church, that masses may be said for the unhappy creature's soul; one is given to the condemned to dispose of as best pleases him, and one is handed to his family. To-day the alms obtained were unusually large, for public opinion is opposed to an execution which is declared to be unjust.'

"'But who is the man?' I asked.

"'One Nicolas Chapado, a soldier in Her Majesty's army. For no offense whatever he was slapped in the face by an officer, and in a moment of exasperation attempted to shoot his superior, but was pinioned before any injury was done. To-morrow, at eight o'clock, he dies.'

"'O mio Dio!' I exclaimed; 'is it possible that such things are permitted in this world? Here am I, happy, contented. In a few moments I shall go upon the stage; receive honors, applause, money; I shall go home to my family to sleep in peace; while not far from me one of God's creatures will be watching, praying, awaiting the coming of a day that will hurl him into eternity, and his family into misery. Signori, tell me no more of this sad story, or I shall not be able to act.' Fearing to become still further interested in a tragedy which I could not help, I retired to the inner cabinet to dress, little dreaming of the part I was destined to play in it.

"It appears that a Society which was in the habit of meeting at a certain café, and which was the centre of revolutionary movements generally, had determined to prevent, if possible, this slaughter of Chapado. Discussing the surest means of obtaining a pardon, they resolved to make me their instrument. The Queen was to be present at the theatre that night. She had already given me proofs of her esteem. At the end of the first act I should throw myself at Her Majesty's feet, and all would be accomplished. Thus decided, a committee came to the theatre, waited upon my husband, and stated the object of their visit.

"'But, gentlemen,' he replied, 'it is impossible. You can not see my wife. She is now dressing for Medea, and, moreover, has no power with the Queen.'

"They persisted, however. They must see Madame Ristori; and finally Giuliano came to me in despair, to ask whether I would give them audience.

"I was dressed. I saw them. They urged. I argued: 'Gentlemen, I am a stranger; this is but my third appearance in Madrid, and only the second time that Her Majesty will have seen me on the stage. To enter her box, to plead for the life of one of her subjects condemned by the highest officers of the crown, seems to me so extraordinary and at the same time so impertinent an action that I should expect to bring disgrace upon myself as well as increased vengeance upon the unfortunate man whom you are endeavoring to serve. Sympathy I give with all my heart; more than that is not in my power.'

"It was useless. They would not listen to a refusal; and so wrought upon my feelings that I promised to exert myself to the utmost, and take the consequences, whatever they might be. To have it on my conscience that I might have saved the life of a human being and did not, was an insupportable thought. Rather than suffer remorse I resolved to suffer the royal displeasure. 'Leave all to me, then,' I said. 'I will first send for Maréchal Narvaez.'

"This intention the committee attempted to combat. As Narvaez had been most prominent in advocating Chapado's sentence, and had great influence with the Queen, the committee wished me to act sub rosa, to take Her Majesty entirely by surprise, and before her minister could counteract the effect of what they were pleased to call my eloquence. 'No,' I answered. 'I will do nothing without the knowledge of the Maréchal. I am incapable of treachery.' For you see I had known Narvaez well in Paris; and no sooner had I arrived in Madrid than he came to me, saying: 'I am, as you are well aware, a man of affairs. My time belongs to my country; but believe me when I state that I am always at your disposition. Make use of me whenever so inclined, and accept the services of a soldier who is yours as long as you remain in Madrid.'

"Rest assured that I did not make any demands upon Narvaez; but the soldier came, remained posted at my door night and day until his presence got to be such a bore (seccatura) that I dismissed him. Narvaez, you perceive, had been friendly to me, consequently it was impossible to act disloyally toward him. Contrary to the wishes of Chapado's friends I sent

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

a messenger to his box (for he, too, was at the theatre), imploring him to come immediately to my dressing-room as I had something of great importance to communicate.

"Narvaez arrived en grande tenue, accompanied by his aide-de-camp. Leaving all the attendants in the ante-room, ushering the Minister into my camerino, out of which I even expelled my own husband, I turned the key upon my prisoner, who looked at me in amazement. 'What does this mean?' he asked. Then I spoke. 'Your Excellency has desired me to call upon you whenever I required your aid. Now is the time of my need, and now I ask what it is in your power to give.'

"'You have but to state the nature of your request, Signora, to have it granted,' replied Narvaez, little dreaming of what was to come.

"'To-morrow morning at eight o'clock a poor soldier is to be executed. I ask you to annul the decree.'

"You should have seen the expression of Narvaez's face. A thunder-bolt from heaven would not have produced a look of greater consternation.

"'Signora,' he gasped, 'what do you mean?'

"'I wish the pardon of Nicolas Chapado.'

"'Impossible! It can not be. Ask any thing but that.'

"'Oh, grant it, Maréchal! It is the one boon I beg of you. In the name of pity, in the name of mercy spare the life of this unfortunate man.'

"'But do you know the nature of your demand, Signora? My name, my honor are pledged to the execution of this sentence. It is I who have been most prominent in the matter—it is I who have urged the necessity of this execution upon the Queen. How can I retract? The salvation of the army depends upon summary punishment. It is not the first case of insubordination that has occurred recently. Such a precedent would be fatal to discipline. The decree is just, and must be fulfilled.'

"'It is not just, Maréchal. All Madrid pronounces against it. The man is not a criminal. His pardon in no way imperils the discipline of the army. Chapado's antecedents have been excellent; the Queen has not a more faithful soldier, a more loyal subject. What is his offense? The helpless victim of a superior's unmerited antipathy; he endured slight after slight until at last slapped in the face without provocation, insulted pride roused him to retaliation, and he drew his weapon upon the real offender, but did no hurt whatever.'

"'There was the intent to kill,' replied Narvaez.

"'Ah, but Maréchal, you have a heart; you are a man as well as a statesman. Think whether you would not have done the same had you been in Chapado's position. Is self-respect an affair of rank? Would you not look with contempt upon any Spaniard who brooked insult with impunity? Remember the indignity, remember the passion of hot blood, and forgive, as you would be forgiven. Think of that unhappy man bowed down with grief now making his last confession. Think of his wretched family that never in this world will know a moment's peace or happiness. Be merciful. Yours is the hand to bless or curse them. Listen to the pleading of your heart, Maréchal, and let it bless.'

"What more I said I can not now repeat. The occasion gave me the power to be something more than I am; and at last the inflexible Narvaez yielded to my supplications. Yes, he, Narvaez, Cabinet Minister, cried like a child.

"'What would you have me do, Signora? My consent is not all that is necessary. The Queen's pardon must be obtained; and how can I, who have urged this act upon her, now argue against it? Where for the future will be my reputation for consistency?'

"Then I replied: 'Maréchal, those gentlemen in the other room constitute a committee who have waited upon me for the purpose of obtaining Chapado's pardon. I have been implored to go to the Queen at the end of the first act, for they declared that Her Majesty could not resist my prayers. They besought me to do this thing; but they likewise besought me to do it unknown to you. I refused to act without your knowledge. I determined to obtain your consent before appealing to a higher power.'

"Then it was arranged that Narvaez should go to the Queen and tell her that at the conclusion of the first act of Medea an extraordinary interview would be solicited for an extraordinary purpose. After this note of preparation he was to retire to his box, and remain there until sent for by me.

"Imagine if you can my sensations during this terrible ordeal. There sat the Queen in the state box magnificently dressed; beside her sat the King. I said to myself, 'The life of a human being depends upon your acting.' And I know that I acted Medea as never before or since. The enthusiasm of the audience was great, no one being more demonstrative than the Queen herself, at which I took more and more courage. 'That is right, dear woman; continue to be moved; let your heart be softened for the prayer that is to come,' I said to myself whenever the Queen applauded. Finally the curtain fell, and I nerved myself for the battle.

"Here, however, comes in an episode wherein I played no part, and of which I was totally ignorant at the time, but which is necessary for the rounding out of the drama. It appears that other emissaries, bent upon the same mission, had been at work in different quarters, and had obtained the co-operation of a member of the Cabinet who, from the first, had been opposed to Chapado's execution, and who on this evening was attached to Her Majesty's suite. The old and homely saying that too many cooks spoil the broth came very near being realized on this occasion; for no sooner had the curtain

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google fallen upon the first act than the door of the Queen's box was flung wide open, the sister of Chapado entered, threw herself at Her Majesty's feet, and entreated the Queen to grant her brother's pardon. The girl wept, prayed—her sovereign became more and more agitated. Being in delicate health at the time, and fearing the consequences of so much excitement, the Queen finally exclaimed, without however having given the unhappy girl any hope whatever, 'You make me ill; you make me ill! I can bear this no longer!'

"Meanwhile I had entered an ante-room connected with the royal box, which, fortunately for me, was attained from the stage by means of a flight of stairs; and in the midst of this stormy situation my name was announced to Her Majesty. 'Yes, yes, I wish to see Madame Ristori,' joyfully replied the Queen. 'Let her enter! let her enter! I can have no more of this.'

"Thus summarily dismissed, Chapado's sister fainted, and as I entered was being borne away. What do you think the Queen's sensations must have been when I began where the wretched girl left off? I too threw myself at her feet, I too pleaded for clemency. I addressed her as a woman. Urged on by the inspiration of the moment, I appealed to every human feeling of which she was susceptible. At least I know that I found the way to her heart, that she listened, that she cried like a poor creature (piangeva come una povera creatura), and that Ristori the actress reigned long enough to rescue a man from eternity.

"'But what will Narvaez say?' finally asked the Queen.

"There stood Narvaez. It had been arranged between us, as you remember, that he should not appear until sent for by me, and this anticipated question of his sovereign—as, of course, she would naturally revert to the Minister who had insisted most strenuously upon the execution—was to have been my cue; but Narvaez had become so nervous at the delay occasioned by the unexpected scene just referred to, that, fearful of the consequence of my daring, he arrived some time before he was needed, vouchsafing, however, not a word. But when the Queen thus submitted the decision to her Minister, I turned to him, saying, 'Maréchal Narvaez has too great a respect for Your Majesty's goodness of heart to wish to thwart so generous an impulse.' At which little speech Narvaez made a profound bow of assent.

"I had obtained Chapado's pardon. Already the entr'acte had been immensely long, and the audience, ignorant of what was going on in front of the curtain, began to be impatient. Blessing the Queen, I rushed from her presence to deliver the good news to the Committee that still awaited me behind the scenes. How I got down those stairs I do not know. I believe I flew; my blue mantle gave me wings. Ah, and you should have witnessed my reception from those anxious men! Well, it is something to have lived for. By the time the curtain rose on the second act the granting of the pardon was no longer a secret to the audience, and my entrance was the signal for such applause and acclamation as will never be accorded to me again.

"Wishing it understood that the Queen, and not myself, was the proper person upon whom to shower regard, I turned and pointed to the royal box, whereupon Her Majesty shook her head very vigorously, and pointing to me, said, 'No, no! It is you! it is you!" And the more I attempted to give her credit for the deed the more she dissented. I thought the excitement never would come to an end, but at last the play went on. When Chapado's pardon was taken to him the poor fellow was confessing to a priest, and fainted at the news.

"I did not see Chapado during this visit to Madrid—his sentence was commuted to twenty years in the galleys; but I received letters from him which would have melted a heart of stone, and so beautifully expressed as to denote an intellect far superior to the rank of a common soldier. To him I was a Providence.

"Our correspondence continued, and when in Spain five years later, I found myself in the vicinity of Chapado's prison and determined to see him. Permission being granted I went to his cell early one morning, accompanied by Borghi—an old and very clever actor—and my two children, Bianca and Giorgio. Chapado, a tall, fine-looking man of about thirty-six years of age, was so overcome as to be well-nigh speechless. Kneeling, he kissed my hand, looking the while as though, were it in his power, he would lay all the treasures of the earth at my feet; and then feeling that with the children he could be more demonstrative, he turned and embraced them again and again. The time at length arriving for us to depart, I took Chapado's arm: Borghi followed, leading the two children.

"Descending in this manner the main stairs what do you suppose I saw? All the convicts of the prison ranged on both sides of the court by which we were to leave gazing at me respectfully and with uncovered heads! They knew Chapado's story, and had expressed a strong desire to see me. It was thus granted by the commander. What a picture it made, and how I wished that Borghi had been a painter to have perpetuated it! The massive, winding staircase, the gloomy, picturesque court, those expressive, sorrow-stricken faces with a gleam of gratitude in their eyes for the sympathy that had been accorded to one of their band, the noble figure of Chapado, and then the strange bit of color caused by the presence of Borghi, my children, and myself, formed a tableau worthy of an artist."

"And pray what became of Chapado?" I asked when Ristori had concluded her narrative.

"He was released soon after our interview, prior to which time the officer whose life he

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

had threatened died. Before breathing his last, however, he sent for Chapado, to whom he gave his hand and his forgiveness—a tardy act of justice on the part of the real culprit. Since regaining his liberty Chapado has put himself at my service, saying he would go to the ends of the earth with me. Latterly I have not written, being so engrossed in business; but I shall not forget my spagnuolo liberato nor his willingness to enter my employ. Come to Paris, and I will show you all his letters, which are very precious to me, being the rare expression of a truly grateful soul."

Such is the truth of one of the most romantic stories in real life, the main incident of which Legouvé introduces in his novel of "Béatrix, ou la Madonne de l'art," as happening to the heroine.

That Ristori had a strange fascination over the Queen of Spain is undoubted. She went to the palace daily at Isabella's urgent request, and, having innocently gained the Queen's affections, hoped to liberalize her mind with regard to State reform. Ristori had begun to make some little headway in this direction when Spain's evil genius, the Church, grew suspicious of the intimacy, and put it out of her power to be of political use. She maintains that at heart Isabella is a kind, affectionate woman who errs through ignorance. Terribly superstitious, she has been ruined by the priests, who surround her, in whom she places implicit faith, and who mould her to their wishes as they would a huge lump of animated putty.

This is not the only occasion upon which Ristori's powers of persuasion have been employed for political purposes, Cavour having intrusted her with a secret diplomatic mission to St. Petersburg, when called there to fulfill a professional engagement in December, 1860. Several of Cavour's letters to Ristori are to be found in his General Correspondence, in one of which the great statesman writes in reference to this mission:

"If you have not converted the Prince Gortchakoff, I must say that he is an impenitent sinner, since the arguments that you know how to employ with so much ability, in order to sustain our cause, appear to me irresistible. But if the Prince, in your presence, does not wish to acknowledge himself conquered, your words will have left in his mind a germ that will develop itself and produce good fruit. I applaud in you not only the first artist in Europe, but the most skillful co-operator in diplomatic negotiations."

This letter was written a very short time before Cavour's death, the news of which reached Ristori while she was acting in Paris. Grieved at the death of her friend, and desirous of paying all the respect in her power to the memory of so great a man and patriot, Ristori announced a suspension of her performances. For "reasons of State" this deference to Italy's regenerator did not receive Imperial approbation, and the actress was forced by the police to remove her notice from the vestibule of the theatre. Incensed at this act of tyranny Ristori declared she would not perform again in Paris that season, and removed her company to Versailles.

Prior to this Ristori had made her début in the French play of Béatrix at the Odéon. To undertake a creation in a foreign language she knew to be exceedingly hazardous; but grateful to France for what her alliance had accomplished for Italy in 1859, and wishing to carry out Legouvé's intentions, he having written Béatrix for her, Ristori consented to risk her reputation as an artist.

During the rehearsals she did not fully appreciate the singularity of her position, although the actors about her, who were, of course, French, seemed to think she was putting her head into the lion's mouth. It was not until the first night's performance that Ristori realized what she was about to do. Then, overcome by the applause that greeted her entrance, and knowing how much was expected of her, stage-fright obtained the mastery, and she was obliged to sit down in order to gain sufficient self-control to proceed with the part. But Beatrix proved a very great success, being performed eighty nights in 1861, and twenty-one nights in 1865, besides meeting with equal favor throughout the provincial cities of France. At one time Ristori traveled with two distinct companies, French and Italian, the former being engaged expressly and solely for Legouvé's comedy.

It was with still greater diffidence that Ristori assumed the rôle of Elizabeth in London. "I had much rather not," she said, to Giacommetti the author. "Do it by all means," was his reply. "London is the place of all others that I would have my drama performed, for there will its historic truthfulness to character be best appreciated." Giacommetti's prediction was more than verified. When, too, it was first suggested that Macbeth should be translated, and so cut down as to give additional prominence to Lady Macbeth, it being, of course, impossible to find an actor in her company to do justice to the hero, Ristori exclaimed, "What, cut Shakspeare? God forbid that I should commit such a sacrilege!"

But urged to the deed by Shakspeare's own countrymen, the proposed adaptation was made by Giulio Carcano, and we in consequence have lived to see a second Siddons. How great Ristori is in the sleeping scene Americans need not be told, yet on first rendering it she acted in opposition to all advice.

"Your interpretation will not answer," said the judges. "I must follow out my own inspirations," responded the actress. The public agreed with the latter. "What! act the sleeping scene without holding the lamp in your hand?" cried Sheridan, rushing into Mrs. Siddon's dressing-room the night of her début in Lady Macbeth. "Go in direct opposition to Mrs. Pritchard, the greatest Lady Macbeth we ever had? Impossible! It must not be." It was, however. The audience that should have hissed applauded the innovation, and Sheridan

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google saw his error. Whether Mrs. Siddons dressed Lady Macbeth as finely as Ristori is doubtful. It required the picturesqueness of an Italian mind to conceive of a night-dress fashioned after the style of the Spanish poncho. "Se non è vero è ben trovato," and for the other costumes no one can complain of historical transgression, the first having been taken from a picture of Lady Macbeth exposed at the Manchester Exhibition some years since, and the second from a painting at Edinburgh of Lady Macbeth, Macduff, and Banquo.

Having gathered laurels in almost every capital in Europe, from Moscow to Dublin, Ristori turned her thoughts to the East, and in the autumn of 1864 sailed for Egypt. There, where Rachel went in search of that lost treasure, health, her rival found new honors and additional fame. It is no little glory to have carried the Italian drama to the land of the Pharaohs, to have spoken Dante's language to the children of the Nile, to have interpreted Alfieri beneath the shadow of the Pyramids. What other artist can claim to have held the interest of an Egyptian audience for thirty-seven nights by the charms of pantomime and facial expression alone?

Smyrna too, and Constantinople were the scenes of other triumphs. Nineteen representations were given in the city of the Bosphorus, and upon Ristori's departure a tablet commemorative of her visit was inserted in the façade of the Théâtre Rossini.

At Athens, though only able to perform there five nights, her success was immense. The furore was for Greek pieces, and from her repertoire Ristori selected Medea, Giuditta, Fedra, and Myrrha as best suited to the classic ground of the Parthenon. Poor as the Athenians are, they yet paid an entrance fee of eight francs. Students sold their books, and others still lower in the scale of fortune sold their clothes in order to catch a glimpse of the wonderful priestess who breathed the breath of life into the mythology of Greece. The theatre was thronged nightly, and the doors suffered severe treatment in the struggling for admittance.

Still greater enthusiasm awaited Ristori in Holland. Receiving a letter from the students of Utrecht begging her to visit their city, the actress replied that it was almost impossible; but yet, in gratitude for the compliment to her art, she would give one performance. This was on the 9th of November, 1865. Arriving at Utrecht, Ristori and her family were received by the entire University, the students being dressed in a riding costume of white cloth breeches, top boots, spurs, and jackets ornamented with the Holland cockade. After listening to a speech of welcome that was made to her in the saloon of the railroad station, Ristori and her daughter were conducted by a committee of ladies to a carriage drawn by four white horses, the Marquis and his son occupying a similar equipage. Preceded by a band, escorted by all the students, who were mounted on horseback, the cortége drove through the town, Ristori being showered with flowers all along the route. Upon returning to her hotel after the performance—Medea—Ristori found a beautiful silver vase filled with flowers which had been left for her in the name of the students, who feared to give their diva jewelry lest the token be indicative of less respect than they desired to express.

Because a blaze of glory now surrounds the name of Ristori let it not be thought that her genius has been sufficient unto itself; for though the actress stands on the top round of the ladder, every step upward has been the fruit of time and hard work. Ristori is what she is because her life has been consecrated to her Art—because she has not trusted entirely to inspiration, but made experience and unending study the broad foundation on which to build her creations.

Before assuming a new rôle every accessible library is ransacked, that costume and manner may be in accordance with facts, and the minutest detail is investigated with passionate interest. In order to properly delineate the last act of Pia de' Tolomei Ristori studied death by malaria from nature. Cases of poisoning being rare, and so sudden as to seldom give the medical or art-student opportunity for investigation, Ristori consulted many physicians on the subject before attempting the character of Adrienne Lecouvreur. From their descriptions she conceived Adrienne's dying scene, the truthfulness of which was once strongly confirmed by a physician in Bologna, who, after the performance, said to Ristori: "Within a few hours I have seen two deaths by poison—one in real life and the other on the stage. The illusion of the latter was so great that I beheld a repetition of the former."

When asked recently why she did not change her dress in Mary Stuart, Schiller having specified white for the last scene, Ristori replied: "Because Schiller is wrong. Such a dress would be contrary to history." Then bringing forth an album containing photographs of all the portraits of Scotland's Queen that ever were painted, she pointed to one representing Mary on the way to the block, taken from a full-length portrait attributed to Daniel Mytens, and now at Windsor Castle. "You see I am right," Ristori continued. "I make but one change. Instead of a white veil embroidered in gold, I substitute black for the sake of better effect. There, you observe, is the gold rosary from which mine is copied, and which was sent to the Earl Arundel before the execution. The steel pin you have remarked upon is a fac-simile of one that was constantly worn by the Queen. It was presented to me by a Scottish nobleman."

So strong is the maternal instinct in Ristori that, when Legouvé first suggested that Medea should be added to her repertoire, she refused, declaring that she could understand all passion but such as led to the murder of one's own off-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google spring. Medea killed her children in the presence of the audience, consequently the character transcended her possibilities. Not until Legouvé altered the situation, so that the murder was implied rather than consummated, was Ristori persuaded to revoke her decision. To such as know the tenderness of Ristori's heart it is amusing to be told by critics how the actress is best adapted by nature to the delineation of rôles where "the tiger element" predominates.

No rehearsal goes on without Ristori's superintendence. Anxious for the smoothness of the ensemble, as well as for that of her own scenes, she takes great pains to make the most out of the material about her. Nor does she mumble over the words, as is the custom with most actors. "How are you to know what the effect will be at night unless the scenes are given with full voice in the morning?" she argues, as did Macready before her, who was always very much in earnest. She goes through her part, and that of every member of the company if necessary, with an intelligence and an intention which makes you realize the difference between an Artist and an Actor. If any one is at a loss for a word or a cue it is Ristori who comes to the rescue.

Few persons are earlier risers than Ristori. No matter at what hour she goes to bed, seven o'clock in the morning will find her awake and up, busily engaged in exploring the contents of her burdensome mails, writing letters, reading Italian and French newspapers, putting in order her theatrical wardrobe—of which she takes almost the entire charge—or taking an English lesson. From seven until ten o'clock are her hours of quiet. After breakfast the excitement of the day begins, from which there is no escape until midnight. Yet this excitement is reduced to a system, and Ristori, with her profession and consequent interruptions, does an amount of outside work that would astonish even a New England woman. Her order keeps pace with her energy: the practical is not swallowed up in the ideal. Ask Madame Ristori for a needle, and putting her hand in her pocket she will bring forth a needle-case, out of which you can make your own selection. Sometimes, too, you will find her handkerchief tied into several knots, and her morning-gown adorned with scraps of paper pinned down the front, all of which a tale unfold of engagements, commissions, orders, etc., too important to be forgotten, too numerous to carry in the memory, and hence this way of bringing them to mind.

Has it not been said that enough is as good as a feast, and have I not written enough? To do more than faintly sketch a few salient points in Ristori's life would require the broad margin of a book.

THE POND.

It lies in a far-off sphere of light,
Where the land dips down beyond my sight;

And the arid years stand thick between
Me and its shadowy shores of green.

But I pass each day the league-long space
To look once more on its changeless face.

And the hot years part and let me through
To brush by its side the morning dew;

And when I am back the burning street
Grows cool to the tread of my dampened feet.

The pond is cradled from wind and storm
By many a great hill's burly form.

They kneel by its side, and lift on high
Their emerald chalices to the sky—

Kneel with a dumb but answered prayer
To God for the pure, bright sleeper there.

A slope of hemlocks on one side keeps
An odorous silence within its deeps.

To the east the fiery autumn crest
Of a maple grove burns in its breast.

Northward a forest of fir-trees comes
To drop o'er the brink its amber gums.

To the west a mile of tangled swamp
Quakes to the hollow margin damp—

A thicket of alders, roses sweet,
With dark, soft trails for familiar feet.

And sloping between are pasture lots,
With sheep paths winding to shady spots;

And sentinel trees of tough old stock,
And a berry bush beside each rock.

The reaches of pebbles below the groves
Are broken by dark and lilied coves.

Lithe rushes bend on the shallow bars
Over blooms that twinkle like mid-day stars.

Every spot in its wide, green round
To a boy's free heart is enchanted ground.

The turtles sunning on half-sunk logs—
The basso profundo of the frogs—

The wary ducks, and the lonely loons,
The cooling baths in the summer noons—

The musk-rat houses with hidden store,
And the hollow runways 'neath the shore—

The raft of rails, and the oarless boat,
With the straw-hat bail scarce kept afloat—

The wealth of fishes, pike, perch, and trout,
And the mustached, daggered, dangerous pout—

The still, bright smile of its heaven-lit face,
The thrilling touch of its soft embrace—

The spirit of joy in its peaceful flood
All run in my boy-life's quickened blood.

I have floated all day upon its breast
Swinging between two heavens in rest.

I have rowed around it in the night
Under the torch-fire's spectral light.

I have dreamed beside it in sunny days,
And drank the calm of its autumn haze:

It is one with my soul; I can but feel
It is life of my life for woe or weal—

My hope of the dim things yet to be,
My dream, my poem, my prophecy.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

DISRAELI.

MONDAY, February 11, 1867, will ever remain a memorable day to those who were in London. On that day Reform vindicated in a very literal manner the claim of its friend that it "stops the way." Innumerable had been the efforts of the Conservative papers and of the Ministry to induce the leaders of the Reform League to forego the mammoth demonstration, but all the more did placards appear bidding the people rise like lions from their slumbers—rise in unvanquishable numbers—and rise they did, as the writer hereof can testify. Assuming a democratic position on the top of an omnibus that had to go, at whatever cost to the limbs of earth-bound mortals, by way of Charing Cross and through Trafalgar Square, where the various Trades' Companies were to assemble, and at the hour when they were to assemble, I had the satisfaction of finding Oxford Circus and aristocratic Regent Street thronged with men and women, and at the foot of Haymarket of encountering the procession itself, and with it a thick crowd of people, which forbade our vehicle to move at more than a snail's pace, so that it took us nearly an hour to go over the two or three hundred yards intervening between us and St. Martin's Church. The crowd that assembled there but a week before, when the Queen went in state to open Parliament: the crowd that I once saw there as the body of Lord Palmerston was borne to its rest in Westminster Abbey, and many another gathering at that great centre of London, were but small groups beside this, which represented the growing determination of the people to have their will represented in the House of Commons; and I can only recall the event of Garibaldi's entrance into London as furnishing any thing like a similar crowd.

It was, like all the London crowds that I have seen, good-humored; no uproar, but a vast deal of "chaff," greeted the mounted policemen, the riders on the tops of omnibuses, or any one else that furnished a good target. Now and then a popular favorite was discerned and greeted by prolonged cheering. As the crowd slowly streamed past the clubs it was plain that it was for them that the demonstration was chiefly intended, the popular impression—superstition, some call it—being that the Carlton and the Reform clubs are the two places where the Conservatives and the Liberals mature and settle, over wine and cigars, the policies that are announced in Parliaments. The Carlton folks seemed rather amused at the groans it caught, and the Reform received its cheers graciously. One of the heartiest cheers was given at the residence of Minister Adams. The flags and devices of the procession were amusing enough. The bakers carried a roll of bread, elegantly decked with ribbons, on the top of a staff, marked "The staff of life," and each other trade had a similarly appropriate emblem. The political symbols were numerous: among others, there was "The Moon-Raking M.P.," a man mounted on a high wagon with a telescope, with which he swept the smiling face of a huge pasteboard moon, which rep-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google resented Mr. Lowe making his lunar discoveries about the working-classes. The man occasionally diverted his telescope, and also the crowd, by taking a view of Nelson on the top of the monument. The people were not permitted by the police to mount the new lions with which Sir Edwin Landseer has just graced the pedestal of the Nelson monument. These four gigantic crouching lions seemed to me, as they rose above the heads of the multitude, to be symbolical of the still crouching strength of the people; while the little but very conspicuous ornamental lion on the top of Northumberland House turned up its tail and its nose in manifest disgust with the hordes below, and in supreme satisfaction at its altitude above them. Some of the wagons bore bands of minstrels—men and women—singing Reform songs. The finest band sang to delighted listeners a song of which I obtained these verses:

"The time shall come, and even now
There's more than Mill believes:
A government of landlords is
A government of thieves.
And since they've called us ugly names,
Through Bob and Ben, their chief,
They can't complain should we explain
What constitutes a thief.

"Who robs me of my civil right,
My power of self-defense,
Is he not more a thief than he
Who steals alone my pence?—
Than they who thus purloin our rights,
Of whatsoever stamp,
The earth no baser scoundrel knows,
Nor hell a viler scamp."

On the very spot where, if archæologists say truly, the body of Queen Eleanor rested, and left when it moved on to Westminster the chèr Reine, which has now got to be Charing Cross, there stood a group of singers whose ballad was even more personal, as the following specimens of it will show:

"Fellow-workmen, let them know
We won't have such men as Lowe,
Who treat the working-classes all with scorn;
Let them try with all their might,
For the working-men are right,
And they'll get what they are working for—Reform.

"Then banish care and pain,
Never mind old Dicky Mayne,
He says this time he'll not interfere;
He remembers it quite well
How the Hyde Park railings fell—
We his noble staff of poleaxes don't fear."

It may be well to remind the reader that Sir Richard Mayne is the much-despised Chief of the Police, or those who are here called "poleaxes." The song concluded with the following, which was taken up by the crowd and shouted magnificently:

"Then shout with all your might,
God save Gladstone, Beales, and Bright!
Wave our banners, let your ranks closer form,
And let your watch-word be:
'Old England! Liberty!
Manhood Suffrage! Vote by Ballot! and Reform!'"

Then I parted from the crowd; it wended its slow way to the great Agricultural Hall, where the people were to announce for the ten thousandth time their Reform Bill; and I went to a House where the Conservative Ministry were that evening to announce theirs. What a difference in the scene going on amidst these quiet old halls from that surging demonstration outside! And yet there is the feeling of a coming storm all through these soft lights and shimmering frescoes. The Puritans on the wall there, just about to embark from a land torn with convulsions such as may yet return, seemed to look down upon some of the members passing by with significant glances, as who should say: "You are our children; you are the Robinsons and Standishes of to-day; you are voyaging rough seas, but you shall reach your Plymouth Rock also, and found a New England!"

It was hard to believe that the company of fine-looking and well-dressed people on whom one looked in the House of Commons was what the combing and washing and filtration of centuries had brought out of just such a crowd as we had just scrambled through in Trafalgar Square. Yet so it was; and in every voice to-night there is an undertone that reminds the attentive ear of the origin of the body, and also that the cord which binds it to the people of England has not been and can not be cut. Every evasion confesses it as plainly as every frank popular word utters it. The rule of popular opinion in England is to-day a fact, though for a time it is powerful through the fear it inspires rather than by direct influence.

The attendance in the House to hear Disraeli's announcement of the purpose of the Ministry with reference to reform was greater than I have ever seen. The room is, as has been often said, absurdly small, and the presence of the entire Parliament to-night—a thing very unusual—compels a hundred members to sit in the galleries. There is a buzzing conversation going on, but it is always lower when a great occasion is at hand, and to-night the House is openly silent. At length all is quiet; the members rise as one man when the Speaker's ludicrous white wig is seen at the door, preceded by an officer in old knee-breeches, and with gray hair gathered in a queue, who bears the mace, and followed by one just like the mace-bearer, who holds up the tail of Mr. Speaker's gown. Then the parson mumbles through his dead prayer, and the members sit down; and for a few minutes, sitting with their hats on, the Commons need only some ladies in caps and mouse-color to be an ordinary Quaker meeting.

When at length, amidst the most profound silence, Disraeli takes his stand near the table, it is impossible not to be struck with the historic impressiveness of the scene. He is such an intensified Jew that one can not help reflecting for a moment on the many struggles which it has cost ere a Jew could enter Parliament, and then how many more ere he could become

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the leader of the Conservative English party, and stand forth as the Chancellor of the English Exchequer. But there is also written all over Disraeli's face and manner an interesting personal history, which one who listens to him can not dissociate from him even for a moment. Lately an artist showed me a sketch of the man made about thirty-five years ago, when his literary fame was just budding, and when he had just returned from his Eastern travels, the trophies of which were scattered in the room around him as he stood, a glowing and even beautiful young man, a little under thirty years of age. "Vivian Grey," "The Young Duke," "Henrietta Temple," "Contarini Fleming," "Venetia," "The Wondrous Tale of Alroy" were the laurels which in those days the enthusiastic world of fashion saw twined about his brow wherever he went; but above all there was written deep upon his brow Ambition. In England all high ambition lies in the direction of the House of Commons. It may be, and probably is, true, as Disraeli has himself said, that so soon as it became finally understood that the Commons held the taxing power it held the eye, ear, and heart of England, and that then and thenceforth all classes rushed to get place and power in it. Certainly it has become the goal of every youth's ambition. Looking on the picture of the young Disraeli to which I have referred, one can imagine the sensation when that queer combination of dandy, actor, and man of genius first leaped on the political stage. He naturally took to political jugglery; and though his dress was of the latest Western fashion, there was a certain wild, dark look about him, and a strange Orientalism of manner that assisted him in the work of bewildering and fascinating the prosaic English people.

He at once began with the trick of keeping in the air at an equal height all the various and antagonistic measures of the day—the ballot, triennial parliaments, agricultural preponderance in government—and rode the ring with one foot on plain economical Joseph Hume, and the other on the Tory Duke of Buckingham. At length his dexterity triumphed, and, with all his spangles on, he appeared in the House of Commons. This was in 1837. He had told O'Connell that he would meet him at Philippi, and here he was. On the evening when he was to make his début there was a tremendous muster of Conservatives, and the agitation of the Whigs was extreme, the impression being general that it was a Saladin who was about to appear, whose sword could part the falling veil, while that of Sir Robert Peel was cleaving iron bars. What was the joyful surprise on one side, and the rigid horror on the other, at the famous result of Disraeli's first speech! Sir Robert Peel fairly shouted out his cheers as the speaker began, but in vain. The orator began by assuming the most ludicrously affected attitude, and the flourishes and flowers of his language were in such contrast with the paucity of his ideas that the members began to titter, and as he went on there arose such shouts of uncontainable laughter all over the House that Disraeli began to stammer, and presently broke down completely. As he took his seat he said, in words which show the confusion and embarrassment under which he labored, but also the power that was in him: "I have begun many things several times, and have often succeeded at last. I shall sit down now, but the time will come when you will hear me." Thenceforth for over two years Disraeli sat in the House with no more sign of life in him than was exhibited by one of its carved griffins. Cold, moody, with brow lowering over eyes ever bent downward, the clangor of party war and the fierce encounters of splendid combatants went on around him, but he sits like one under a spell. Nevertheless, "Young England" still read his marvelously eloquent tales, and still worshiped him; and at length he feels that the time has come when the door of opportunity is again open to him.

When next Disraeli rose to his feet it was plain that the man of wood had been for three or four years all eyes and ears; that he had scented out, like an Indian, every man's position and every man's weakness. Long before 1841 the House was aware that a new power had entered it, but not until then was it manifested what kind of power it was. In that year Sir Robert Peel began to develop his Free Trade policy, and at him Disraeli struck his first blow. From that time the most memorable invectives known to parliamentary annals were poured forth against Peel by the new orator—for orator he plainly was. All the flowers of his early effort had become now the rhetorical sheath of a Damascus blade; his butterflies had changed to wasps; under their stings Peel's eyes visibly started from his head. At last, after six years of this, he drove the great Tory chief from power forever, and took his place. No cruelties of vivisection ever surpassed those maddening attacks, and yet the reader of those wonderful debates in Hansard, ranging from 1841 to 1846—and few things are so well worth looking up—is struck by nothing more than the artistic courtesy, the ingenious display of anæsthetic mitigation where the victim is to receive only poisoned knives, and each on a nerve. Every word seems a solemn and painful necessity of the State; every word is, when the gilt is rubbed off, discovered to be a bullet aimed at a man with purely murderous intent. Why did Disraeli hate Peel? He stood between him and the leadership of the great historic party of England.

When at length the tomb of Peel became his pedestal it was shown that Disraeli's success had defined his habitat. He did not again make a great mark in Parliament until Lord John Russell was being overhauled for his diplomatic proceedings in Vienna during the Crimean war. Some one said that Dante never imagined such a hell as Lord John had to endure on one occasion for two hours. Disraeli, leaning on the table, poured forth a withering sirocco of scorn

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

under which the poor little nobleman shrank gradually to such a mere point that it seemed he would vanish altogether. He did not now as in Sir Robert's case veil his dagger, but let its light flash through every part of the House ere he finally plunged it through his victim's heart. For it did go through his heart, and Russell, though he has received every attention in the sick wards of the House of Lords, to which he was removed in 1861, has never recovered, and never can recover.

In estimating Disraeli's success, and deciding whether or not it is creditable to the House of Commons—resting as it did on no great capacity to deal with principles, but solely upon the power of eloquent denunciation—it must be remembered that Parliament had become in the last generation formal to the extent of commonplace and polite to the verge of dullness. The time for a reaction had come, and Disraeli had the acumen to see it. The blasé gentlemen pined for a new spice, and here was a traveler who brought back the most stinging curry ever known. But man can not live on mustard alone. Parliamentary palates wearied of the dish. They looked to the last successful caterer for a new one; and this he tried hard to supply in 1852, when, as Chancellor of the Exchequer under Lord Derby, he began his rôle as a Reformer. But now he appeared helpless. A wading bird on a mountain, a yacht on the great desert, could not be more helpless than the Right Hon. B. Disraeli with work called for which no amount of oratory or political vivisection could do. His Reform speeches—they have lately been all, except the last, printed in a volume—bear witness that he had studied up the subject completely; but they still more prove that he had no heart for it. Nothing could be more affected than this talk; he warns England against permitting the working-classes to preponderate in her Parliament, while it is evident that he has not the slightest fear of such preponderance; his deprecation of the subversive tendencies of the age is so mock as to be funny. The unreality of these speeches is sublime. The people felt it. In comparing the popular phrases that used to express the general feeling with regard to Disraeli's earlier efforts with those that one finds in every penny paper now, one may discern a fresh reason to trust the critical instinct of the crowd.

Mr. Ewing Ritchie, an old habitué of the Stranger's Gallery, wrote of Disraeli: "We do not read that he was eloquent, argumentative, pathetic, or patriotic. You speak of him as you would of Tom Sayers. His admirers tell you that he was 'in good condition'—that he 'showed fight'—that he was 'plucky as usual'—that he 'hit right and left'—that he was 'up to the mark,'" etc. But now for years—certainly ever since his Reform bill of 1859—the metaphors of the street concerning him have been histrionic. He does the "country gentleman trick"—he "takes his benefit"—he "came out in the third act"—he "did the indignation well." There can be no question that a man of whom the people habitually speak thus must lose his power just as fast as questions become imminent and the times earnest. The growth of popular intelligence in England has seriously outgrown the antique forms upon which the privileged class rests; for fifteen years or more the line was becoming sharper between those who would defend the old and those who will have the new, insomuch that those who would sit on the fence have been generally cut in twain by it. But here was a nimble fellow who showed that he could dance hornpipes on the dangerous edge, leaning now to one, and now to the other side; and for a time this was amusing, but the people have become weary of it.

Under these circumstances the artist promises a new trick, and his friends whisper about that it will end in distributing from his hat to the crowd all the measures that the people demand. It was plain that the old reformers knew better, for they had distributed a printed resolution to be adopted at their meeting in Agricultural Hall declaring that the Reform measures introduced by the Tory Ministry were deceptive and unsatisfactory; which, of course, was printed beforehand, for when the curtain rose in Parliament there was no Reform bill, but some vague resolutions.

Nevertheless the rank and file of the people hoped for something — they have always believed that Disraeli has a revolutionary heart, and if he had any heart they would be right—and so they assembled at Islington, and made arrangements to have the proceedings in Westminster Hall telegraphed to them point for point as the Chancellor of the Exchequer should develop them. Disraeli knew all this. He heard the distant roar of the multitude as he drove in his coach to the House. He felt the dismal silence as he passed through the crowd at the door, and felt its contrast with the cheers that echoed far into the lobbies as Gladstone or Bright alighted and entered. All this made the impressive scenery amidst which the old actor again came forward before the lights. How changed is he now from the handsome youth of the picture which I have before described! The raven locks have grown thin, and of them one remains in front that might have been once a curl, but is now the coil of a serpent, on the centre of his forehead; the fine aquiline nose has become hooked and thin; every rapier whose edge an adversary has felt, it now seems, had left its scar in the deep lines of his own face also. And yet the grace of the form is still there, and power has not deserted its throne on his marble brow. Shall we see the man to-night? All feel that he is there for a purpose not his own; he has been assigned by the manager a part, which is to hold a spangled veil to amuse the eye with fine mottoes about England and the Constitution, and what not, and try and induce the people to believe that it is a solid cube, and the gems on it real

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

gold and diamonds, while it is all rag and paste, behind which Reform is spirited away.

The thing that chiefly struck me at the outset was, that a Ministry—and one claiming particularly to represent old and historic England—should put up this man to respond to that great roar of the lion outside. He is the most un-English man I ever saw. Of those who sat near me in the Speaker's gallery one remarked what a superb Il Diavolo he would make for a manager; another ventured the theory that "Dizzy was really the Wandering Jew;" and others made their several criticisms—for his appearance always evokes a personal comment—but all assumed that he was as a strange, foreign bird that had come from some alien land and alighted among a wondering world of English rooks, robins, and the like. It seemed to me, all through this speech, and through others that I have heard from him, that the feeling of this want of relation to the English people of any class is the constant and pressing trouble in Disraeli's breast; and I have observed that the journals here, like the Saturday Review, which hate him most put their bitterest gall into some such phrase as—"Mr. Disraeli, with his usual" (or "natural" they often write it) "inability to understand the feelings of Englishmen," etc. I have observed something of the same look of isolation in the one or two speeches which I have heard Mr. Benjamin make in the United States Senate; and in that case as in this the feeling in the man was no doubt largely reflected from the members around him, who looked upon him as a political gipsy.

During this speech of Disraeli's there was a passage in which he referred to the opposition with which the Derby Reform bill of 1859 had been met, and said: "With the greatest respect—without the slightest desire to give offense to any member of the House, which would be foreign to my nature—I must at once say that the country upon this question can not bear a repetition of the manœuvres of 1859." I was at this moment looking through an opera-glass at Gladstone, who was sitting in his slouchy way with his hat bent over his eyes, but as Disraeli said these words the Liberal leader raised his head and leveled at the speaker a look full of scorn—a look which said as plainly as if he had thundered it through the House, "You pretend to speak for this country and say what it will or will not bear!" Disraeli's eyes fell on the instant as they met those of Gladstone—he shrank back a moment, and for the only time in the course of his speech stammered in the next sentence. Adventurer he felt himself to be in the eyes even of the party he led, to say nothing of the eyes of Russell and of the aged reformer Earl Grey, which also glared on him.

In the present condition of the struggle which absorbs attention in England it is almost impossible for any journal or public man to do justice to this last effort of Disraeli as a work of art—for a great oration is perhaps the consummate work of art. The rule of a political battle in England is: Concede nothing; Deny every thing; and so the marvelous ability, the undeniable genius, shown in this oration have not in any paper that I have seen been truly stated. Doubtless to English ears there was a hollow ring, which, to one listening from a literary standpoint, did not mar the effect. Certainly there are not three men living who could have made so powerful and so brilliant an oration as that which Disraeli made on this occasion. He had not the calm, frank simplicity of Wendell Phillips; he has not the fiery force of Bright; he has not the almost poetic felicity of Mr Lowe. But he is in no sense inferior to these in subtlety, and he has a philosophical comprehensiveness, and a grace of diction equal to that of Gladstone, which is saying a great deal, and he has much of the various characteristics of all the orators I have just named. In epigrammatic statement no English and few French statesmen can compete with him, and his manner of making such statements is vivid in the extreme. Instances of this abounded in this last speech. Every mind felt the strength of his words when he said, roundly, looking straight at John Bright as he spoke, "Do gentlemen mean to reconstruct this House on the principles of the English Constitution or on the principles of the Constitution of another country?" In this sentence was concentrated every charge made against the Bright school of preferring America to England. In speaking of the rush of all classes to gain strength in the House of Commons because of its supremacy as the power of England, he said, "People complain of the influence, the undue influence, of the Peerage in the House of Commons. Why, Sir, the influence of the Peerage in this House is not a usurpation of our rights; it is a deference to our authority." And again: "Every class and every interest has sought, and to a great degree has obtained, representation in this House. That is the cause of the variety of our character. But it is the variety of our character that has given us our deliberative power. It is our deliberative power that has given us our hold upon the executive; and it is this hold upon the executive which is the best, ay, the only security for the freedom we enjoy." The clearness and quietness with which these generalizations of the historic development of England were given could not fail to kindle a company of cultivated Englishmen, and the orator was rewarded by the only round of hearty cheers which he received during the evening.

But it was in his peroration that Disraeli's particular quality as a parliamentary orator was shown. Standing a little back from the table, leaning one hand on the box which held the seals of his office, he lowered his voice, and in slow, even stately periods, said, in reply to the criticisms upon the past faults and present inadequacy of the House of Commons: "I do not doubt that this human institution is not free from the imperfections of humanity. It

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

is possible that there may have been periods when even the integrity of the House of Commons might successfully have been impugned. I know well—we all know—that there have been times when its conduct has been unjust, violent, even tyrannical. If you search our records unquestionably you will find conclusions on many subjects that are at variance with those doctrines which are the happier appanage of our more enlightened times. But, Sir, there is no greater error than to judge the morals of one age by the manners of a subsequent one. There is no greater error than to decide upon the passions of perilous times with the philosophic calmness of assured security. There is no greater error than to gauge the intellect of the past by its deficiencies, not by the slow progress of human systems. Those who take a larger and nobler view of human affairs will, I think, recognize that, alone in the countries of Europe, England now for almost countless generations has by her Parliament exhibited the fair example of free government; and that in the course of the vicissitudes of her heroic history she has, chiefly by this House of Commons, maintained and cherished that public spirit which is the soul of commonwealths, without which empire has no glory, and the wealth of nations is a source of corruption and decay."

Had these words been uttered by an unknown man—by a man not standing upon a platform which the English people have marked as that of political atheism—I am persuaded that their substance and tone would have electrified any intelligent public assembly. Studied they are, but the best things are generally studied. Nevertheless, to those who listened, their art was artifice, their perfection theatrical. John Bright turned his head as if in weariness. Gladstone affected sleepiness. But Mill, I saw, listened with respect, for he finds too much difficulty in thinking hardly of any man to do it often. The solemn tones had hardly died away, as the speaker sat down, when I heard a distinguished politician, who sat just before me, turn and say to another by his side, "Which hat is the joker under, think you?" "Re-distribution of seats," was the dry reply. So far, I am persuaded, and only so far, did the fine speech go in the ear of the country; and that must be taken as measure of the depth from which it came.

When Gladstone rose, and from his gathering brow the first flashes of the coming storm darted across the table, Disraeli had already hardened to stone. But he must have felt that the steps of Fate were in the air. There was a strange anger in Gladstone's eye, and his very nose — it was in the nose that Winkelmann found the wrath of Apollo slaying the Python—had a horny expression. It was evident that he had not forgiven the foul blow under which he had fallen last year on his first trial as leader of the House. If I am not mistaken, the greater power of sarcasm is with Gladstone; and, though the duel will be long and terrible, the probabilities are that Disraeli will yet discover all the agonies which Peel suffered twenty years ago under his own remorseless pursuit. He has climbed high, and that by extraordinary faculties, and despite unfavorable circumstances; for in nature there is no luck, but it takes an ounce to balance an ounce. But as is his height, such must be the ruin of his fall, if he does fall.

CRETE.

THE Island of Crete requires no aid from contemporary events to arouse the interest of the intelligent reader. There is much in her past history to attract and entertain. "Beautiful of situation," with a glorious climate and noble scenery abounding in stirring landscapes, her mountains became the scene of legend and romance from the earliest period. Jove in his infancy was cradled on the snowy summits of her Idæan crags; Homer sang of her hundred cities, and her hundred prores plowing their way to the Sigean shores, and her hero, Idomeneus, battling "far on the ringing plains of windy Troy." In remote antiquity the Cretans formed a confederacy of miniature democracies, living in tolerable concord, and governed by a code said to have been introduced by Minos, and copied in many of its features by Lycurgus at a later period. But, like the Swiss, the Cretans, although sturdy republicans, did not disdain to serve as mercenaries in most of the wars of ancient Greece, while they rarely felt enough Hellenism to side with the other Greeks as allies. Their triremes scoured the seas the corsairs of old, plundering merchant galleys laden with Tyrian stuffs, the gems of the East, and the grain of the Nile. The legionaries of Rome marched through the gorges of Crete, but failed to reduce the island until after their first army had ignominiously perished.

From the first the islanders developed a love of independence, which has clung to them as a distinguishing and ennobling trait among many vices and through long ages of oppression. The Byzantines, the Saracens, the Latins, and the Ottomans have successively held possession of Crete. A band of roving Saracens from Spain touched on the island, and were so captivated by its charms that they returned with forty galleys and plundered the villages; but in seeking the coast to re-embark, lo! their vessels were in flames. Abu Caab, their leader, had anticipated the famous feat of Cortéz; he had covertly set the fleet on fire with a purpose of remaining, and to the clamors of his followers replied: "Of what do you complain? Here is your true country; repose from your toils, and forget the barren place of your nativity." They listened and obeyed, married their female captives, and established a city which they called Candax, a name since corrupted to Candia and applied to the whole island. For one hundred and thirty years their rovers swept the seas, and revived the ill repu-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tation of Crete as a nest of pirates. With the exception of the inhabitants of Kydonia, the Cretans at this period embraced Islamism, the creed of their conquerors.

In 960 Nikephorus Phokas, one of the few military heroes who relieved the decline of the Byzantine throne from its disgraceful inefficiency, laid siege to Candia; seven months were consumed before the walls of a city destined in a later age to sustain the most protracted siege known in history; and even after the storming of the defenses a hand-to-hand conflict was maintained in the streets before the place fell into the hands of the Greeks, and with it the whole island. All the Cretans were now baptized into the Greek Church, and Nikephorus was rewarded with a triumph in Constantinople and the purple.

Baldwin, the crusader, was the successor of the Byzantines in Crete; then came the Genoese and the Count of Montferrat, who sold Candia to the Venetians for 10,000 marks. For three centuries the Queen City of the Sea had undisturbed sway over the valleys of Crete, one of the brighest gems in her diadem. But in an evil hour the Sultana Kœsem, the mother of Ibrahim Sultan, who, by her genius, ruled both her son and the Ottoman Empire, conceived the scheme of subjugating Crete. She was seconded in her project by the Grand-Vizier Yousouf Pasha. A Dalmatian by birth, he was a natural enemy of Venice. While still a barefoot urchin running about the streets of Vrania, his native place, he attracted the attention of a Turkish official riding through the town, who carried him off to Constantinople. With good looks and ready tact and talent at his command, he mounted the successive steps so often trod by those who rise from the lowest grades of society to eminence in the courts of the East, and in due time became Grand-Vizier or Prime Minister, and second in power only to the Sultan himself. When he had reached this perilous height he still cherished his hereditary hatred toward the Venetians, and gave a willing ear to the plans of the Queen-Mother. To conquer Crete would be to ravish from Venice one of her principal sources of revenue and prestige, and overthrow one of the bulwarks of Christendom. Appointed Generalissimo of the land and naval forces of the expedition, and married to the Sultan's daughter before his departure, Yousouf landed on the shores of Crete with a hundred thousand men. The island was speedily overrun, and Canéa, the capital, captured after a three months' siege, and Yousouf Pasha then returned to Constantinople for supplies and to refit his armament for the reduction of the strong-hold of Candia. His enemies chose to make the Sultan believe in his unfaithfulness to his command.

"Return to Crete at once or die!" were the words with which the capricious monarch welcomed his triumphant General.

"My liege," responded Yousouf, astonished at his master's unreasonable demands, "you are unversed in naval affairs; our galleys have no rowers, and ships can not put to sea without oars."

"Wretch!" cried Ibrahim, "do you presume to teach me!" Then turning to an attendant, said: "Bring me his head!"

The fate of Yousouf was but the lot of half the Grand-Viziers of Turkey, some of them men of commanding intellect and magnanimous character. His career is only one of many instances in her history of men who from low degree have soared to the second place in the realm, poised on that dizzy eminence a month, a year, perhaps a decade, and then fallen in an hour like an eagle gazing on the sun, pierced to the heart by the fatal arrow, and in a moment dropping lifeless to the depths below.

For many years longer the war in Crete and the siege of Candia lingered without reaching a decisive result, until the accession of Mohammed IV. His favorite wife Gulneish was a Cretan by birth, and desired the island as an appanage whose revenues should swell her allowance of pin-money. Achmed Kuprili, the second of that name and the greatest of Turkey's Grand-Viziers, having added a large slice of Christian territory to the Ottoman Empire, notwithstanding a defeat at St. Gothard, was desirous of giving the finishing touch to his administration by the conquest of Candia.

Morosini, one of the best soldiers of the time, held the place with the flower of the Christian chivalry; and during the siege the garrison was reinforced by frequent arrivals of heroes from all parts of Christendom, anxious to break a lance in this apparently final grapple with the Antichrist. Vauban, the great engineer, and many others of scarcely less note, fought behind the seemingly impregnable battlements of Candia, and repelled the oft-repeated assaults of the janizaries, the most redoubtable warriors of those bloody times.

On one occasion the Duke de Beaufort arrived from France with many gentlemen and powerful reinforcements. Hardly were they landed when, rash and enthusiastic, and disdaining the advice of the experienced Morosini, they sallied out against the janizaries. But few ever returned. The Duke de Beaufort never reappeared. Kuprili made search for his body, but in vain. As, on the defeat of Don Roderic, legends were long floating about the island that, humiliated by his reverse, the lost Duke had escaped to the mountains and was seen at intervals dwelling in the caves, a hermit devoted to penitence and prayer, until sight and memory of him alike passed away.

In September, 1629, two years and three months after Kuprili opened the trenches, the city fell, the blockade of the place having been maintained for twenty-three years. Over 30,000 Christians and 120,000 Turks were sacrificed during the siege, and the defense has been a model in the conduct of many a subsequent defense. The conquest of Candia was the last great triumph of the Ottoman arms, and it has

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google remained in the hands of the Turks to this day, a period of 238 years.

The Turks divided the island into three pashalics or satrapies, and would seem to have taken stronger root there than in most of their Christian possessions. They have intermarried with the Greeks, and, by reason of religious oppression, many of the Christians have, during the lapse of ages, nominally embraced Islamism; although, as a general thing, these proselytes have practiced their old rites in secret, and transmitted the observance of this double religion to their posterity. The reader will be reminded by this circumstance of those Moors of Spain who became outwardly Catholics after the fall of Grenada, but who practiced Mohammedanism in private; instances existing even to our time. So intermixed had races and religions become in some parts of Crete that it gave rise to a proverb long current in the Archipelago, when reference was made to the Cretans: Τοῦρκος εἶσε Μουσταφά; Τοῦρκος εἶμαι μά τήν Παναγιά, which is, by interpretation, "Are you a Turk, Moustapha? I swear by the Holy Virgin I am a Turk." As religion in the Levant has more to do with nationality than race, to be a Turk is to be a Mussulman, and for a Mussulman to swear by the Virgin Mary is an impossibility any where but in Crete, where many of the nominal Turks are secret Christians.

Notwithstanding this mixing of races, the Christians of Crete have been treated with an oppression rare even under the Ottoman rule, and it has rather tended to stimulate the vices inherent in the Cretan character—impatience of law, venality, cunning, and treachery. It has taught them also their mode of bush-fighting common with most of the modern Greeks, and so like Indian warfare—hiding behind a thicket or a rock, and thence blazing away at the foe. The narrow gorges of the Cretan mountains afford excellent facilities for this kind of tactics, which is by no means incompatible with genuine valor; but in the case of the modern Greek it has become such an inborn characteristic, that he is liable to lose his presence of mind if he can not rest his musket on the edge of an earth-work or the crotch of an old olive-tree.

On the southern side of Crete is a small canton called Sphakia, whose inhabitants differ in some respects from the other Cretans. They are supposed to represent the Pelasgic aborigines who peopled the island before the Hellenes appeared on the stage of history. Mostly shepherds, and only a few thousand in number, they have always maintained a semi-independence of the Turkish yoke, like the Maniotes, the descendants of the ancient Spartans, and the sturdy Armenian mountaineers of Zeitun, in Asia Minor—subdued only within a few years, after centuries of stubborn resistance. Often defeated, the Sphakiotes as often escaped to the mountains, to return to their villages on the departure of the invader, and resisted payment of tribute to the time of the Greek Revolution.

When that war broke out the Greek cruisers appeared off the island; but after the first panic was over the Turks became so exasperated that they began to massacre the Christians. The Sphakiotes having scoffed at a summons to give up their arms—being encouraged to such a course by their hero Melidori—the Turks prepared to go against them; but as they waited for the conclusion of the annual festivities of Bairám, the Sphakiotes collected a force of 1200 muskets, and defeated the Turks at Loulo. Another check received at the hands of the brothers Kormouli so enraged the Moslems that they massacred over a thousand of both sexes in the city of Candia and elsewhere, including the ten bishops of Crete.

During the summer many combats took place, in which Antonio Melidori was conspicuous on account of his patriotism and unwavering courage. Before the breaking out of the Revolution he had spent some months traveling through Asia Minor and the Archipelago, preparing the Greeks for the approaching revolt. On the 18th of July the Turks were routed with great loss at Askoupi, near Retymo, leaving their baggage and artillery on the field. But the Sphakiotes, after plundering the plains on the northern side of the Idæan slope, returned to Sphakia to divide the booty, which movement enabled the Turks to storm the intrenchments of Therison; and in the September following an army of about 10,000 janizaries, guided by a treacherous priest, entered the Sphakiote canton, burned the villages, and drove the people of that and the neighboring districts into the mountains or on board of their coasters. Lack of provisions, however, soon compelled the invaders to retreat to their fortified towns, where the Christians, who had been hitherto spared, were now put to the sword. During this period of the insurrection an enthusiasm pervaded the Cretans which, had it continued, might have enabled them to hush the clamors of discord and achieve their freedom. During an attack on Therison the Greek women animated their defenders by their presence, and supplied them with fruits and drink. A peasant girl, carrying a jar of water on her shoulder, had it broken by a ball; but, undaunted, she went on to the Greek lines with a basket of grapes.

At this time Melidori and Zervas were dispatched to the Morea to procure reinforcements and ammunition, and a military leader to assume general command of the Cretan forces. It was but a small supply of powder that they could obtain, but Michael Comnenus Affendouli was appointed to the Cretan department, and arrived at Loutro in November. In the mean time the insurgents had reappeared and laid siege to Canea, and after cutting the water-pipes that led into the city, reduced the garrison to great straits. But, with the inconstancy so characteristic of irregular soldiery, and particularly of Greek palikars, when the rainy season set in the besiegers fell back.

Affendouli was well received by all classes,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and seems to have been a man of fair administrative capacity; but, whatever might have been his military talents, he certainly was but ill qualified to conduct the partisan warfare of Crete, and control the rude, unstable spirits under his command. The Sphakiotes—brave, but treacherous, and despising the other Cretans, or Lowlanders, as they called them—required a leader of consummate skill and iron hand.

During the winter considerable supplies and reinforcements arrived, and the Cretans took the field early in the year with a force of near 7000 men—2400, under General Papadaki, in the western part of the island; 3000, under Rousso and other chieftains, near the centre; while Antonio Melidori guarded the defiles of Mount Ida with a partisan band varying in number from 200 to 1000, but making its mark wherever it struck, until the fame of Melidori rang from one end of Crete to the other—a name to kindle the courage of his fellow-countrymen, and fill the heart of the Turk with terror.

But to oppose the Candiote forces the Ottomans had from 20,000 to 25,000 men well provided with all the munitions of war, besides twenty-seven strong-holds, and the neutrality of a good portion of the islanders—for many of the Cretans remained indifferent to the cause for which their brethren were in arms; so that the contest from the outset had a very one-sided appearance, by no means reassuring to the insurgents. However, the blockade of Canea, for siege it could not be called, was resumed with some prospect of success, and the city would have fallen if there had been more concert in the disposal of the Cretan army. But Affendouli was more skillful in wording proclamations than manœuvring battalions, and the Cretans themselves, by their own misconduct, brought matters for a time to a crisis unfavorable to their independence.

Antonio Melidori, by his many exploits and disinterested patriotism—patriotic where genuine patriotism was so rarely a dominant principle—had won the friendship of the commander-in-chief, and had been promoted. This gave umbrage to the turbulent Sphakiotes, whose little souls regarded the contest as only a question whether the Sphakiote or the Ottoman should be tyrant of Crete. A band of Sphakiotes in the command of Melidori sacked the hovel of a defenseless old woman, and their captain compelled the robbers to restore the spoil; but as they did so they exclaimed "that his tomb was open," which means, in the figurative language of the East, that his doom was sealed. A plot to assassinate him was concocted by the Sphakiotes, Melidori's own brother-in-law, Anaguosti, and Captain Rousso being the principals in this iniquitous scheme. Antonio having crowned his previous exploits by capturing a Turkish village and exterminating the garrison, was invited to a feast by Rousso and Anagnosti, where he was to receive the congratulations of his countrymen for his victory. As the roasted lamb disappeared and the wine began to circulate Rousso sought to pick a quarrel with his guest; but failing in this, attempted to slay him, on which Melidori mounted and departed; but his brother-in-law followed and besought him to return, offering to bring about a reconciliation. In the act of embracing him Rousso plunged a dagger into his bosom.

The Turks fired a salute on learning of the fall of their great enemy; Melidori's friends quit the camp in great indignation; and Rousso being cashiered, all his adherents also left; and the insurgent army was so much reduced that all operations in the pashalic of Candia were brought to a stand. Melidori was one of the few heroes of the Greek Revolution whose fame is untarnished by the imputation of sordid ends: the purity of his aims, the breadth of his views, the noble simplicity of his character, and the valor he displayed during his brief military career remind us of Aristomenes, Leonidas, and other heroes of ancient Greece. He was worthy of a wider influence and a longer life, crowned by deeds more lasting in their consequences to posterity than any he was allowed to achieve. Miss Mulock, now Mrs. Craik, in a volume of romantic sketches written long years ago, has a spirited tale founded on the exploits of the Cretan hero, although it is not entirely reliable as a historic narrative.

In April Colonel Balesto arrived in Candia with a band of Samians, and was ordered to the command of the district of Retymo. Instead of the army promised him, he found at Kogsare a paltry 800, but succeeded in raising the force to 1200; but on attempting a reconnoissance his men began to fall away, and the approach of Easter rather tended to encourage desertion. (N.B.—When the Greeks begin to think less of their 150 holy days, and attach more value to matters of importance, there will be some hope of their progress and success as a nation.) In the mean time the Ottoman forces opposing Balesto were increased, but notwithstanding were worsted in an engagement on the plain of Castello. As the days went by, and it became more and more apparent that the increasing scarcity of provisions would leave him without a man, Balesto resolved to hazard an attack on the Turkish intrenchments. The Turks were about 4000 strong; and by great effort Balesto contrived to collect about the same number of men for the emergency; for the irregular Cretan soldiery are in the habit of collecting and dispersing rapidly. At the last moment he was informed that his men had only six cartridges apiece. To attack under the circumstances was folly; and messengers were dispatched to Sphakia for ammunition. At this juncture the Turks quit their works and fell on the Greeks; for three-quarters of an hour the combat was evenly balanced, but was finally decided by the treachery of the Sphakiote contingent, who had taken a prejudice to Balesto, and, as is asserted, had sworn his destruction. In the heat of the fight they fled; and Balesto fell into the hands of the Turks, who cut off his head and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google right arm. The preceding narrative will give the reader some notion of the way in which the Cretan rebellion was conducted, and how hopeless was the contest from the outset unless foreign intervention could solve the problem, which it was beyond the capacity of the natives to grapple successfully.

To go into the details of the campaign of 1822 and 1823 would be a thankless task. It is sufficient to say that Affendouli was obliged to resign his command, and Admiral Tombazi, a noted seaman of Hydra, was chosen to succeed him. Alternate victories and defeats and equal cruelty and bad faith characterized the fortunes of both sides, until the perpetual quarrels of the Cretans were taken advantage of by Mustafa Bey, who gave them a notable defeat at Amourgeli, from which they never recovered. Before going into winter-quarters the Ottomans ravaged the island, and either put to the sword or sold into slavery over 10,000 Cretans. All but the Sphakiotes laid down their arms, multitudes of the Christians emigrated to other islands, and the insurrection was apparently at an end. In the spring the Ottomans swept the island with 20,000 men; and the Sphakiotes, out of hatred to the "Lowlanders," who would not submit to their leadership, entered into private terms of capitulation. While many burrowed in the caves of the mountains or fled to the neighboring isles, thousands met with slavery or death, and the chains of Crete were forged stronger than ever. It is some consolation to our notions of justice to know that the Sphakiote captains were rewarded for their treason with a dungeon, among them Rousso, the murderer of Melidori.

Off the western coast of Crete is a small islet named Karabusa, crowned by an impregnable fortress, and this was surprised by a band of Cretans in 1825, and many of those who had fled from Candia returned and settled on this castellated rock; but so thickly were they collected there that starvation carried them off by thousands, and many of the survivors left. But the strength of the fortress and the difficulty of blockading it suggested to two clever Cretans, named Antoniades and Economos, the feasibility of turning it into a piratical rendezvous. The Cretans, as has been before observed, have always taken kindly to this infamous craft. The aforementioned brace of knaves purchased a schooner, which made a very successful voyage; and, stimulated by this interesting result, a number of Sphakiotes living there fitted out another vessel, and the example was speedily followed by exiles connected with the first families of Crete. A quasi government was established, assuming to represent the four divisions of Crete, and dignified by loud-sounding titles, the whole under the direction of Economos and Antoniades, who, however, took good care to keep behind the scenes while they pulled the wires. In order to mask their knavery a band occasionally landed on the coast of Crete, and returned with a great flourish of trumpets after worrying the life out of a few poor Turks, all of which was carefully reported, whereby Philhellenic benevolence was imposed upon and amerced in considerable sums for the support of the war of independence in Crete! In the mean time affairs went on swimmingly with our picarooning adventurers. Their success attracted shoals of villains from all parts of the archipelago, every person on the rock becoming a shareholder in a joint-stock company organized to plunder the commerce of all nations, including that of the Greeks themselves. Some hundred dwellings arose within the castle, and the company owned, as part of its stock, a force of forty-eight brigs and schooners. Warehouses were erected for storing the captured goods, and the wine-shops rang with the revelry of the roystering crews. The isle swarmed with brokers purchasing the stolen property, and the buccaneers of the Spanish Main seemed to have come to life again in the Ægean; although it is doubtful whether such a complete system of piracy was ever before organized, for the Greeks are shrewd beyond the shrewdest in business matters, the chief difficulty being that they are often so shrewd as to practice dishonesty when there is no occasion for it, and thereby in the end overreach themselves. It is not our purpose, nor do our limits allow us, to dwell longer on this disgraceful episode in the Greek Revolution. Impelled by the threats of the European admirals in those seas, and by other reasons, the freebooters finally gave themselves seriously to the work of reviving the insurrection in Crete. Two thousand mercenaries were procured, and, with about as many from Karabusa, were landed at St. Nicholas. After various fortunes this, like previous attempts, failed, on account of the feuds existing between the Christians recruited from different portions of Crete. In the interval a squadron of English and French men-of-war, comprising nine sail, and with a detachment of infantry on board, appeared off Karabusa. The artful negotiations that now occurred, the burning of that part of the piratical fleet which had not absconded in time, the loss of the Cambria frigate, the final capture of the place by stratagem, and the utter uprooting of this piratical nest, form a curious narrative. That the overthrow of Karabusa was not an easy task may be inferred from the fact that there were at least 2500 desperate fighting men behind the fortifications.

After the fall of Karabusa Hadji Mihali, a cavalry officer of some note in the Greek Revolution, who had stopped at Karabusa on his way to Crete with a corps of Roumeliotes, landed on the Sphakiote coast, but received assistance neither in the way of provisions nor men. Reduced to great distress, he finally surprised a Turkish detachment, routed them, and captured among other items 20,000 sheep, with which he returned to his strong-hold of Franco Castello, an old Venetian fortress on the coast. On this the Turkish general, Mustafa Pasha, marched on Franco Castello with over 5000 men

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and two pieces of artillery. As the captured sheep filled the court-yard of the castle, Hadji Mihali posted all his force, numbering about 700 men, behind low earth-works called tambouries. One redoubt was held by Captain Kyriakouli with 100 picked men, who tied their legs together in a chain with their girdles, and swore to hold the spot or die. They all fell at their posts but one who fled; and long after a row of skeletons could be seen bleaching there, bound with shreds of weather-worn girdles. Hadji Mihali was cut to pieces; 270 Roumeliotes escaped into the castle, where they found themselves with meat enough and to spare, but no water. They were forced to surrender, and on giving their parole not again to serve against the Sultan in Crete, were provided with provisions, their wounded were carefully tended, and they were allowed to sail away. The whole affair, so heroic on the part of the vanquished, so generous on the part of the victor, is the most interesting episode of the kind in the Greek Revolution.

As if to give the other side of the picture, the Sphakiotes—who would not fight when others were ready, but fought when their valor could be of little use—now turned out, and held the passes by which Mustafa Pasha must return. Without heeding the amnesty he proclaimed, they persisted until they reduced him to great extremity. At this crisis, when the consummation of Cretan independence hung in the balance, Mustafa, aware of Sphakiote cupidity, summoned a council of war, in which it was decided to abandon all the baggage to the enemy. The bait took. Dazzled by the sight of so much plunder, the Sphakiotes seized the spoil before them, but allowed the Ottoman army to escape, and with it their freedom fled from their grasp for indefinite ages. They were unworthy of the immortal gift of liberty which was offered to them, and it was withdrawn.

Enough has been written in the above narrative to prove that at that period Crete and the Cretans were not prepared for independence. Whether they are now prepared to receive and value and guard the priceless gift with "sleepless vigilance," is a question to be decided by their own conduct. Our knowledge of the Greek and of the Cretan justifies us in entertaining reasonable doubts as to their present fitness for self-government. But as the poor islanders can hardly be more miserable than they are under the cruel domination of the Turks, and may improve their condition if they can once attain the independence for which they have so often fought in vain, it is highly proper that they should receive all the assistance that can be extended to them.

The Cretans were not in good repute in ancient times. Epimenides, as quoted by St. Paul, said "the Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies." They have not outlived their disreputable character. In the Levant to this day to say that a man is a Cretan or an Ionian Islander is by no means a compliment. The present enthusiasm for Cretan independence which has aroused the Kingdom of Greece is not wholly out of disinterested love for Crete. It arises from a sort of Panhellenic frenzy or desire to unite in one government all who speak the Greek language or belong to the Greek Church, however inharmonious the various elements. This tendency to assemble the different branches of a race into one powerful and coherent mass seems to be a phenomenon peculiar to this period of the world's progress. We have the Panslavic movement, the struggle for a united Italy, the yearnings for a consolidation of the Germanic nations. Old Father Time is welding the races on his mighty anvil into stronger and more fitting weapons for the advancement of mankind to new battle-fields and new victories over the hosts of superstition and sin. The forward movement may be slow, but it is sure.

This is called a war of the Cross against the Crescent, as in contradistinction to most wars, and to a certain extent it is true. Greek Christianity is not of a high order, but it is several degrees above Islamism; and, like the Papacy in former ages, the Greek Church has had a mission to perform. This has been to furnish a bond of union to the scattered members of a race that long periods of servitude have kept without any distinct nationality, except as sympathy for one creed kept alive the yearning for reunion under a government of their own. It was religious fanaticism which has prevented the Greeks from abjuring their articles of faith, and with them their Hellenism when the Latin or the Turk has planted his foot on the neck of the Greek; and it was their Church that finally stimulated the people to rise in 1821 and assert their independence. So much credit is fairly due to the Greek Church, but more it has not done. It has tended rather to lower than to elevate the moral standard of the Greek race. Since her independence Greece has made some progress—grant, if you will, that the advance on her previous condition has been considerable—but the melancholy fact remains that Greece has not progressed in proportion with other nations during the same period, scarcely so far even as Turkey; and for this the Greek Church is responsible. The Church desires Hellenic unity not for the sake of permitting, but rather to prevent, greater liberty of conscience.

There are some among us not devoid of common-sense in ordinary matters, who allow their judgment to be warped when they dream of the union of the Eastern and Western churches. Those who are best informed about the Greek Church, its clergy, its disciples, and its dogmas, not as they might be but as they are, not in posse but in esse, perceive most clearly the absurdity of the whole scheme. It is a vision fit only for the cobwebbed intellects of those antediluvian dreamers who see no impropriety in putting new wine into old bottles, in throwing the world back fifteen centuries, in binding again the adamantine gyves of superstition over the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google emancipated soul of the nineteenth century; they are first cousins to Rip Van Winkle.

It was recently observed by one of the most learned men of Russia, in speaking of the Greek Church in that country, that "The Church is the great obstacle to the development of the nation. With all their wealth the priesthood have not produced one work for humanity, nor done one thing for the elevation of the people." This is true to a still greater degree in Greece. The Greeks have inherited the beauty, and, to a certain extent, the heroism and genius of their immortal ancestors; they are acute, genial, and courtly in their manners; the humblest barefooted peasant-girl of Attica, holding her rude distaff under her arm and spinning by the roadside exactly as described by Homer, has a profile as perfect, a form as graceful, and an address as courteous and yet as unaffected as if she were some princess in disguise—another Perdita scarcely concealed by the picturesque costume of a shepherdess. Many of the vices of the Greeks are the growth of long ages of slavery and superstition, and it is to be hoped will give place to nobler traits. Their country, essentially poetic on account of the peerless splendor of its mountain crags lit by the superb sunsets of the Ægean, the magnificent ruins which crown its hoary steeps, the loveliness of its clustering isles, and the historic associations that hallow every sod and throw an aureole of glory over the land, will be an object to arouse the better emotions of our nature to the end of time.

But it must be confessed that there is little hope of the rapid progress of the Greek race toward a nobler destiny unless the Greek Church undergoes a radical change. The Church must either keep pace with the onward march of mankind or the Greeks must shake themselves free from their clerical bondage and think and act for themselves; and in either case the conditions of their social advancement must be a total separation of Church and State. It is their own Æsop, I think, who tells the story of a hawk that entangled its claws in the woolly back of a sheep and then sought to fly up with his prey, but found, instead, that the sheep was too much for him, and he was thus kept down until the shepherds came up and caught him. Not to speak irreverently, the shape of Greece is exactly that of the hawk. She is trammeled by the weight of an inert, gross, material hierarchy, and seeks in vain to soar into higher regions. Without abandoning the truths of the Scriptures or the tenets of the early Fathers, let her liberate herself from the corrupt system which has prostituted those Scriptures and those dogmas to its own ends; let her emulate the noble example of Italy; let no dungeons be kept in readiness for those who question the purity of the national faith; and the sons of Greece will gradually become possessors of those inestimable virtues without which no people can flourish—truth, honesty, moral courage, order, and freedom; the Muses of Parnassus will awake again from their trance of ages, art and science will thrive as never before, the nation will not require the aid of foreign bayonets, and Greece will again become a power in the world. This may be rather a rose-colored vision; but when we consider what tremendous moral and social revolutions have recently occurred in Italy, Germany, and the United States, such as ten years ago not even the wildest enthusiast would have predicted, we feel less skepticism than might otherwise be the case when we contemplate the future of the great Panhellenic movement. But it must be confessed that until the Greek Church radically changes its present character we entertain fears concerning the rapid progress of Greece toward a nobler destiny.

ANTIPODES.

THE violets, O the violets!
  They are dripping with the dew,
The lark is singing in the sky,
  And the sky is bright and blue;
But my heart is aching, aching—
  Aching through and through!

The daisies, O the daisies!
  They are round and fair of face,
And the daffodil has bribed the sun
  To lie in her embrace;
But my heart is crying, dying
  Like a soul that lacketh grace!

The roses, O the roses!
  They have pledged and plighted faith
To the winds that kiss and kiss them
  Till they faint and fail for breath;
But my heart is bleeding, bleeding—
  Bleeding slowly into death!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE VIRGINIANS IN TEXAS.

CHAPTER XVI.

AMONG THE INDIANS.

VENABLE was not killed on the spot by the Indians for two reasons. They often prefer taking boys and girls prisoners to killing them. Besides, they had many spare horses along which they had stampeded and stolen, and they needed the assistance of the boy and a slave to drive these. Between being taken a prisoner and being killed outright, the latter—as a general rule—is preferable in such cases. As it was, the boy was badly wounded in his knee and through one arm. Almost at the instant his foes were upon him; before he had time to think he had been lifted upon a mustang and was galloped off between two of the tribe; for having the Rangers on their trail they had no time to stop. Before he had gone very far he heard the crack of rifles behind him, and knew that Francisco and his uncle were in the fight. It flashed upon him as a sudden hope that they might be taken prisoners also, so that he might have them with him; but he well knew that all the probabilities were that they would both be killed and scalped. Even in that moment of terror he noticed, and with a sort of pride too, that one Indian had thought his antelope worth bringing, and now rode with it slung on the horse behind him. After dashing on for a time over the prairie the Indians slackened their pace a little at a gruff word from one of them. Venable had read, and had been told also by his uncle, that the only way to propitiate Indians when in their power is to be as fearless of them as possible; so he raised his drooping head and assumed as bold a port as he possibly could, and for the first time looked full at the Indians between whom he rode in front, while the rest of the band came after, some fifty in all. The Indian who rode upon his left was almost as black as a negro. His hair was cut square off over his eyes, and hung down behind almost to the stirrup as he rode—all platted and mingled in with all sorts of coins, gold and silver; it was a wonder to the boy how his head could sustain the strain of such a load. Buckskin and blankets made up the rest of his dress; but his face—it was that which puzzled Venable. He had imagined that Indians always had a ferocious aspect, but this Indian had a fat, grave, even benignant face. It reminded Venable strongly of the pictures he had seen of Franklin. A more serious, composed, sanctimonious face even, could not be seen any where. Apart from his hue and his costume, he looked like some respectable Deacon riding on his way to church—one who had scarce ever harmed even a fly all his life. And yet that Indian had murdered, cruelly tortured, and butchered many a human being; and would have put Venable to the most terrible suffering, and then killed him without moving a muscle of his benevolent countenance. However, Venable was greatly encouraged, and now glanced at the Indian on his right. This was a tall, lean, haughty-looking warrior, who reminded Venable as much of pictures he had seen of Don Quixote as the other did of Franklin. But the most striking thing about him was his armor. This consisted of a coat of mail covering him down to the thighs, and formed of innumerable small steel rings woven curiously into each other with consummate skill. Each Indian was supplied with leathern shields painted over with various emblems, with bows and arrows in cowskin quivers. As he looked at the arrows projecting from the quiver hanging under the arm of the right-hand Indian he read in them that it was Comanches in whose hands he was. Every tribe grooves its arrows, so that when they have penetrated the body of a victim the blood may trickle out and drop upon the ground, leaving a trail by which the victim can be followed. The arrows of other tribes are grooved spirally, or otherwise irregularly, while those of the Comanches have a straight groove from the barbed end to the other. And Venable knew, too, that it was Iron-Jacket who rode by him, a renowned chief named after the mail he wore, of whom he had often heard. Iron-Jacket! Known over all the West, among the Indians especially, as the owner and constant wearer of a coat which rendered him perfectly invulnerable to arrow or bullet. In some way it had come down from Cortéz—or some follower of Cortéz—into the hands of this chief, who was a chief in consequence of owning it, and who would not have exchanged it for all the cattle on the prairies.

And now Venable began to wonder how he was going to escape; and then imagined how interesting it would be, when at home again, to tell Bessie and Will and all of them about it. His wounds began to smart severely; yet by a strange reaction, from sudden terror his spirits began also to rise wonderfully. Hope and even joy filled his bosom as he rode. And then he breathed a fervent prayer to God to help him. And then he wondered whether they had captured Francisco and his uncle yet, and would soon bring them along. And then it occurred to him that the same Heavenly Father whom he worshiped at the family altar at home was as near to him, and as powerful and willing to help him now as then; and this was a consolation to him inexpressible. Then another thought rose in his mind. His hands were not tied, and he quietly slipped them in his pockets as they trotted rapidly along. Gathering up the contents of his pocket in his hand, with his forefinger he managed to punch a hole through the seam in the pocket, and then cautiously pushed his knife through. It gradually worked its way down his leg and fell out upon the ground. He dreaded lest the Indians clatter-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ing behind should see it; but they were too busy looking around and talking to notice it. By this time it was becoming dark; still they rode on without a halt. Scarce a word had been uttered by any one since the last Indian had galloped up after sending from his bow the arrow which bore death to the Mexican. As it became darker Venable dropped through the hole in his pocket every thing he had—two half-dollars, three Mexican dollars, his pocket-comb. Then, out of the other pocket, a fishing line rolled on its cork, a brass buckle, a bunch of buckskin tied up, a box of caps, a charger made out of a boar's tooth. All these; not at once, but scattered along a mile or so apart. His object was to help any persons who might endeavor to trail him; and it answered the purpose admirably afterward. He would have had all these things taken from him; but the Indians had not yet had time, dreading to stop lest the Rangers should catch up with them. All night they rode, the boy almost falling from his horse with hunger and loss of sleep; a sense of utter wretchedness and despair, too, began to creep upon him. And so the next morning dawned upon him, the benignant Franklin still riding on one side, and Iron-Jacket on the other, as composed as if just started on a little pleasure excursion. The horses, however, could hardly walk even; and at full sunrise Iron-Jacket called a halt upon a little stream. The animals were allowed to graze to recover strength; for an Indian cares for his horse only for the present use it is to him, having no idea even of affection for it. Venable fell heavily on the grass, and lay there sound asleep, the Indians paying no attention to him whatever. When he woke the sun was high, and the savages preparing to start. A fragment of jerked beef was thrown to him by Iron-Jacket, like a bone to a dog; but so ravenously hungry was the boy that he ate it greedily. And so on, and on, over the prairie the whole of that long day, the boy being forced to assist in driving the loose horses along, among which he recognized his brother's pony Slow, which Francisco had ridden. It was consolation even to have this old acquaintance along. Once when a young Indian drove his spear into Slow to make him go faster, Venable shouted at him fiercely, and the whole band broke into a loud laugh. In fact, the boy began to feel at home with his captors, weighed down occasionally by heavy thoughts of the fate of Francisco and his uncle, and his own destiny. And so night came—a fragment of beef, a sound sleep on the grass, and up again by day, and off on the wearisome march. Thus passed a whole week; though it seemed to the boy like a year. He was now naked except half a blanket tied by him around his waist, every thing having long ago been appropriated by the Indians. His hat, too, had long decked the head of the young Indian that had speared Slow. From head to foot Venable was dirty and blistered by the sun, his naked feet bleeding from the rocks, his wounds exceedingly painful. He almost began to doubt his identity; he felt as if he was rapidly becoming an Indian himself, almost imagined that he had always been what he now was. Still, morning and evening he ceased not to pray to God, often remembering his deliverance, when escape seemed impossible, from the prairie fire. As he rode during the day, or lay awake at night, all the verses of Scripture and hymns he had ever learned passed through his mind; he loved to repeat all he knew, and was astonished how many he remembered. Home, too—that dearest spot on earth, under the live-oaks by the San Hieronymo—it was before his eyes all the time, clad in a kind of glory to him. He wondered he had never prized it more. Oh, if he ever was there again, how he would love the very rocks and earth there! And his father, mother, Will, Bessie, Hark, Rohamma, Duke, Snap—how keenly he appreciated and loved them now! It seemed now to him like Paradise with its angels, if he ever was there again! Plans of escape, too, had often crossed his mind—such a whirl, a current, a cataract of things had rushed through his mind since he had been taken!

It was the tenth day after he had been taken captive. The Indians had now reached their camp on the Colorado—rude skin tents with any quantity of squaws and children. All his romantic notions of such things vanished before the reality. The filth was unutterable; not a spark of kindliness or gentleness had he yet witnessed. It was a den of wild animals with their cubs—nothing more. He was continually employed in bringing wood or water, a miserable slave as squalid in appearance as any of them almost. His long black hair all tangled about his eyes, his naked body blistered by the sun, grimed with dirt, a great sore on his knee, another on his arm; he could scarce have been told from the Indians. He had thought best not to wash himself when at the river for water, but to seem as much at home with the savages as possible. But under all his miserable outward appearance he was his uncle's own Venable still, as the young Indian who had wounded Slow found to his cost. In passing Venable once he spat at him. It was on the top of a high bank of the river, and the next instant the Indian had been knocked down the bank into the river with a splash. All the Indians near ran to see, and laughed heartily. Venable waited for the discomfited savage to rush up the bank and kill him. And he did come up the slope, but with his brown face all in a good-humored grin and to shake hands with the captive. Ever after Venable had in him a stanch friend. It illustrated the fact that with Indians treaties and tribute only encourage them to insolence. Fear is the only means to keep them in order. The tenth, eleventh, and twelfth days of his captivity were spent by Venable in the camp. The Indians occupied themselves in dressing hides, broiling beef on the coals, and eating, smoking, quarreling, sleeping, going out hunting or returning with game, making

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

baskets, moccasins, and bows. The filth was abominable; it seemed to the boy that he was rather among a species of monkeys than human beings. The fat, grave Indian whom he thought of as Franklin, sat all day on a log smoking solemnly, absorbed in unutterable meditation. Iron-Jacket stalked haughtily about, never removing the armor in which he trusted. It was to him his confidence, his glory, the one thing that elevated and separated him above all the world besides. No monarch could be prouder of his crown and kingdom; and all the rest of the tribe rendered him the homage due as owner of an invulnerable coat, creating him justly and rightfully their superior. Kept clean and bright, covering his entire person to the waist, glittering in the sun, he moved about the Ajax, the Achilles of the camp. As to the captive, he kept up as stout a heart as possible. Occasionally he would steal down to the river to weep, for he could not help it. He thought how its waters flowed by his father's door so many miles below, and he would even kiss the surface, sending his love thus, to that spot which now seemed to him to hold in itself all repose and joy in the world, and yet as far away as if in another planet, from which he had fallen ages ago. Whenever he dared he would loiter to where Slow was staked on the prairie, and hug and kiss him and whisper his hopes. "What do you think of things, old fellow?" he would say, and Slow would shake his head despondingly, and resume his grass with a sigh of despair, only making the best of circumstances. As Venable would turn from Slow to the miserable camp again, it was like coming down from human companionship to that of brutes. If there had been any thing womanly even in the squaws it would not have been so bad; but they were all of them hideously ugly, dirtier than the men, and always squabbling with each other or the little rats of children—rats small but with keen, quick, eyes, malicious and wicked. "What does make all the vast difference between these creatures and white people?" he often asked himself. "If they lived in a different planet they could not be more unlike us." As his father might have told him, that which made all the difference between the savages and civilized people was one thing, and just the same thing as would make the immense and eternal difference too between those in heaven and those without hereafter—that is, the possession and use of the Bible.

The morning of the thirteenth day since he was taken had arrived. The Indians were eating their breakfast, their mustangs grazing around as usual. Suddenly a single naked savage was seen running toward the camp from the prairie, yelling and brandishing his arms. In an instant the whole camp was in a whirlwind of confusion. Each squaw dropped every thing and pounced upon her own children like a hawk, carrying the youngest in her arms, the elder running closely at her heels, and making for the bottom timber as fast as they could run. The men, in a minute's flash, were on their mustangs armed for the foe—the solemn Benjamin Franklin seated on his animal as composed and serious and benevolent in his aspect as ever. But Iron-Jacket was the hero of the hour—on the most spirited horse, fully armed, resplendent in his coat of mail, he rallied his warriors around him with a yell and a wave of his hand. However it fared with the rest he knew no bullet could harm him, and he was composed and confident accordingly. And the savages had little time to spare. Close at the heels of the Indian that gave the alarm came tearing on for the camp a company of Rangers outyelling the Indians. And a motley crew they were. Some with broad wool hats—some with handkerchiefs tied around their heads—some with coats—some in their shirt-sleeves—old, white-headed frontiersmen with a long score of outrages to settle up—bronzed middle-aged men—youths not twenty. Not a man there but had lost a father, brother, mother, sister, whose scalps they knew were at that moment drying in possession of the Indians before them, or at least had lost cattle and horses by the Indians. No line of battle at all—helter-skelter on they came as hard as their mustangs could bear them under incessant spurring—Ford, their captain, at their head. The in-running warrior fell with a dozen balls in him, and lay dead far behind in a short time; and then came the fight in good earnest. In the very first surprise, however, an Indian had snatched Venable up from the ground, lifted him on a horse—it happened to be Slow, to which Venable always kept as close as possible—leaped on another, and was off with him in a twinkling, the contest raging louder and louder behind them as they fled. They had gone a mile or more before Venable recovered his presence of mind. He was almost stunned with anguish—so near rescue, and to be thus carried off as from the very grasp of his friends into captivity, hopeless captivity! He would rather be killed on the spot! He was becoming desperate. Suddenly a thought struck him. Right ahead were several openings in the ground like deserted wells. In carrying out the horses to graze, with the Indians, he had often noticed them, and wondered what they were—even sounded one or two of them with a rock. As he approached them he laid his hands upon the neck of his horse; as he passed them he suddenly sprang off and ran for his life. An arrow from the Indian whizzed through the very place in which he had been the moment before, when he disappeared in one desperate jump down the well, crashing through the brush that almost covered its mouth, and followed in his descent by a shower of dirt and pebbles from the banks. Almost as soon as he had disappeared the Indians had ridden his shying horse as near the mouth as possible; but the sound of battle waxed louder and louder behind, mixed with the rush of coming hoofs. How to get the boy out puzzled the savage. There was

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google only one remedy; and, leaning over the mouth of the opening, he sent arrow after arrow from his bow down into the darkness. Then, as the fight rolled up upon the spot, he sprang again upon his horse and with a yell mingled in it.

The fight had been from the first a retreat on the part of the Indians; the bravest of the warriors plying their arrows upon the Rangers, giving way before them all the time, but as slowly as possible, to give chance for the rest to make good their escape. First among the Rangers was a Texan in his shirt-sleeves, pale and calm, while all the rest seemed frenzied with excitement; silent, while all the rest were cursing and swearing as if their oaths were bullets. An arrow was sticking in his clothes, but he rode steadily on; another passed between his arm and his side, but his object seemed only to be to get among the Indians, while his quick glance ran like lightning rapidly around in search of the prisoner. Benjamin Franklin spurred upon him only to receive a ball in his benevolent face. Sliding slowly and decorously from his horse, as the fight rolled by him, he lay at length upon the earth dead, but with countenance as composed and dignified in death as in life. But Iron-Jacket was the most active and desperate foe, and the most conspicuous mark for every Ranger. Their assaults, however, he treated with contempt, confident in his invulnerable armor. Suddenly, however, in the thickest of the fight, and in the height of his confidence, a loud "Waugh!" burst from his lips. He had been hit. Instantly all his courage gave place to consternation. Who can tell the agony of the man at the sudden destruction of the faith and reliance of his whole life. And as he turned another ball struck him full in the breast. With mortal anguish, and disappointment even more agonizing, he fell headlong from his mustang and soon expired under the hoofs of the Rangers. At the sight the rest of the Indians ceased to make even a show of battle, and fled for their lives, the Rangers spurring after them and picking the scattered and flying foes off their horses with rifle and revolver as they got the chance, keeping up all the time unceasing yells. Not a plume, not an epaulet, not an inch of gold facing, not a brass button, not even a sword, or any other show whatever of martial splendor, there are no superior troops to the Texan Rangers in the world. There is not even a fife, a drum, or a bugle often; rarely any thing resembling discipline or drill. Yet for defending a frontier they out-Indian the Indians. Each man "fights on his own hook." A Ranger with the least white feather about him is a bird never yet heard of in Texas. Even in a regular fight, as at Buena Vista, they are exceedingly inconvenient to an enemy. While these lines are being written these gallant Rangers are waging a war whose line of battle is the entire northern and western boundary of Texas, and years will roll by before their rifles can become cold again.

Spurring at full speed through and through the abandoned camp in every direction, around and around it, again and again, rode Uncle Frank, shooting the Indians only when they got in his way. Venable! Venable! where was he? Not a trace of him! Suddenly he dashed ahead of the rest of the Rangers after the flying Indians. Outriding them all he rode hard upon a young Indian wearing a wool hat which he recognized as his nephew's. One shot from his revolver brought down the Indian's horse, and, before the savage could rise, the Texan was on him and had plucked the hat from his head, crushed it up in his hands, and stuck it in his belt.

"Where is he?" he shouted to the Indian in Spanish, choking him so at the same instant as to render reply impossible. The Indian pointed ahead, and indicated as much by gestures as words that the prisoner had just been carried on. Hurling him to one side out of his way, the Texan sprang on his horse again and spurred on.

"Throw away an Indian!" exclaimed a voice behind him. "What a miserable waste! Here, you mister, take that with my compliments!" and as the Indian fell at the shot the red-shirted Ranger added his scalp to his collection, already very large. "Never saw a man as careless about collecting his scalps in all my days as that fellow," he said, as he tied the last knot in the buckskin strings of his saddle to the bloody hair and remounted his horse in search of more.

By this time the Texan was far ahead among the leading Rangers. Still no sign of the boy. Riding suddenly aside to the top of a prairie knob he could see the flying Indians, all of them racing for life. Swiftly arranging his spy-glass he scanned eagerly their disordered ranks —again—yet again. No white-skin among them. Overwhelmed with distress he rode down again, not knowing what to do. Suddenly his eye caught sight of a familiar pony—Slow standing and whinnying off to one side. But he could not stop for him now, and dashed on almost hopelessly after the Rangers.

Seven long hours afterward the Texans came trooping back from pursuit, eagerly discussing, as they walked their worn-out horses along, the events of the day. One only among them rode silent, and oh, how sad! Where—how—what possible chance was there now of trailing the prisoner? As he passed along he noticed Slow grazing about the same spot. Jumping off his horse he walked up to him with the half purpose of questioning him for his master. Slow recognized him evidently, and trotting off before him stood at the opening of a sort of well, whinnying and pawing. The Texan glanced at the mouth of the well; the bushes were disarranged; there were breaks in the gravelly sides as if of soil lately knocked away.

"By—!" an oath rose to his lips and almost escaped, but was kept down by a sudden emotion, a new resolve.

"Here—I say, Mac—one of you boys—a lariat—quick as you can!" And all the Rangers

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google pressed eagerly around the opening. Swift as thought Uncle Frank had tied the end of a lariat around his revolver, and riding "straddle" of this he pushed himself off down the opening, while a dozen willing hands held the end.

"I'll bet my life only an Indian down there," said a Ranger. "Anyhow let him go down—it's a pity to lose the scalp. My scalp, if you please, old hoss!" he shouted down into the darkness.

"Hold!" cried the Texan from below. "Send down another lariat—another still. Now pull!" he again shouted, after a few moments, during which a hundred questions were poured down upon him without a reply. A hard pull it was, but it brought up the Texan bearing a body, evidently a dead body, in his arms. When near enough the surface a dozen hands lifted Venable out of his uncle's arms, and laid him gently on the grass, almost dropping the Texan back again into the hole in their forgetfulness of him. There was not a dry eye among those rude but gallant men as they gathered around the body—naked, grimed doubly with dirt and blood, a wound in his side, in which an arrow was still sticking. The Texan sat down on the grass and wept silently, the men standing around in hushed silence, most of them having taken their hats from their heads. At last one of them knelt down, laid his ear to the naked bosom of the boy, then placed his finger upon his pulse.

"Gen-tle-men," said he, looking up with an air of grave importance, "calomel is pisen. Any man that'll give minerals to a feller-creeter is a murderer any day. I'm what you call a steam doctor. Thompsonian-Bo-tanic is my sort of doctoring. But this boy ain't dead. Stunned he is—see that bruise on his head?—fainted, too, from loss of blood. A han'kerchief, any of you? Some whisky, too, if you hain't drunk it all up."

CHAPTER XVII.

THE RETURN.

"It's twice now you've made a goose of me, my boy. I want you to stop it."

It was the uncle who spoke, and to his nephew lying pale and exhausted upon a buffalo-robe beneath a mesquit. Borne in the arms of his uncle into the camp so recently occupied by the Indians, attended by all the Rangers with an eager sympathy, every means had been used for his restoration by the steam doctor, who had thus suddenly soared above all his fellow-Rangers into an importance absolutely sublime.

Sure enough, the boy had only fainted from loss of blood. The close air, too, of the pit had aided to prolong his stupefaction. Very soon the pit would have been his grave also had he not been rescued in time. As it was, there he lay naked, except the blanket around his waist; very dirty, too, from the pit except where water had been dashed over his face to restore him. Browned by the sun, too, and his black hair hopelessly tangled together, he looked much more like an Indian than a white man. He had already, as well as he could, told his uncle and the Rangers crowding around the whole story of his captivity. It was now past midnight. Around their camp-fires the Rangers had sauced their suppers—made up in large part from the larders of the defeated Indians—with narrations of each man's share in the adventures of the day. After this several uproarious songs had been sung, not a voice failing in the chorus. After that a dozen or so of them had farther refreshed themselves after the fatigues of the day by joining in a double-shuffle dance for an hour or so with the hearty approval of all the rest. A guard had been stationed around the camp, outside of the grazing horses; and by two o'clock in the morning the moon shone, only less clear than the sun, upon the Rangers lying about soundly asleep upon the grass in every direction and attitude, some with their heads on their saddles, some upon buffalo-robes, some on saddle-blankets, some flat on the grass.

The steam doctor was the last asleep, no one remaining awake to the story of his manifold cures, which he had continued to tell without the pause of an instant from the moment Venable had been extricated from the pit—all through his restoration, through supper, through the song and dance—and had ceased only when the snore of his last companion awake left him without a listener. Not far from him lay the scalp-collector. Never had miser counted over his gold more eagerly, carefully than he had his scalps before sleeping; and now, wrapped together in his coat, they made a pillow upon which he slept as sweetly as an infant. Little undressing was there for the repose of the Rangers. One good war-whoop near them would have placed in one second every man of them upon his feet wide awake, armed to the teeth, and more than willing for a fight. Now, however, they slept—scattered about over the prairie upon the grass by their smoking fires—deeply, leaving the uncle and nephew to their own secrets.

"There's one thing more I wanted to tell you, uncle," said Venable, at length, "before we go to sleep, and while we are all quiet here by ourselves. There it is." And he drew out a corner of the blanket around him, which had been tucked in securely, and, unrolling it, he produced a bar of white metal, square, some four inches long by one thick.

"Why, this is silver," said his uncle, holding it up in the moonlight, turning it round and round, and examining it closely. "Where on earth did you pick it up?"

"Nowhere—under the earth, uncle. When I first fell, or rather jumped into the hole, I was so stunned and bruised I did not know any thing—even that I was wounded by the arrow. After a while I came to myself a little. I could hardly move, and it was so dark I could not see. I began to feel around a little with my hands

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google on the ground, expecting to touch a snake or a centipede every instant, when I felt that bar among the trash with a number of others lying beside it. I didn't know what it was—iron, I thought—till I held it up a little in the light. Then I thought I might dig out steps in the sides of the well with it to climb out by, so I rolled it up in a flap of my blanket, and tucked it in carefully not to lose it, for I felt I was getting sick, as if I was going fast asleep. I never thought of it again till this moment. That's all."

"And a plenty," added his uncle, eagerly, who had listened with deepest interest to the narration. "Don't say a syllable about it to any one, Venable. I'll keep the bar safely for you. We'll talk about it more after a while. You go to sleep now fast as you can."

In fact his nephew was asleep already before he had finished. Not so the elder of the two. Lying down beside the boy, with his hands so that no one could see, the Texan rubbed the bar well with his sleeve, first moistening it with his lips, and then examined it carefully for an hour. It was a bar of silver, nothing more, nothing less, no stamp or mark upon it whatever. The Texan understood it none the less. He had often heard from Americans, and more especially from Mexicans, wonderful stories of the old silver mines throughout the northwestern part of Texas, extending through Chihuahua and Sonora and Lower California, and so on up into California. On several occasions when among Indians he had made careful and cunningly-worded inquiry of them in regard to these mines, from curiosity more than any thing else. They had uniformly denied any knowledge of any such mines, but always in such a manner as confirmed him in his belief that there were such mines. The more loud and positive their denials, the more satisfied he had become that they knew of such mines, and carefully concealed the location. In fact, for days before the fight, in trailing the Indians with the Rangers, the Texan had observed that upon almost every eminence in the prairie were heaps of rocks evidently piled by hand. On one or two occasions, having ascended to such piles, he had observed a something he never would have observed but for a hint he had once got from an old white-headed Mexican woman. This was that on the top of such a pile there always was one long rock pointing in a certain direction. Noticing this once or twice, he had taken the direction in which the index-rock pointed with his pocket compass. Ever after, during every day's ride, he had made a point of ascending every such elevation on either side of the trail, as if to scan the country for Indians, and in every case there was the same pile of rocks, with the same sort of finger-rock pointing in the same direction. Laboring under a feverish anxiety in regard to his nephew, as well as full of thought only less painful in regard to Dolores, he had found a kind of relief in doing this while he urged on the pursuit, which continued in the direction of the rocks. He had forgotten all about the matter during the fight and since, and now it all came back to him in the bar of silver. Sure enough! sure enough! And so Venable had pitched down head-foremost into one of the old silver mines.

"Pointed right, that's a fact," said the Texan to himself—"pointed exactly to the spot where I was to find the silver—and the gold," he added, glancing at his slumbering nephew. "If chance is God of this world," he continued to himself, "then chance is infinitely wise and infinitely good. Things go crashing and smashing and ruining along right hand and left, just when they are working out—like a mill sluice on an overshot wheel—just the best results. My opinion is, we've most to fear when every thing seems going right. But Providence! Providence! as Brother Morton says. And it shall be my religion, too, from this day out."

Concealing the bar of silver carefully in his bosom, the Texan breathed a fervent prayer of thanksgiving to that Being whom he had now taken as his chief friend forever, and with a supplication for future guidance he composed himself to sleep.

It was three days before Venable was strong enough to go any distance. It was not till the morning of the fourth day that he ventured down to the river, and there took a thorough washing for the first time in weeks. In one of the tents had been found a suit of buckskin, which Venable remembered to have seen a squaw at work on for the Indian whom he had knocked into the river, and who had robbed him of his hat. It was new, but far from complete. However, his uncle managed to eke it out from other spoils found in the camp, so that by the end of the week after his rescue Venable was clothed from head to foot—enough of an Indian in appearance to have frightened Bessie out of her wits had she seen him. The coat of mail and a complete equipment of bow, arrows, and quiver was gladly allowed him by the Rangers—who regarded him as rather the owner of the camp, residuary legatee of his dear departed friends the Indians—and kept by him to carry home, as well as a skin paint-bag and a few other mementoes of his short but eventful experience of Indian life. During all the week of his recovery the Rangers were far from idle. Not a day but scouting parties were going out and coming in, with little success, however. Indians do not invade the frontier in an army, but in squads of from three or four to fifty. To fight them is like keeping off mosquitoes—when you are chasing them off in one direction they are coming in in another. When it is remembered that the frontier of Texas is many hundred miles long, the difficulty of the task can be somewhat appreciated. As it is, Rangers—i. e., men perpetually ranging along the frontier—are the only ones to defend it; the pomp and cumbrous machinery of the regular service is totally out of place under such circumstances. To while away the hours around the camp-fires by night every expedient was put in play. Gambling is forbid-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

den by strict rule; horse-racing also. Drinking is also forbidden, as well as impossible from lack of whisky. As it was, every man told his story of frontier adventure with Indians and all sorts of game. The steam doctor was always a great deal more than ready with his experiences; the scalp-hunter had a tale an hour long for each of his scalps. Not a man, too, but could sing. "When I can read my title clear" was the favorite, sung in the longest possible metre, although in singular juxtaposition with many other melodies exceedingly unlike it. One would suddenly lead off, and the song would close with every voice on the ground joined in. Dancing, too—such dances as would have appalled a French dancing-master by their peculiar figures and the extensive area essential to their performance. A wild, jovial, whole-souled, reckless set they were, kind as women to the sick or suffering among them, more desperate than Indians in an affray. The discipline of their officers was that of good fellowship and personal popularity rather than of drill and routine and arrest. It was far, very far from being the place for a youth to learn life in; and it would have been far worse for Venable than it was had it not been for the unusual respect had by all for his uncle. As to Venable himself, what was yielded to him first from pity was more than confirmed as he moved among the men in his moccasins and buckskin apparel, straight as an arrow, with a ready smile on his brown, frank, intelligent face; he became the hero of the camp. Young as he was, he already possessed, unconsciously to himself, the magical influence of a youthful Napoleon, in virtue of his fearless, sincere, pure-minded intelligence, more the result of his pious training than any thing else.

It was ten days after his capture before the march homeward was begun. And greatly to the joy of both uncle and nephew. Both knew the sickening anxiety under which the family at home must be suffering in regard to them, but they had found no way of communicating with the family since they left home. The morning after his rescue Venable had heard from his uncle of the death of the Mexican—heard it with deep sorrow. Though to Venable—and to all except the Texan himself—that Mexican continued ever after to be only the boy Francisco, the girl Dolores slept in the depths of the prairie bayou and in the deep, serene memory of the Texan too, more as a dream than a reality. For all it was well it should have happened as it did.

It was six days' steady travel before Venable and his uncle parted with the Rangers at the base of Mount Hoogenboom, the Rangers going on to Austin to be mustered out of service, the boy and his uncle to hasten toward the dearly-loved home on the San Hieronymo.

"We won't say any thing to any one except your father and mother about the bar of silver just yet," said the elder as they rode along. "Nobody knows certainly who the old silver hunters were. They may have been Spaniards hundreds of years ago; they may have been Mexicans hunting for silver only some fifty years ago; they may have been the old original, mysterious aborigines of the country whole centuries ago. Nobody knows, and nobody ever will know, I suppose. I took many a look at the wells near the camp. They are all alike—old silver mines abandoned long ago. It might be because no silver could be found, if it were not for the bar you picked up in one."

"I've been thinking, uncle," said Venable, "that it might be in this way: perhaps the miners, whoever they were, had works there long, long ago for refining and rolling out the silver, and perhaps suddenly some savages of some sort came upon them, killed them all—"

"And burned up their works," interrupted his uncle. "Just what I thought possible; and in groping about there one day—I had to be careful lest the Rangers should suspect something—I came upon two things, each of which told its own separate secret. One was a stick of charred wood almost overgrown by grass and brush—that whispered of a fire. The other was a skull with a hole—a hole on its left side, mark, made in a fight therefore."

"How? Why, uncle? I don't see that."

"Suppose an Indian was face to face with you fighting. He raises his hatchet in his right hand and strikes your head."

"Oh yes, it would be on the left side, sure enough."

"Well," continued the Texan, "we've guessed the history so far right. Careful search would be sure to reveal more. Why, if we only found, say, a spoon, or a button, or a coin, or—"

"Even a buckle or a bridle-bit or a stirrup, uncle," interrupted his nephew.

"Yes, almost any relic would tell the whole tale."

"Some of these days we must go there for a good search, uncle."

"Yes, Sir!" replied the Texan, with emphasis. "We might get silver enough, Venable, to buy you three or four thousand head of cattle to begin to raise stock with. Besides the curiosity of the thing there's no telling what we might come across there. And then, too—"

"Oh, yonder is father and Will in the field!" exclaimed his nephew, interrupting him; and, putting spurs to Slow, Venable dashed to the fence, bounded off his pony, cleared the fence at a leap like a deer, he hardly knew how. Now, when a wandering son returns home in rags a father always knows exactly what to do. But in this case, at a shriek from Will, Mr. McRobert had looked up in time to see an Indian jump the fence and make full at him. It was too far to see the brown face distinctly; but buckskin, moccasins, bow, quiver, every thing—it was an Indian! Mr. McRobert took for granted that all the rest of the tribe would come streaming after the first over the fence in an instant; for the country had been full of them, he knew. Will had picked up a clod of earth and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google jumped behind his father, already slaughtered, scalped, and eaten up in imagination. As to his father, he had been plugging water-melons in the field, and had the butcher-knife in his hand. This he grasped firmly; then dropped and almost sank on the ground as the ferocious Indian came bounding along among the green corn, exclaiming, "Oh, father, father!"

Who can describe the father's joy, and Will's too, as his brother seized him in turn in his arms and lifted him from his feet and held him high in the air, and dropped him on the ground and ran on down the row between the standing corn toward the house. But the voice of his father arrested him.

"Stop, Venable, you will frighten your mother—wait!"

By this time Uncle Frank had come up, and received an ardent welcome. On account of his dress it was agreed that Venable should wait, while the rest went on to tell of the safe arrival. As soon as they were gone—I have never known whether it was only thoughtlessness, or sheer mischief—but Venable turned aside toward the negro cabin. He ought not to have done, but he pushed open the door and stepped in upon Rohamma, Indian as he was, without a word of warning. Stooping over the fire, she was toasting coffee for supper. One half-glance, and, dropping her spoon, she rolled over helplessly among the pots and pans beside her, an easy victim for the tomahawk and scalping-knife. There was only one word on her pallid lips, and that was one which held ample meaning with her—"Texas!" But now the air rang with cries of "Venable! Venable!" There was the sound of light but swift-coming footsteps along the ground without, and the boy stepped out to receive his mother—his dear, dear mother, in his arms, upon his bosom, in a gush of silent tears, and kisses more silent still. And Bessie—for a week after she complained how her brother had hugged her. And there was Hark too, and Scip, as glad as the rest. No tongue can tell the joy with which the boy, only just now a captive among the Indians, walked along toward the house as well as he could for loved ones clinging about him, clasping, and kissing him at every step. And Duke and Snap too. Oh, home! home! It seemed heaven itself to Venable; he could have hugged the very gate-posts as he passed them. He felt as if he had been gone for years—long years. It was not until he had laid aside his Indian attire for one of his own suits that he could sit still even for a moment in the joyful confusion.

"Ah! it's mighty plain nobody cares a cent for me," said Uncle Frank at length. He was seated on the front step of the long porch in front of the house, his back against one of the pillars, Bessie in his arms.

"Oh, Uncle Frank!" exclaimed Bessie, with a hug and a kiss, "how can you thay tho? Didn't we all hug you tho? and didn't ma and me kith you tho?" Another embrace and a kiss upon his bearded lip by the little witch, so rosy with affection.

"Yes; but nobody cared for me while I was gone," said her uncle, taking her little hands in his.

"Oh yeth we did!" replied Bessie, eagerly. "Pa prayed for you tho every day at prayers, and brother Will and I prayed for you by the bed every morning and night; and Mr. Roland prayed tho for you. And oh yeth, yeth, Mith Agneth!"

"Hush, Bessie!" interrupted her mother.

"Oh yeth, ma; yeth, uncle," persisted Bessie; "I didn't thee Mith Agneth cry any, or pray any; but oh! she looked tho thorry, thorry for you; and it wa'n't for brother Venable, I know, because—"

Here Miss Agnes herself, who had drawn near unperceived, stepped upon the porch, her sweet face glowing remarkably—from exercise, probably; but not more so than that of Uncle Frank as he rose to greet her, his face glowing—from sitting still, probably.

"Oh, Mith Agneth!" burst out Bessie, "poor, poor Franthitheo dead, killed—poor Franthitheo! ain't you thorry?"

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE COMMUNION SABBATH.

Two weeks, happy weeks, have passed—happy to all the family on the San Hieronymo because the fountains of affection toward each other are now flowing with a deeper stream as from fountains enlarged. It is the Sabbath morning, and the month of June lies like a charm upon prairie and forest and silent-flowing Colorado. The fervent labors of Mr. Roland have been greatly successful in that secluded region, away from the distractions of business and fashion. Yesterday a church was organized by the minister God has so wonderfully sent them. Besides many of the neighbors living around, and of whom I would have greatly liked to have said something, only I am so afraid of making my story too long, there was Hoogenboom and his wife, Christians before in the old country, "Sectarians" as they styled it, glad to be members again of a visible church. Yes, Hoogenboom had united in the organization with a profusion of red pocket-handkerchief, and his wife in an extraordinary bonnet, never worn before since she left Germany. Then there were Miss Agnes, and Mr. and Mrs. Morton McRobert, who had also been members of the church before. Rohamma and Hark, too, had both been consistent members of the church for years before leaving Virginia, and their names also were enrolled. But there were two who united with the church now for the first time, Uncle Frank and Venable. Alike they had received an early training in piety; alike they had been the special objects of prayer and effort on the part of all their pious friends for a year

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

now past; alike had they in the last few months passed through scenes which had awakened deep reflection and new resolves. The joy of the angels above in the event found an echo, if possible, deeper and sweeter still in the bosoms of those who looked on below. Uncle Frank, so bearded and bronzed and nobly rough in his way, yet so grave and calm and resolved and happy, even Bessie could not but exclaim upon the new beauty that sat upon the face of her darling uncle; it would have been a blind man who could not have observed it. And beside him now, as in sport and danger, his nephew. The loving eyes of father and mother fairly devoured him as he sat that day in Uncle Frank's ranch, where the organization was accomplished. Just turning, as on a sudden, from the boy into the man, modest and yet manly, humble and yet resolved, happy and yet calm, no wonder he had become the pride and prayer and joy of his father and mother. Even Will felt as if his brother had, in the last few weeks, somehow risen higher above him, and felt for him a new reverence as well as a more relying affection. Words can not utter the joy with which these two were welcomed into the church of God. Mr. and Mrs. McRobert grasped the glowing hand of their brother, feeling that he was now doubly their brother, and held Venable to their hearts as trebly their son. And Hark and Rohamma, none the less sincere was the hard hand with which each grasped that, first of "Mass Frank" and then of "Mass Venable," and welcomed them into the new relationship with them in that body in which all are one whether bond or free.

"May de good Lord bless you, massa, an' bring you to glory at las'!" Ah! nobody could doubt the sincerity of their tearful eyes and white teeth glittering through the hearty smile. The organization of a group of Christians thrown together in the wild West into a church is to the individuals themselves, minister and all, one of those rare luxuries which are reserved among manifold privations for settlers upon the frontier; and never were Christians gathered together into one body with feelings and hopes deeper or sweeter than on that Saturday in the log ranch.

But it is now the Sabbath morning. The whole neighborhood have assembled at the ranch. Already steps have been taken to build a neat church on a spot near by; but until then the ranch is still used, as it long has been, for public worship. Let us stand just inside the door and look on. It is the largest room in the ranch, of logs, and not twenty feet square—none the less a true temple of God. There are six or eight rows of seats, made of plank laid on hide-bottomed chairs, and covered with bedquilts, and every inch of space is occupied by—apparently, at least—a devout worshiper. There, on the front seat, sitting, like the rest, with their backs to the door, is Hoogenboom and his wife, with several white-headed children clustered about their knees or sitting on the floor at their feet. On the same seat are Mr. and Mrs. Morton McRobert, with Will and Bessie. Venable next his mother, and Uncle Frank next him, fill out that plank. Not three feet before them is the little pine table, covered with a gorgeous Mexican blanket, which is the pulpit, and behind it against the wall is Mr. Roland. On chairs to his right and left are seated Hark, Rohamma, and a few other pious negroes of the neighborhood. The service is just completed. The singing has been of old familiar hymns; the prayers and the sermon have been delightfully adapted to the occasion; the bread and the wine of the Sacrament have been distributed; and the plates and glasses, half emptied, are now again on the little table, with the Bible and the hymn-book, before Mr. Roland. He has just engaged in prayer, thanking God, with streaming eyes and the hearts of all there on his tongue, for the feast they have just enjoyed, and for employing him as a minister, "so unworthy, unworthy," in the blessed work. He has now extended his hands, and all rise to receive the Benediction, which seems visibly to flow from his outstretched hands upon the bowed heads before him. As we, standing against the clap-board door, bow our heads with the rest, we are conscious that some one has ridden on his horse near behind us. Almost at the same instant there is uttered behind us, in a low, coarse voice, a deep curse, followed by the sharp crack of a rifle not a foot apparently from our ears. Instantly we are outside, in time to see the back of a man as he rides off at full speed. Confusion, cries, shrieks, a whirlwind of uproar from within the crowded cabin, out of which comes Frank McRobert, his rifle in his hand, which he has snatched, as in the flash of a second, from its wooden pins on the wall. We are appalled even then by the whiteness of his face as he speeds, or rather leaps, along after the horseman. He surely can not expect to catch the man! He runs like a deer; but by the time he has reached the edge of the timber in which the ranch is built the horseman is sixty yards from him on the prairie, and will soon be over the ridge and out of sight. The Texan falls on one knee as he catches sight of the fugitive, and, as in the same instant, the horse falls, struck by a ball from his rifle, which has broken its hind-leg just above the hoof. Before the fallen rider, blaspheming like a fiend, can disentangle himself from under his horse he is in the grasp of his pursuer, his red hair and crimson face in strong contrast with the rigid pallor of the man who holds him. And the Texan seems to be in a sort of dream; he is not looking at the captive, paying no attention to his struggles and curses. He is talking aloud to himself.

"Oh no, no, don't! don't! for your life—for your soul don't do it! don't! don't!" he continues earnestly, incessantly. It is with himself that he is struggling and entreating. It is but for a minute longer that he has to hold down

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google the ruffian without him and the devil within himself; and then twenty men are around him, and as many hard hands have hold of the captive as can find space to grasp.

"Thank God! thank God!" says the Texan, silently to himself as he steps back, "my hands are free from your blood; it was a narrow—a narrow—"

It seems not ten minutes since profound peace reigned in and around the ranch, and now all is confusion and terror. The captive has been brought into the yard, and has been actually woven into a net-work of all the lariats to be had on the place. The man seems to be more astonished than any thing else; with volumes of oaths he exclaims,

"Why, surely I couldn't have killed the wrong man. Why, men—you fools—gentlemen—it was only the preacher I shot—the preacher, I say. I've got nothing agin none of you. You ain't such fools as to care for him, I know. Killed my brother two years ago and a little over in Alabam. I was bound to get him. Come, you let me go. I've done nothin to none of you, hev I?"

"Killed your brother?" say several in a breath.

"Yes, gen-tle-men, my own dear brother. The smartest chap you ever seed; we have ate all our lives out of the same trough. My own brother, gen-tle-men. I was bound to kill him certain, and I done it."

"Gentlemen," exclaims Uncle Frank, in a loud, clear voice, high above all, "I happen to know the whole story. Mr. Roland did kill his brother. But it was because his brother grossly insulted his wife. Mr. Roland was often from home preaching. Once or twice this man's brother, Bob Dyson, a notorious scoundrel, had insulted Mr. Roland publicly, because of his hate for religion and any thing like a preacher. Roland bore with it for months patient as a lamb, never gave the man the least cause. Bob Dyson only got madder at him, determined to drive him away, bring on a fight, kill him. One day Roland came home from preaching somewhere off. He found Dyson in his house—actually in his house, men; insulting his wife, men—a poor sickly woman, men—insulting her, men! In a moment Roland had picked up the tongs—it was in winter—and had knocked the man down—killed him at one blow. I know all about it from his own lips, and from twenty people—I wrote back—living around! Hold on! hear the rest. Mrs. Roland died in consequence of it all. Roland fled out here. We can't understand it—remember he's a preacher—but somehow his conscience troubled him. He was acquitted on trial right away; but that he, a minister, had killed a man he couldn't bear to think of it—he couldn't bear to look any body in the face. He was around here for months, starving, before we found him out. Hush, men! one word more. Natchez under the Hill never saw two worse men than Bob and Buck Dyson. It's Bob Dyson Mr. Roland killed, men; that man there is Buck Dyson you've all read about. Killed his father, you remember. Buck Dyson!"

"Yes, and I'll tell you what it is, men," said the ruffian, with oaths. "This here Buck Dyson will settle accounts with some of you, sure! You let me loose, it's only a preacher I've killed. I wish I could shoot down the whole raft of them! I'll mark every man of you; and as soon as I'm loose I'll not leave a man of you that ain't richer by an ounce of cold lead. Texas? Eh! Texas! you can manage yellow Mexicans—you can't manage Alabamy boys. Come, now, I want to loose!"

There was not a syllable of reply. Hoogenboom was slowly winding round and round the ruffian an ox-chain which he had taken off the oxen that had dragged his family to meeting, regardless of the curses of his victim. The rest stood around in silence—not a whisper even among them. As the Texan walked away toward the house one of the neighbors followed him quietly and laid his hand upon him; he turned almost fiercely upon him:

"No!" he exclaimed, "I won't, won't! Don't you say one word to me, Lem Johnson. You mind your own business. I tell you what it is. I won't stir a finger, and I won't hear one word;" and he disappeared in the house and suddenly came out again.

"Hoogenboom," he said, "Hark here! you two put that man in the ox-wagon and pack him up to your cabin—take more lariats if he needs it. I'll be along to-morrow;" and he again entered the house. In accordance with his command Hark yoked in the oxen, tethered near by under a mesquit, peacefully chewing the cud, indifferent to the passions raging so near them, drove up the wagon, and, with the assistance of the silent Dutchman, lifted up the ruffian and laid him, all bound hand and foot, in the bottom of the wagon. At a word from the Dutchman his wife, accompanied by her children, climbed in beside him—shrinking to the front as far as possible from their passenger—and so drove slowly off. The yard was full of men, yet not a word was spoken. Some were whittling sticks, others were getting up their horses or buggies; none paid any attention to the wagon as it rolled away out of the yard and along the road leading up into the brake. The profound indifference manifested seemed to appall the ruffian—at least he lay silent, saying not a word. Hark walked behind all the way, and it was late in the afternoon when they reached the door of the Dutchman's cabin, far away up among the rocks on the side of the mountain. As they lifted the ruffian out he made a violent effort to escape; but it was hopeless, the knots had been tied too tightly. It was a heavy load for the two as they bore him, ox-chain and all, into the cabin and laid him down like some loathsome red reptile, filthy and dangerous, on the bed on one side of the room. In answer to his request Hark then gave him a gourd of water, holding it to his lips as he sat up to drink.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Fifty dollars in gold," he whispered to the negro, "if you'll only cut one place in the rope. Nobody will see. One hundred, two hundred, three hundred!"

The negro, deaf as a post, carried the gourd back to the water-bucket. He did not even look once into the eager face and hungry eyes, but silently took his leave. The ruffian turned on his side with a curse and looked at the Dutchman. He had first taken off his Sabbath coat and hung it carefully behind a calico curtain on the wall. With his huge wool hat well drawn over his head he then sat down in his old arm-chair with his side to the prisoner and his meerschaum in his hand. The captive watched him as he slowly and methodically filled his pipe, raked a coal out of the ashes on the hearth, lighted it, and began to smoke, his dog Schlick, yellow and hairless, lying beside him with its eye on the stranger. The wife had gone into the little shed adjoining with the children to change her best clothes and to prepare supper. The eyes of the prisoner brightened.

"Mister, I beg your pardon, I haven't hearn your name yet," he said, in a conciliatory manner.

"Hoogenboom," said his host, removing the pipe from his lips and replacing it immediately.

"Hoogenboom!" said his guest—"you don't mean Hoogenboom? Why, I've a cousin of that name. A cousin? Why, that was my wife's maiden name. Why, we are relations. I'm glad to make your acquaintance!"

The Dutchman smoked placidly on in silent attention.

"Yes," continued the man, "a Hoogenboom she was. She has told me five hundred times of a brother she had in Texas—let's see—a brother? I think, or an uncle, was it? A cousin—something. She used to be talking about you forever."

The Dutchman listened with grave countenance.

"I say, you, look here," continued the man, after a long pause, "I wish you would just loosen this rope a little—it hurts a fellow. I can't talk."

A silent puff of smoke was the only reply.

"You're a steady-going, business man; I can see that with half an eye," continued the ruffian, after another and longer silence still. "A solid, substantial business man, and no mistake. You're not very rich, I know. I'm a plain, straightforward fellow. You let me go, and I've got three hundred dollars in a belt here around me—they are yours. Heh?"

Not a syllable of reply.

"You can get it off me yourself, and lock it up in your chest there before you loose me—man. I'll tell you what—you won't believe me, perhaps, but there's five hundred—five hundred did I say? I mean five thousand dollars in gold in my saddle-bags down where my horse fell;" and here he broke into a torrent of curses upon the Texan who had disabled his horse. "You let me go, and you may have them every cent."

Had Hoogenboom been sitting for his portrait he could not have been more dignified and severe in his repose of manner.

"Five thousand dollars, man," said his prisoner. "What do you care for that pale-faced preacher? Who would have dreamed that you people out here would have cared so much for a preacher? I never was more disappointed in a set of men in my life!" This with strong disgust.

The Dutchman here filled his pipe afresh, and resumed his repose of manner.

"Look here, man," said his prisoner, after another silence, with the sudden ferocity of a wolf at bay—"you let me go, now, straight away. You'd better. As sure as you don't I'll murder you and every child you have! I'm Buck Dyson. 'Tain't the first time I've been a prisoner and got off. I've plenty of dimes to pay the lawyers—plenty of friends to slip a file in through the bars. It isn't wholesome—it's worst sort for your health to keep me here!" and he wound up with a perfect fury of execrations. But Mount Hoogenboom itself was not more unmoved under the blowing of a Norther than the placid Dutchman. He seemed rather to be listening to hear something from without, and smoked silently on. And so for an hour the prisoner wasted threatening, entreaty, bribery alternately—used every art known to him in a long experience—only paused from exhaustion—it was all wind against granite.

As the shades of night darkened the wife of the Dutchman came in, set the table, spread the supper of bread, fried bacon, and buttermilk upon it. The father, mother, and children then gathered around. The Dutchman, laying aside his hat and pipe, asked a blessing in German, and the family proceeded silently with their supper.

"You surely won't let a man lay under your roof a-starving to death, and you eating before his very eyes, Madame?" said the prisoner. "Jest loose one arm enough to eat a bite; I haven't had any thing for six days—nine at least. I'll pay you for it."

The woman stole a glance at her husband. He replied in one syllable, and the family proceeded with their meal—finished it. The table was removed, the hearth swept, the father again resumed his chair, his pipe, his placid repose—listening, though, all the time, as for something.

"Won't you come here, little buddy—come here, sis—come here a moment, and I'll give you a pretty?" whispered the man to the children. But at a half-word from the mother the children only clustered more closely about their parents near the empty fire-place. All the family seemed to be expecting something or somebody. At every sound without there was a perceptible start in all, except the father, who sat immovable, with his eye upon the door, enveloped in the smoke from his pipe. Suddenly a new

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google thought seemed to flash upon the Dutchman. At a quick word from him his wife laid a large book in his lap, and lighted a bit of cotton floating in a tin cup of lard, for it was now quite dark.

"Mine friend, mine friend," said the Dutchman, putting on his spectacles eagerly, and addressing his captive for the first time, "dis is de goot Book; let me read you one, two, dree lines about Christ and your soul. You in great danger—let me read, let me bray wid you." And he spoke in an earnest and hurried way, in singular contrast with his manner before. The man regarded him at first with astonishment, and then repelled the offer with a paroxysm of oaths. Again and again, with greater and greater earnestness, and as if in a hurry to do it as soon as possible—listening as if to the door—the German urged the matter, but in vain. He even attempted to read and then to pray, in spite of the man's resistance, but it was impossible. The ruffian broke out into a vile song, at the top of his voice, as he lay, drowning every other sound. Silently, at last, the Dutchman resumed his chair and his pipe, more phlegmatic, if possible, than before—his children and wife seated beside him before the fire-place, their backs to the bed — waiting, listening. As there came a sound of footsteps without the woman drew up her wondering children about her, and bowed her head down among them weeping and praying; her husband gave no sign of intelligence. He well knew that there were no jails in fifty miles to hold the man; plenty of friends to rescue him if they had time to hear of his arrest; in any case, plenty of lawyers to quibble and put off trial. In a word, the man knew that if the legal course were followed the escape of the desperado, and his unchecked, exasperated course of future crime was a certainty. In any case he was helpless to defend his prisoner without bloodshed, and he sat and smoked in silence, awaiting what he knew was coming, though not a syllable or a gesture from any one had intimated it. As his wife bowed down her head, one blow on the door and the little cabin was full of men. Only the children stared in terror, the yellow dog cowering under their feet, snarling and barking; neither the Dutchman nor his wife even looked around. Without a word spoken, or a sound, save the yells and curses of the prisoner, twenty hands were in an instant on the man, and twenty arms lifted him off the bed and hurried him out. It seemed but a moment more, and the woman was weeping convulsively aloud on her knees beside her husband, and the sound of many rapid footsteps had died away outside, leaving the cabin in a silence and solitude appalling from the suddenness thereof. All night long the family sat cowering about the cold hearth-stone, the father smoking steadily and silently in the centre. When the morning sun dawned its beams fell upon a stunted live-oak, miles away from any home, in an obscure ravine among the mountains; and the beams, flickering through its scanty foliage, fell upon a new-made grave beneath its largest limb. The mesquit grass had been trampled down around, as by the tread of many feet, and a close observer might have detected the bark rubbed away in places upon the limb overhead, as by the friction of a rope. At least never again was the desperado seen by man in Texas, Alabama, or elsewhere. Very rarely was his name even mentioned in the neighborhood, and soon the whole event lapsed into the misty Past in the current of fresher things.

CHAPTER XIX.

AND LAST.

"When I have become immensely rich, and have ten or twenty thousand head of cattle grazing in the prairies around, and a magnificent mansion where my ranch now stands, and a splendid coach and four, and a side-board loaded down with silver plate, I was just deciding what I would have as my coat of arms to paint upon the carriage-panels, and stamp upon the plate, and have worked upon all the linen, and embossed upon all the letter-paper." It was Uncle Frank who spoke, rocking at ease, in the capacious rocking-chair out upon the front porch of the house on the San Hieronymo, with all the family grouped around.

"It must be this delicious moonlight which makes you so romantic, Frank," said his sister. "But do let us hear what you have selected as your coat of arms. Two revolvers crossed? or a bear and a hunter rampant? or what?"

"No, I would have a Spanish dagger-tree in full bloom, with the motto, 'Joy after Sorrow.' It's an idea that struck me the first time we visited this spot together a day or two after your arrival. Yonder is the very plant that I then pointed out to you when I made the remark. The plant, you see, is found only, or mainly, in Texas, that would show that I'm a Texan, heart and soul. It's an evergreen, needs no rain, seems to enjoy perpetual summer, and defies the bitterest blast of winter—that, too, would be emblematic of Texas and a genuine Texan. There, it is a perfect mass, from the hardy root up, of bristling spikes, not to be trampled down, even touched safely, by any thing, beast or man. But the magnificent bloom, the whole bristling tree ending in, and crowned by, the towering, fragrant, splendid bloom. Yes, Joy after Sorrow—joy growing out of sorrow: trouble, pain, anguish, trial, all ending superbly in Happiness. It's a splendid crest, a noble emblem!"

"Yes," replied his sister. "But you should let us have it. Remember all our great trouble in Virginia ending in the happiness we—as a family—possess this night on the San Hieronymo."

"No, Madam, you must hunt up your own coat of arms," said the Texan, smiling. "You forget that I was a good-for-nothing runaway

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

youth from Virginia. You do not know half the troubles and trials out here in Texas I have seen, long before you came even, and since, too, if you only knew them. It was that Communion Sabbath I began to flower—sterile, barren; rough, dangerous backwoodsman that I was—not a more worthless plant rooted in a prairie, six weeks ago, from that Communion Sabbath I began, in my poor way, to flower, and just out of the darkest of moments."

"Let me decide the dispute," said Agnes, who sat beside him tearfully yet joyfully. "You surely will both of you yield to me. Think of my long and bitter sorrow before coming to Texas. And think of that hour father fell, shot down before my eyes. Only remember that dreadful, dreadful day I sat there on the floor, in the confusion of shrieking women and children, his dear head on my lap, his dear life all flowing swiftly away. Me in one hour deprived of my home, my father, even, it almost seemed to me, of my God. And then in that same hour—of all the hours of my life—to find all restored to me in Frank—that darkest hour the beginning of the happiest days I have ever known. At least, not your coat of arms alone, Frank, our coat of arms, say." And she laid her little, soft hand in his.

"I never rode so fast in my life," said Venable, speaking rapidly as if to relieve his uncle. "When you hurried out to me from the house, told me I was the only one there you could trust, and how important it was I should go and return as soon as possible, I felt as if I had wings. And I was not very long in getting to the county court-house I know. The clerk had lost the office key and wanted to stop and look for it! I gave one jump against the door and stood, or rather lay, on the floor in the centre of the office. Then I got an old newspaper ready, and the instant the old clerk had written out and stamped the license I had pressed it on the newspaper so as to dry it. I had folded it up, put it in my breast pocket, paid the clerk for it and the broken lock, and was on my horse again in double quick time. 'You'll do for Texas, do for Texas!' said the white-haired old clerk, and he came out. I was sorry, for I had no time for it, to shake hands with me and tell me good-by as I mounted. Do all I could, it was midnight before I got back."

"I remember so well," said Agnes, in a low, soft voice, "all that father said as he lay there so calm and happy, even. 'It was an angry blow—one angry blow Moses gave the rock that offended God,' he said. 'For that one blow, after all his long, weary wandering in the desert, he was not permitted to enter the promised land—only saw it at a distance and died. I was just entering on success in this wide, rich field of labor,' he said, 'and now I die, for that one wicked, wicked blow.' And yet how serene, submissive, willing he was to die! 'Since my great sin God has in mercy permitted me to do some good in Texas,' he said. 'But oh how I would like, if it pleased God, to live a few years—only a few Sabbaths, even—longer to preach the Gospel! I never knew how to preach at all before my great sorrow. Now I am just beginning to learn. Heaven is a bright and happy place, but if I only could stay here a little longer, to do a little more good—only to make up in some degree for the reproach I have brought on the Gospel!'"

"'Tis strange," said the Texan. "That night I carried him over to the ranch from Hark's cabin, and a hundred times since, I've reasoned with him about killing Bob Dyson. It was no use. 'I needn't have killed him,' he would always say. 'I might have entreated him; or I might have taken him in my arms and put him out of the house. It's the death of his soul I look at. To see my wife pale and all trembling there was the sight that maddened me. But the instant after, to see that man lying stone-dead on the carpet by the fire-place, so red and bloated and brutal, gone in the very instant of blasphemy and violence and desperate wickedness to the bar of God, not a moment for thought and repentance allowed him—it was the ghastly dead soul lying at my feet, and I a minister of the Gospel, whose business is to save souls, and to be an example of all meekness; it was this that overwhelmed me.'"

"And you remember," said Mrs. Morton McRobert, her eyes filling with tears as she spoke, "what he said about saving little Will's life. 'It was God,' he said, 'who ordered it that I should be on the river-bank just at the right instant. And when I snatched the little fellow out of the very jaws of death, and had him warm and living again in my arms, it was the first flash of light on my darkness. I took a life,' he said, 'and now God has so wonderfully permitted me to save a life. Surely it is a token of forgiveness from my Father in heaven. And who knows, dear Madam,' he said to me, 'but that I then saved from death a life that is to be of great use to the world? I do believe so! Train him for it, Madam,' he said." And as she spoke the mother drew her boy nearer to her side, her arm around him.

"His great consolation, however," said her husband, "was in the souls converted under his preaching here. He told me that afternoon that if God had permitted him to destroy one soul, He had also shown his love in permitting him to be the means of saving many souls."

"There was one thing that strikes me now with awe as I think of it," said Agnes, sinking her voice still lower in the hushed silence of the group around. "It was half an hour before Venable got back that night. He had been talking of other things. Suddenly he thought for the first time of his murderer. He had said nothing about him—supposed him to have escaped safely. Yet suddenly he began to pray for him as he lay. His eyes were shut, his face so deadly pale, but he clasped his hands together over the wound in his side, and seemed in an agony of prayer. 'Father, forgive him, he knew not what he did!' he said.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'Spare me, spare me this soul. Open his eyes now, now. Let him not die in sin!' He prayed as if by the bedside of a dying sinner, it must have been near half an hour. And then he opened his eyes and smiled upon me as if he felt entirely relieved. 'I do believe, Agnes,' he said, his face full of joy—'I do believe that my prayer for Dyson is heard.' Was it not strange?"

"Ah, that may account for what Lem Johnson told me," said the Texan, in a tone that thrilled every heart there in the solemn moonlight. "I don't like to refer to the thing but for this. All the way from Hoogenboom's he was struggling and yelling and blaspheming like a fiend. But just before he got to the spot he became still, on a sudden, as death. When they laid him on the ground under the tree he begged them, in tones altogether changed, to wait with him a moment. It wasn't fright either, nor fawning, for he knew his men too well for that. The men halted from their work while he confessed all he had ever done; it was a terrible tale of crime—ten times worse than any one had ever suspected. Lem told me it made his blood curdle there in the moonlight to hear that man, sitting on the ground in the centre of them, telling the whole story like an humble little child. He seemed sorry from his very heart—and Lem isn't a man to be easily deceived, he's been present at too many such things. 'I don't know why it is, men,' Dyson said, 'but up to a few moments ago I was still Buck Dyson to the core. Now a something has come over me—a power, a force, a something awful, men, and I ain't the same man. I've been as near death as this before,' he said; ''tain't that. A something has got at, got into my heart. Now, from my soul I'm sorry for what I've done. God sees it; you can't. God sees it, and that's enough for me. Sorry, sorry, all through and through and through. I've heard Roland—the man I killed to-day—say that a man must repent—that means be sorry for his rascalities—and believe in Christ, who died to save sinners. Now I do repent. I know that certain, sure. And I'm a trying now, men, to believe in Christ hard! I hearn tell once of a rough that was crucified next Christ, and he believed in Christ there. If he could, I'll try.' Lem told me he never heard such a prayer as that man prayed then and there, kneeling among the rocks, so low—not loud-like—so fervent, catching hold on God with desperate hands, pleading for mercy. Some of the men actually cried, he said. 'Suppose we let him go,' said Lem; 'at least let's hold on to him till he can be tried and hung all regular.' Dyson stood straight up on his feet at that. 'No, men,' he said—'no, not at all, not a bit of it. I've deserved to die just this death fifty times. Better die now, here this quiet night, off alone here by ourselves. And I do hope, trust, ac'lly believe I'm a pardoned man! I've got God's pardon, men; yours is no account—that is, in comparison. Let me die, gentlemen. I've got a poor crippled sister at home; father threw her out of the window when he was drunk, and I killed him for it. Please send her what I leave in this belt and the saddle-bags.' And he told them where to send. 'Write her I died repentant,' he said. Lem said he stood there that midnight another man from Buck Dyson altogether; it almost seemed wrong to hang him. But they did it. I never would have told all this but for what you said about Mr. Roland's praying just exactly at that same hour for him."

There was a long silence after this. No one on the porch seemed inclined to speak or even move. At last, and to give a turn to the tide of thought, Mrs. Morton McRobert said:

"Next to that belief in his prayer being answered I believe it was your marriage, Agnes, that did most to soothe his dying hour."

"And it was so strange," said Agnes. "Not a word or a look even, had ever passed between Frank and myself about even the possibility of such a thing. I didn't know, that is, I was not sure, that he even loved me. At least—well, I knew well enough that I loved him," she added, smiling.

"It was the boldest, coolest thing, I do think, I ever did," said the Texan. "I whispered to you to come out for one moment—only one. I don't know what I said to you when I tried to ask you about it. I haven't the least recollection what you said to me—I don't really believe you said any thing at all. But Venable was off and back again with the license, and sister here prepared your father for it, and he married us as we knelt down beside his pallet on the floor. It was just after his prayer for Dyson. This, taken with that, seemed to fill the measure of his peace, and he was gone."

Another long and happy silence. A deep and holy calm had settled upon all. The breeze sighed gently among the trees, the moonbeams sparkled brightly upon the San Hieronymo, and the Colorado rippled audibly in the distance.

"How much we all have learned since we have been in Texas!" said Mr. Morton McRobert, at last. "The old prophets, and John the Baptist, and our Saviour taught their most precious lessons to people who came out to them, away from the cities and villages, into the wilderness to learn. I think I at least have learned something since I reached this spot. To do the best I can through the darkest hour, trusting quietly in God."

"And I hope I have shared the lesson with you," said his wife, laying her hand in his; "and this in addition—to think of our Father not only as in the house of worship but as abiding under our own roof; not only as during the Sabbath, but as during each of the six days also. How many dangers and privations have we been threatened with, and yet how happy, happy our home has been all the time!"

"I ought to have learned the same too," said Venable, "that night out on the burning prairie, and at the springs when Dyson had hold of me,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and up among the Indians. I've got that quiver, bow, arrows, paint-bag, Iron-Jacket's armor, and that powder-horn that burst by me in the fire that night, all hanging up in a row against the wall of my room, as reminders of it all. I need them, for I'm very apt to forget."

"As to us," said the Texan, drawing the head of his wife upon his bosom, "till Agnes and I get rich enough to have the coat of arms on our silver and carriage we'll plant a perfect hedge of the yuca—the dagger-plant—about our ranch to remind us of the same thing. We have all learned the same lesson in common, being here in the same school together."

"I don't think I have half done learning all Texas has got to teach me yet," said Venable. "There's a great deal to be seen and to be done here yet."

"Oh yes," said Will, who had been silent in his chair so long all supposed him asleep. "Plenty to do: there's the bathing-house to build on the spring, and that splendid pleasure-boat to build too, we've all been intending so long. And I've got to finish my collection of bugs and reptiles and things—petrifactions and the like. I find something new for it every day. And there's budding and grafting of choice grapes on mustang grape stock; and apples on the haws; and a collection of cactus to make; and a honey-palace for the bees to build; and —oh yes! a hundred thousand things to do."

"Oh, as to that," said his brother, "you haven't mentioned half! There's a fish-trap to build in the spring, and a seine to knit for the river. And there's New Braunsfels, the wonderful German town, to visit; and San Antonio, the wonderful Mexican city, with the ruins of grand old monasteries around it, to see. Yes, I want to visit the Enchanted Rock I've heard so much about, that glitters like a mountain of diamonds—it's not two hundred miles from here. And, then, I've heard of wonderful caves all around. Then there's that one-eyed panther uncle has fought so often—he has to be shot!"

"And there's the new church to build," suggested the father; "and a nice one it shall be. And Frank and myself must both build new and better houses of rock soon, and take in a great deal more prairie under fence."

"Yes, father," said Venable; "and I've set my heart on going out on a buffalo hunt with uncle. And I want to learn German of Hoogenboom, and how to draw of Aunt Agnes."

"And there's the silver mines we've got to visit," added Uncle Frank, in a lower tone, to Venable. "Oh, Texas is a grand country!" he continued, in a louder tone—"it's so tremendously large—old Virginia multiplied by five, I believe—that it'll take years to hunt out all there is to see in it. A geologist might spend his lifetime collecting its fossils and petrifactions and minerals, and such things. Any body fond of botany could spend a hundred years collecting its various plants. And so of its birds, and of its fishes, and of its reptiles: as to its insects, a thousand years would hardly do to make a collection of them. I do believe new insects and flowers and the rest are created every year—new kinds, I mean. There isn't a week hardly but what I come upon something bran-new to me. As to adventures of all kinds, they spring up, like every thing else on Texas soil, abundant, innumerable. We haven't learned more than the A B C of Texas yet—only made a little start in knowing about it."

"And then there's Mexico next door to us; and all the wonderful things there I hope to visit," said Venable.

"Yes," added his uncle; "and there are events about taking place in Mexico, too, well worth witnessing—hearing about at least, witnessing most like. But it's time for us, Agnes, darling, to be walking over home," he said, rising from his seat. "I'll tell what we'll do. Will, you go ahead collecting for your museum as fast as you can: we'll all add to it every thing we happen upon. Hark and Hoogenboom will do what they can to help us. So will all the rest. Next time I'm in Austin I'll buy Venable a large writing-desk, several reams of the best paper I can find, a huge bottle of ink, and a gold pen, and let him keep a history of every thing for us. He can make a fair, even start from the first of next month, and by the end of a year I'll be bound his book will be worth reading. All in favor of my proposition will please to say Ay!" And, with the laughing and unanimous assent that followed, the group separated for the night.

[Here closes the story of "The Virginians in Texas," as written eight years ago, and accepted for Harper's Magazine. The Great Rebellion burst out, like a flash of lightning from a clear sky, just as the publication of the story was to have been commenced. During these years the manuscript has been in our hands. It is reproduced precisely as written, so that the reader may know how Texas appeared then. The author remained in Texas through the war. What a change came over the State during those long years he has told in his tale—"Inside: a Chronicle of Secession"—which is more history than fiction. A few weeks since he sent us a chapter, by way of "Envoi," narrating the fortunes of these Virginians during that time. This will be given in our next Number, and with it will be concluded the story of "The Virginians in Texas."—Ed. Harper's Mag.]

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AT BAY.

[I had intended to tell the story myself; but the young woman's account is so much more to the point than another could be that I send her MS. just as it fell into my hands, only premising that it seems to me worth the reading.—E.]

I WILL tell you about it as well as I can, since you ask me to; though it frightens me to think of showing it to any one who knows how to write books; and I do hope you will excuse all mistakes, and remember that I can't tell things in a fine way, but only just as they happened. Of course you will not have it printed as it is, but will write it out yourself, and fix it up in some pretty way.

I do not wonder so much at your wanting to make a story out of Martie. It used to seem like a story to me as it went along. I often think when I have finished a novel, or a story in a magazine or newspaper—and I have read a good many this winter that Dan has brought home—that it is strange why the people who make them up can not find something real to say. It seems to me as if I knew a good many lives that I could put right into a book, if I only had the words, and make somebody feel glad or sorry, or help them or track them. But then, you know, I don't know any thing about it. I read a story once—it was a good while ago—called "Paul Blecker." I saw in a paper that it was written by a lady who had written something called "Life in the Iron Mills." I never saw that, nor any thing more of hers, and I don't know who she is. I wish I could find her out and thank her for having written that story. It made you feel as if she knew all about you, and were sorry for you; and as if she thought nobody was too poor, or too uneducated, or too worn-out with washing-days, and all the things that do not sound a bit grand in books, to be written about. I think of it often now, since I have had the care and worry of the children here at home. It makes me love her, and it makes me respect her—stranger as she is, and so very far above and beyond any thing that I can ever be in this world or another.

To think that I have troubled you with all this, when I ought to have begun at once with Martie!

It is nothing of a story after all, when you come to it; so very simple and short. I suppose it means more to me because she was Martie. But I can not help hoping that, after you have altered it all over, so that it is fit to print, it may make somebody think a little about us poor country girls who go into the cities, homesick and unprotected, to find work. Perhaps they could make it a bit easier or safer for us; and then very likely they couldn't. But it does you good—at least it does me—just to be thought about. Sometimes I used to see it in a lady's eyes in the street, or in a horse-car—just a look, and she would go, and I would never see her again; but when I was in bed at night I remembered it. I have heard Martie say the same.

You see, one does feel so lonely! I remember just how hard it was, leaving home; and Dan had already found me my place at Inkman, Tipes, & Co.'s, so that the way was smoothed out for me at the beginning better than ever it was for Martie. But all that Dan could do never made it an easy way. I suppose I am one of hundreds like me, who turn to the cities for work; we start all about alike; we end terribly unlike.

You know how large the family is, and that father and Dan, though they were two as industrious and steady men as could be found at Long Meadow, had hard work of it making the two ends meet. In fact, they didn't always meet; and it was when I found that out that I began to think a little for myself at night, when we were in bed and Mary Ann had gone to sleep; Mary Ann always did go to sleep first.

I had been well educated for a farmer's daughter, as we counted education in Long Meadow. They had a hard pull to get me through the High School, for it was after the war had begun, and hard times; but mother was determined I should do it; so I graduated, and read my composition with the rest, and came home for father and Dan to support. Not that I was by any means idle, for I took the heaviest baking and dairy-work right off mother's hands, and helped about the children's sewing. If she could not have got along without me it would have been all very well, and I should have felt, and so would father, that I was fairly contributing to the household expenses. But Mary Ann was growing large enough to help her about the churning after school, and to mend the boys' mittens very well; so I felt as if I should be better away. I respected myself more and I felt happier as soon as I had made up my mind to go.

I always learn a new thing easily. I had no trouble with type-setting after the first week or two, and never repented my decision. It is not so respectable, as the world goes, to work in a printing-office as to teach, and mother wanted me to take the district school. But I had rather go into a factory or do washing than to drudge in a hot school-room for three hundred a year. As to respectability, I told mother I would make my own, independently of my business, or I would go without.

But after all it was a little rough when the time came to say good-by. Mother would cry behind her apron, and father coughed, and Dan winked, and the children pulled hold of my dress so, and looked so pink and pretty! Then the old sitting-room and the kitchen, and the cat and the cows, and the horses, and the sunshine through the window-glass, and the dahlias nodding out in the front-yard with the frost on them—why, I don't suppose I could tell you how leaving them seemed like leaving a part of myself, nor how I cried after Dan had put me into the car and given me my check and gone off.

I don't suppose you would care to hear if I did tell you—not about that long, lonesome

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google journey, and how long and lonesome the city seemed when I stepped out into the rattling streets, in the strange noise and hurry and dirt, nor how long and lonesome the time that I must stay in it, shut out from the red maples, and the sky, and the great wide fields of snow, and May-flowers, and clover-smells, and stillness, and sweetness, and home, and mother. I only speak of it because it made me feel, remembering all about it, so sorry for Martie.

I was a great deal more sorry for her than I was for myself, just because she hadn't what I had to brave. The night that she came to our house—I boarded with Mrs. M'Cracken—I thought that she had the most homesick face I ever saw. The room which she had engaged would not be vacant for three days—it was Josie Sewell's, and Josie was going home sick; so Mrs. M'Cracken asked, Would I let her sleep with me for a night or two? I don't generally like to sleep with strangers, but I had the queerest feeling about her, as if I wanted to talk away or kiss away that homesickness out of her face; so I said Yes most willingly. Though, to be sure, it would not have made much difference if I hadn't been willing, for Mrs. M'Cracken scolded so if she did not have her way that the boarders all gave in to her.

I took Martie up stairs with me to take off her bonnet, and she thanked me, but did not say any more, so I came down again. She looked so shy and uncomfortable when she came in to supper that I wished I had waited for her. The table was full too—printers we were almost all of us, except two seamstresses, two machine-girls, and one young stone-mason, David Bent. We used to call him Davie, because he was such a pleasant-spoken fellow, and willing to do a good turn for every body. It was a pretty name, and it seemed to suit him, though he was a great stoutly-built man over six feet.

I remember that Job Rice happened to be punctual to supper that night, and that he passed Martie the butter (Mrs. M'Cracken, by-the-way, did manage to get the worst butter that ever I tasted in my life).

Sue Cummings whispered to me, looking over at Martie as we sat down, that she was as homely as a hedge-fence. Now I don't think that any body but Sue would ever have thought of calling Martha Saunders homely. She was not exactly pretty either, but she certainly was prettier, it seemed to me, than Sue. Sue had black hair and bright cheeks too, and was called a very good-looking girl.

Martie was the palest woman that I ever saw, I believe—just cut like a little sad statue out of marble. I never saw a tinge of color in her face but twice in all the years I've known her. Her hair grew low on her forehead, and she had large eyes—they were gray eyes, set far apart. She had large hands, even larger than mine—for she had done rougher work—but white, like her face, and warm. She took up things in a strong, firm way, like a man. I never saw her hold her tea-cup with her little finger sticking out, like Sue. I noticed these things when she sat down opposite me full in the light. It gives me a cold, uncomfortable feeling looking back so far. I wish I had been the only one that noticed; yet not exactly that either, come to think of it.

I went up stairs with her after supper, and helped her put away her things, and presently got up the courage to ask her if she were coming in at Inkman & Tipes's. She said yes; that they had just given her Josie Sewell's place; that she hoped she should not be slow at learning the trade; and was it very hard to understand? I offered to teach her a little at nooning, and she turned her sweet gray eyes on me to thank me in such a way—nobody but Martie ever had such a way. I believe I loved her from that minute.

"You came from the country?" I said by-and-by.

"Yes."

"Far?"

"About twenty miles."

"I wonder if you are as homesick as I was," I said as gently as I knew how. "You have a home, I suppose?"

She was standing by the pine wardrobe, hanging up one of her black dresses. She hung it up and buttoned the wardrobe door, and began to fold her shawl. I thought she was not going to answer me.

"I had a home," she said at last.

She began to undress very fast without looking at me, and I felt that I had better not ask her any more questions. I sat up after she was in bed to read a chapter—mother made me promise always to read my chapter—and the light, where I had put it on the wash-stand, shone down against her face. I was reading somewhere in the genealogies, and it wasn't very interesting, and I could not keep my eyes off from her. I have seen little children often since I have been in New York lost in the streets at twilight on a rainy day. Martie's face that night reminded me of them. I wanted to throw down my Bible and comfort her up and cry with her; but I did not dare to.

I hope you will not laugh at me for making so much fuss over a homesick girl—as Sue did. At any rate I believe you would have done just what I did if you had been there. And I'm sure I didn't do very much. I only kissed her, that was all. After I was in bed and the lamp was out, and we had lain still a while, I only stooped over and kissed her softly on both her eyes.

I was afraid she would be angry with me, but I really could not help it. And instead of being angry with me what do you suppose she did? Why, she threw her arms about my neck and broke out crying in the strangest way:

"It's so long," she said, "it's so long since any body kissed me!"

She sobbed the words over and over in her odd, dry way without any tears as if she would

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google never catch her breath; and I was so taken by surprise, and I didn't know what to do, so I just held her there and let her say it over, "It's so long—so long!"

Well, I suppose you know how short a time it takes for girls to get acquainted when they like each other. One hour is just as good as one year. So you will not be surprised nor laugh—I shouldn't wonder if you did laugh a little though—to hear that before we went to sleep she knew all about me, and I knew all about her; and I felt almost as much at home with her as I did with Mary Ann. When the time came for her to take Josie's room I wouldn't hear of it, so we arranged with Mrs. M'Cracken to keep her with me.

She told me all about the home that had been, and how it was broken up—"buried," she called it now. Her mother had been dead a great many years, and then two little brothers went next—there was consumption, I believe, both sides of the family—and last of all her father. He had been a shoemaker, comfortably off and kind-hearted, and he had sent her to school, and done every thing for her, and been every thing to her. She kept house for him till he was sick; then she used to bind shoes all day and half the night, sitting by his bed and watching to see if he wanted any thing. He had a little laid up, but it soon went for doctor's bills, and so she supported them both and kept him in comforts to the last; and he died while he was kissing her good-night—died with his lips on her cheek.

After that the place grew so lonely to her—and the grave was right in sight every day as she went to work—and she said it seemed as if she must get away. But she did not know where to go, and she had nobody to tell her; so she staid on, till one week, all of a sudden, the Corporation failed. They had been crowding on hands at very high wages—eight dollars a week to good workers—running a venture against a rival Company, and, without any warning, the whole thing fell flat, turning five hundred hands out of work.

Martie took the next train for New York. She came in in the dark and cold as I did, only she had not a place provided in which to lay her head, and she did not know a face in all the great, strange city. She wandered about for two or three days trying to find work, and sleeping at a miserable little lodging-house that she came across—a place, she said afterward, to which she felt that no respectable girl ought to go. But what could she do? Money to board at a hotel she had not, and apply to the police she dared not; she said she was afraid that they would arrest her as a vagrant. Martie always had dreadful notions of the police; and so had I for that matter. They act, and I don't know but they must act, so different to a poor girl in a calico dress from what they do to the ladies who want to be helped across the mud in Broadway.

Perhaps there may be a place somewhere in the city where they take care of country girls until they can take care of themselves—I'm sure there ought to be—but if there is, I don't know where; nor did Martie. Dan told me that there is such a place in Boston, under the charge of some Catholic women. I think they must be very good women, and I don't say any thing against them; but I suppose Protestant people must know how much more girls think about saying their prayers and every thing good, when they are homesick and lonely, and how easily they can be turned and guided. I believe that any body who had cared for and been kind to Martie those first few days might have made—why, might have made a Buddhist of her without any trouble at all.

But at last, when she was all worn out and discouraged, she happened to come across Inkman & Tipes; and so Mr. Inkman, who said she looked like a smart girl, took her on trial, and the foreman told her about Josie Sewell and Mrs. M'Cracken, and that was the way she came to me, and—to so much else.

And if I don't hurry I shall never come to it.

The first day—I think it was the very first day—that Martie went to work, Job Rice came up when the foreman was looking the other way, and asked me to introduce him to the new girl. Now I never did like Job Rice—not from the first minute I saw him. I did not know much about him, nor had I any thing against him but his swearing and his face. All the fellows at our table swore though, except Davie Bent, and I shouldn't have thought so much of that but for his face. I can't explain what was the matter with that either, except that I did not like it. So I did not want him to speak to Martie, and I said so. Then he said he would get somebody else to do it, and that I was the rudest and most unreasonable girl he ever had seen at Inkman's. So I thought perhaps it was rude and unreasonable, and I took him over to Martie at the window. I used to blame myself for it afterward; but Martie said that was foolish, for it would have made no difference in the end. He walked home with her that day to dinner.

The next noon she begged me to wait for her; and when we were in the street she walked on so fast that I could hardly keep up. But Job could walk faster than we, and he gained upon us, and fell into step beside her.

"Just what she meant he should do!" said Sue from behind, in her spiteful way. Of course the other girl heard her.

The next day Martie said she wanted to see Mary Bailey about her sack-pattern, so Mary walked the other side. But where there's a will there's a way, they say, and Job Rice's wicked will found ways enough. He would come upon her suddenly as she waited after breakfast for me upon the stairs. He joined us at night, because he said it was too dark for us to come back alone. He waited about after supper when she staid to help Mrs. M'Cracken with the dishes—that went a little way toward

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google her board, and she could not earn much, you know, till she had fairly learned her trade. He went to church whenever Martie did. He went to Sabbath-school just to sit in a class opposite and watch her. He was always asking her at the table to go with him to the theatre, or evening-school, or negro minstrels, or something, till he worried the poor child half sick.

Before long they were the talk of the house, and Sue Cummings did her best to see that they should be. The fact was, that Sue had been used to having things her own way among the boys, and especially with Job Rice, till Martie came.

One night Davie Bent met me and walked home with me. Davie didn't often walk home with me. Just as we came to the slope he asked me—we had been talking about Martie—if this was true that they said about her and Rice? He supposed she did like him, didn't she?

I was thinking of something else—some thought of my own that it was silly to waste time over—and I did not say much to Martie when I first went up stairs. Presently I told her what Davie said. She turned just as quick, with a little stamp of her foot.

"And you? What did you say to him?"

So I told her what I said: that I knew she didn't like Job, and that he worried and dogged her.

"Well, I should like to tell you something else to tell him. No, I suppose it would make it the worse for me though. I wish Job would let me alone. I wish he would let me alone!"

I noticed then how her eyes burned—just like coals at white heat; I never had seen them look so before.

"Martie," said I, beginning to wonder, "what is the matter? What did you wish you could tell Davie? What has happened?"

She was brushing out her hair, and she stopped and threw down her brush with a childish burst of vehemence as if her nerves were strung to their tightest:

"Job Rice told me to-night he wanted to marry me, that's what he did! He might have known what I would say, and he might have known what an insult it was after I've shown him and shown him how hateful he is to me. He said—I wouldn't even tell you what he said. It seems as if I couldn't bear it!"

"You told him?"

"I told him," she said, slowly—"I told him I would rather be cut to pieces inch by inch! Explicit, wasn't it, dear?"

She broke out laughing, but it sounded as if she would much rather cry; and by-and-by she hid her face in the pillows a while, and I shouldn't wonder if she did cry.

"You see he said such things!" she said presently, her voice smothered up in the pillows. "He said such things to me! Father wouldn't have let him, father wouldn't! Oh, Sarah, Sarah!"

I was very sorry for her, though I had to be sorry without half understanding why. But after that I always felt that Martie was afraid of Job Rice. Sometimes it used to seem as if she let him go with her just to hush up words that were on his lips. One day when he had said something that displeased her, she flashed up a little, and told him before us all that he was a miserable cowardly villain to treat a girl so. I saw him go to his case, set up something quick in type, strike it off on a slip of paper, and toss it over to her. A gust from an open window blew it toward me, and I saw the three words: "We will see."

They did not sound so very dreadful, to be sure; but when Martie read them that curious look, like a lost child, crept all over her face, and never went out of it all day, nor could I kiss it away at night, though I tried as hard as I could.

It was the next week, I believe, that we had our little week's vacation that we had waited for so long. Business was dull just then, and Mr. Inkman was glad to let us off. I took Martie up to Long Meadow with me, and I verily believe that was one of the happiest weeks the poor girl ever spent in her life. Mother took her in as if she had been one of us, and kissed her, and cured her neuralgia, and made her flannel petticoats, and treated her just as she did me; and father used to pat her on the head when she had read the Almanac to him evenings. Poor little Martie! Her eyelids used to tremble a little at that. The children petted her to death, and as for Dan—well, well! poor fellow!—I don't mind telling you—I am afraid Dan thought a great deal of Martie; but I saw, and he saw, that it never could be; she would never care for him—in that way, I mean. I could not understand then why, Dan was so good and handsome. Poor Dan! I thought this winter that he might take a fancy to Jinny Coles; at least I hoped so; but he says he does not care to marry just yet, and Jinny calls him an old bachelor, and so do all the Long Meadow girls.

Well, Martie went out with me into the sweet spring days—there seemed to be a great many days to that week—and fed the cows, and looked at the horses, and played with the chickens, and hunted for May-flowers, and filled her carpet-bag with sea-weed moss to carry back; she liked it because it was cool, she said; she used to bury up her face in it and sit thinking.

"Sarah," she said, the night before we went back, "I have felt so safe here. Just think if one could feel safe all the time!"

So to-morrow came, and we had to bid good-by to all the sweetness, and dearness, and safety; and the long, lonesome city looked longer and lonesomer than ever.

When we got back, all drabbled and cold and tired, Mrs. M'Cracken met me at the door.

"How do you do, Sarah?" said she, in a very high key. "You'll find your room ready; and you'll better take your bag and run right up, and not stand here lettin' the draught in.—

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Marthy Saunders, I'm sorry to say I haven't got any room for you."

"Not any room for me!"

Martie turned about and looked at her. It was growing dark fast, and the dreary wind blew up from the street against her.

"No, I hain't; and, I'm sorry to say, I never expect to. I'm a respectable widow, I am, and this 'ere's a respectable house. I've no place for the likes of you!"

Martie just stood and looked at her—looked at her with her great, wide-open eyes. I don't believe any of those little lost children could have been slower to take in the shameful words.

I must have said something dreadful to Mrs. M'Cracken—I believe I told her she lied; then it occurred to me that that wasn't polite, so I told her I should like to know what she was talking about, and whom she was talking about.

"I'm talkin' about Marthy Saunders," says she; "and I say girls as behaves shameful and loses their virtoous name, and then begs young men to marry 'em, ain't fit company for me, nor my boarders! So, Marthy Saunders, I'll be obleeged to you if you'll jest step out of the way, for it's cold, and I want the door shet!"

Then, for once of the two times, I saw the hot color go shooting all over Martie's face, up to her forehead, down to her neck. It blazed for a minute like a jet of fire, and then died down. I never saw her look so white—I never saw her look so pure and white as she looked when it had gone.

She opened her lips to speak, but Mrs. M'Cracken had slammed the door; slammed it so close upon her that her shawl was caught in the hinge.

The girls were laughing out in the dining-room, where they were playing forfeits with Davie Bent. The light twinkled out warmly through the side-glass, and shone down warmly from our own room where they had just made things ready for me. The dreary wind blew up from the street; the dust whirled about in clouds; two or three people went by in the dark, hurrying home. Poor little Martie!

Dear me! dear me! To think that I can't write about it after all this time without crying!

I broke out into something about Job Rice, and the landlady, and what should we do? And had it all in a jumble of anger and grief and bewilderment; but noticed at last that Martie stood yet, with her shawl shut in the door, perfectly still. I noticed, too, that her hand was lifted solemnly up above her head.

"Martie! Martie! what are you doing?"

"Praying God to settle accounts with him," she said in a very quiet voice; but a voice no more like Martie's than it was like Job's. "Well, Sarah, good-by. You'd better go in."

"He just did it for revenge!" I cried out, sobbing. "Poor Martie! poor Martie! And not a place for you to sleep this night!"

"You'd better go in," she repeated, in the same strange, quiet way. "You will take cold. I suppose I can find a place. At least there's the station-house always for such as us," with a laugh. "Good-night, dear!"

But I never could have let her go in that way all alone; and though she did her best to send me back, I went out with her into the dreary wind to find a shelter for her head. Something in her face, as we passed the street-lamp at the corner, set me to thinking how it must choke and stifle one to walk on gasping in the cruel wind, leaving one's good name further behind at every step. Then I thought of the warm light in our window, and the girls and Davie. Then I thought of the good, strong father—she had often told me how good and strong he was—and of the grave away in the country, and I wondered how he could bear it to be lying there, and she here, his only little daughter; and she said he had sheltered her in so with his love. Poor, poor little Martie! Why, I thought till it seemed as if my heart would break for her.

I looked up, I remember, into people's faces as we passed, wondering why there wasn't anybody in all the city to help her. I knew there were many good men and women who would have trusted and cared for her, but we did not know where to find them, and Martie was so shy of strangers. I remember how the lamps flitted and whirled, and how bright the shop windows looked, as we walked on, still watching the people, face after face, for one kind look; one kind look would have given me courage to speak. It did seem to me strange that they could help noticing us. But nobody did notice, and we did not dare to speak. I went once into a jeweler's, where I saw through the great plate-glass a pleasant-faced gentleman with gray hair, and I asked him could he tell me where a poor girl could get a respectable lodging for the night? He answered very pleasantly that the police would tell me best, and I ran out frightened, and did not try that again.

There were our employers, you say. Yes, but they did not know nor care much about the hands out of working hours. Mr. Inkman was a good sort of man, but he would not be likely to trouble himself that time of night about Martie. Besides, he would probably take Mrs. M'Cracken's word for the truth, and it might cost Martie her place for him to hear the story. As for her Sunday-school teacher, why, she would about as soon have thought of going to the police, for she had never spoken with her except to give her name and answer the Bible-questions. Besides, we did not know where she lived. So Martie must help herself.

We went to boarding-houses till we were tired out. Nobody would take a strange girl in at night. Where had she been last? Mrs. M'Cracken's. Had she a recommendation? No. They were sorry, but the house was full. Good-evening.

I don't suppose they can be exactly blamed; but it seemed hard. Just such a night as that

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was to Martie has sent many of us poor girls right straight to destruction. It did seem hard.

Pretty soon, worn out and in a sort of desperation, she said that she should go back to the place where she spent her first few days in the city. I thought the police would be better than that; but she said no; what could she do in the hands of the police, with the character that she had brought away with her from the door-steps back there? She would go back to the old place and take her chance. It was safe enough, probably, only she was foolish and fanciful. It would be better than to run the risk of worse. So we went, and they took her in.

I would have staid with her, I could not bear to have her there alone, but she would not listen to it. She said I should not lose my home and my good name with hers. She begged me so for her sake to go back that I had to go. She walked a little way with me till I would let her go no farther. Then I watched her going back alone.

I gave Job Rice a piece of my mind that night, and I stood up for Martie against Mrs. M'Cracken and the girls. But it was of no use. Sue had been before me to echo every word of Job's and a little more. Sue said it was just what she had always expected of her. When I looked at Sue's bold, bad face, and thought of that pure white look of Martie's, I wondered how God could let any body believe one against the other. But I suppose, after all, we do our own believing; we can not blame Him for it.

Davie Bent came up to me a minute as I stood apart by the window; Sue and Job had been talking so that I could not stand it.

"Davie," said I, between my teeth, "I hope God will 'settle accounts' with him fair and square, for it's a fiendish lie! It's a fiendish lie, Davie!"

He opened his kindly, honest eyes wide on me, and a color like a girl's went over his face.

"Did you think," said he, "could you think that I—"

Sue came up just then, in her inquisitive way, and he broke off and went out of the room.

I did not think to tell Martie of this for several days. It occurred to me when I did speak of it, and she looked up, that perhaps she would have liked to hear it before.

"You see, Martie," said I, "it is plain what he was going to say, though he didn't finish his sentence. He believes in you, and I knew he would."

But she shook her head drearily.

"You don't know that. He did not say so. He would have said something quite different. Nobody believes in me. Why should he?"

With that she turned away to look into a shop-window and said no more the rest of the way home.

"Davie wouldn't be so mean," I argued. "Davie is true, and fair, and good." But she would not talk about it.

She spent two weeks at that place. I never knew till it was all over, not till long after it was all over, just what she lived through there. How there was a rum-shop on the first-floor; how late the hooting and singing used to last; how she sat up night after night till two or three o'clock, unable to sleep for the noise and fear, and trying to muffle her windows, and the crack under the door, so that she should not hear the words they said and sung.

Her story came to Mr. Inkman's ears, too, soon enough, and there was talk of dismissing her; but it finally blew over; she was a valuable compositor, quick as a thought, and very accurate; and Inkman & Tipes did not care so much as they might have done about the morals of their hands.

But, take it altogether, those two were as miserable weeks as ever a poor girl lived. That lost look, I noticed, settled down into her face, and before they were over became her only look.

One night—it is a little thing to tell, but it hurt me at the time—it chanced that she had to carry proof to some editor—I've forgotten his name, but he was connected with a Magazine which Inkman & Tipes printed. The boy whose business it was to carry proof and copy was sick, and as the errand was right on Martie's way the foreman asked her to attend to it.

The editor was at dinner—she told me about it afterward—and she had to wait for him a few moments in the hall. She was tired and faint, and the jets of gas-light dazzled her. She leaned up against the balusters for support, looking around at the carpeted hall and stairs, and in at the open door of the parlors, where glimpses of mirrors and crimson curtains, of pictures, and books, and flameless, hot coal fires showed through. I know just how she must have looked, standing there, homeless and outcast, in the midst of it all.

While she was waiting a young girl about her own age—a pretty, delicate creature, with a rich dress and soft, ringed hands—came from somewhere and fluttered into the parlors, looking like a picture cut out against the flameless fires, and fluttered out again, softly humming a tune. Her father met her at the further end of the hall, and Martie, who had shrunk out of sight at the foot of the stairs, heard him say, the words broken up with a laughing kiss:

"Well, Empress Nell! So you insist on dragging your old father out to the concert to-night? The carriage will be punctual, and I hope you will be likewise. Your hair? Oh no, that doesn't need to be frizzed over. You look pretty enough already. Be sure and wrap up warmly, dear; it is a chilly night. Jane, where did you leave the young woman? Is she waiting? Oh yes."

It doesn't seem so much to tell of, but it came over Martie so—this other girl, sheltered in by the light and elegance and warmth and love, so watched and protected, so pleased and petted through her happy days and nights—and she to be shut out into the cold and dark of the streets, shut back into her wretched room, home

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and help and good name gone—and the grave lying out far away in the night—it came over her so for the minute that she staggered up against the balusters, a sick faintness creeping all over her. I believe she might have had courage to tell the gentleman all about it had he asked her; and I suppose he would have asked her had he thought of it, for she said he had a pleasant face. But he was a busy man and hurried, so he took the proofs and opened the door politely for her, and she went slowly out. He must have been struck by her look, for she heard him say to his pretty daughter as he latched the door,

"That poor girl is very pale. Consumptive, probably. Come, Nell, fly away and get ready!"

At the end of the fortnight Martie had a dress to be cut at little Miss Tripp's. And little Miss Tripp—God bless her for it!—no sooner had questioned the story all out of her than she said: "Martha Saunders, I'll stand by you. You just leave that dreadful place and come board with me."

So Martie went to little Miss Tripp's, and I insisted on her letting me go with her. As to its "hurting my character," which she argued in her dear, unselfish love, I said, as I had said about my respectability, I would make my own or I would go without.

We had been at Miss Tripp's just a week when the most astounding thing happened. Martie came in one night with very bright eyes, and said:

"I am going to be married to Job Rice."

I do not know what I did or said. I am sure I never was so bewildered and confounded in my life.

"We shall be married in three weeks," she said, quietly drawing the curtain and beginning to take down her hair. "That is about as soon as I can get ready. You needn't look so at me, Sarah. Continual dropping wears away the hardest stone, you know. Come, I am tired and want to go to bed."

I don't know what it was, but something in her eyes stopped me from reasoning with her. I tried it once, and after that I gave it up. So, still bewildered and confounded, shocked and worried and grieved, I yielded silently to Martie's plans for this horrible wedding. I cut out and basted and sewed; I bought patterns and tucked muslin; I went about and looked at her and touched her as if I had been in a nightmare.

Davie Bent had been home to see his mother, and had not heard. The first night that he came back—it was a warm, light spring night—he and Martie went to walk. I was sitting at my window thinking about them, when they came home and stopped by the steps a minute to talk. I remember how warm the air was sweeping up against my cheeks, and I remember how Davie's voice sounded so manly and low and still. I did not mean to hear, and I shrank back; but I had caught one word, and I knew—what I ought to have known long before; but it is very hard for us to find things out sometimes.

I did not notice Martie when she first came up; but presently she called me, and turning round I wondered what had happened.

"Sarah," she said. She waited a minute after that, and then I saw for the second and last time the color in her face—sweet, faint color, like a happy child's. It made her very pretty. "Sarah, he did believe in me. He told me that he believed in me all through."

"Martie," said I, very low, "he told you something more than that."

"Yes." She turned her head away quickly.

"I wonder what you told him."

"What should I tell him?" said she, turning back in a sharp way. "I have promised to marry Job Rice."

So we neither of us said any more about it.

Martie's wedding-day came on very fast, and we were very busy. She had spent all her money over her little outfit; and she could not have taken more pains over her white muslin dress if she had been going to be Job's very happy wife; I never could think that. It did seem to me as if I must stop it, and the nearer the time came the more terrible it seemed. But she never called it terrible. One of the last nights I broke out crying, and asked her if she had not a word to say to me about it.

"No," said she. "Why should I have?"

She had sent a special invitation to Mrs. M'Cracken, and the girls there, and Sue; and, strange as it seemed, they all came. We did not have many weddings, and it gave them something to talk about. We were all there waiting in Miss Tripp's little parlor—waiting in the nightmare, it seemed to me—when Martie came in with Job. She did not blush or look shy, as most girls do; she was pretty and white and quiet. I did not see what made her so quiet. There was an odd light in her eyes. It reminded me somehow of a look I have seen in pictures in the eyes of hunted creatures that had been driven till they could be driven no further.

Davie Bent was there, trying to flirt a little with Sue. He was very white. I felt sorry for Davie; sorrier than I did for Martie, or for—well, no matter who!

The minister was a little late, and we were talking when he came in, but hushed up at sight of him. He was a tall, fine-looking gentleman, who treated Miss Tripp and Martie very politely—almost as politely as if they had been rich and educated ladies; and looked around the room with very keen eyes. Martie sent for him because she liked his sermons. She had been to his church several times; she did not go regularly, because it was a grand church, and she did not feel at home there.

Dear me, how I trembled when he began the Marriage Service! And how still the room was! And how that hunted look in Martie's eyes grew and brightened into another look—and that look was stranger yet!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The minister was through with what he had to say to Job; and Job, with his complacent, evil smile, had made his responses; and it came Martie's turn, and you could have heard a pin drop. I remember how solemnly the words sounded:

"Do you take this man who stands beside you to be your wedded husband?"

He waited for her answer, and it came:

"No! and I never will!" and she flung off Job's hand as if it had been a serpent, and stood there quivering.

In an instant every thing was in a hubbub. I'm sure I never saw a minister's face look blanker than that minister's face looked.

"Madam," said he, with a low bow, "I consider that you have insulted me, and insulted my profession beyond hope of apology. I wish you good-evening!" and he walked right out of the room.

Miss Tripp screamed; Sue Cummings tried to faint; Job, purple with passion, gasped for breath to speak, and every thing was in an uproar. Above it I saw Martie standing still and triumphant; and above it I was conscious of Davie's face with a sudden light striking it through and through.

Job found his voice at last, and he stood and swore at Martie, oath after oath; I never heard such swearing. She just stood there perfectly still and smiled. Then he turned upon her and raised his hand. I believe, woman though she was, he would have struck her to the floor, but there was a spring at the other end of the room; the girls made way screaming, and Davie just caught her out of Job's reach in his great, strong arms, and held her—held her there, before us all—and she never struggled nor blushed; but the lost look faded out of her face in that minute, and I never saw it again.

So it was all explained now. She had not meant it so much for revenge, though it was revenge enough, and Job deserved it, and I'm glad he had it; but she took it as the only way possible to her to defend herself, and give the lie to his foul slanders. And to think how she had kept it from every human soul, and planned it so well, and done all her sewing, that Davie never suspected the truth till it came; and, stranger than that, that she had never hinted a breath of it to me, and I rooming with her all along! I wonder how many girls could have done it! Nobody need tell me that a woman can't keep a secret again!

She sent for Dr. —— the next day, and explained to him, before Miss Tripp and me, the whole story. She apologized for the rudeness done to him yesterday; and said that the chief thing that troubled her about the plan was the insult to a clergyman which it involved, but she was driven to it, and she begged his pardon, and hoped he would not judge her harshly. He received her apology kindly, and said he wished that he had known how she had been situated before; he should have been glad to help her if he could in silencing the cruel scandal. I think he believed, when he saw her face, that she spoke simple truth. I think he was a good man.

Well, and so later in the summer there was another wedding-day. It came away from the hot city and Sue's gossipy tongue, and away from Job, who was always vowing vengeance, but has never found his way to wreak it yet. It came with Long Meadow sunlight and flowers, at home, in our little front-parlor—it seemed so strange, you know, that Davie should ever be in my home—and he looked so proud of Martie, and Martie so content with him! I think it was the sweetest, stillest wedding that I ever saw. I think it made me very happy—at least—yes, I think it did. It was so pleasant to know that I never should have to call her Poor Martie any more. Happy little Martie!

By-the-way, you may be sure that we sent for little Miss Tripp to come out, and that she came.

Now, since mother died, and I have been at home keeping house—since there has been so much to do, and I get tired and cry a little sometimes by myself when the children have been naughty or sick—sometimes, when life looks very different from what I used to think it would be—from what I suppose all girls think it will be at some time or other—I believe it does me good—I'm sure it ought to—to think of Davie's wife——

[There were one or two words more, but so blotted and blurred by a large round mark that I struck them out as unintelligible.]

THE JIM-JIMS.

"HAVE you ever had the Jim-Jims, my young friend?—The Jim-Jims?" he repeated, in reply to my questioning look.

John Brinsley was seated in his rooms, reading the price-current in the evening paper. I had dropped in upon him to inquire what were the prospects, not of our common country, but of cheese. He was preparing himself for the delivery of an elaborate opinion when he suddenly started from his chair and, grasping me by the arm, cried: "For Heaven's sake, tell me, was that a fly?"

I supposed he meant to inquire whether I had bought a few tons of cheese "just for a fly"—speculators will understand the phrase—or whether I intended to add another branch to my business, and replied accordingly.

"I mean, was that—is that—a fly?" he cried, making a wild sweep at a blue-bottle whose wings just then brushed his nose.

"Of course it is," I returned. "What did you think it was—a guinea-hen or a turkey-buzzard?"

He seated himself, and began stirring the fire thoughtfully.

Mr. John Brinsley, let me explain, is a well-to-do and rather portly commission merchant, whose acquaintance I had lately made. Naturally a very sensible fellow, he had the advant-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google age or disadvantage on starting in life of a collegiate education, graduating either as a bacchanalian or a baccalaureate—I do not exactly remember which. Of his former habits I knew nothing, but he was then one of the stanchest teetotalers going, refusing even that delicious phase of the grape—Tokay, to which I always yield myself a ready victim.

Suddenly he wheeled round in his chair and propounded the queries with which this article begins. I replied in the negative—that I had never had the Jim-Jims, and did not even know what they were.

"Eh? No?" he said, squaring himself in his seat. "Well, I sincerely hope you never will. As it is, let me tell you something about them."

I listened; there is no stopping John Brinsley when he once gets talking; and he went on as follows:

For about thirty years of my life I was addicted to—to—permit me a periphrasis—the use of stimulants. Never a hard drinker in the common acceptation of that term, I was still what may be called a steady drinker. I drank, as people vote in the less respectable wards, early and often. In short, I would as soon have thought of going through the day without breathing as without bibbing. My nose may have acquired a slightly coppery color in consequence, yet no one ever saw me under the influence of liquor, and the charge of intemperance was never brought against me. Shutters and gutters were alike strange to me.

Right here let me ask how the sin of drunkenness is to be estimated and measured? Is it the quantity drunk or the effect produced which we are to consider when sitting in judgment upon a man's habits and character? For while one man can drink all day without manifesting any symptom of inebriation, another, who should undertake or be persuaded to undergo a similar course of discipline, would probably find himself carried home in a most ignominious way upon an uncomfortable and hastily improvised litter, long before the sun was at its zenith; those who witnessed the informal procession would undoubtedly blazon the horizontal hero as a drunkard of the most eminent type; and solemn tracts with startling titles would be showered upon him in lieu of the ivy-leaves wherewith the brows of Bacchus of old were bound. All this while the other man, who carried off his more frequent indulgences with an air of unconscious grace, standing up under his potations like a three-decker to only a moderate breeze, would very likely be lauded for his temperate habits, and held up as a model of sobriety to his less fortunate neighbor. But whether the iniquity of imbibition is to be measured by the amount drunk or by the capacity of the drinker to withstand the subtle spell which bewilders the brain and confuses the powers of locomotion, I can not undertake to determine, nor will I now discuss; but one thing is certain, a fourth part of the liquor which I every day consumed without fear and without reproach would have sent half my acquaintance reeling to their beds, and won for them, in a very short time, most unenviable reputations.

It was only some six months since that I experienced any ill effects of my habit. Gout gradually set in, which was by no means pleasant to a man fond of dancing. Besides, I developed an apoplectic tendency, which acquaintances remarked upon; like the elder Mr. Weller, I swelled visibly; sudden rushes of blood to my head rendered me at times nearly blind. Often on entering or leaving a room I was obliged to put out my hands and grope my way—and blindman's-buff is an amusement for which I never had any partiality. Consulting my physician—not a hydropathist, understand—he at once ordered me to "cease the use of stimulants"—the technical way of saying "Stop drinking." I remonstrated; but he was peremptory. I said: "Not too suddenly;" but he replied: "At once!" To my mild urging that it would be best to "taper off" he made answer that a taper was burning at my vitals, and that spirits were the oils which fed the flame. He said: "Snuff it out at once; cut off the fuel!" To my representations that I could not live he replied that I might as well die one way as another; that if I continued to drink, my death was certain; that if I stopped, there was a chance for me. And he clapped a stop on further objections by refusing to treat my case at all unless I abandoned drinking before coming under his hands. Ale was worse than whisky, because more bulky; wine more dangerous than any thing else, because so insidious and seductive.

He had been the physician of myself and of my father's family—I have no family of my own—since first the family was founded, and there was none other in the city to whose hands I could commit myself with confidence. So I yielded to his ultimatum, converted my demijohns into yet more fragmentary divisions, and became a water-drinker on the spot.

The first day of my new experience I suffered; slightly, but still I suffered—nor was I strong. My hand was shaky in the morning; and I said to myself: "This comes of temperance." Through the day I felt singularly strange; my voice was tremulous; I planted my foot upon the pavement in an uncertain way, and had a general impression that I had lost something. At my regular dinner-hour I was appetiteless. I retired to bed wretched. My dreams were unpleasant; and the next morning I woke with an uncomfortable sense of unrefreshedness. My hands were hot, and my face, though pale, was burning. In making my toilet several attempts were necessary to enable me to part my hair in a line any thing like an approach to straightness; for my hand, in its manipulations of the comb, dotted up and down like a dairy-maid's in printing butter. As for breakfast, I was conscious of no fast to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google break. Mechanically, however, I appeared at table. But toast, tea, muffins, eggs had lost their power of fascination. Hot and tempting though they were, I looked upon them coldly. So tremulous and uncertain was my hand that in attempting to drink my tea I nearly poured it into my ear. While being shaved, subsequently, I found it next to impossible to sit still. Several times in my nervous starts the barber gashed my face and chin.

A blank, horrible day seemed before me. Time, like a leaden weight, hung upon my soul. To some simple business calculation which the cashier of our house tried to present to me, I found it impossible to listen. The figures were before my eyes, and I attempted to grasp them. They danced and jostled each other like puppets at a booth—the nines wagging their heads at me mockingly, and the sevens curling up their tails in derision. The cashier, noticing my bewildered air and look, attempted to explain; his tones fell upon my ear as monotonously and meaninglessly as rain upon a cottage thatch. As he proceeded droning out his details a singular rage took possession of me; and I believe I should have throttled him where he stood had I not seized my hat and abruptly quitted the office.

It seemed to me that the open air would bring relief; but it did not. I walked not with my accustomed firmness of tread, but with a jerkiness, as a jumping-jack might if endowed with automatic motion. Somehow I scarcely knew when my feet touched the ground; it seemed that I was stepping upon air. A friend met me, and, with a familiar slap upon the back, asked me to take a drink. I started, and shrank as his hand fell upon me as though from a thunder-bolt—it seemed a trip-hammer delivered between my shoulders. His face was familiar to me as my own, but I looked into it with a frightened expression which prompted the inquiry, "What the devil ails you?"

"A little under the weather," I replied.

"A drink will set you all right," he returned, and then I explained to him that I was forbidden stimulants.

"Devilish dangerous," he said, "quitting so suddenly; you can't stop a horse at full speed without flinging him flat on his haunches. I wouldn't dare go back on my whisky in that style nohow. It would bring on a spell of the Jim-Jims sure!"

But I was true to my pledge and my physician, and my friend left me with a pitying look. "Rats in your boots to-morrow morning," he said, "and no mistake. I'm betting on it."

Feeling it useless to make any attempt at dinner, and fully assured that I would cut but a sorry figure in the after-talk, I made my way to my rooms, remarking to myself in a patronizing way that a good night's sleep would restore me to my normal self.

I was utterly prostrated, mentally and physically. In the course of the evening a number of friends dropped in; I was reclining on the sofa. Requesting them to excuse me from rising, on the plea that I was thoroughly tired out by the duties of the day, I retained my position, but it was useless to endeavor to take part in the conversation. And very soon, in spite of my endeavors, I dropped off to sleep, if sleep it could be called, for at intervals of every few minutes I awoke with a sudden start and clutch, the impression upon my mind being that I was falling from some place. So busily engaged were my friends in discussing an absorbing topic of the day that they did not notice my nervousness, but seeing that I was indeed fatigued they each and all took early leave.

I went to bed. So thoroughly exhausted was I, for I had slept very fitfully the two preceding nights, that I dropped into a heavy slumber as soon as my head touched the pillow. In the dream which came to me I found myself on a very steep roof. It was impossible to stand up, so sharp was the incline, and I threw myself flat on my face, clutching at the shingles. But all was useless; slowly but surely I slipped toward the eaves. I dug my nails into the wood in a fierce endeavor to avert the fate which threatened me; but all effort was in vain. Occasionally a protruding nail-head afforded me a momentary respite, but the hold was insufficient, and soon I was again slipping down, down toward the eaves. It seemed hours—hours of agony and apprehension. At last the eaves were reached and the end seemed immediate. My legs dangled in air; my hands clutched the tin water-spout which ran along the edge of the roof in one last, wild effort at self-preservation; it gave way under my weight—and with all the breath gone out from my body I awoke. At least ten hours seemed to have been consumed.

Looking at my watch I found it was precisely seven minutes since I had got into bed.

Thankful, most thankful, that it was all a dream, and that I had not indeed fallen from the roof of a four-story frame-house, with a tin water-spout clattering about my ears, I closed my eyes and endeavored to again compose myself to slumber. To my surprise my eyelids seemed lined with blue, and they were as transparent as flame. This scarcely seemed in accordance with the eternal fitness of things, and I popped my head under the bed-clothes to secure opaqueness; but still my eyelids, lined with blue flames, flickered and glowed as queerly as ever. And I thought of what my friend had said about the Jim-Jims.

Very soon again, however, I was asleep. How long I slept I do not know. But I was awakened with a boom in my ear like the tolling of a mighty bell. Boom-boom-boom—every stroke smote on my aural sense, echoing and vibrating through my brain until I was nearly deafened. I sprang up instinctively and the sound ceased; I laid my head down again and it recommenced. Wishing to time the hour of the unusual disturbance I touched the stop of the watch, which lay under my pil-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

low. All was quiet at once. Here was a clew to the mystery. I released the stop and again the bell thundered in my ears. Each nerve strained to a tension like that of a harp-string, the ticking of the watch under my head was sonorous as the tones of the great bell Roland. And so it was with every sound of the night. I never was subject to physical fear, but now I started at a breath. A mouse gnawing at the door made a noise as though a legion of burglars, with a full equipment of carpenters' saws, were attempting to cut their way into the apartment. I propped myself up in bed, revolver in hand, ready to deliver a volley at the first man who crossed the threshold. My movements alarmed the mouse, probably—at least I heard no more of burglars.

Again I fell asleep. My dreams were all of violence and blood, but strangely vivid. After a prolonged battle with bearded ruffians I thought one stole upon me in my sleep and was filling my mouth with pitch.

I awoke nearly stifled, and tearing black gobs from my mouth, with an impression that a man was standing over me. And indeed in the darkness I distinctly saw the outline of a man a few feet distant from my bedside. Quietly grasping the pistol which always lay ready to my hand, I cocked it quickly and noiselessly, when it occurred to me that perhaps it was my chum, who, sleeping in an adjoining room, had occasion to come into mine for something. As I gazed the figure assumed a new shape—that of a grinning skeleton. And while I looked a whole procession of skeletons filed in and marched in solemn procession through the room. The bars of moonlight upon the walls, shining through the lattice-work of the blinds, began to dance and burn in vari-colored flames. And I said to myself, "Here are the Jim-Jims!"

The first idea which occurred to me was that a pistol, under the circumstances, was scarcely the thing to have within convenient and ready reach. So I deposited it safely in the wash-bowl. Then I sat up in bed and prepared to enjoy myself as much as could be expected under such strangely abnormal conditions. There were more flames and burning wheels, spiral rockets and scintillations and corruscations of all kinds than I ever saw on any Fourth of July day. Dragons flew and aerial toads hopped through the air. My skeleton friends ranged themselves for the Lancers and went through that dance in grand style, butting their bare skulls together in the courtliness of their bows, and shaking their fleshless shins in the wild ecstasy of convolution and involution till they rattled like castanets.

I was fully conscious the while that the scene was unreal, that all was an illusion. But still the figures and flames were as plain to me as the sun is at this moment. The only alarm which I felt arose from an apprehension that this might be the beginning of a really serious attack; that I might lose the control of myself which I then possessed, and come to regard the shapes as real—become, in short, a "demnition maniac." As it was I had no other fear. That one apprehension aside, the whole thing seemed an entertainment, gotten up for my special amusement, and I was sitting apart in a private box. Indeed, I decidedly enjoyed it rather than otherwise. The walls burned with all the colors of the rainbow, and the monsters, dragons, griffins, and such things were more gorgeous in their attire than lizards, let alone lilies of the valley.

I had a pet monster in the collection—nothing less than the sea-serpent. The next morning I attempted to sketch the ophidian for the benefit of Nantucket people, but without success. If any artist would like to reproduce the animal, I can at present only suggest green scales and a gaping mouth as the leading features, for I am not good at remembering details. It was quite a pretty monster, however, and I gazed at it that long night through with feelings more akin to admiration than fear.

I forgot to say that at an early stage of the proceedings I had arisen and lighted the gas, the better to see what was going on. Letting light on the scene made no difference at all—indeed, it rather multiplied the phantoms. Every thing about the room underwent a strange sea-change. The figures of the carpet became snakes, which wound and lashed themselves together in a perfect wilderness of contortions; it was impossible to follow their motions, so rapid were they. The faces carven upon the panels and the bedposts transformed themselves into first-class fiends, and I thought what a good thing it would have been could Doré have had a slight acquaintance with the Jim-Jims before he undertook to illustrate Milton's "Paradise Lost." Even at this lapse of time I think I could furnish him some valuable suggestions from my own experience.

How or when I fell asleep I do not know, but I woke about ten o'clock the next morning flushed and fevered. My eyes were sore and swollen as though they had been beaten, simply with the staring they did during the show. First, on awaking, I expected to renew my acquaintances of the night; but no, there was not so much as a tadpole in the room. The figures of the carpet lay straight and orderly; the skeletons were all buried from sight; the blue, green, and red flames had faded into the pale light of day, and the fiends all were fled. Nor can I say that I regretted the disappearance. For to have found them again at my elbow might have persuaded me that they were real, and instead of writing I might now be raving. That was all and the last of the Jim-Jims.

For a month after I was as nervous as a school-girl in the green and yellow melancholy of her first love. I started when persons spoke to me, and lived in constant terror of being run over by omnibuses—so much so that I scarcely dared attempt to cross the street if one was

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google coming or going within a block of me. But now I should quite have forgotten the Jim-Jims had it not been for a little incident the other evening, similar to the one which provoked this story.

A party of us were sitting after dinner, when a large fly came buzzing about my ears. I clutched at it instinctively, and started to my feet in horror: "A fly in mid-winter? It can not be," thought I, "the Jim-Jims again."

But it was a fly, nevertheless, and I had the satisfaction of catching it. And so grateful was I at finding it palpable to the touch—a real fly, and not a fancy fly born of delirium—that I gave the creature its liberty; the first time, perhaps, that ever I did the Uncle Toby business to a similar extent. I still rise at flies, you see, but otherwise am pretty well and progressing under the doctor's hands. I have lost flesh, it is true, but I have not thought it worth while to advertise the loss, and I have not heard of any body's finding any. "Of no use to any one but the owner"—the owner, in this case, is not anxious to retrieve his loss. The gout is gradually subsiding, and I am not quite so apoplectic as I was. I am less lively in society, and more irritable, my friends say, but my general health is much improved. I am glad, on the whole, that I left off drinking; but I often think how true is the saying: Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coute. My "first step" toward sobriety nearly cost me my reason indeed; and sometimes I ask myself: Was it not a dangerous step to take? Was not my good doctor a little too arbitrary in his requirements? What think you, my friend?

I made no answer, for medicine is not my forte. Whether the doctor in this case was wrong or not let the doctors decide. But I mentally thanked my stars that my temperate habits and cold-water proclivities could never make me nearer acquainted with the Jim-Jims than I was by John Brinsley's story.

GOOD-MANNERS.

"MANNERS make the man," says the apophthegm. We might add—the woman also; for there is nothing more attractive than grace of manner, nothing more winning than good-manners. We do not refer now to etiquette, or the arbitrary customs of society, which differ with every nation, and sometimes differ in different parts of the same nation; though etiquette and good-manners are frequently nearly allied. Nor do we refer to what Mr. Turveydrop calls "deportment;" nor yet to "courtesy." Deportment comprehends the whole external expression of the individual, while courtesy involves refinement. To have a good deportment one must have good-manners; but one will have a higher deportment who has courtesy. Every one may have good-manners; only the refined can have courtesy. Courtesy was born of chivalry. It is a generous virtue, and can not live in an ignoble atmosphere. The strength of man and the gentleness of woman begat courtesy, which since that day has lived upon earth to elevate and refine the relations of both.

The real basis of good-manners is a kind and sympathizing heart, by means of which we are enabled to feel with and appreciate others. This explains why there is such difference in people in regard to "innate refinement." Some people are better constituted naturally than others; are more susceptible of development. We all like to be appreciated; there is no exception to the rule; and we all experience a sensation of mortification when we feel that we have been neglected or treated with indifference. Nothing sooner arouses the spirit of jealousy, which is so prodominant a feature in human nature, than a sense of non-appreciation, especially in persons who are gifted with a sensitive nature. It is a common failing with all of us to fancy that we are not adequately appreciated; but not to be appreciated at all is more than philosophy can endure. Some persons are so dull by nature that they are incapable of appreciating with any niceness the feelings of others. Such persons are generally rude, and their wit, if they have any, is always of the offensive kind. Graham one evening, rattling away to Dr. Johnson and Dr. Goldsmith, exclaimed: "Doctor, I should be happy to see you at Eton." "I shall be glad to wait on you," answered Goldsmith. "No," said Graham, "'tis not you I mean, Dr. Minor; 'tis Dr. Major there." "What effect this had on Goldsmith, who was as irascible as a hornet," Dr. Johnson used to add, says Boswell, "may easily be conceived." Graham was drunk—not an uncommon thing in those days; even Bozzy got drunk—and for this reason may be excused for his rudeness; but Dr. Johnson's enjoyment of the scene shows the rugged, coarse nature which marked him quite as much as his intellectual ability and broad culture. It is a clear evidence how remarkable the latter qualities must have been that people could have endured the former. We do not wonder that Mrs. Boswell entertained so poor an opinion of her husband's "governor," particularly when the Doctor tipped up the candle intentionally and let the grease run down upon the carpet. Yet the rough old royal brute was in the main a good man, and did many kind things. He only wanted to be appreciated up to the point demanded by his vanity.

There are people who are not stupid but malicious, and therefore take pleasure in wounding the feelings of others, or in gratifying themselves at the expense of others. Such persons indulge in the vulgarity of endeavoring to make butts of others, or in the meanness of talking at people, or in introducing subjects which must be malapropos.

The two classes we have referred to—the stupidly rude and the maliciously rude—both need to be regenerated and renewed. Nothing less will enable them either to appreciate or acquire good-manners.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

In conversation we often hear good-breeding and politeness used interchangeably with good-manners as phrases of the same import. Yet there is a difference in these words. Good-breeding, like deportment, is a large expression. To be well-bred one must have been brought up in a certain way, have had certain advantages and opportunities, and improved those advantages and opportunities. A well-bred person will be a polite person necessarily. But a person may have good-manners yet not be polite; for the manners may be good according to the opportunities. Politeness springs from cultivation. Its development will depend upon capacity and opportunity. Some people have no capacity for manners, some can be drilled into behaving themselves, while others exhibit a natural adaptation to attaining an agreeable demeanor. How often do we hear it said, "So-and-so is a boor; you can make nothing of him;" and again, "What pleasant manners Mrs. So-and-so has!"—"Yes, they are natural to her." There is innate refinement, and there is native grace, and when these are cultivated the result is very charming. "Opportunity and importunity," said an Irishman who fell from grace, "are too much for poor humanity!" When nature and association are against a man a Turveydrop will hardly make him pass muster in a review where manners is the ordeal.

Good-manners refer to personal intercourse whether the persons are present or absent. They involve respect, ease, frankness, consideration, so that you always behave toward others, reserving to yourself the right to select your acquaintances, and to determine the measure of the acquaintanceship, as you would wish they should behave unto you. Whoever cultivates such principles of action will be, according to the position in the world he occupies, the possessor of good-manners.

These were the principles which governed Robert Burns, who, born a peasant, moved with ease in the society of his day, from the hut to the castle, whose associates reached from the commonest and most illiterate to the most distinguished and most cultivated in Scotland. Such, too, were the principles of the Ettrick Shepherd, who boasted that he had moved in every grade of society, and had found himself so much at home in each that he could not tell to which he really belonged. When Alton Locke found himself at Lord Lyndale's, not a little nervous in so new a sphere, he received from a friend this piece of advice: "Be natural." It was as good advice as could have been given. To be kind, sincere, unaffected, is to be well-mannered.

Respect, consideration, kind feeling, have a great deal to do with oiling the wheels of the world. It is singular how often we find those who should know what good-manners require apparently indifferent in regard to some of the customs of life which should never be neglected.

Clergymen even, who should set an example of good-breeding, are often grossly negligent in the matter of replying to letters. The very persons, too, who are most regardless of other's interests and feelings are the most prompt to take offense. Let one of those distinguished people who never can remember or find time to write, address a letter to another upon some subject requiring an answer and find no notice taken of it, and the deeply injured individual will quite fail to recognize that he is receiving some of the coin of which he has disbursed so much. People ought not to forget what concerns themselves and have no apology for forgetting what interests others. If it were only a matter of feeling, still feelings should be regarded.

Society is becoming sadly vulgarized by the introduction of slang, so that the pure speaker is rare. It passes for wit or humor with some people, especially with those who are incapable of either, very much as conceit passes for cleverness with the unintellectual and uninformed.

Sobriquets are among the vulgarisms which should awaken disgust. What can be more rude than to apply epithets and names to others, thus rendering them subjects of ridicule. Satire is allowable; it can be indulged in face to face and need not ruffle a feather. It shows a want of cleverness to allow satire to degenerate into sarcasm. Sarcasm may be permitted under certain circumstances, for as a distinguished President of the United States once remarked, "Hitting hard and fending off is sometimes a pleasant occupation." But vulgar rudeness should be classed with that "mediocre excellence in poets which," Horace says, "is intolerable to gods and men."

We have often noticed a point in etiquette which seems expressly adapted to the protection of the rights and feelings of both sexes. We allude to the custom which requires the lady to speak first, and which requires the gentleman to return the bow when a lady and gentleman, presumed acquaintances, meet in the street. The philosophy of the rule is this, for there is sound philosophy in manners: were the gentleman to bow first it would be in the power of the lady to ignore the bow, and thus mortify the gentleman who might have only intended a politeness. The lady bowing first, the gentleman, in deference to her sex, must return the bow; thus the lady is protected. Further, she is guarded from the intrusion of impudent men upon her acquaintance, and men likewise are assured against the rudeness of pert women. If the lady does not bow, things remain as they were; neither is injured, neither can take exception.

In nothing are good-manners more apparent than in the mode of differing in conversation. Observe the perfect courtesy manifested by the well-bred man or woman. The difference only acts as a stimulus to the conversation. Indeed it may be considered rather pleasant than otherwise, awakening the powers of both the talkers, and giving life to the scene. Argument and debate are generally to be deprecated

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in society, for they are apt to run into harshness and no one is convinced. Argument and contradiction are favorite modes of the ill-mannered. It is better to treat the ill-mannered as Dante did the contemptible spirits—"not talk about them, but observe and pass on."

It is often discussed whether manners are better in the country or in the city. In the city there is more style, more finish, more tournure; while in the country there is more heart, more sympathy, more geniality, more frankness. The women of the city are apt to be, owing to having had greater advantages, more cultivated than their sisters of the country. In the practical affairs of life, however, they are not so well informed. Ladies in the city walk better, dance better, sing better, play better, and speak more foreign languages than the ladies of the country; but it is questionable whether they can keep house as well, or do many other things as well as those who are compelled to rely chiefly upon themselves. People in the country are usually better read than those in the city. Perhaps it is because they have more time, and are less attracted by various amusements and pleasures.

Manners, whether in town or country, will vary according to the character of the individual and the measure of breeding, with the degree of good sense and good taste. They who think that bluntness is honesty will be rude to the end; they who think consideration the father of courtesy will progress toward refinement. Manners are not a matter of slight importance. Regarded at large, they are as Burke remarks, "what vex or soothe, corrupt or purify, exalt or debase, barbarize or refine us, by a constant, steady, uniform, insensible operation, like that of the air we breathe in." Refinement in manners is one of the marked proofs of the advancement of a nation and the culture of the people. The ancients had manners, and very bad manners. Refined in some of their tastes and habits they were brutal in many of their ways. Courtesy, as we have said, grew out of chivalry, politeness is the offspring of culture. Good-manners commend themselves, and, like good wine, need no bush.

NEW ASPECTS OF THE AMERICAN MIND.

WE have gone through so many labors, agitations, and changes during the last seven years, that it has been impossible for us either to see them all in their historical compass and unity, or to note their practical bearing upon the mind and habit of the nation. We know pretty well, indeed, the history and issue of the conflict of opinion. The adjournment of the Thirty-ninth and the organization of the Fortieth Congress are facts that have no uncertain sound. This March 4, 1867, tells a very different story from the March 4, 1860, when Buchanan and Breckinridge were in power, and the dominant Democratic party had fixed their National Convention at Charleston for April 23, and there hoped in some way to keep in with the slave lords of the Southern States, even at some cost of sycophancy.

The merest glance at the Message which Mr. Buchanan sent to Congress on the opening of the December Session in 1860 tells the story of the marvelous revolution in public opinion. With all his timidity he did not anticipate the great convulsion that was at hand after the election of Abraham Lincoln in November. Well aware of the threatened secession, he thought, apparently, to disarm it of its power by denying the right of Congress to coerce a seceding State; and by urging upon the Free States strong measures of conciliation toward the slave power, such as the legal recognition of slavery where it exists, the protection of the alleged right of masters to hold their slaves within the Territories, and full liberty to reclaim their slaves when they escape into the Free States. He certainly held very mild views of the temper of the people when he wrote: "The Slavery question, like every thing human, will have its day. I firmly believe that it has already reached and passed the culminating point." Such words read very strangely now, after the passage of the Military Bill for securing order throughout the seceded States, and making negro suffrage an essential of their reconstruction within the Union. No less startling is the recommendation of the leading organs of the old Democratic party to the South to accept the proffered terms, and to return to the Union by help of the negro voters, and in hope of winning them over to the interests of their old masters.

Sometimes little things show how the wind blows quite as well as great clouds; and I chanced on Monday, March 4, to note a sign of the times quite as memorable as the acts of Congress. Visiting a friend who is largely in an important branch of Southern trade, he pointed out some showy yet really very pretty goods that were intended for sale among the freedmen and their families. There was a lot of spring hats very much such as our ladies so jauntily and witchingly wear, yet somewhat more demonstrative and ornate. Taking up a very showy yet not offensive specimen he said: "There, that will be sure to go upon the head of some freedman's wife or daughter, and our customers assure us that their trade is becoming now a leading feature of the Southern market." That little fact speaks volumes. On one side of the street those cases of dashing little hats for women and girls who were so lately mere chattels, and shut out from those fashions which stir so much ambition and so much social feeling, while they may also move no little vanity or pride; and on the other side of the street spelling-books piled up in hundreds of thousands waiting conveyance to the schools and huts of those same freedmen, and destined to open to them the alphabet of literature, as the arts of dress open the alphabet of society. With new wants come new powers, and the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

millions who now are rising to the trials and blessings of freedom are illustrating the new aspect of the American mind.

We must not, however, look wholly or chiefly to the emancipated race to illustrate the new evolution of character in America. The whole nation has been mightily schooled and trained; and we have hardly begun to appreciate the results of the process. Consider some of the features of our America in 1860, and see what has been going on from that time to the present. The land itself was then as large as now, and during all our struggles and triumphs no new domain has been acquired or sought, and our flag floats as then over our whole country from Maine to Texas, from New York to California. We form a more distinct idea of what transformations we have passed through, and are still passing through, by noting the main facts of our position in 1860 from the census which was so tardily published as still to be a sealed book to most persons. Our population then numbered 31,443,321; of these 27,489,561 being free, and 3,958,760 being slaves. Of this population 4,136,175 were foreign born, or $13\frac{15}{100}$ per cent. of the whole, leaving $86\frac{85}{100}$ per cent. to our native people. Of the foreign born 1,611,304 or $5\frac{12}{100}$ of the whole population were Irish, 1,301,136 or $4\frac{14}{100}$ of the whole were German, 431,692 or $1\frac{37}{100}$ per cent. were English, while the French numbered 109,870, the Scotch 108,518, the Swiss 53,327, and the Norwegian 43,995. The census gave us minutely the record of the unfortunate by birth or disaster, and numbered 12,821 deaf and dumb, 12,658 blind, 23,046 insane, and 18,930 idiotic, making 68,455 of these unfortunates in all.

We get a more satisfactory idea of what these people were doing, and how they were likely to be moved and educated by the changes of the war, by considering their characteristic occupations, or what they were thinking and doing in their daily work. We are met and considerably comforted by the fact, that out of the 8,287,043 persons whose occupations were given in the census of 1860, 2,423,895 were farmers, 795,679 were farm laborers, 21,323 were gardeners, 6369 were herdsmen, 1153 were shepherds, 85,561 were planters, or nearly three and a half millions, or over two-fifths of the whole working population, were busy with the soil or agriculturists.

Next come the mechanics of various orders, such as these: blacksmiths 112,357, carpenters 252,958, machinists 43,824, masons 49,925, shoemakers 164,608, butchers 30,103, cabinet-makers 29,223, bricklayers 14,311, brick-makers 18,736, bakers 19,001, weavers 36,178, wheel-wrights 32,693, apprentices 52,326, coopers 43,624, stone-cutters 19,825, agricultural implement makers 16,478, tailors 101,868, sawyers 50,000, miners 147,750, painters 51,695, millers 37,281, printers 23,106, manufacturers 11,289, mechanics in general 23,492, mantua-makers 35,165, milliners 25,222, seamstresses 90,198, laundresses 38,633; while more or less closely connected with the various trades stand 969,301 laborers and 559,908 servants. Making a general estimate of the occupations that may be called mechanical, we may set them down at over two millions, or nearly three-tenths of the industrial population of the country in 1860.

Look to the buying and selling class, and we have a great host, led off by 123,378 merchants, 184,485 clerks, 2753 bankers, 2995 bank officers, 67,360 sailors, 19,521 drivers, 34,824 teamsters; and followed by a vast array of porters, laborers, and servants of various kinds, that must make the mercantile interest and its dependencies come next to the mechanical trades in the numbers employed, and give us something like another fifth of the industrial population.

The disciplinary and educational classes close the list, and give us 101,836 teachers, 37,529 clergymen, 54,543 physicians, 33,193 lawyers, 49,993 students, 27,437 engineers, 2994 editors, 4516 artists. Add to these all who were in any way connected with the work of instruction or discipline, in higher or lower stations, in households, schools, government, and religion, and we find the remaining tenth of our industrial class, and finish our rough estimate of the working of the American mind in 1860, which we make out to be two-fifths agricultural, three-tenths mechanical, one-fifth mercantile, and one-tenth educational and governmental. Our army in 1860 might be reckoned under the latter head as a school of war, not indeed a large item in the scale then, for at the time of the attack on Fort Sumter the entire military force at the disposal of the Government was only 16,000 regulars.

When, however, we consider the nearly 6,000,000 children at school in 1860, and the number of persons employed in taking care of them at school and at home, it is not difficult to fill out our one-tenth of workers in the disciplinary branch. We remember the classification more easily if reduced to a scale of tenths; and say that four, three, two, and one tenths represent the relative proportion of the agricultural, mechanical, mercantile, and educational and governmental classes. This scale embraces mainly adults and men, and does not give the proportions of the whole population of the country. The estimate of families would be quite different, since the farming class of men numbers more than its proportion of families, and the women and children who are connected with agricultural labor, and who are not reckoned in the over eight millions of the industrial order, might swell the agricultural class to two-thirds of the population of the country. Our figures enable us to form a somewhat definite idea of the business of our people in 1860, and to judge of the effect of the war in changing their pursuits and habits, and teaching them the lessons and training them to the duties of the new and eventful times.

Such was our America in 1860, in its popula-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tion and work. These facts tell us something of what was going on in the American mind, for those eight millions of workers were bringing out their powers and dispositions in various ways, and supporting by their labor and skill the remaining twenty-three millions dependent upon them. Every day the world was carried forward by their work, and character as well as wealth grew under their fostering hand. The nation was becoming rich to an enormous extent, and in the ten years from 1850 to 1860, the estimated cash value of farms under cultivation had gone up from $3,271,575,426 to $6,645,045,007, an increase of 103 per cent. in ten years. The amount of capital invested in farm implements and machinery in 1860 was $246,118,141, being an increase of over ninety-four millions in ten years, or more than 63 per cent.; while our population during that period increased only at the rate of 35½ per cent. Something is said of the training, the practical training, of the mind of our people in thought as well as toil, by the fact that the manufacture of farm implements in 1860 amounted to $17,487,960—an increase of 160 per cent. in ten years on the whole, and of 325 $\frac{8}{100}$ per cent. in the Western States. The South concerned itself little with this enterprise and its important educational bearings, and received its machines mostly from the North and West, although a single New England machinist, Daniel Pratt, who went in 1853 from New Hampshire to Alabama, and made over 8000 cotton gins for the planters, showed what the mechanic arts could do for the South under due encouragement. The more enlightened men saw the great significance of Mr. Pratt's enterprise, and the University of Alabama gave him the honorary degree of Master of the Mechanic Arts; but the people at large felt little of the attraction for these arts and their studies and labors; and slavery could not make the South very winning to the inventors and workmen who have so thriven in the regions of liberty where labor is so much respected and in such close relations with thought and public spirit.

The war found our people busy with their immense work of agriculture, mechanism, and commerce; and bent upon money-making as never before. The great conflict did not take them from their activity, but changed its field or its motive, and put a grand national enthusiasm into the place of their industrial utilitarianism. Every where throughout the Free States they had been learning to put mind into material implements; and iron, brass, wood, leather, and stone were made servants of thought. Their vast mechanical force stood ready to pass from the arts of peace to the arts of war; and plows, reapers, mowers, spindles, lathes, engines, furnaces, rolling-mills, foundries, seemed to rush like living creatures to arms, at the call of our President, and to fight against the rebellion, as the stars in their courses fought against Sisera. They clothed and fed our army, made our bridges and roads, furnished swords, muskets, and cannon of unexampled excellence, and sent forth against the insurgents a navy that startled the world, and made every resource of invention and science tell in the triumphs of our flag upon the sea. So it was that a new life went into the fields and work-shops, and even when the old kinds of work were done they were done with new motive, and great thoughts and purposes went into the day's patient toil. The industrial arts that had made our people strong, docile, and persistent, and had saved them from the braggart indolence of the insurgents who had so boasted of being owners of men and masters of their labor, now rose into heroic grandeur. Our giant servitors stood by us in time of need, while the minions of the slave lords deserted them in time of need. The American mind that had gone into mechanism did a great deal to give us the victory, and Franklin, Fulton, Erricson, and their peers and disciples, were but representatives of the intellect of the nation in its great industrial work.

I remember one day, after a good deal of depression at public disaster, visiting a large cluster of work-shops that gathered round a huge steam-engine, not far from Harper's printing-house. I went down into the basement, and there saw the giant power lifting and dropping his ponderous shaft, and turning all those machines by his great force. The workmen in a mood of grim humor had put little flags upon his great head and arms, and the monster seemed to be alive with patriotism. The sight was most suggestive and encouraging. I could have cried for joy or sung hallelujahs to the Lord of Hosts, for all was clear then. There, and every where through the loyal States, was that same mighty force working for us—the Providential arm of this nineteenth century, whose mission it is to organize liberty by law and put the old tyranny under its feet.

Our people were perhaps as busy in 1860 as since, and that enormous product of the year, $18,000,000 of manufacture, shows something of what they were about. But since then their labor has taken a different turn, and breathed a different spirit. The dominant idea was then private or individual, and our people were bent upon money-getting, and awake to every opportunity of bettering their fortunes under the mighty spur of equal competition that so quickens every impulse and faculty, and brings all the energies into play. We are not to despise this motive, nor to say that the new patriotism made our people unmindful of private thrift. Getting a living in America is of itself an education, for it is ever opening new fields, courting ever-changing chances, and breaking up mental stagnation. But now new incentives came, and even the contractors who went for large profits could not but carry a certain enthusiasm into their schemes, and catch something of the sacred passion that cares for the flag for itself, not merely for the money that its success secures. With the people at large public spirit entered into their private business

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

as well as their military enterprise, and the war was a popular education as well as a national drill. All the lines of industry turned toward the one centre; and at heart the whole loyal people worked or studied, marched or sailed under the brave old banner of the Union. Our Yankee utilitarianism took an ideal turn, and thrift caught fire at the flaming altar of patriotism. The women and children knit stockings and scraped lint; the men plowed and reaped, sawed and hammered, planned and built, when they did not fight for the nation.

It is an important question how far this six or seven years' schooling has told upon the habitual working of the American mind, and made of us a new and better people; and especially if it has acted upon us in the higher plane of thought. It is very clear that our affections have been brought into our patriotism as never before, and we never knew how much we could love our country until it was in peril, and not only one sheep but the whole flock seemed in danger of being lost among the deep valleys or dark mountains. Our affections have not only clung to the country and flag with a direct patriotism, but through a thousand ties of sympathy and love from our associations with its brave and suffering defenders. The law of love is a wonderful multiplier as well as magnifier, and we have seen the force of the whole nation reflected from the thousands and millions of her champions. Consider the effect of our great armies upon the national mind in this one respect, the training of our people to look upon the whole country, alike the land and the people, in the light of their intense solicitude and personal affinities. Every valley, mountain, river and lake, sound and sea, now speaks to them of home, kindred, and friends, and the heroic dead bind us all anew to our motherland. Our affections go into our historical studies, and we read of the old revolutionary times, and the old Constitutional debates as parts of our own family history, or as bearing on the pedigree and title-deeds of ourselves and our children. So we have all studied the country by heart, and are so studying it still; and we know it more and better by this recent schooling than from our whole lifetime before.

How vast must be the power of our great armies, alike by their sufferings and victories, their absence and return, their lives and deaths, to bring the nation and its history and prospects home to us all! The army rolls number 2,653,062 men in the aggregate, which, reduced to the three years' standard, number 2,129,041; and, with due allowance for re-enlistments, we have not far from two millions of men mustered into service, and most of them carrying the hearts of others with them to the war. May 1, 1865, our roll numbered 1,000,591 men, and by November 15, 1865, 800,000 of these men were mustered out of service, and carried all the power of their wounds or trophies, their weeks of sickness, and their days of battle to their old homes; and they gave to the distant fields of conflict not a little of the enchantment that distance and remembered danger always lend to the view. The simple fact, that from 1861 to July 1, 1865, 1,057,423 cases of sickness were treated in our general hospitals, with a mortality of 8 per cent., or over 80,000, proves how far the mighty ministry of pain has entered into our estimate of the worth of the nation, and how much that should be prized that costs so dear. Now those millions are absorbed in the nation, and our army numbers only some 50,000 men.

We have certainly far more pathos and sentiment in our habitual temper than before, as also far more humor and courage. It can not be that the great conflict has failed to educate our intellect to higher thinking and aspiration. Americans have always had a certain ideal as well as emotional tendency; and the great response given to such apostles of faith as Wesley and his brethren, and the strong-hold that Jonathan Edwards and his Puritan scholasticism has so long maintained over our more orthodox clergy and churches, and the wide influence of Channing and his school of Christian Humanists upon the opinion of our leading Liberals, are ample proof that we are by no means a plodding nation of utilitarians, whose god is the belly or the purse. Yet the public habit of our people has been somewhat utilitarian; and Franklin, alike in his sagacity and his narrowness, has been too much the master of our public councils. Our statutes and debates have taken it too much for granted that our Government is in the main a business partnership for the security of property and life, and that it is airy enthusiasm to speak of God and the Supreme good in Congress or Cabinets. Faith and ideas we had, but were doubtful as to their connection with civil affairs; and that pattern of conservative Americanism, James Buchanan, seems to have thought it wholly out of place to apply the test of conscience, humanity, and religion to the slave question and the enormous pretensions of the slave power. Of course we are not to accuse Franklin of any such degradation, for he was a thorough Liberal, and strong in the free temper of the 18th century; but he was not a man of the 19th century—not a representative of its spiritual convictions, its personal independence and intuition, and its broad catholicity. We, as a people, were becoming dissatisfied with his utilitarian school of thinking, but had not carried our protest out into action.

More and more we felt the power of ideal principles, and more and more lamented the great gulf between our principles and our policy and our politicians. We believed in the supreme worth of man with Wesley, Edwards, and Channing, and we followed Webster and Clay, and even Pierce and Buchanan, who taught that those things that have been must be, and gave little if any hope of redemption. All this was changed by the war and its sequel, and mainly by the act of the enemy, that forced

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the issue of arms that we accepted but never originated. Our ideal thinking is now in the line of our manifest destiny, and the Declaration of Independence is incorporated into the Constitution of the nation. Liberty is now not an abstraction, but an institution; not a speculative idea, but a legal fact; not an imaginative notion, but a constructive power. Our great thinkers and sages in literature now need no expurgation at the North or the South, and we read the grand visions of the ages in the clear light of to-day. The whole horizon indeed is not clear, but the principle is undoubted; and in that principle the nation finds rest, and takes it not from man but from God—from His Eternal Word that calls us all to one Sonship, and from his Eternal Spirit that offers to all the one glorious liberty of His children.

The exclusion of certain classes from full civil liberty is nothing against the certainty of the principle, for the exclusion is only temporary, and as a punishment for treason; and as such it proves the rule of loyal privilege. The temporary exclusion of the traitorous classes is in order to secure the results of the strife, and to make universal freedom the birth-right of the whole nation. Never before was a moral principle so mightily asserted by so great a nation through such struggles and sacrifices. The fact can not but inspire the intelligence of the people, and tell upon our popular thinking and rising literature. It is eminently proof of the mind of the many, and has not been the work of any dominant thinker. We have had no great man to lead us, no Washington, Franklin, Hamilton, or Madison to guide us from the beginning, or even to tell us what was likely to happen. Our most prominent statesman, our Secretary of State, did not ride the whirlwind and direct the storm, but rather tried to ignore or prevent the uprising. Our literary and political doctrinaires, who urged the idea of universal liberty and called slavery barbarism, never had any great weight with the nation at large, and were very sectional in their affinities and often unheroic in their temper. The representative man of the eventful years, our martyred President, rather followed than led the nation; and saw the hand of Providence in events as they came rather than in prophetic visions that claimed authority over events in the name of God. He learned his lesson of statesmanship of God and the times; he said it to the people and the army; and then died, struck by a foul hand that wrote its own doom and the doom of its rebel crew; and raised the victim who was sometimes the doubting politician into the triumphant martyr whose name is one forever with liberty now.

We have had no great intellectual leader, and God clearly means that the nation shall be great and the mind of America shall be imperial and not depend upon any one chief who may imperil its dignity or tempt it to servility. Noble men we have had, indeed, who have helped to form the national thought—preachers, moralists, historians, journalists, poets, orators, statesmen, philosophers—but the mind of the nation is greater than them all; and refusing to follow the lead of any of them when swerving from the path of principle, it walks the way of God's Providence and is open to the call of his Spirit, true to its convictions with a calm decision, that no veering President or truckling Secretary of State, no wavering popular preacher or wily editor can shake. May we not say that the nation has not only won more light, but deeper vision, and shown a power of insight more precious than the shrewd sight that has so long been its boast and sometimes its danger. We have been quick at inductive reasoning from facts to general rules, and have been no dull scholars in tracing natural phenomena to their cause or principle. Now our people have learned the higher wisdom of intuition and deduction, and starting from great principles in clear insight, they are deducing from them their just consequences; and our national life is opening into the upper sphere of thought, and primal ideas are lighting us on to our daily work. We are not losing our old inductive prudence, but allying it with deductive wisdom; and we who have been learning to go from facts to principles are now learning, as never before, to go from principles to facts. Our popular opinion, that was before great but somewhat nebulous, has become settled and clarified, its nebula has been consolidated into a globe, and its haze has flamed into a shining star.

The American intellect has thus won and matured the two leading elements of sagacity or sound judgment, comprehensiveness and point. We have learned to look about us and see men and things as never before, and also to trace out their bearing upon the main point. So, too, we have learned to go from the main point to the subordinate particulars, and argue from the sacred idea of the nation to its proper work and manifest destiny. We have believed that the God of our fathers has called us to organize liberty in this nineteenth century, and that this is the American's mission, and ought to be his inspiration. We may not all nor generally be fully conscious of this conviction, but it is none the less real, and is constantly coming out in the thought and legislation of the country. It is not a private opinion, but a universal truth, and as such it is taking possession of our schools, legislatures, literature, and churches, and becoming the tacit principle when it is not the open assurance of the general mind, never so much so as in this spring of the year 1867, which rounds the seven years since secession dared to show its head at the Convention in Charleston, and John C. Breckinridge was set up as the predestined leader of the pro-slavery Democracy in the political campaign that was to call Abraham Lincoln to the Presidency.

When we turn to the active elements of the American mind, or take the dynamic view of its recent training, its aspects are quite as mem-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

orable. We are seeing the results of the heroism of their schooling as well as of its thinking. We have been all along well aware that our people were doing a great many things with a versatility and pluck unknown before even in America; and that they have learned to do them, moreover, with a certain bearing upon the great work of saving the nation, and with much help from the master motive, the public spirit or national will that has been so marvelously drawn out and exalted; but it has not been clear to us what the end would be, or how much of the war heroism would be carried into the new age of peace. What a vision of human activity opens to us in those years of conflict, that immense change of effort in our millions of workers from the arts of peace to the arts of war, and their return to the old paths of regular industry! How much the millions did who worked for the nation at home, and how much the millions did and dared and suffered who went to the field! Fancy fails to paint the picture of all the work-shops, shipyards, foundries, those marches, camps, hospitals, forts, fleets, and fields. It is easier to tell what our people have not done than what they have done; for there is little within the power of the human will, either in its might or its mercy, that has not been done in our America within these late years. Think of the withdrawal of two millions of men from the eight millions of industrial workers for military service, and then of their return to the old ways with so much new observation, experience, and incentive. We were laughed at as a people who were up to doing any thing and every thing, the universal Yankee nation, every man a Jack-at-all-trades, able to farm or fish, preach or plead or physic, keep store or school, and what not. Now that we can do more than ever, and have done the one thing most essential, we are not laughed at as of old, and the nations of Europe seem to think that our versatility of fingers really amounts to something that they would like to have.

The main fact in our dynamic training, however, is not that our people have done so many things in their separate crafts and spheres, but that they have done them with a common motive and in a heroic temper. The national work has come from and strengthened a great national will; and the question is, what is to become of this national will, now that the occasion that stirred and formed it is over? A superficial philosophy might easily suppose that the martial spirit would cease with the war, and the heroism of the people would end with their return home and sheathing their swords and laying aside their muskets; but a deeper wisdom proves to us that the heroic will is as steadfast as the earnest intellect, and our courage perpetuates its habit as stoutly as our thinking does. The war is, we hope, for once only, but the war power is forever; and the military bill that is now the law of the land needs comparatively little actual force to carry it into execution, because the war power is known to be a fixed fact; and the transgressors will beware of waking the sleeping lion, because they know full well that he is the lion, and can easily show his teeth when provoked. Very interesting and instructive it is to study what may be called the dynamic history of nations, and trace out the evolution of heroic powers that are as enduring as dominant ideas. There are virtues, like truths, "that wake to perish never;" and such, we trust, is the destiny of that heroism that has risen in this country among our people, who were forced into civil war simply because they would not consent to extend the area of slavery. The heroic power is not a mere impulse or private volition, but a moving of the national life in its universal sphere, and is like one of those heavings of the earth from the great central fire that send up the everlasting hills, and open within them living springs that never fail to pour down their healing and refreshing and fertilizing waters. The upheaving is once, but the mountains and the streams are forever. Divine as well as human agencies move this great purpose, and all earnest patriots know that the movement is not theirs alone, and believe that God has stirred this great purpose, which is as much an inspiration as a resolve, and which rises into religious dignity, and sings in our hymns and speaks in our prayers. It possesses us more than we possess it. We feel it whenever we hear a drum beat, or a bugle sound, or a cannon roar; we see it whenever our sacred banner lifts aloft its stars upon our forts, or is borne through our streets by stout and loyal arms.

There is, of course, much of our alleged patriotism that is a human feeling, and perhaps a party passion, or local impulse, or sectional animosity; but who will say, after these years of sacrifice, that such has been the character of our national will? Must we not say that the strength of the people has been trained like its intelligence under the discipline of Providence, and that as its intelligence has learned range and point, deductive sequence as well as inductive breadth, so the public will has learned versatility, persistence, and unity, and has been trained not only to do many things for the one good cause, but to do them from the central and commanding motive, and press forward into every field of action in a brave purpose that is deductive as well as inductive, in an industry that covers all spheres, and a heroism that lifts over them all the same flag, and puts into them all the same flaming love of country. The form of the heroic purpose will change with the times; but we must not wonder that it keeps its militant temper so long as the results of the war are in peril, and the slave powers persist in assailing the first principles of our republican government, and threatening the liberty and even the life of Union citizens.

Our new idealism is not a doctrinaire speculation but a far-sighted sagacity; and asks to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

walk its open path with sufficient power. Its open eye demands the quick foot and the strong and ready hand. As in the Berkeleyan theory of vision it helps sight by touch, and measures distances and judges substances by muscular action as well as nervous sense. It is clear that we are adding power to ideas as never before, and our thought is becoming dynamic as well as ideal, and muscle is allying itself with mind. We are making the dynamic estimate of men and things, and after so long and many disappointments at mere reputations and professions, we are quietly asking what men and measures will do the work needed, and coolly guiding our conduct by the result. This temper has kept our people from all rash extremes, and put them upon the path of discretion and courage. The President has not been impeached, nor has his dictation been followed; the States in rebellion have not been overrun or destroyed, nor have their rebel leaders been allowed to resume their power. A very shrewd judgment has been brought to bear upon the rash partisans of either faction, and there are no signs of our yielding to the pretensions of any dictator, whether of the White House or the Capitol. We have learned in a very costly school to discern the limitations of human characters and abilities; to use men for what they can do, without expecting them to do every thing; and to admit a certain amount of imperfection without contempt or proscription. We have taken the measure of our President, his coadjutors, and his antagonists, and have not lost our temper or our principle in our likes or dislikes. We have given the President the full swing of his notions, impulses, and rhetoric, and allowed him to pass from fever heat to moderate coolness on the great questions at issue. He is evidently a calmer if not a wiser man than a year ago, and has made up his mind that he is not the only head in the nation or the Government. He has been treated in the main, and especially of late, with much dignity; and the lesson has not been lost upon his somewhat irascible nature. The people are seeing that Andrew Jackson is his model, and that he has not added any essential idea to the Old Hickory Platform; and has accepted emancipation more as a necessary circumstance than an essential principle. He has gone considerably forward, but not upward; he has advanced somewhat, but not grown much; and finds it hard to believe that the people have outgrown him, and that new days have come to the nation that call for new measures and men. Many who think his ideas of constitutional law right in themselves give him the benefit of this judgment, while they think him wholly wrong in overlooking the demands of the political situation, and not admitting the necessity of putting the rebel States upon probation until they are fitted to resume the old privileges and functions. There is no aspect of our political history more instructive and cheering than the bearing of our Congress and our people toward the chief magistrate, who holds the office by a calamity, and whose policy is an offense to the reason and conscience of the nation. The people have kept cool, and threatened as little as they have boasted. The conviction of possessing substantial power has given them sobriety and moderation; and they do not blow the trumpet either to keep their courage up or to tell the world that they are not afraid.

The army still lives, although disbanded in the main; and the navy still lives, though most of our ships are no longer at sea. Their two chiefs, in their courage, fidelity, and coolness, are good representatives of the popular heroism—Grant, who holds the enormous war power of the nation in his hand, and talks as little of its dominant ideas and forces as the solid earth talks of the gravitation that keeps it true to its centre, and swings it round the sun in its loyal orbit; and Farragut, who takes his famous battles as simple acts of duty, and sailed through the jaws of death to victory with as much simplicity and directness as if he were paying a common debt, or going to market for his family. A call from the two under the laws of the land would bring a million of men into the field, and hundreds of well-manned ships out upon the seas; and the certainty of this fact saves them from the necessity of putting forth their prerogative, and keeps the nation at peace with the once rebel States and the world.

The same cool sagacity that has marked our political temper and our military policy appears in our relation to the freedmen. Our people have not lost their wits either in rapture for the negro's emancipation or in disgust at his new prerogative. They take the humane and kindly, but still the sternly practical view of him, and weigh and measure him carefully. The negro's status depends upon what he can do, and it is clear that a race that takes freedom so mildly and seeks instruction and keeps at work so signally, is a substantial power of the nation. The nearly two millions of bales of cotton of the year 1866 speak volumes for the negroes' sobriety and industry, and should relieve the nation from all fear as to their future development under liberty, union, education, and religion.

Exactly what is to come within the next few years we do not profess to say. It is safe to say, however, that the national life will gain vigor and unity, and that the central power will demand the fullest local liberty and action compatible with the preservation of the Union; and with this reconciliation of interests, a new day of reconciled feeling and enterprise will come. Hatred too much there has been and still is; but not between those who have been most active in the contest; and our soldiers have not found it hard to give their hand to their old enemies as soon as they laid down their arms and owned one country. In time the dominant ideas and interests will pervade the ruling elements even of the seceded States; and before the year 1876, the centennial of our national

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google life, comes round, we may hope to be one people, with one mind and heart.

When we are most disturbed by the willfulness and passion of the seceding States and their apparently stubborn determination never to assimilate with us in thought and feeling, even when they return fully to their old place in the Union, we must not forget that there is an older element than secession and slavery in their blood. Of old the leading Southerners looked forward to the extinction of Slavery, and were hearty friends of the arts, sciences, and letters, that are the glory of free States. The time was when Charleston was in advance of New York in culture and taste, and Virginia excelled New England and even Massachusetts in champions of philosophical liberalism. Blood always tells, and often the grandfather reappears in the features and temperament of the grandchild. Already there are some note-worthy facts that prove the affinity of the Southern mind with our Northern education, and the desire of an important class to share our literary privileges before they are restored to their political status. The leading importer of German books in this city assures me that the largest orders for rare works of Oriental learning, especially for Sanscrit literature, are from the South, and the love for such books, which was so baffled by the war, seems now to have come out with new fervor. Many indications show that before what we call essential comforts are secured, there are Southern scholars that crave the nurture of good learning, and care more for a rare book than for a rare dish; and our soldiers agree in testifying to the remarkable taste for libraries, painting, sculpture, and artistic gardens in the old Southern States. Of course popular education can never thrive under slave institutions, with their contempt for labor and the common lot; but the fact may be none the less real, that back of the new cotton interest that made the South cling to Slavery as the corner-stone of its wealth, there was an old and generous spirit of letters and civilization that has never died out, and by the law of historical continuity must in some way revive.

I attended not long ago a most interesting meeting of the American Academy of Science in Boston, and saw the Rumford Gold Medal presented by the President, Dr. Gray, to Mr. Alvan Clarke, of Cambridge, for the best telescope ever yet made, the object-glass being 18 inches in diameter—three inches larger than the diameter of the object-glass at Cambridge. The story of Mr. Clarke's labors in making his peerless lenses was most instructive and interesting. He began the work over twenty years ago with his son as a kind of boys' play, and he naïvely said that it had been to him boys' play ever since. It was a note-worthy fact that this object-glass was ordered by a college in the State of Mississippi before the war, and was of course left on the maker's hands after the war broke out. While the slow dignitaries of Cambridge were raising the money to secure the prize, and had subscribed $4500 for this gem, more precious in radiance than the Koh-i-noor diamond, that mountain of light, Chicago, that is becoming in public spirit the hub of the West, and perhaps of the whole Union, paid the $11,000 down at once, and had the lens mounted fitly into the best telescope ever known to the world. Let the South have the benefit of originating this work, and it is the first step that costs; though in this case the cost that followed came out of Northern pockets. Such facts show dispositions, and hint of a time when a true ambition will bring the Southern mind into the great fellowship of American education; and its pro-slavery metaphysics shall give place to the true philosophy of America and the nineteenth century of organized liberty and law.

The noble bequest of George Peabody is a forerunner of the good times of intellectual and moral comity between North and South. A friend who was present at the meeting in Washington for organizing the government of that benefaction says that after the business was done, the venerable Bishop of Ohio proposed that all present unite in prayer for the blessing of God upon the enterprise, and all knelt down—men of all sections, parties, and creeds—and implored the grace of Heaven upon the work. Such acts are not vain, and carry good fellowship wherever they are known, and sow the seed of future charity and wisdom.

One thing, however, is very clear, and must be stated with all distinctness. The Southern mind is fond of power, and fascinated alike by its possession and its possessors. It thought that the power of the future was with itself and its institutions; and the more thoroughly this idea is rooted out so much the better for the South and the whole nation. It is well, then, that the country has so decidedly settled the question of the supremacy of the Government; and the Military Bill will in its principal feature prove more attractive to the convalescent rebel madmen than any half-way measures of conciliation. The essential point to be urged is, that the nation is the sovereign power; and that power will soon become as fascinating and commanding to the Southern temper as it has been repulsive. When the Southern people come loyally under the flag, and use their great energies for the good of the country, for its wealth and peace at home, and for its honor abroad, the old fellowship will return, and all disabling and exclusive legislation will cease. Americans are a generous people, and never was such a war waged with so little vengeance on the part of the conquerors. We may have decision without bigotry; strength without cruelty; and may be assured that by the time we celebrate the jubilee of our national life in 1876 the sovereign power of the Union will be the liberty and prosperity of all the States.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Editor's Easy Chair.

THE first sunbeam awoke Memnon to music, and the early spring, which arouses the song sparrows, kindles also the public interest in pictures. But the opening of the Academy, which gives one more delightful resort in the city to the strangers who come with the bluebirds, reminds us that the day of prosperity is not always a day of peace and repose. We have often gossiped in these pages of the golden age of the National Academy, when it modestly opened its doors in the old Clinton Hall in Beekman Street, and ascended Broadway to the galleries in the absurd old Society Library building at the corner of Leonard Street, which a fortunate fire has removed. It was ludicrous to think of such a building as a temple of art. It was, indeed, high and big. It made a convenient and most pleasant range of warerooms after it ceased to be the seat of the Library and of the annual exhibition of pictures; but the aspect of the front, solemnly aping architecture, was as irresistible as the Sunday face of old Gunnybags himself.

Its disappearance has removed the old Academy days still further. And when we speak of them as the golden age we are far from meaning that the pictures of that time were more excellent than those of to-day, or that the Academy treasury actually glistened with as much gold as now. Nor are we so bold as to suggest that there were no jealousies and bickerings and sharp sneers among the ancient and admirable fraternity of artists. Indeed, we would much rather believe that they were confined to that time and have long since disappeared. As we contemplate the pure temple at the corner of Twenty-third Street we wish to believe it typical, and to imagine that immortal peace reigns within its walls, and that its council chamber is a little heaven below. Dedicated to art by the lovers and worshipers and students of nature we say, as we regard it, that, if peace can be found in the world, the heart that is humble will look for it here.

But whether such a heart finds it or not it is certain that in the golden age the heart-burnings were publicly repressed. The critics of those days, born under a genial star, wrote with gracious nibs on kindly pages. Their articles were like the good Ingham's portraits—all velvet and ivory and honey. The mild public, attentively studying the catalogue, passed on through ranges of "Portrait of a Gentleman," "Portrait of a Lady," blandly gazing at each, and envying the bright immortals of the walls. Oh, halcyon hours! before yet Harry Franco drew his sparkling blade, or the Tribune, with dreadful lance in rest, tilted at the undoubting N. A's and A's.

Since that time the great interest in art has arisen in the country, and within a few years it has raged like a fashion. The establishment of agencies of foreign art houses; the introduction of famous single pictures of the modern European masters in every style, with the galleries of Belgian, French, and English works; the increased familiarity through travel with the great pictures abroad, the gradual development of a vigorous and aggressive criticism, and the production of some striking pictures and statues, have all given to the subject in all its relations a prominence hitherto unknown. The Academy, of course, has not been idle, nor has it failed to profit by the swelling tide. Bursting the feeble bonds of hired or shared rooms it steadily persisted in building during the war. It solicited subscriptions and issued Life-memberships—and what eminent conservative was it who declined to subscribe because in a year or two there would be no nation to justify the title of the Academy? If he could be named, how stoutly he would declare that he was an original Union man! Steadily through all the smoke and thunder of the war the new building arose and was finished as the war ended. Then came the bright evening of the opening, when Mr. Bryant stood before Mr. Bierstadt's Yo Semite and made his pleasant speech, to which Mr. President Huntington pleasantly responded. The building was beautiful, the pictures were many, the company was brilliant; there was an air of triumphant prosperity, and the quiet old Clinton Hall and the upper rooms at the corner of Leonard Street were remembered as Cophetua's bride in the gorgeous palace may have remembered her former humble state.

Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown. The guild of art has attained prosperity, and with it toil and trouble. It is a recognized power, and is splendidly housed and has money in its purse, or ought to have if it lives so magnificently. But the Philistines be upon it. No longer is the path smoothed and sweetened with the old honey and butter. No longer may the P. N. A. and the N. A's and the A's with light hearts quietly enjoy their dignity. The otium has fled. The critics not only exercise their rapiers upon the pictures but the editors smite with their broadswords and claymores the Academy itself, as a corporate entity. On one hand is the terrible raid of the Pre-Raphaelites, and on the other the secession of the water-color painters. Here is the free trade howl at the artists' petition for a prohibitory duty upon certain foreign pictures, and there are the prosperous foreign print-shops. Under the futile mask of "An Artist" the Academy parries these thrusts as it can. But the storm increases, and we trust the placid visitor at the Exhibition will not find in the pictures any of the stormy and turbid feeling which may have lain at some time during the painting in the artist's mind.

Some time ago the artists asked for a certain increase of rates in the duty upon foreign pictures. The papers rushed to arms. Even the Tribune, the Castor and Pollux of protection, decried the suggestion, while the Evening Post, the Achilles of free trade, sneered and shouted with indignation and contempt. "An Artist" protested to the Tribune, but the paper thrust the protest into the interior and inaccessible parts of the sheet and confined it in small print; while in open bourgeois upon the editorial page it held a drum-head court-martial and sentenced the futile protest to immediate contempt. The Evening Post meanwhile was merciless. From time to time it prodded the offending petitioners very much as the executioner might have stirred up St. Lawrence upon his gridiron, and at length

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

published a letter from Mr. Bryant himself, the chosen high-priest of the opening ceremonies of the Academy, strongly censuring the petition and inclosing a protest from Hiram Powers, the American sculptor in Florence, declaring that if such an increase should be made there would be retaliatory legislation and heavy export duties laid upon works of art in Italy, whereby American statues and pictures would be assaulted upon both flanks. To this "An Artist" declared that the Post's free trade sympathies had "got the better" of its sense of justice, and asserted that Mr. Bryant's letter and that of Mr. Powers were both founded upon false premises. He then says that the artists are not opposed to the introduction of "fine works;" and that they ask only that pictures which cost a thousand dollars or less shall pay a specific duty of one hundred dollars; and ten per cent. additional upon the cost above one hundred dollars, which will not exclude the "fine works" which "cultivated people" desire. Alas! the remorseless Post merely growled, "What are 'fine' paintings?" Who is to be the judge? And there was no answer.

Then the Academy Council announced that it would station an agent in the gallery during the exhibition to attend to the sale of the works that the artists may offer as well as those which they may have in their studios or elsewhere. Why not? says the gratified "patron of art;" it is a very convenient arrangement. "And," continues the Council, there will be a neat little commission of five per cent. charged upon the amount of sales. Certainly, responds the enlightened connoisseur, business is business. But as if the institution which has raised itself from Beekman Street to Twenty-third were to have no further repose corresponding with its elevation the Post beats the long-roll, and declares that the old system was better, under which the door-keeper had a book in which the price of each picture was registered. It derides the Academy for "cutting under" the commissions of the picture-shops; and, with a touch of caustic upon its nib, remarks that it had supposed the officers of the Academy regarded with some pride its former disinterested though slight method of selling the pictures. Gathering wrath as it proceeds, it finally scoffs at the Academy's attempted reforms as such lamentable failures that its friends begin to lose hope; and then concludes with a sneer, like an opera imp vanishing in a flash of vitriolic fire, "it proposes to sell the poor artists' work 'very sheap,' as they say on Chatham Street."

Finally, at the last exhibition of the Artists' Fund Society there was the finest collection of water-colors ever seen here. But the Academy, according to one critic, had never encouraged water-colors, thinking that they were honored enough by hanging them "in the corridor with a miscellaneous collection of odds and ends that would not fit any where else." Therefore, when the water-colorists saw how full of resources the country was in their department, and reflected that the Academy had ever seemed to be of the opinion of the artist who said that water-colors hung in the same room with oils destroyed, by their greater brilliancy and peculiar texture, the effect of the oils, they formed themselves, independently of the Academy, into the American Water-color Society. Many of the members are also members of the Academy, and we do not know of the slightest feeling of hostility. But as the Academy is an Academy of Design, and as water-colors are certainly an art of design, it is unfortunate that it should not have the infant society under its sheltering wing.

But despite the sorrows of the Academy, the critics, the Pre-Raphaelites, and the water-colorists, it still opens the hospitable doors of its House Beautiful every spring, and welcomes every visitor who comes to see. Yet not always does it, nor can it, welcome all who come to be seen. If there were a Haydon among us who sent in an acre or two of canvas every year, the Academy could hardly exhibit the whole of his work and yet be just to other and more modest performers. That is only to say that there must be some discrimination and selection; and, of course, where there is selection there will be jealousy. But there is another kind of ill-feeling which the Academy can easily avoid, and it is that which arises from an exclusive devotion to the traditions of the art. The Council flings its doors wide open to every honest spectator. Let its hospitality be as generous for every school and every artist. Its great purpose is the development of art, not the encouragement of the favorite method of the orthodox schools. Those who are of another and more modern manner are not less sincere, and should be welcomed as heartily as any. Nobody knows better than the guild of artists that an Academy is always considered a peril to art from its tendency to narrowness and dogmatism. Indeed, the term "academic" has become synonymous with formal and lifeless. It can not be truly said that our Academy has not been of great service to art among us. But it can very easily be made prejudicial to the development of art unless every body concerned cultivates the utmost catholicity of spirit.

If a small State is in constant danger of political corruption it has some peculiar social advantage arising from the intensity of local feeling. It is of the nature of a family, and all its domestic events and personages have a special interest to every citizen. Goethe thought that the true independence of Germany and the distinctiveness of the German civilization were best preserved by maintaining the small local courts, each of which was a centre of refinement and intelligence; and he quoted Greece as an illustration of the value of a system of highly organized small states. Indeed, the theory of many centres is that doctrine of the municipality opposed to the centralizing tendency which is so precious to the believer in popular government; and the political problem of the time is the adjustment of local character and independence to united or national strength.

In our own country nothing is more striking than the individual local character which exists without natural boundaries, with no excluding political machinery, and despite the obliterating tendencies of steam and the telegraph. The traveler may go from Boston to Washington in twenty-four hours; yet the four cities which he sees—Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore—closely connected in every way as they are, are still perfectly distinct, have each a special character, and remind him of a different origin and history. Still more striking is the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

separation of local traditions, which stop suddenly at a narrow stream or an imaginary territorial line. The church, the bar, the medical profession of each State, have their special heroes and annals, which are familiar to the citizens of those States and unknown beyond them. And this familiarity is closer in the ratio of the smallness of the State. In the empire of New York, indeed, Montauk has much the same relation to Niagara that an Emperor has to the Czar. It is a formal fraternity. The hero of Chautauqua may be utterly unknown to Suffolk. Inevitably the local interests of the State become sectional. There is the western part and the northern, the eastern and the southern. But in a little State like Rhode Island, for instance, every part is familiar to every other, and a noted man any where is famous every where in the State, as a mere sigh in the Whispering Gallery of St. Paul's echoes audibly around the building.

We have been reminded of this by some graphic and striking papers we have lately seen in the Providence Journal upon two conspicuous Rhode Islanders of the last generation who lately died. John Whipple and Wilkins Updike were names perfectly familiar to every citizen of Rhode Island, yet they were probably scarcely known beyond the State except to personal friends. Mr. Whipple was a friend of Mr. Webster's, and for a time, indeed, he held, although without office, the same intellectual ascendency in his State which Mr. Webster held in the Union. They had the same open air tastes; the same large love of large things, which, in the case of Mr. Webster, has been so admirably described by Mr. Parton. Mr. Whipple was a boatman, a fisherman, and he had generous rural tastes and sympathies. In the politics of the State he was a towering figure. His lofty independence disdained intrigue, and he despised the tricks and grimaces and meannesses by which so many politicians wriggle into place. It was ludicrous to think of a State which had John Whipple for a citizen sending any body but him as Senator to Congress when his party was in power. But although a Whig he was an independent Whig. The papers of which we speak, signed P., the initial, we presume, of an accomplished and distinguished successor of Mr. Whipple at the Rhode Island bar, speak of his position upon the right of petition when he denounced what he called an unholy alliance between the Whigs and the Abolitionists. It was by such acts, not as indicative of principle but merely of his party independence, that he constantly chilled and rebuffed the eager partisanship of his companions. Mr. Whipple made this denunciation against the late Senator Simmons of Rhode Island, whom P. calls "his cool, able, and adroit antagonist." It might seem from this circumstance that the Senator was more radical, as the phrase is, than Mr. Whipple. But it meant only that he was a shrewder partisan. At the Chicago Convention of 1860 which nominated Mr. Lincoln, Senator Simmons said to the son of a former political friend in Rhode Island: "You say a great deal about the Declaration of Independence. Do you suppose any body believes in human equality?" Mr. Whipple at least believed heartily in every position he took whether it would help his party or not. Yet it is but fair to say that P. speaks of Senator Simmons as a man whom time will justify, and who deserves a high and honorable place in Rhode Island history.

It is not probable that the name of John Whipple—for as P. says he was always spoken of like John Hampden without title or addition—will ever be widely known beyond his State. But within its borders it will be always cherished for the sturdy heroism of his nature, his remarkable powers, and his life-long defiance and resistance of those belittling influences which are strongest in the politics of small States.

The sketch of Wilkins Updike by the same hand is a picturesque and delightful portrait of a truly quaint and original character:

"He was first of all an orator. He worked not by moving masses of capital, for he was not rich, nor by running party machinery, for in this he had no skill, but by direct action on the minds and hearts of men by means of speech. Not formal orations, but talk; not in mass meetings, but wherever men and women were gathered together—at dinner-tables, in railroad cars, in taverns, in court-houses, and above all, in the General Assembly. It is the fashion now to decry mere speakers, and fools have much to say in praise of practical men and to disparage talkers. But Napoleon III. has shown how Cæsar acknowledged Cicero as a power in the state, and he has been made to feel that only a large army can balance the eloquence of Thiers, and that only for a time. For two generations there was no contest in Rhode Island in which the tongue of Mr. Updike could be safely counted out.

"But how did he speak? Since his death there have been many friendly notices of him, and some of them say he was not logical. If that means any thing, it means that he was not stupid. I think the popular idea of logic is methodical stupidity, and in this sense Mr. Updike certainly was not logical. Nor did he make much display of argumentative tools. He reasoned very much as lightning moves. He went right at his mark, and left the result to show the force of the blow. In the dreary work of reporting the proceedings of the General Assembly, it has been my duty to hear many excellent speeches, to listen to which was a discipline and a toil. Listening was a necessity when Mr. Updike was talking. You might agree with him or differ from him, but you must hear him. It is easy to talk about his sarcasm, his ridicule, and this and that, after the usual manner of those who must say something and don't know what to say.

"It is not easy to reproduce Mr. Updike as he was. Like all living things he dies in the process of analysis. You may retain what he was made of, but you have lost him. He was always in earnest. If he urged a measure it was because he thought it ought to pass. If he abused a man it was because he thought he ought to be abused. If he raised a laugh against a man in debate, it was with the zeal of a man in the discharge of a religious duty. Perhaps there was never on the whole a more favorable exhibition of his powers than in the discussion on the old State debt. He did not think that the farmers ought to be taxed to pay that debt. I do not know whether it ought to have been paid or not. Having made up his mind to oppose its payment, Mr. Updike did not waste his power in answering the learned and logical and historical arguments in its favor. He went right at the practical purpose of making the members of the General Assembly vote against it. He had to deal with the history of the State, with all the leading men whom he had known. His blows were all hard, some I doubt not fell on innocent shoulders, but they all told. One reason that he gave why the scrip was valueless, was that a certain man had given some of it away, which he would not have done if it had been worth any thing. Another was that one of the holders had a squeaking voice, which he mimicked till the house was in a roar. These things made many people mad, but they told on the final vote. They were low arts perhaps, but they have been used by Thad. Stevens and Benton and Palmerston and Charles James Fox and Demosthenes, and all robust men who have wielded at will popular assemblies. Right or wrong they killed the old State debt."

* * * * * * *

"A very good member of the General Assembly once moved to translate all the Latin phrases in the statute, so that the common people could understand them. The exquisite folly of such a measure was by no means

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google obvious to the great body of the Assembly. It was quite as likely to pass as not. A good solid argument against it would probably have carried it through. Mr. Updike took the ground that it was no advantage to have the people understand the laws. They were not afraid of any thing which they understood. It was these Latin words that they were afraid of. 'Mr. Speaker, there was a man in South Kingstown about twenty years ago, a perfect nuisance, and nobody knew how to get rid of him. One day he was hoeing corn, and he saw the sheriff coming with a paper, and he asked what it was. Now if he had told him it was a writ, what would he have cared? but he told him it was a capias ad satisfaciendum, and the man dropped his hoe and ran, and has not been heard of since.' Nor has the proposition to translate the Latin words in the statutes."

Here was a genial Conservative who seems to step out of a novel—a Conservative who can dispense with the intrenchments of antiquity and tradition.

"Mr. Whipple thought and read much about Athens. Mr. Atwell was much exercised about the doings of the Barons of Runnymede. For any thing that Mr. Updike cared, the human race might have had its origin in South Kingstown. He gave Roger Williams credit for his doctrine of soul liberty, but he did not like the man, and had a contempt for what he called his notions of equality. Mr. Updike's idea of a well-ordered society was a strong Government, supported by the Episcopal Church, with the different classes of society pretty distinct, and each minding its own business.

* * * * * * *

"He was a nobleman in personal appearance, and in the generous humanity of his nature. In the House of Lords he would have been among his peers. But he did not need titles or broad acres. Wherever he sat was the head of the table, and he would have entertained a royal duke at his house in South Kingstown without any sense of social inferiority.

"He was a gentleman; scrupulously neat in all his habits, and always considerate of the happiness of those around him. He was seized with the illness from which he never fully recovered, some six years since, on the morning of the day when he had invited some friends to dine with him. He insisted that the dinner should go on, and concealed his condition as well as he could, and only after the company had gone was it known how sick he was. To the last he made his daily toilet as carefully as when a young man, and was only confined to his bed for a day or two, and his mind was unclouded to the end. I have heard him express regret that he had not early in his professional life located himself in some larger place than Kingstown. This was a natural feeling. All men whose spirits are touched to fine issues are discontented. Discontent is a human trait, of which aspiration is a healthy and whining a diseased exhibition. But I doubt if Mr. Updike could have been transplanted with any advantage. It seems to me that his roots were deep in the South County soil, as if there his foot was on his native heath and his name was M'Gregor."

This is admirable. It has a relish of Addison's and Steele's descriptions. Like all the best of such sketches it is the portrait of an individual, but it stands as the type of a class. Would Wilkins Updike, had he been a student at Princeton, probably have received Mr. Jerome's prize as the first gentleman in his class?

THERE has been some sharp criticism of Miss Hosmer's design of a freedmen's monument to Abraham Lincoln, and of the letter which accompanied it. The commendation of the Commission, also, is severely treated. It often happens that an artist's description of his intention is unskillful and exaggerated from his want of practical familiarity with other forms of expression than those of his art; and this is manifestly true of Miss Hosmer's explanation of her project. In alluding to it in our February Number we spoke of the explanation as confused, but suggested that the photograph or model of the design was very intelligible. It is very elaborate, and would be very costly; and it seems to us that a simple structure would be more appropriate and more feasible.

The subject has been recalled to us by a letter from Missouri. The writer says, "I was at the time of the assassination an officer in a colored regiment stationed in Mississippi. The officers made known to the men that a proposition had been made that the freedmen should contribute money to erect a monument to Mr. Lincoln, and that they alone should subscribe to the fund for that purpose. Our regiment responded nobly to the call, and more than four thousand two hundred dollars was subscribed by this regiment for the purpose. Many other regiments subscribed large sums, and the proceeds are, no doubt, in the hands of treasurers who are waiting for some action to be taken. It is not necessary for the name of Abraham Lincoln to be preserved in letters of stone or brass to keep it in the hearts and minds of those for whom he did so much; but these people have given from their small means this money to be used for a certain purpose, and I think that, however small the amount may be, it should be used for that purpose. No matter how humble in appearance the monument might be, it would show that the race whom he had benefited had some regard for his memory." The writer also suggests that the officers of the regiments which subscribed should take care that the money be applied as soon as practicable to its purpose.

This is good advice; and as the Commission, of which James Yeatman of St. Louis is chairman, has taken the whole subject in charge, the obvious direction of the money should be to that Commission. We believe that it has accepted Miss Hosmer's plan; but as her design is very costly, and as it can not be expected and is not desirable that so large an amount should be subscribed by the freedmen, it is very possible that some other and plainer memorial might be agreed upon by the artist and the Commission. A plain, durable shaft, erected solely by the offerings of the freedmen, would be the best memorial. The subscriptions of others should be inadmissible. The whole significance of the monument would otherwise be lost. It is the offering of the emancipated to the emancipator. In Imperial Rome, as the gladiators went to death in the arena, their salutation to the cruel Emperor was, "Hail, Cæsar! the doomed salute thee!" In Republican America the inscription of this shaft should be, "Abraham Lincoln! the freed salute thee!"

ALL the good uncles in all the old comedies who ever came home from India and gave their blessing and endless lacs of rupees to Angelina and Alphonso are outdone by Mr. George Peabody. It is impossible not to believe that he lives in the famous Green Vaults of Dresden—the Grüne Gewölbe, in which the most costly and wonderful treasures of every kind lie heaped in gorgeous profusion. He is Fortunatus redivivus. He is the lucky heir who has always a handful of gold in his purse. There is no bottom to it. He is Jack Horner, who pulls out a plum every time. Now it is a library; now it is an institute; now it is an agricultural college or a scientific school; now it is a superb banquet; now it is a charity fund—but always it is sparkling

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and welcome. No rich man ever turned his wealth to such popular account. To be rich seems, in his case, to be a cardinal virtue. Like Monsieur Hermann, the prestidigitateur, who stood on the stage, in full view of the audience, and dealt cards to the upper gallery, Mr. Peabody sends his thousands flying in every direction amidst enthusiastic thunders of applause.

Whatever he does is splendidly done. All the details conform to the greatness of the general plan. Thus the first meeting of the trustees of his Southern fund was a shining event. Sumptuous rooms at a fine hotel were provided by the thoughtful Crœsus. Boxes at the opera were added for the pleasure of the toiling trustees. Private dinners, elegant parties awaited them on every hand; and a magnificent banquet, prepared under the special direction of the Lord of the Green Vaults himself, crowned the benevolent labors and the bright festivities of the week. In the grand hall of the hotel the Marine band —"conducted," as Jenkins informs us, "by Professor Rehm—was in attendance." The whole description, indeed, conducted by Jenkins, is "a gem." He tells us that when the band began to play the company began to move into the dining-room, or rather "saloon," which was not decorated, "the elegance and force of the scene, as the guests entered, being increased by the massive, rich, and costly services of gold and silver which embellished the tables, while the luscious viands and fruits on all sides gave a zest to appetite." They also gave a zest to the descriptive faculty, for we are immediately told: "On the east side the two tables were united, and upon that part of the banquet-board the gold service, consisting of ten pieces, was placed. It was a splendid exhibition; and a large basket of natural flowers, of the richest and rarest kind, did not deprive the richly-wrought metal of its lustrous wealth of workmanship"—which was certainly kind upon the part of the natural flowers, and shows the high harmony of the occasion.

As imagination surveys the scene Jenkins gently and instinctively whispers: "Being a strictly private dinner, the toilets of the ladies were less elaborate than for 'state occasions.' Exquisite taste seemed to actuate them on the occasion, and the dresses and the ornaments were rather elegant and simple. Most of the ladies were married, and there was consequently more of the simplicity of a 'family party' than a 'set dinner,' where show is the rule and simplicity the exception." In a subdued and incomparable strain our guide and philosopher continues: "The viands prepared for the banquet and the wines were of the richest description; and the bill of fare, though printed with simple elegance and without pretense, shows but little of the number or extent of the dishes. Under general terms was included a wealth of substantials and of delicacies. The hundred wax-lights, added to the flames of the gas chandeliers, made the scene very brilliant as the guests commenced, amidst soft music, to examine the catalogue of dainties."

To the sound of flutes and sweet recorders the dainties were probably consumed, and then Mr. Winthrop of Boston made a little speech, sweeter than flutes and mild as soft music, which was in perfect harmony with the occasion. It is not fair to criticise, and it is very easy to ridicule, such a speech. The difficulty in Mr. Peabody's position is, that, if he exposes himself to public occasions, and to speeches aimed at himself, there must inevitably be a strain of compliment which, however natural and well-meant, is ludicrous the moment it loses the conditions under which it is spoken. A cheerful and brilliant and highly respectable company, surrounding a munificent gentleman who entertains them with a sumptuous banquet and gives millions of dollars to good purposes, will say many things to him which, in the genial warmth of the rosy hour, are very apt and graceful, but which can no more be read with satisfaction in the cool morning afterward than the Champagne of the dinner can be drunk. It may not strike the reader so—we are very sure it was not so intended—but there is something extremely ludicrous in that part of Mr. Winthrop's speech in which, after mentioning with needless particularity the names of certain prominent Southern members of the Commission who had moved and seconded certain resolutions, he added, "every member of the Board rose in his place in attestation of their adoption." This is meant to be impressive. It is the reverse. The picture of a dozen elderly gentlemen gravely taking a vote by rising is merely amusing.

But there was one slip in the report of the speech which made a joke beyond invention. The occasion must be imagined, and Jenkins leaves us no excuse for not seeing it plainly with the mind's eye. The inexpressible respectability and the venerability of many of the guests must be remembered, and the orator, Mr. Winthrop, must be conceived as the most Websterian of Webster Whigs, with an unapproachable decorum of oratorical deportment. He is uttering his felicitous and polite phrases to the complacent company, when, according to the report, he began a fresh sentence in these words: "It was once said on some occasion by my illustrious friend, the late Daniel Webster, in that loose and impressive language in which he excelled almost all other men—" Loose and impressive language! Of course it was a misprint, probably for terse; but what unkind demon substituted exactly that word loose?

The remark which Mr. Webster made, in his loose and impressive manner, was, that America had contributed to history the character of George Washington; and Mr. Winthrop, coupling with it the name of George Peabody, declared that the future Thackeray who should lecture upon the American Georges would be able to trace in them "elements of true nobility, of real royalty, such as have rarely adorned the lives of those who have wielded the sceptre of earthly sovereignty in any land or age." Does he mean to limit the term "American Georges" to General Washington and Mr. Peabody, or to open the gates and admit all Americans named George?

Well, it is not quite fair. It was a hard task to say any thing, or to say nothing. The generosity of Mr. Peabody is so unquestioned, his service to worthy institutions is so evident, that we are anxious to separate the substance from the show. But the eminent respectability of the banquet, proceeding to "soft music," and recorded, or penned, or treated—or whatever word suits him best—by Jenkins, is, let us say, the smiling side of it. It is its loose rather than its impressive aspect.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 29th of March. It embraces the closing scenes of the Thirty-ninth Congress and the commencement of the Fortieth. The most important feature of the month is the complete triumph of Congress in its controversy with the President upon the question of reconstruction, and the apparent disposition of the South to acquiesce in the proposed plan.

Under the late law the new Congress was convened at the close of the former one. The changes in the members were so few that the present Congress may be considered as a continuation of the former, bearing in mind that all proceedings up to the 4th of March belong to the Thirty-ninth; all subsequent, to the Fortieth Congress. As the session was approaching its close, upon motion of Mr. Le Blond, seconded by Mr. Winfield, both Democrats, the thanks of the House were unanimously presented to Mr. Colfax, the Speaker, for the able and impartial manner in which he had discharged the duties of his office. At the opening of the new Congress Mr. Colfax was re-elected Speaker of the House. Mr. Wade, of Ohio, was chosen President of the Senate. This choice is of special importance from the fact that in case Mr. Johnson is in any way disqualified the President of the Senate becomes ex officio President of the United States.

Contrary to anticipation, both Houses agreed upon the Tariff and Bankrupt bills. The details of these are so voluminous as to preclude any attempt at an abstract in this Record.—The President signed the Army Appropriation bill (March 2), accompanying his action with a protest against one section which he said, "in certain cases, virtually deprives the President of his Constitutional functions as Commander-in-Chief of the army; and another which denies to the States of the Union their Constitutional right to protect themselves in any emergency by the means of their own militia." But if he refused to sign the bill he would be compelled to defeat the necessary military appropriations; he therefore signed it, protesting against these sections.

THE MILITARY GOVERNMENT BILL.

The "Act for the more efficient Government of the late Insurrectionary States," the complete text of which was given in our last Record, was on the 2d of March returned to the House by the President, with his veto. The President says that the statement in the preamble that "no adequate protection for life or property now exists in these States is not supported by any evidence which has come to his knowledge;" and while the existing Governments of these States have not succeeded in preventing the commission of all crime, yet "all the information I have on the subject convinces me that the mass of the Southern people, and those who control their public acts, while they entertain diverse opinions on questions of federal policy, are completely united in the effort to reorganize their society on the basis of peace, and to restore their mutual prosperity as rapidly and completely as the circumstances of the case will permit." The bill, however, adds the President, "would seem to show upon its face that the establishment of peace and good order is not its real object." He argues that—

> "The military rule which it establishes is plainly to be used, not for any purpose of order or for the prevention of crime, but solely as a means of coercing the people into the adoption of principles and measures to which it is known that they are opposed and upon which they have an undeniable right to exercise their own judgment.
>
> "I submit to Congress whether this measure is not, in its whole character, scope, and object, without precedent and without authority—in palpable conflict with the plainest provisions of the Constitution, and utterly destructive to those great principles of liberty and humanity for which our ancestors on both sides of the Atlantic shed so much blood and expended so much treasure."

The President proceeds to urge that the power given by the bill to the several military commanders "is that of an absolute monarch, his mere will taking the place of all law; it places at his free disposal all the lands and goods in his district, and he may distribute them to whom he pleases; he may make a criminal code of his own, and he may make it as bloody as any recorded in history, or he may reserve the privilege of acting upon the impulse of his private passions in each case that occurs." In fine, says the President:

> "It is plain that the authority here given to the military officer amounts to absolute despotism. But to make it still more unendurable the bill provides that it may be delegated to as many subordinates as he chooses to appoint; for it declares that he shall 'punish or cause to be punished.' Such a power has not been wielded by any monarch in England for more than five hundred years. In all that time no people who speak the English language have borne such servitude. It reduces the whole population of the ten States—all persons, of every color, sex, and condition, and every stranger within their limits—to the most abject and degrading slavery. No master ever had a control over his slaves so absolute as this bill gives to the military officers over both white and colored persons."

The President then proceeds to urge what he considers a still more important objection to the bill. He argues at length that it is absolutely unconstitutional. The arguments which he brings forward are in effect the same which have been previously adduced against the general scheme proposed by Congress. In regard to the right of suffrage conferred by this bill upon the freedmen, the President says:

> "The negroes have not asked for the privilege of voting; the vast majority of them have no idea what it means. This bill not only thrusts it into their hands, but compels them as well as the whites to use it in a particular way. If they do not form a Constitution with prescribed articles in it, and afterward elect a legislature which will act upon certain measures in a prescribed way, neither blacks nor whites can be relieved from the slavery which the bill imposes upon them. Without pausing here to consider the policy or impolicy of Africanizing the Southern part of our territory, I would simply ask the attention of Congress to that manifest, well-known, and universally acknowledged rule of constitutional law which declares that the Federal Government has no jurisdiction, authority, or power to regulate such subjects for any State. To force the right of suffrage out of the hands of the white people and into the hands of the negroes is an arbitrary violation of this principle."

In the conclusion of his argument upon the Constitutional question, the President says:

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"It was to punish the gross crime of defying the Constitution and to vindicate its supreme authority that we carried on a bloody war of four years' duration. Shall we now acknowledge that we sacrificed a million of lives and expended billions of treasure to enforce a Constitution which is not worthy of respect and preservation? Those who advocated the right of secession alleged in their own justification that we had no regard for law, and that their rights of property, life, and liberty would not be safe under the Constitution as administered by us. If we now verify their assertion we prove that they were in truth and in fact fighting for their liberty, and, instead of branding their leaders with the dishonoring name of traitors against a righteous and legal Government, we elevate them in history to the rank of self-sacrificing patriots, consecrate them to the admiration of the world, and place them by the side of Washington, Hampden, and Sydney."

This veto Message thus concludes:

"While we are legislating upon subjects which are of great importance to the whole people, and which must affect all parts of the country, not only during the life of the present generation but for ages to come, we should remember that all men are entitled at least to a hearing in the councils which decide upon the destiny of themselves and their children. At present ten States are denied representation, and when the Fortieth Congress assembles on the 4th day of the present month sixteen States will be without a voice in the House of Representatives. This grave fact, with the important question before us, should induce us to pause in a course of legislation which, looking solely to the attainment of political ends, fails to consider the rights it transgresses, the law which it violates, or the institutions which it imperils."

The bill was passed, notwithstanding the veto of the President, in the House by a vote of 135 to 48, and in the Senate by 38 to 10. The bill having thus become a law the President, in accordance with its provisions, appointed the following General officers as military commanders of the respective districts created by the law:

First District, Virginia, head-quarters at Richmond: General J. M. Schofield.
Second District, North and South Carolina, head-quarters at Columbia: General D. E. Sickles.
Third District, Georgia, Florida, and Alabama, head-quarters at Montgomery: General John Pope.
Fourth District, Mississippi and Arkansas, head-quarters at Vicksburg: General E. O. C. Ord.
Fifth District, Louisiana and Texas, head-quarters at New Orleans: General P. H. Sheridan.

General Thomas was originally named for the command of the Third District, but at his own request General Pope was placed in command of this district, Thomas retaining the command of the Department of the Cumberland.

On the 18th of March an act supplementary to the Military Government bill was passed. It makes provision for the mode of executing the details of that bill.—On or before September 1, 1867, a register is to be made of persons qualified to vote; all of whom must take oath that they had not been in any way disfranchised on account of participation in the rebellion; no persons except those registered to be allowed to vote. These electors are to vote whether a Convention shall be held for the formation of a Constitution for their States respectively. If a majority vote for a Convention it shall be held, otherwise not; but if a majority of the registered electors do not vote upon this question, then no Convention shall be held. At this election delegates are also to be chosen in case the Convention is to be held. These delegates, when assembled in Convention, are first to determine whether it is the wish of the people of their respective States to frame a Constitution in accordance with the Act; and if so to proceed to frame a Constitution; the Constitution so framed then to be submitted for acceptance or rejection to the electors already registered. If accepted by them it is to be submitted to Congress, and if Congress pronounces that the Constitution is in accordance with the provisions of the law, then Senators and Representatives from such State are to be admitted into the National Legislature. The registration is to be completed by the 1st of September; at least thirty days' notice must be given for the election of delegates to the Convention, and sixty days may elapse thereafter before the assemblage of the Convention; so that at the shortest none of the seceding States can be represented in Congress during the present year.

On the 23d of March the President returned this bill with his veto. He reiterated his objections to the original bill, and presents others against the provisions of this Supplementary Act. The essential points are these: That by the oath required at registration every elector must decide for himself, "under peril of military punishment if he makes a mistake," whether he has been disfranchised for participation in the rebellion; and, says the President, "almost every man—the negro as well as the white—above twenty-one years of age, who was resident in the ten States during the rebellion, voluntarily or involuntarily, at some time, and in some way, did participate in resistance to the lawful authority of the General Government;" and, further, as the people themselves are to have no voice in conducting the registration and the subsequent election, the Convention can not be considered as representing the citizens of these States. "No consideration," says the President, "could induce me to give my approval to such an election law for any purpose, and especially for the great purpose of framing the Constitution of a State." If, argues the President, negro suffrage is essential to a Republican Government, then "the work of reconstruction may as well begin in Ohio as in Virginia, in Pennsylvania as in North Carolina." This Supplementary Act was promptly passed over the veto of the President—in the Senate by a vote of 40 to 7; in the House by 114 to 25.

THE TENURE OF OFFICE BILL.

This bill, the essential features of which were given in our Record for March, was, before its passage in the House, amended so as to take from the President the power of removing even the members of the Cabinet. They are to hold office "for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the consent of the Senate." The President, March 2, returned this bill with his veto. He argued at length that the power of removal from office was by the Constitution vested in the Executive; that it was a necessary power, and that its exercise had never resulted in evil effects.—The bill was, however, passed over the veto; in the Senate, by a vote of 35 to 11; in the House, by 131 to 37.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The Judiciary Committee in the House, to whom was referred the resolution relating to the impeachment of the President, reported, March 3, that they had examined many witnesses and collected many documents, but were not prepared

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google to report, further than to say that, in the opinion of the majority—eight members out of nine—"sufficient testimony had been brought to the notice of the Committee to justify and demand a further prosecution of the investigation." The testimony taken by the Committee would go into the custody of the Clerk of the House, and so would pass into the hands of any Committee which the succeeding Congress might appoint to bring the investigation to a close.—Mr. Rogers, who was the minority of the Committee, dissented from this. He reported that "there was not a particle of evidence to sustain any one of the charges which the House required the Committee to investigate, and that the case is wholly without evidence upon which impeachment could be founded;" and he could therefore see no good in a continuance of the investigation.—The matter was for the present disposed of (March 7) by directing the Committee on the Judiciary of the new Congress to take charge of the testimony taken by the Committee of the late Congress.

NEBRASKA AND COLORADO.

On the 1st of March the President issued his proclamation, announcing that the Legislature of Nebraska having on the 8th and 9th of February passed an Act ratifying the condition contained in the enabling Act, and thus "the fundamental conditions imposed by Congress on the State of Nebraska, to entitle that State to admission, having been ratified and accepted, the admission of the said State into the Union is now complete." Nebraska, therefore, is now one of the States of the Union; and its Senators and Representatives have taken their seats in Congress. On the 1st of March the question came up in the Senate whether the bill, admitting Colorado as a State into the Union, should pass, notwithstanding the veto of the President. The vote was 29 ayes and 19 nays: less than two-thirds of the Senate having voted in the affirmative the bill fails.

RELIEF FOR SOUTHERN DESTITUTION.

On the 9th of March a joint resolution passed the Senate appropriating $1,000,000 for the relief of destitute people of the South and Southwest, of all classes, to be expended for supplies of food, under the superintendence of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau. In the House the resolution was subjected to a sharp debate, in the course of which General B. F. Butler, now a member from Massachusetts, proposed a substitute to the effect that the military commanders of the several districts should have power to collect from all persons within their commands, owning more than 160 acres of land, or having an income of more than $600 a year, such sums as he might deem necessary to relieve the white pauperism there. Mr. Van Trump, of Ohio, doubted whether Congress had the constitutional power to appropriate money as an act of charity; and he also doubted whether the people of the South would accept this charity. If he were a Southern man, he said, under the circumstances in which that people were now placed by Congress, he would starve rather than touch one cent of this Congressional bounty. Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York, had six reasons for voting against the resolution: Congress had no right to appropriate it; the Southern people had not asked for it; the gift was placed on insulting grounds; the money was to be disbursed by the Freedmen's Bureau; political, not benevolent motives prompted the measure; and, besides, the Freedmen's Bureau had already a large unexpended sum in its hands.—Finally, on the 22d, the resolution was so amended as to direct the Secretary of War to issue supplies of food through the Freedmen's Bureau "sufficient to prevent starvation and extreme want to any and all classes of destitute or helpless persons in the Southern and Southwestern States"—the appropriation, not, however, to exceed the amount of the unexpended moneys heretofore appropriated to supply freedmen and refugees with provisions or rations.—The resolution, as thus amended, passed the House by a vote of 91 to 31, and was concurred in by the Senate by 29 to 9.—Contributions to a very considerable amount, yet far less than the exigencies of the case demand, have been made by individuals and associations for the relief of Southern destitution.

ORDERS OF DISTRICTS COMMANDERS.

Several of the Military Commanders have issued orders bearing upon the state of things in their respective districts. In Virginia, General Schofield's order recognized the existing civil Government, and continued all State officers in the performance of their duties, unless specially ordered otherwise, until their successors should be duly elected and qualified in accordance with the Act of Congress.—In North and South Carolina, General Sickles said that the present Governments were merely provisional, and subject to the paramount authority of the United States; but meanwhile the existing civil officers would continue to exercise their functions, subject to the orders of the commanding general; in case they should any where neglect to exercise their duties, it should be reported to head-quarters. Post commanders were to arrest persons charged with crimes, when the local authorities should fail to do so, and hold them in custody for trial by military commission. He hoped that there would be little occasion for the exercise of military authority in matters of ordinary civil administration.—In Louisiana, before the appointment of a Military Commander for that district, the Legislature had ordered an election for city officers of New Orleans; General Sheridan assumed the responsibility (March 9) of prohibiting this election, and by a resolution of the Legislature the former incumbents were continued in their places. Subsequently (March 27) General Sheridan removed from office John T. Monroe, the Mayor of New Orleans, Edmund Cabell, Judge of the District Court, and Andrew S. Herron, Attorney-General of the State, appointing other persons to take their place. Mr. Monroe was Mayor of the city at the time of its occupation by Farragut and Butler, at which time he made himself especially obnoxious. Having been pardoned by the President, he was re-elected Mayor.

FEELING AT THE SOUTH.

The indications are very strong that the most prominent leaders of public opinion in the South are disposed to accept the new state of things, and to endeavor to persuade the people to reorganize their State governments upon the basis laid down by Congress. At Columbia, South

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Carolina, the freedmen held a public meeting on the 18th of March. By request they were addressed by several leading white citizens. General Wade Hampton spoke of the vast importance of the present movement, not only to the colored but to the white man. He advised the freedmen to give their friends at the South a fair trial, and if they were found wanting it would be time enough to go abroad for sympathy; it was for their interest to build up the South, for as the country prospered they would prosper. Hon. E. J. Arthur said the freedmen had now the right of franchise, and he advised them to exercise it with good judgment. To learn to appreciate the advantages which had been conferred upon them they should educate themselves and their children; and it was the duty of the whites to aid them in so doing. The freedmen, he said, were now the political equals of the whites, and education would go far to make them morally and mentally so. "Let there be," he said, "no war of races among us. It is true that many of the whites are deprived of the political rights which colored men will enjoy, but that should not create envious and unkind feelings. Let no harsh feelings exist among us. Look to each other's welfare and happiness; and last, though not least, look to your educational and moral improvement." Colonel William H. Talley said that the interests of the white and colored man of the South were one and the same; they were parts of one society, and under the circumstances in which they were placed "the two races must prosper or perish together; the white man and the colored man of the South have the same interest and the same destiny." He was sure that he expressed the feelings of the intelligent white men of the South when he declared that "they cherished no feelings of hostility toward the colored man on account of his altered circumstances." He also advised the freedmen to trust those whom they had known; if these, he said, "deceive you, it will then be time enough to experiment on the sympathies of strangers."—Of the colored speakers Beverly Nash declared that the freedmen would present to Congress a petition for the enfranchisement of the whites so strong that it would be regarded; the colored men, he said, "would not rest until the whites were enfranchised." He was in favor of universal suffrage, and advised the colored people in their selection of candidates to look to merit alone. The Rev. Mr. Pickett, colored, was opposed to universal suffrage on account of the want of education and of a property qualification; but the first was readily attainable, and the last would surely come. As to elections the question should be, "not whether a man was white or black, but was he honest?"—Taken in all its bearings, says the Columbia Phœnix, "the pleasant feelings engendered by this gathering can not be too highly appreciated, nor its importance over-estimated. Disfranchised whites were invited to address enfranchised blacks, and the advice given was received in the spirit in which it was intended, while the remarks of the colored speakers were such as to give general satisfaction."

General Longstreet, in a published letter (March 18), says: "The striking feature is that we are a conquered people. Recognizing this fact fairly and squarely, there is but one course left for wise men to pursue, and that is to accept the terms that are now offered to us by the conquerors. There can be no discredit to a conquered people for accepting the conditions offered by their conquerors, nor is there any occasion for a feeling of humiliation. We made an honest, and, I hope I may say, a creditable fight; but we have lost. Let us come forward, then, and accept the ends involved in the struggle. Our people earnestly desire that the Constitutional Government shall be re-established, and the only means to accomplish this is to comply with the requirements of the recent Congressional legislation. It is said by some that Congress will not receive us even after we have complied with their conditions; but I can find no sufficient reason for entertaining this proposition for a moment. I can not admit that the representative men of a great nation could make such a pledge in bad faith. Admitting, however, that there is such a mental reservation, can that be any excuse for us in failing to discharge our duty? Let us accept the terms, as we are in duty bound to do, and if there is a lack of good faith let it be upon others."

THE CANADIAN CONFEDERATION.

The Queen, in opening the British Parliament on February 5, announced that a bill would be submitted for the consolidation of the principal British Provinces of North America. This bill was introduced in the House of Lords on February 15, and passed that body on February 26. It provides that there shall be a Governor-General appointed by the Crown; a Lieutenant-Governor for each province to be appointed by the Governor-General, and to hold office five years; and a general or central Parliament for the Confederation, to consist of an Upper Chamber and Lower House, the seventy-two members of the first to be elected for life, and the one hundred and eighty-one members of the other to be elected for five years. Local legislatures are provided for each province. The present plan of confederation does not include Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, Newfoundland, or Vancouver Island. Earl Carnarvon, in moving the second reading of the bill, pointed out the advantages to be derived from the unity of the Canadian provinces in the event of invasion from any quarter, and said that, in passing the bill, the House "would be laying the foundation of a great state worthy to take its place by the side of one of the greatest nations of the world—the United States." The bill was sent to the House of Commons early in March, where its final consideration was pending as our Record closed.—This proposed Confederacy has excited some feeling in the Congress of the United States. On the 27th of March a joint resolution, offered by Mr. Banks, was passed in the House, declaring that "the people of the United States can not regard the proposed Confederation of the provinces on the northern frontier of this country without extreme solicitude; that a Confederation of States on this continent, extending from ocean to ocean, established without consulting the people of the provinces, and founded upon monarchical principles, can not be considered otherwise than as in contravention of the traditions and constantly declared principles of this Government, endan-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

gering the most important interests, and tending to increase and perpetuate the embarrassments already existing between the two Governments."

EUROPE.

The Fenian insurrection in Kerry County, Ireland, during February resulted only in the temporary interruption of the telegraph lines which traverse that district and the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus by the British Government for three months. Another demonstration, evidently better planned and on a more extended scale than the first, took place in March, but with no better results or greater successes on the part of the Fenians. It was commenced on March 5 by simultaneous demonstrations in various parts of the southeastern counties. A fight occurred at Tallaght, about eight miles from Dublin, between the armed police and a large body of Fenians: in which one policeman was killed, five Fenians wounded, and eighty arrested. Subsequently six loads of ammunition were seized and one hundred more Fenians captured. The rest retreated to the hills, pursued by the British forces. On the same day two hundred Fenians were repulsed in an attack on the police-station at Kilmallock; while other forces were defeated in their attempts to seize the Drogheda and the Castlemartyr barracks. The object of these demonstrations—to obtain arms—was in every instance frustrated, and finding their efforts futile the Fenians fled to the mountains. The various bands which had engaged in these movements then concentrated in the mountains of Tipperary, near the junction of the Cork and Dublin with the Limerick and Waterford railroads, and succeeded for a short time in obstructing travel by those routes. The British troops soon made their appearance in the same vicinity, and the Fenians dispersed to their homes. Several arrests were made, including that of a Colonel or General Connor, who appears to have been a leader, and who with forty others was confined in Tipperary jail to await trial for high treason. These demonstrations were the occasion of some discussion but little action in the English Parliament; and on March 20 Mr. Disraeli proposed the passage of a new and liberal Reform Bill for Ireland as the best weapon with which to fight the Fenians.

Editor's Drawer.

THE THIRTY-FOURTH VOLUME of this Magazine is completed with the present May Number. The Drawer, which is almost coeval with the Magazine, may now fairly be looked upon as a chest of drawers. What the contents of these are their owners know well; but few imagine how many hands have gathered up the good things there deposited. They have been furnished by fully two thousand different persons, and from every section of the country. To all these contributors, whether known or unknown—and may their number never be less—the Editor sends hearty greeting, with thanks for past favors and solicitations for more.

THE young gentleman who officiates as countist in one of the Ithica banks mentions a little incident that occurred there in 1864, when the farmers were investing liberally in seven-thirty notes:

One day a lank countryman entered the bank, and leaning over the counter until his face almost touched mine, said, in a drawling tone: "Have you got any of them seven by nine bonds? If you have I want some." Taking out his "pus" and counting the required sum, he obtained his governments and evaded the premises.

FROM Cheesedom, Geauga County, Ohio, a gentleman who stands well there sends the following, which is mostly old, but the concluding part good enough to warrant reproduction:

Old Daddy Rumsey was a conscientious man, fond of his Bible and his bitters. He was summoned as a witness before our County Court. On entering the hotel he stepped up to the bar, called for a little tanzy whisky, poured out a tumbler nearly full, and proceeded to get outside of it, which he did with entire success. The usual sixpence was laid on the counter in payment. Landlord handed back three cents.

"What!" said Rumsey, "don't you charge but three cents?"

"Not where I sell at wholesale," was the reply.

The old man shoved back the change and said: "Well, if it's as cheap as that, you take the three cents and I'll take some more!"

AFTER this wholesale transaction had been disposed of one of the leading lawyers of the county entered and invited daddy to indulge again, giving a knowing wink to the crowd.

"Daddy," said the lawyer, "what did you come here for?"

"Why, we had a mill-pond in our town, and it made all the people sick, when the Lord sent a flood and carried the dam away, then the people got well."

"I don't see why you should say the Lord had any thing to do with it."

"Certainly he did," replied daddy, "for the Bible says, 'He sendeth his rain upon the just and upon the unjust.'"

"Oh, you are getting weak and foolish," said the lawyer.

"I know it," was the response, "but the Bible tells us that the Lord chooses the weak and foolish things of this world to confound the wise!"

THE country judge business was a large thing in the olden time, especially that portion of the judiciary known as "side judges." Many years ago, in Genesee County, a "corporous" side jurist, Judge E——, happened to be seated on the bench by the side of that courtly and able judge, Addison Gardiner. A Tonawanda Indian, John Steeprock, had been tried and convicted for some petty larceny, and at the moment sentence was about to be pronounced his counsel, with the utmost apparent gravity, arose and said, that as

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the Indian was not a citizen, but a subject of a neighboring monarchy (the Six Nations), with whom we were then, happily, at peace, he could not with propriety be tried or sentenced by this Court. And then cast his eyes toward Judge E——, with whom he was on confidential terms. The Judge, though really having no voice in the matter, straightened himself up, and without waiting for Judge Gardiner, orated as follows: "The only question for this Court to consider is, Is Injuns folks? If Injuns be folks then this indictment stands; but if Injuns baint folks then it's squushed!"

Judge Gardiner didn't seem to see it in that light, and ordered "our red brother" into quod for six calendar months.

Soon after the venerable Judge Busteed's appointment as United States Judge for the State of Alabama he was conversing with an acquaintance on the duties, etc., of his new and very responsible position. The latter expressed surprise that the Judge should have accepted the honor, or consented to go upon the bench under any circumstances—"it would be so difficult for you," said he, jocularly, "to maintain the requisite facial gravity."

"What!" said the Judge, assuming an aspect of great severity, "do you mean to say that I do not look like the United States Judge of Alabama?"

"Well, Judge," was the reply, "I must confess you have rather a 'Mobile' countenance just at this moment, though how it will appear when you visit the other districts I'll not undertake to say."

The little people will pester the old with curious readings of the Good Book. Thus, at Orange, New Jersey, "Our children are accustomed nightly to repeat a passage of Scripture committed during the day. After the older children had repeated their verses our little Eloise (two-and-a-half years old) expressed a wish to repeat a verse, and did it, giving a new version to 'My yoke is easy and my burden is light,' as follows: 'My joke is easy and my bird is polite!'"

At last we have it on irrefragable testimony, from Ogdensburgh, that old Grimes's pulse has finally ceased to beat. A few mornings since, when the thermometer was nearly played out, a ragged little beggar stopped at the door of Judge J——'s and plaintively suggested victuals. As the benevolent lady of the house was emptying a few into his basket she asked:

"What is your name, my son?"

"My name is Grimes."

"Is your father living?"

"Yes, marm."

"I thought 'Old Grimes' was dead long ago."

"That was my grandpa!"

And the youngster waddled off, thinking what "a good old soul" the lady was.

One of the selectmen of Canton, Missouri, tells us, in confidence, that he entered Nichols's grocery the other night and found some one reading an account, in a St. Louis paper, of a man who had arranged himself in a coffin, dressed as he wished to be buried, and taken Prussic acid. Next morning of course he was found dead. Mike Dooley, a character here, remarked, as the reading was finished, "Why didn't the fool nail up the coffin? Then he'd made a good job of it!"

Did you know Betsy Cranch? What a fine creature she was! I told her once, in jest, she must be my wife, for I had never been so deeply in love before. "It is out of the question, my dear Doctor," replied she. "It is impossible. I am five deep already!"

A correspondent in the "far distant Oregon," writing under date of January 11, says:

Your anecdote of the Frenchman who charged the Indians half a dollar for a needle, alleging as an excuse that the needle-maker was dead, reminds me of a merchant of the Jewish persuasion doing business, in 1862, at Le Grange, who charged the honest miners one dollar in coin, each, for needles, and on being remonstrated with and told that a paper of needles cost only a "bit" (12½ cents) in Portland, replied: "Mein Gott! I knows tat. 'Tain't te cost of te goots, but te cash money for te freight!" As freight was only $2 per ton, what was it per needle?

The following come "marching on" to us from Ossawotamie, Kansas, inspired, doubtless, by the spirit of ancient John Brown:

Captain Case, of the ——th Kansas regiment, was slightly pompous, but a good soldier and strict disciplinarian. To fill up his company to the desired standard he was obliged to enlist some of the "noble red men of the forest," who were not thoroughly posted in the art of civilized warfare. Soon after enlistment one of these noble red men was placed on guard (Captain C. being officer of the day), and stationed just in rear of the Colonel's tent, with strict orders to walk his beat until relieved. No sooner had the officer left than the noble red man sat down on the ground and amused himself by humming a favorite war-song. Several officers happened to be lounging near the Colonel's tent, when the Adjutant called the Captain's attention to the delinquent. The Captain walked up to the noble red man and, in his fiercest and most sanguinary tones, demanded: "Are you a guard, Sir?" The noble red man replied that he was not, which riled the Captain. He repeated, with a flourish of his sabre, "Are you a guard, Sir?" The reply came: "No, me no guard; me Shawnee!" The Captain advanced backward to his friends and left the noble red man to continue his oratorio.

As might be expected in this place, from which old John Brown emigrated, a large portion of the inhabitants are ladies and gentlemen of ebony tint. During the protracted meeting just closed Brother Lewis, a good man, but feeble in grammar, on being called on to pray, began thus: "O Lord! bress dis congregashum; bress dem dat am orphans; bress dem dat am widders; and bress dem dat am widders for good!"

Judge Barnard, of the Supreme Court of this city, whose rapid way of doing business at chambers is proverbial, is quick to perceive where a witticism may, without impropriety, be introduced to enliven the proceedings. The scrivener of this happened to be present one morning when two pillars of the law stood in the presence, each

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google holding some quires of paper facetiously termed "pleadings."

"I ask leave, your Honor, to amend so as to insert" so and so.

"And I move to amend," says the other, "by inserting," etc., etc.

This continued for half an hour, when the Judge quietly arose, took his hat and cane, and remarked: "Gentlemen, you each have leave, if you wish, to insert the whole of Webster's Dictionary. This is my birthday, and I'm going home to dinner. Court's adjourned!"

Counsel were disposed to ask for a writ of "No Go" (ne exeat); but the Judge was off, and we suppose they are now at work on that superior, though somewhat discursive, volume.

As the angling season is about to commence, when

"The trout and salmon
Are playing at backgammon,"

and the poor *fin*ians are to be killed for our edible delectation, we commend to gentlemen of piscatorial habits the following verse from a new book just received from beyond the big fishing-pond:

"When Eve and Adam lived in peace,
Sans either brawl or jangling,
The Serpent, from his brimstone den,
Thought he would go an angling;
He baited his hook with fiendish look;
Says he: This will entangle her;
And so, my friends, you all may see
The Devil was the first angler!"

PER CONTRA:

"Happy the fisher's life and humble state;
Calm are his hours, and free from rude debate;
No restless cares he knows of sordid gain,
Nor schemes that rack the toiling statesman's brain;
Fearless in shades he takes his healthy dreams,
And labors mild amid refreshing streams."

THAT our colored brother out West has the open countenance characteristic of him in other latitudes is settled by the following memorandum from a Newark, Ohio, correspondent:

The other day two colored individus were standing at the dépôt—one on the platform, the other on the track. The gemman on the track was indulging in loud laughter at something he had witnessed, when his comrade called out:

"I say, Bill, you's in great danger dar!"

"Why so?" says Bill.

"'Kase when de train come along it'll take your mouf for de dépôt and run in dar!"

IN one of the towns of Western New York—which, of course, has its weekly paper—the following advertisement appeared:

NOTICE.—Whereas my wife Sally has left my bed and board without just cause or provocation, I forbid all persons from harboring or trusting her on my account, for I shall pay no debts of her contracting, as I pay none of my own. E—— B——.

After publishing this the required time the able editor sent in his bill. Payment was declined. The able editor was indignant. "Why," said Mr. B——, who was impecunious to the beggarly point, "didn't the last line of the advertisement say that I paid none of my own debts, and do you suppose I'm going back on that? Not much!"

FROM Belvidere, Illinois, in the neatest possible caligraphy, comes the following from a lady contributor. It propounds a high moral problem which our lady readers are invited to discuss:

A little boy of four summers had been very anxious for a baby brother, such as a little playmate had. His father was a minister, and little Harry had been taught that it was his duty to pray for what he desired. Coming to his father one day with a very sober face, he said: "Papa, do you suppose, if I prayed to God right along, that he would send me a baby brother?" "Perhaps so," said papa; "but why do you ask?" "Oh, because," replied he, "I have been praying off and on this good while, and it don't seem to do any good!"

FROM St. John, New Brunswick, the following are sent to help on the monthly cachinnation:

The Rev. Mr. Driver was a Baptist minister in the town of S——. Happening one day, while journeying to a neighboring village, to meet a countryman driving a very lean pair of oxen, he accosted him with:

"Why do you have such a lean pair of cattle, my man? They look as though they needed something to eat."

"Well," replied the owner, "I can't just exactly tell why, unless it is because they are like the church in S——; they either want a new pastor [pasture] or a new Driver!"

The minister cogitated a moment, saw the point, and paused not to ask any more questions.

"MY boy," said the Quaco schoolmaster to Bob one morning, "why do you stand there against that rickety old gate while you study your multiplication-table?"

"Because, Sir, the Bible tells us to 'prop a gate and multiply,' and I mean always to do what it says."

"Quite proper, Robert," said the master; "but seems to me you are beginning early."

How about this?

At a recent missionary meeting in New England much was said relative to the Bible and the efforts of missionaries to send it to the uttermost parts of the earth. In due course the Rev. Mr. —— was asked to pray, and did, thus:

"O Lord! we thank thee for thy word as it is given to us; and although it is not the original copy, still we consider it a very good edition under the circumstances. And although thou hast made the earth and caused it to revolve with incredible velocity, and although our missionaries are scattered over the surface thereof, yet thou hast so nicely balanced the centrifugal and centripetal forces, that, as yet, not a single brother has been thrown from the surface!"

AT an auction sale in St. John, not long ago, a wag came pushing through the crowd, and demanded, in an excited manner:

"Auctioneer, is Mr. M'Affee [a well-known merchant] in the room? He is wanted immediately on business of great importance."

The auctioneer therewith stopped the sale, and called, in a stentorian voice: "Mr. M'Affee! Mr. M'Affee! Is Mr. M'Affee present?"

A pause ensued, and no answer, for the reason that Mr. M'Affee had not been there at all. And when, after repeated calling, the crowd became impatient, a brawny Scott cried out,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Hoot, mon! if ye dinna go on with the sale ye'll no' mak a fee to-night!" The auctioneer seemed to regard it in a jocular light, and went on.

A FEW years ago, in a village in Chester County, Pennsylvania, the Methodists and Presbyterians each built a church at about the same time. Soon a rivalry arose between them, especially among the juvenile portion of the congregations. On one occasion the Methodist party got the best of an argument in this way:

"Ah! I guess we beat you now."

"How?"

"Why, we've got six buried in our grave-yard, and you've only four; and there's old Mr. Cooper is going to die soon, and he'll make seven!"

Cheerful contest!

THEY have a superior article of Legislature in Nebraska, judging from the following incident, which a correspondent at Omaha is kind enough to send us:

Last week an honorable member proposed an amendment to the tax-law, exempting the property of widows and minor children of soldiers, to a certain amount, from taxation; which brought Mr. Kinsela, a Celt, to his feet, with a request that it be so amended as not to include widows after they were married, or minors after they became of age!

A MEMBER of the Society of Friends (they will be naughty, like the world's people, once in a while), feeling in need of relaxation, thought he would be excusable in transgressing, "just once," the rules of that Society; so he went to one of the theatres where the spectacular drama was on view—one where the lady performers dressed as "low down and high up" as is customary in the *leg*ular drama nowadays. The "Friend" was delighted with the pedal exhibition. It reappeared to him in his sleep. He thought about it next morning on the way to meeting; thought about it in meeting; became drowsy—fell asleep. Something occurred to waken him suddenly. Starting up and rubbing his eyes, he exclaimed: "Hats off! down in front!" The brethren being accustomed when in meeting to sit with hats on, heeded not the unorthodox invitation. Friend Hicks did not feel moved to explain.

A WITTY lady, writing of the grand ball recently given in Philadelphia by Mr. Jay Cooke, the great banker and Government bond broker, says: "The company commenced to arrive at 5.20; dancing began at 7.30; supper was served at 10.40!"

THE owner of Lock Box No. 1141, Minneapolis, Minnesota, informs us of the decease of a citizen of that town, named Sa-mith; and mentions that a little boy told him that the physicians had just gown down to hold a post mortification examination of the body!

BETTER than this is the following, communicated by a lady correspondent in North Cambridge, Massachusetts:

At the Musical Festival in Boston, given in honor of the Russians, was sung a chorus from Mozart's Twelfth Mass. A cousin from the country was present, and on our way home we began discussing the music, when he exclaimed, "The piece I liked best was that chorus of the Twelfth Massachusetts!"

AN African lady entered the dépôt at Lancaster, Ohio, and, wishing to have her baggage checked, asked the agent: "Is you de gemman wat mails de trunks?"

MERELY to show the progress made in the Freedmen's Schools, we reproduce the following sent from Washington:

A brief colored brother was requested by his teacher to write her a letter telling her what trade he would follow. He wrote:

"MY DEAR TEACHER,—You inquire what I would like to be when I grow up. I think I should like to be a lawyer or a President, for I think they are both very useful trades. Will you please give me your advice?"

With "A. J.'s" recent experience before him, we should say, try the law.

THE three R's—Reading, Riting, and Rithmetic—are not prevailing to any serious extent in Douglas County, Illinois, judging from the following, sent to us by A. G. Wallace, Esq., Clerk of the Circuit Court and Recorder of that county. The envelope is thus superscribed:

Mr Clurck of the Seircket
Cort Duglest Conty Ills

and the letter reads:

Kansas Ills Jan 16 '67

Ser Mr Clurck of Duglest Sericuit Crt pleas send me the time of the Circket Cort kmenses in yor place and oblige yors truley A K——E pleas give this xpedit adtentions.

AN old correspondent in Philadelphia speaks of the Rev. Dr. B——, who, on being called on to offer prayer at a Commencement of one of the medical colleges of that city, prayed for the Faculty, the College, and the Graduates—"that the Lord would give healing efficacy to the medicines administered by them; but if, in his all-wise Providence, there should be among their patients those who were appointed unto death, that they might be permitted to enter into the rest prepared for the people of God, and that their attendants might soon follow them!"

AT a missionary meeting in one of the cities near New York, after a financial crisis had swept over the land, Dr. Medico, who wears a valuable diamond-ring, had been speaking of the importance of missionary labor. In making gestures the brilliant flashed in the light, and could be very distinctly seen. Brother C——, whose worldly wealth consisted in part of a valuable watch and chain, followed, and remarked that, in times like these, we should be as economical as possible, as the treasury was empty; especially, said he, should we dispense with all superfluities, especially jewelry. Deacon S—— coincided with the last speaker; and proposed, as an example, that he and Brother C—— should give their watches. Brother C—— promptly agreed, and each walked forward to the table in front of the desk, Brother C—— unfastening his watch from the chain. Deacon S——, who had left the watch he usually carried to be repaired, deliberately drew out an old "bull's-eye." Brother C—— stood a moment, and spoke: "No, you

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

don't, Deacon S——; that ain't your best watch!"—and refastening his own watch returned to his seat. It not being watch-night, the meeting was speedily closed.

THE question whether hanging should be abolished was recently discussed by a debating society in Brighton, Michigan. Sim Wool was adverse to the suspensory process, as may be gathered from his peroration: "Mr. President, talk of hanging for stealing! Why, Sir, where would I have been, where would you have been, where would we all have been, if hanging were the penalty for that offense?" Let the codifiers answer.

A JOCULAR citizen of Ohio, now serving his country in the capital of that State, has ferreted out the following, and has a notion that it will look well in brevier:

In our Legislature are several clergymen of different denominations. Prominent among them is the Rev. Mr. W——, a Cumberland Presbyterian. A few days since the Rev. Mr. S——, a Campbellite Baptist, introduced a bill to amerce sheriffs in certain cases of malfeasance in office. The Rev. Mr. W——, who to his solid piety adds a rich vein of humor, objected to the bill as a covert attempt on the part of the honorable gentleman to make Campbellites out of all the sheriffs of the State by compelling them to be immersed!" A dastardly effort at propagandism!

AT a recent Sunday-school examination in Ailsa Craig, Canada West, the Superintendent asked: "Why did our Lord's father and mother have to go to Bethlehem to be taxed?" This was a poser; but little Harry S——, who had heard at home much assessment talk, held up his hand.

"Well, Harry, what is it?" said the Superintendent.

Master H——, with grave voice and countenance, replied: "Because they owned a manger there!"

That youth should be placed near the person of Commissioner Rollins, at Washington.

THE æsthetics of sign-painting may be regarded as having reached the highest possible development in Albany, where one who claims to be "a man and a brother" as well as a barber, has placed over his door the following inscription:

TONSORIAL OPERATOR AND CAPILLARY REGENERATOR.

The which reminds us of one of those frightful sensation novels aptly described as "a tricopherous or hair-raising narrative!"

NOT long since a distinguished and witty member of the United States Senate having "suffered from an accident of hospitality" (as Mr. Webster neatly phrased it), and really needing reconstruction, was seen winding his d vious way homeward when he fell into the sewer opening at the corner of Fourteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue. The accident attracted the attention of a policeman, who came and helped him out. The Senator straightened himself up, and, assuming a mock dignity, said: "Do you know who I am, Sir?" The policeman did know, but said he didn't. "Well, Sir," exclaimed the Senator, throwing back his head, "I'm the greatest statesman in this country, Sir—I'm Sewer-ed!"

FROM the classic groves of Pompey (Onondaga County) comes the subjoined, which we type just to show what Pompey is capable of producing when she exerts herself:

Soon after President Johnson took that trip to Chicago, ostensibly to lay the corner-stone of the Douglas Monument, but in reality to "swing around the circle," as the public-spirited Mr. Petroleum V. Nasby styles it, an old lady, up in the hills of Onondaga, asked the person who was reading the account to her whether "the President did act'ally take the monument along with him?"

The good soul knew what grave-stones meant, but wasn't so well up in her monumentals.

THE last novel by Miss Annie Thomas, entitled "Played Out," forms No. 288 of Harper's Library of Select Novels. A lady "friend of the family" dropped in at Franklin Square a few days since, on her way to the New Haven Dépôt, and asked for something pleasant to read in the cars. The party addressed handed her "Played Out," remarking that he was now impertinently designated as "Old 288" by the faster youth of the establishment. "Evidently à propos," said the lady, "for you are just a little too (2) gross!"

A VALIANT non-commissioned officer, who left a fair portion of his "corporal" frame at Gettysburg, lately came to New York, hoping to obtain some employment by which he could support self and wife. Being altogether short, he made a call-loan of $5 of the gentleman to whom he applied, who knew his honesty. Subsequently this kind-hearted person procured for him a temporary situation as night-watchman in a distillery that had been seized by the revenue-officers; but this was of short duration. Down came he again to the office of our informant and stated his misfortunes. "Indeed," said he, "my money is all gone, and I don't know what I'm to do. When there are no seizures I get no pay." "Of course not," was the reply; "aut seizure [Cæsar] aut nihil!"

AN "advanced young lady" of say seven summers places great stress upon what she deems to be due to misses of that mature age (of course she lives in Boston), and reserves to herself the right to show her dislike to certain persons. Upon being informed that a young man was in the parlor, and told to go and see him, she trotted in, and patronizingly remarked: "Oh! Mr. K——'s little boy! How do you do, dear?" Mr. K——'s "little boy" was seventeen years of age, and was so fortunate as to be able to enjoy his stated rations.

A BELLE from the rear part of Ulster County was invited by her city cousins to make them a visit during last winter's holidays, and promised that it should be made as lively and jolly as possible. It was the good creature's first trip to town. She was twenty, in glorious health, weighed a hundred and sixty, and could tire down any of your city damsels in "straight work" at a regular

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ball. The ladies accepted an invitation to one of the fashionable "assemblies," and took the country lass along. Great was her delight thereat. Did she dance much? Well, I should say so! Not a cotillion or country dance but she was on the floor and did her prettiest. By-and-by a dapper youth, with nascent mustache, approached, and with great diffidence asked if she would do him the honor to join in a waltz? "No, Sir!" said she. "I can go the cotillions right along; but when you come to the whirling-round business it makes me puke! Not any waltz for me!"

A CHANCERY suit has been defined as a legal skrimmage in which all parties take the chances. Something of this sort is now going on in the Chancery Court at Springfield, Illinois, where three sets of children are claiming to be the lawful heirs of one man. Mr. Edwards is of counsel and was resisting all the claimants. General Palmer appeared for one set of children. Mr. Edwards wished to have the legitimacy of all three sets tried at once. General Palmer sought an opportunity to present the claims of his clients and have the question in which they were interested tried by itself. Mr. Edwards earnestly objected: "No, Sir; we are not willing to divide this case. We want to take up all these marriages at once and dispose of them, and not prolong this case forever. I repeat, Sir: we are not willing to make mince-meat of this case."

"As I understand it," said General Palmer, dryly, "to have mince-meat you must have the flesh of different animals. Mr. Edwards wants to do that; we do not."

A PHILADELPHIA gentleman of festive tastes, who takes a "fair shake" at all the obtainable pleasures of the town, last week assisted at a heavy dinner, took much potable, and did not leave for home until ever-so-many o'clock. On reaching his door-steps and fishing up his night-key, he became satisfied that he was essentially convivialized, and not precisely in that condition which a good husband should be in to meet a good wife. Cautiously entering the hall he stopped, listened a moment, heard no noise, and congratulated himself that the family were asleep. Quietly he took off over-coat, drew off boots, turned off hall-light, slowly ascended stairs to family bedroom, hesitated at door, believed he was reasonably right, stealthily entered, found gas turned low, wife apparently asleep, thought she was asleep, sat down, listened again, no stir; began to undress: got coat, vest, pants, drawers, stockings all safely off; was journeying carefully toward couch when wife of bosom quietly asked:

"Coming to bed, dear?"

"Yes, love."

"Well, dear, hadn't you better take off your hat?"

WE are solicited to take cognizance of the following case of legal oppression recently imposed upon a jury in Colorado. It comes verified by a government functionary of that red-tinted Territory:

Judge G——, of Brooklyn, while sitting as Judge of the District Court in Denver, had made himself noted among delinquent jurors by the manner in which he held them to the discharge of their duties. The jury in this case had been out three days, in great discomfort, and sought relief in these beautiful and touching lines:

"Judge G——, Judge G——, you are a sinner,
If you don't let us have some dinner;
There ain't no show for a decision,
And we are hankering for provision."

THE Tennessee Legislature was in session when Fort Donelson fell, leaving the Federals free to occupy Nashville. Hearing a great stir in the Governor's office below, a committee was sent to see what was going on. They found his Excellency packing up preparatory to leaving. He handed the committee a dispatch announcing the fall. When the committee returned Mr. W. was in the chair, and just on the point of adjourning. Addressing the House, he said: "And now, gentlemen, God will take care of us, and if we do not meet again here we shall meet in heaven."

A member from East Tennessee, who had been dozing off the effects of the fluid to which he was addicted, hearing the last words of the Speaker's remarks, roused up and delivered himself thus: "Stop! Mr. Chairman, don't adjourn us to that place. If you do we shall never get a quorum!"

NEXT day the same member, while in the cars waiting for departure, called out to the Governor as he was passing through—"Look here, Governor, are we running, or are we falling back for a firmer stand?"

THE same individual seeing John Bell, the candidate of "the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the Laws," the day after he succumbed to rebelism, began to stare at him. Bell asked why he was thus gazed at? "Well," replied our friend, "I was looking at the last of 'the Union, Constitution, and enforcement of the Laws!'"

"H. M.," of Baltimore, thinks he perceives in the following a small call to mirth:

In the latter part of 1864 a North Carolina soldier was one day passing a house in the country, in which he heard a young lady playing the piano and singing. Stepping on the piazza, he paused and listened. When the damsel had ceased her song, he put his head through the open window and said, "If you please, miss, be kind enough to claw the ivory and howl again!" Somewhat startled, she asked what he meant? "Why, play and sing some more;" which she good-naturedly did, and the warrior from the tar and turpentine State "retreated in good order," carrying off all his arms, but no forage.

THE congregation at Cannonsville were recently moved to donate sundry edibles and things to their worthy pastor, Mr. Wakeman; whereupon, being a wide-awakeman, he promptly acknowledged the present in the following paragram in the village paper:

CANNONSVILLE, Jan. 19, 1967.

A good and acceptable visit was made by a portion of the brethren and sisters of the Baptist Church of Cannonsville, for the benefit of Rev. J. B. Wakeman, and was thankfully received by him. It is a kind reward for his labor of love and toil among them for nearly two years. I feel to offer prayers more earnestly for God's blessing to rest upon the Church. We need a good coat and vest. Our friend and brother, D. D. Chamberlain, let us have one last year. Who

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google will be the first to let us have one this year? Though it is written, "Think not what ye shall eat, or drink, or wherewithal ye shall be clothed."

J. B. WAKEMAN.

FROM far out in the Genesee country, in the town where our old friend Colonel Pettibone is magnate, comes this brief statement of fact:

A little Union girl, whose father had just returned from the war with an honorable discharge, went to visit a relative in a distant county accompanied by a lady. Arriving late in the evening at Uncle B.'s, our little patriotess being much fatigued, proposed to retire, and solicited her companion to go with her. "Oh no," replied she, "I must sit up until Uncle B. has prayers." "Pray!" said our little friend—"does Uncle B. pray? Why, I thought he was a Democrat."

What a partisan!

THEY have their linguists in Nevada as well as in San Diego, judging from the inquiry of a gentleman of a financial turn of mind, who desired to be informed what the receipts of the County had been for the last physical year.

Again: the village blacksmith had heard of the Siamese twins and the wonderful bond of union between them. "Well, now, I wonder!" said he, stopping with uplifted hammer. "And do you mean to say that that legacy can't be cut?"

When Chang and Eng were first exhibited in New York a curious inquirer went up to the exhibitor, and asked, "These the Siamese?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Brothers, I presume?"

On the whole he thought they were.

FROM the great city of M'Minnville, Tennessee, where a large portion of the more intelligent population devote their leisure hours to the perusal of the wisdom that appears in the Drawer, we receive the subjoined:

It happened in this way: The day was very warm. For weeks there had been no rain. Vegetation was drying up. A preacher of the "Methodist Church [very] South," whose heart and soul was in the cause of the rebels, during his opening prayer, said: "O Lord, send down the refreshing shower and revive the drooping vegetation. Send a good shower—[pausing]. But, Lord, do not send enough to raise the Cumberland River, so that the Yankee gun-boats can come and take Nashville!"

A SAN DIEGO (California) correspondent sends the original of the following advertisement of one of the opulent farmers of that neighborhood:

NOTICE is her by given to all hume it may consurn that the under signd intends to commens to Bait for Bear and all other Varments that may molest his enclosiers on the twentyth of this instant I shall not Putt any Bait out side of my enclosier it is nearly time to commens a nother Crop & I wish to get rid of the Varments before I sow a grain a gain I am resolved to Bait and trap the next year out before I bee eat up a gain J. M. D——.

November 11th 1866

UNCLE LYMAN H——, who lives in the vicinity of Gravesville, Wisconsin, is somewhat given, the people do say, to useless ornamentation in the way of stating things. One day our correspondent found him at the post-office, mourning over the manner in which he had been slandered:

"Why," said he, "don't you think they say that I said I had, while a boy, mowed a hundred swathes of hay, a mile long, in one day—and that would be a hundred miles!"

I, of course, sympathized with him, but spoke of the folly of a person of his years telling such absurd stories. And I mentioned his having asserted that he had dressed a thousand feet of siding one morning before breakfast, when three hundred was a day's work.

"I did do that," said he, "and can whip any man who says I didn't. I not only did it, but had breakfast in pooty good season too!"

IN a copy of the United States Gazette, published in 1779, we find an account of a flag-presentation which may edify that large portion of our population who have latterly participated in little affairs of that sort. On the day after the battle of Fort Moultrie, in 1779, Mrs. Elliott presented to Colonel Moultrie's Second South Carolina Regiment a banner. Surrounded by the beauty and fashion of the day, the Colonel stepped forth and, receiving the flag from Mrs. E., acknowledged it in a very appropriate and eloquent speech. In closing, he turned suddenly to his men, and said: "My gallant companions, you see the reward of courage and fortitude! You have fought and have conquered, and the brave fellows who fell in the carnage of yesterday are now in heaven riding in their chariots like the very devil!"

A BALTIMORE correspondent gives account of a famous old rooster whose firm-set joints and firmer flesh were not hankered after by those before whom he was placed as an edible dainty. "And when I reflected upon his fate," says the correspondent, "I felt that if Cowper had immortalized a cat, and Pindar a dog, why should I suffer this deserving cock, now a 'Bird of Paradise,' to go his last journey without one note to sing his praise, one line to mark his fate? No! if he could not tender me a dinner I'll tender him an epitaph:

"Here lies, in plenitude of years,
A noble chanticleer;
He led a virtuous chicken life,
And died without a fear.
Here lie his bones, and muscles too,
Untouched by carver's art;
Tenacious to the very last,
In death they would not part."

"BEATS there a heart with soul so dead" that it can not admire the legal acumen and noble sense of justice that percolates, as one might say, through every line of the following, which cometh from Whitehall, Green County, Illinois?

Judge H——, Ex-M. C. from this District, in the early part of his practice was called upon to conduct a cause for the plaintiff in a suit before Squire W——. The defendant, having small hope of success, did not employ counsel. The plaintiff's counsel had it all his own way; and, after summing up, submitted the case for the decision of the Court. The Squire arose, and said "that as the defendant had no counsel, he would make some remarks on that side of the question himself!"

How he succeeded on "that side" is not stated. It may be conjectured that he "took the papers and reserved his decision," as our city judges do.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
3 9015 05609 0437

NON-CIRCULATING PERIODICAL COLLECTION

Replaced with Commercial Microform

1995

Digitized by Google

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google